[K] And came off upon very reaſonable terms.] I meet with three paſſages which relate to him, in the defamatory writings of Jarrige the quondam Jeſuit, the firſt of which runs thus: Father John Adam, one of the beſt Preachers among the Jeſuits, explain'd to an * Urſuline of the convent of St. Macarius the Treatiſe on Generation; and ſpoke as plainly of thoſe parts which contribute to the procreation of children, as Du Laurent does in his Anatomy (21). The ſecond paſſage is as follows: All thoſe who were of the college of Poictiers in 1646, know the quarrel that aroſe been John Adam and James Biroat, two of the moſt conſiderable perſons of their order. Theſe attacked one another ſo vigorouſly, that they diſcovered by the ſecret providence of God their own filthy obſcenities; and James Biroat was convicted, &c. (22). The third declares, that John Adam, the moſt able Preacher among them, was ſon to a * journeyman-taylor or botcher (23). Now, of theſe three paſſages, the firſt only can be injurious to Father Adam's memory; for the ſecond throws on Biroat only the filth which their quarrel was the occaſion of bringing to light. Conſequently, whatever ſcandal and ſecret hiſtory had revealed to Father Jarrige concerning Father Adam, it amounted only to this; that he had read ſome anatomical lectures, on the procreation of children, to a Nun. Once again, this is getting out of Father Jarrige's hands upon very eaſy terms; which every one muſt allow, who reflects ever ſo little on the character of his work. Had Father Jarrige told us the Nun's age, we then might have formed a better judgment of the crime. To converſe on this ſubject with a young Nun, is undoubtedly a great ſin, becauſe it is morally impoſſible but diſcourſes of ſuch a nature muſt raiſe impure ideas: but I ſhould be glad to hear a caſuiſt of good ſenſe, who was neither of a too looſe nor too ſevere a turn of mind, examine the following queſtion: Would a Nun, who is in ſo advanced an age, that ſhe could attend to an anatomical lecture on the organs of generation, with the ſame coolneſs and indifference as ſhe could bear the ſtructure of the ear explained; would, I ſay, the curioſity of attending to ſuch a lecture, be imputed to her for a ſin? I believe it will be granted me, that it is very lawful for a woman, whatever may be her ſtation or condition in life, to know all that relates to the circulation of the blood. It is not a ſin for her to know, that the moſt ſubtle parts of the chyle paſs from the inteſtines into the lacteal veins, and from thence ſucceſſively into the cavity diſcovered by Pequet, into the Ductus Thoracicus, into the ſubclavian vein, into the hollow vein, into the right ventricle of the heart, into the artery of the lungs, into the vein of the lungs, into the left ventricle of the heart, and into the great artery. It will be no crime in ſuch a woman to know, the opening and ſhutting of the valves ſeated in the extremity of the veins and arteries, the anaſtomoſes (orifices of the veins and arteries where they meet) the ſecretion of urine, &c. Why then would it be criminal in her to go through a complete courſe of Anatomy; and to ſtudy very exactly, whatever is ſaid on the conſtruction of thoſe parts (externally and internally) by which children are procreated? The guilt could not conſiſt in the bare knowledge of theſe things; conſequently it muſt conſiſt in the impure ideas which either preceded, accompanied or followed ſuch a courſe or ſtudy. But then I ſuppoſe, that ſuch a woman was no more affected with theſe lectures, than ſhe would be with ſtudying the anatomy of the ear. This is the caſe on which we are to argue. As I my ſelf don't ſet up for a Caſuiſt, I ſhall leave the deciſion of this point, to thoſe whoſe province it is; and ſhall only obſerve, that thoſe perſons who are not obliged by their profeſſion to know theſe things, particularly ſuch as have made a vow of chaſtity, would do well to ſuppreſs every curioſity of this kind, and never gratify it: whence it follows, that Father Adam could not have own'd the fact, without confeſſing himſelf guilty of a fault at the ſame time. The moſt favourable conſtruction people would put upon this matter is, that his female auditor made this her maxim; Amare liceat, ſi potiri non licet. Dum caremus veris, gaudia falſa juvant. That is,

" To love is lawful, tho' not to enjoy,
" Wanting true joys, fictitious ones delight.

[L] He is not the firſt who has ſpoke ſlightingly of St. Auſtin.] Sarrau, in a letter of his to Salmaſius in 1646, obſerves, that the Jeſuits declared daily from the pulpit, that St. Auſtin was not the rule of faith; and that he had advanced ſeveral things indiſcreetly, merely to remove the objections which were made to him. Non eſt hic pater regula fidei, ut ſe expediret ab argumentis hæreticorum ſui temporis multa liberiùs & inconſideratiùs dixit, quibus non tenemur (24). Father Adam, four days after his preaching this ſermon, owned to a perſon who repreſented to him the miſchief which that piece might occaſion, That Gabriel à Porta the Jeſuit would often ſay, that it were to be wiſhed, St. Auſtin had never writ concerning grace (25). A long time before the riſe of Janſenius's doctrine, ſome Divines had declared very freely, that St. Auſtin carried matters too far; and that when he was combating certain adverſaries, he flew with ſo much violence from their erroneous tenets, that he ſeemed to run into the oppoſite extreme; as for inſtance, when he oppoſed the error of the Pelagians, he ſeemed to approach too near that of the Manichees; and on the contrary, in combating the principles of the Manichees, he ſeemed to approve of the Pelagian hereſy. An Iriſhman, Paulus Leonardus by name, cites thereupon Genebrard, Cornelius Muſſus Biſhop of Bitonto, Cajetan and Sixtus Sinenſis (26); but father Annat cites a great many more in the work, where he endeavours to prove, that St. Auſtin was not of Janſenius's opinion (27). See what father Noris anſwers to the great cloud of witneſſes, which are oppoſed to that famous Biſhop of Hippo. Some Proteſtants ſeem inclined to think, that St. Auſtin carried matters too far: I don't hint at the Philoſophical Commentary (28), wherein father Adam's deciſion is in ſome meaſure approved; nor of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (29), where St. Auſtin is drawn directly to father Adam's mind; but the perſon I have in view is Mr. Daillé, who not only involves St. Auſtin in the accuſation which is levelled againſt the fathers in general, viz. that in flying from one precipice, they ſeem to run down another (30); but accuſes him alſo, of treating things too much after the fluctuating manner of the Academical Philoſophers, or followers of Plato (31). A little book was, not long ſince, publiſhed, entitled, Avis importans à Mr. Arnaud ſur le Projet d'une nouvelle Bibliothéque d'Auteurs Janſeniſts. i. e. (" Important Advice to Mr. " Arnauld, upon the propoſal for compiling a new " Bibliotheque (Library) of Janſeniſt writers,") where we are told, that a third party is forming, which will be neither Janſeniſt nor Moliniſt; and that theſe will ſuſpend St. Auſtin, ſo very nicely, between heaven and earth, that he won't ſtand either too high or too low. Such a medium as this would reconcile all animoſities, if people would be but reaſonable; and a man might be either a Janſeniſt or Moliniſt, juſt as he pleaſed. Ought not the Jeſuits to be ſatisfied, if St. Auſtin is not allowed to be the rule of faith? Did they deſire more than this, in thoſe books where the deputies of the Janſeniſts (32) extracted upwards of an hundred propoſitions, which ſtruck at the authority of that father of the church?

[M] Inſinuated, that St. Paul's too great vivacity, made him exaggerate.] We meet in the Cenſure of father Adam's Sermon (33), a paſſage of father Cauſſin, where St. Paul and St. Auſtin are compared to two great ſeas which ſwell through an impetuoſity of ſpirit to ſuch a degree on one ſhore, that one would imagine they intended to leave the oppoſite dry for a time; but, in the ſame manner as the ocean, after having ſpread itſelf wide on one ſide, returns to thoſe limits which the Creator had preſcribed to it, ſo theſe, after falling upon thoſe rebellious ſpirits who riſe up againſt

* The Urſulines are Nuns (called from St. Urſula) who follow St. Auſtin's rule, and undertake the inſtruction and education of young girls.

(21) Jarrige, Jéſuites mis ſur l'ecba faut. i. e. " The Jeſuits ſet on the ſcaffold, chap. 10.

(22) Ibid.

* The French is couturier, ſignifying properly a country taylor, or a journeyman taylor in great towns, who botches old clothes for brokers, or for the poorer ſort of people.

(23) Jarrige, Réponſe a Jaques Beaufés, ch. 14.

A DOUBT propoſed to Caſuiſts with regard to a curioſity in Anatomy.

(24) Vide Epiſt. Sarravii, p. 196.

(25) Defenſe de St. Auguſtin contre le P. Adam, p. 24.

(26) Paulus Leonard. Reſponſ. ad Expoſtulationes contra ſcientiam mediam, p. 117, 118.

(27) Annati Auguſtinus vindicatus à Bajanis.

(28) Part III. p. 4. See alſo the Supplement, p. 2.

(29) Tome 14. p. 287.

(30) Daillé, de l'emploi des Peres, p. 153.

(31) Ibid. p. 393.

(32) In 1653. See the Memorial hiſtorique touchant les V propoſitions, p. 82.

(33) Pag. 17.

ADAM (MELCHIOR) lived in the ſeventeenth Century. As he took ſuch indefatigable pains to collect, adjuſt and publiſh the lives of a vaſt number of learned men, it was but juſt that ſome perſon ſhould do him the ſame good office; and yet this is what, I believe, no one has yet attempted. Moreri promiſed to take notice of him, but forgot his engagement when the time came for his performing it (a). His promiſe and non-performance have ſubſiſted hitherto, in all the editions of his Dictionary (b). It was ſcarce poſſible that a perſon ſhould forget a writer, whence he had borrowed ſo many articles: and with regard to myſelf, ſo great is the advantage I have reaped from his labours, that I would very willingly have ſhewn my gratitude, by giving a large account of his life, could I have met with materials for that purpoſe. Here follows what I could collect on this head. MELCHIOR ADAM was born in the territory of Grotkaw in Sileſia, and went thro' his ſtudies in the college of Brieg, where the Dukes who receive their title from thence, gave the moſt favourable protection to learning, and in particular to the reform'd religion (c); that I mean which a Roman Catholic would call Calviniſm. Here our young ſcholar was firmly riveted in Proteſtant principles, and enabled to purſue his ſtudies by the liberality of a perſon of great quality (d), who had left ſeveral exhibitions for the education of a certain number of young ſtudents. He was made principal of a College in Heidelberg (e), in which city he publiſhed, anno 1615, the firſt volume of his Illuſtrious Men. This firſt volume comprehending the Philoſophers, and under that title, the Poets, the Writers on Polite Literature, the Hiſtorians, &c. was followed by three others; that which included the Divines was printed in 1619; that of the Civilians or Lawyers came afterwards; and finally, that of the Phyſicians. The two laſt of which were printed in 1620. The ſeveral Literati whoſe lives are comprehended in theſe four volumes in 8°, lived in the ſixteenth, or the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, and are all Germans or Flemings; but he publiſhed in 1618 the lives of twenty Divines of other countries, in a ſeparate volume. All his Divines were Proteſtants. Though he has given us but a few of theſe lives, they nevertheleſs coſt him a great deal of time and pains, becauſe he abridged the ſeveral pieces which furniſhed him with materials, whether Lives, properly ſo called, Funeral Sermons, printed Bills relating to Declamations; Elogiums, Prefaces, or Memoirs of Families; not to mention the multitude of ſummaries he has thrown into the margin. He has omitted ſome perſons, who as juſtly deſerved a place in his work, as ſeveral of thoſe he has taken notice of [A]. He did not pleaſe the Lutherans (f), for theſe pronounce him a partial writer, and will not allow his collection to be a proper ſtandard, for forming a judgment of the learning of the Germans (g). He wrote other works [B], (a) Under the word ADAM, he bids the reader ſee Melchior Adam; but when he looks for Melchior, he finds nothing to that purpoſe.

(b) This is writ in June 1698.

(c) Melch. Adam. in Epiſt. Dedicat. Germani Theolog.

(d) Joachim Bergerus. See the Epiſt. Dedicatory to his German Philoſophers.

(e) Henn. Witte. Diarium Biograph.

(f) See Konig, Biblioth. vet. & nov. p. 8. ubi citatur Henningi Witte, Præfat. Memor. Theologorum, p. 17, 18.

(g) Morhofius, Polyhiſtor, pag. 192, 209.

*against the truth, return with a peaceable equality to edify the houſe of God. Here we have the wheel, that whirls round more than it is ordered to do, to which we have heard a Miniſter compare the ſpirit of prophecy (34). St. Paul and St. Auſtin are ſometimes very intemperate in their expreſſions, but they afterwards return back, like the tide, to thoſe bounds which God has ſet them. Incomparable ſure! Hence a man is happily enabled to anſwer very eaſily all ſuch paſſages of St. Paul, as may interfere with his private ſentiments; for he need only declare, that the Saint had then overflowed the whole country; and that he muſt be waited for, till he return into the bed or channel which God had made for him. Sir Edwin Sandys informs me of a particular, which ſuits ſo well the preſent occaſion, that I muſt not omit it here. Some parts of Scripture, as St. Paul's Epiſtles, they (the Romaniſts) are ſo jealous of, and think ſo dangerous, that by report of divers, (for my ſelf did not hear it) ſome of their Jeſuits of late in Italy in ſolemn ſermon, and other their favourites elſewhere in private communication, commending between them St. Peter for a worthy ſpirit, have cenſured St. Paul for a hot-headed perſon, who was tranſported ſo with his pangs of zeal and eagerneſs beyond all compaſs in ſundry his diſputes, that there was no great reckoning to be made of his aſſertions; yea he was dangerous to read as ſavouring of hereſy in ſome places, and better he had not written of thoſe matters at all. Agreeable to which I have heard other of their Catholics deliver, that it hath been heretofore very ſeriouſly conſulted among them, to have cenſured by ſome means and reformed the writings of St. Paul; though for my own part I muſt profeſs I can hardly believe this, as being an attempt too too abominable and blaſphemous, and for theſe times alſo too deſperate a ſcandal. But howſoever, he of all other is leaſt beholden to them; whom of mine own knowledge and hearing, ſome of them teach in pulpits, not to have been ſecure of his preaching but by conference with St. Peter and other of the Apoſtles; nor that he durſt publiſh his Epiſtles till they had allowed them (35). In how abſurd a manner do theſe people argue! If St. Paul's Epiſtles were approved of by St. Peter, are they then not as authentic as can be deſired?

* Of the Holy Court, tom. 3. Maxim 6 of Predeſtination, num. 2.

(34) Near the cloſe of the remark [E] above.

(35) State of Religion in the weſtern parts of the world, pag. 127. By Sir Edwin Sandys, Kt London printed for Tho. Baſſet 1673. 8°.

[A] He has omitted ſome perſons, who as juſtly deſerved a place in this work, as ſeveral of thoſe he has taken notice of.] This he himſelf confeſſes, but declares at the ſame time, that he had no particular views in acting thus, and that the only reaſon of it was his want of materials. However, he intended to ſupply theſe omiſſions in other volumes, as appears from his own words: Quædam mihi monendus, aut rogandus es, mi lector. Primùm, ne præteritos aut omiſſos non paucos quæraris, haud indignos, qui hoc in theatro appareant. In eo mea, mi lector, culpa nulla eſt: ſed penuria fecit hiſtoriæ; quam nanciſci nullam uſpiam potui. Malui itaque prorſus tacere de multis præſtantibus viris, quàm, ut ille de Carthagine, pauca dicere; & trita illa, Natus eſt, obiit, ſcribere. Suppleri tamen poterit hic defectus, volente Deo, & mutuas operas tradentibus bonis patriæque amantibus, ſi hujus voluminis tomus ſecundus fuerit adornatus. Quod idem dictum volo, de reliquis Vitis Juriſconſultorum & Politicorum, Medicorum ac Philoſophorum (1). i. e. "Reader, I am to acquaint you with ſome things, and requeſt others of you: Firſt, that you would not conclude, that the many perſons who are omitted in this work, were not worthy a place in it. The fault, reader, is no ways mine, but is owing to the ſcarcity of materials, which it was impoſſible for me to procure. I therefore choſe to ſay nothing of many excellent perſons, rather than (like the man ſpeaking of Carthage) to ſay but a very little, and to uſe thoſe trite words,* He was born; he died. However, this defect, God willing, may be ſupplied, provided good men and lovers of their country will but grant me their aſſiſtance, when the ſecond volume of this work ſhall be prepared. The ſame I deſire may be underſtood of the reſt of the lives of Civilians, Politicians, Phyſicians, and Philoſophers."

(1) Melch. Adam. Præfat. Theolog. Germanorum.

* Like that whimſical epitaph mentioned in the Spectator, Here lies John Hall Spittle-fields weaver, and that's all.

works [B], and died in 1622. See Baillet's Jugemens des Sçavans, Vol. II, pag. 177 and 178.

(B] He wrote other works.] Viz. Apographum Monumentorum Heidelbergenſium. Notæ in Orationem Julii Cæſaris. Scaligeri pro M. T. Ciceronе contra Citeronianum Eraſmi. Parodiæ & Metaphraſes Horatianæ (2). He is not author of Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſtica Eccleſiæ Hamburgenſis & Bremenſis, as is declared in the catalogue of the Bodleian Library; that work being written by one ADAM a Canon of Bremen, who lived in the 11th Century. Conringius and Poſſevinus place him in the 10th Century, but they are miſtaken. See Mollerus, page 65, Part firſt of Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ.

(2) Ex Diario Biograph. Henningi Witte.

ADAM, à Joyner of Nevers, a French Poet. Vide BILLAUT.

ADAMITES (a), a ridiculous ſect, which ſome writers declare to have been a branch of the Carpocratians and Valentinians (b). According to Theodoret, one Prodicus was the founder of it [A]. St. Epiphanius ſays that they received the name of Adamites, from one Adam, who lived in the time that they were ſo called (c). But it is more probable, according to St. Auſtin (d), that they were denominated from Adam, from whom all mankind ſprung; for theſe wretches went naked, in imitation of our firſt parents in the ſtate of innocence, and condemned marriage for this reaſon, viz. becauſe Adam did not know Eve till after his fall, and after he was drove out of paradiſe. Theſe ſectariſts, therefore, ſuppoſed, that marriage would not have been inſtituted, had man continued in his primitive innocency; and indeed, they made a vow of continence, and a monaſtic life (e). They never appeared naked but in their aſſemblies [B], when their religious exerciſes were to be performed (f); and uſed to meet in a ſtove-room, under which a fire was made, in order to expel the cold. They uſed to ſtrip themſelves at their coming into it, when both women and men, the Clergy as well as the Laity, were as naked as when they came from the womb; after which they ſeated themſelves in a random manner on benches that were fixed one above the other, and fell to their devotions; and theſe being ended, they dreſſed themſelves, and returned to their reſpective habitations. Any perſon who committed a fault, was excluded the aſſembly [C]; on which occaſion they uſed to ſay, that having, as Adam had done, eaten of the forbidden fruit, they deſerved, like him, to be drove out of paradiſe, for ſo theſe Sectariſts called their church. So far St. Epiphanius informs us on this head [D], and that not from books,

(a) St. Auſtin calls them Adamiani, after St. Epiphanius, who calls them Ἀδαμιανοί.

(b) See Danæum in Aug. de Hæreſ. cap. 31.

(c) Epiphan. in Synopſi, tom. 1. lib. 2. p. 397.

(d) Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. 31.

(e) See the remark [C]

(f) Epiph. Hæreſ. 52.

[A] According to Theodoret, one Prodicus was the founder of it (1).] Baronius places him in the year 120, and anterior to Valentinus; for which reaſon he cenſures in another place (2), thoſe who rank him among the diſciples of Valentinus. If this be true, Lambert Daneau (Danæus) whom I have cited, is not worthy of credit. I ſhall ſpeak of this Prodicus in a ſeparate article.

(1) Theodoret. Hæret. Fabul. lib. 1.

(2) Baronius ad ann. 175. numb. 33.

[B] They never appeared naked but in their aſſemblies.] Danæus was therefore miſtaken, when he included among their errors the obligation Chriſtians of both ſexes were under of walking the ſtreets naked. Oportere Chriſtianos homines verſari in PUBLICO, in cœtu eccleſiæ, in precibus, nudos, ſive mares ſint, ſive fœminæ (3).

(3) Danæus, in Auguſt. de Hæret. cap. 31. fol. 83.

[C] He was excluded the aſſembly.] St. Epiphanius declares, that theſe Sectariſts profeſſed continence and the monaſtic life, and condemned marriage. Μονάζοντές τε καὶ ἐγκρατευόμενοι ὄντες καὶ γάμου μὴ ἀνεχόμενοι (4). We therefore are not to doubt, but that fornication and adultery were condemned by their tenets; and conſequently, that they excommunicated and excluded thoſe from their aſſemblies, who were guilty of theſe crimes. And we are to obſerve, that altho' this ancient Father of the church will not allow of what the Adamites uſed to alledge, viz. that they ſtript themſelves, becauſe they were no more aſhamed of their nakedneſs than Adam was: it is, I ſay, to be obſerved, that altho' St. Epiphanius chuſes rather to impute their behaviour to an inſatiable laſciviouſneſs, which prompted them to feed the eye with alluring objects (5), he nevertheleſs does not ſay, that they were guilty of obſcene actions in their aſſemblies. Baronius has therefore aſſerted a falſhood, when he declares that Epiphanius gave the name of brothels (lupinaria) to thoſe Aſſemblies; for he employs the words φωλεὸς, latibulum (a den or covert) and σπηλυγγα, caverna (a cave) (6); and that ſimply in the ſignification of lurking-hole, or cave, as appears from his obſerving, that he would call the conventicles of heretics by that name. It is manifeſt that St. Epiphanius alludes to the following paſſage in the Goſpel, that the houſe of God had been made a den of thieves (7); but nothing is here hinted at relating to bodily impurity, or carnal correſpondence between the ſexes. Father Gaultier was therefore in the wrong to aſſert, (citing St. Epiphanius) that the Adamites, after leaving their clothes at the door of their aſſemblies, mix'd promiſcuouſly with the firſt women they laid hold of, mulieribus promiſcuè utentes (8). With regard to the quotation of Alphonſus de Caſtro, which immediately follows that of St. Epiphanius, in the margin of Father Gaultier's work, the aſſertion in it is as falſe as the abovementioned. Lambertus Danæus, when he accuſes the Adamites of the like impurity, does not quote St. Epiphanius, but Clemens Alexandrinus cited by Theodoret: Extinctis in ſuo cœtu lucernis promiſcuè coeunt, quemadmodum ex Clement. Strom. notat Theodoretus (9). i. e. "The lights being put out, they aſſociate promiſcuouſly, as Theodoret obſerves from the Stromata of Clemens Alexandrinus." The reader will preſently find, that this paſſage is not quoted to the purpoſe. It is pretty ſtrange, that neither St. Epiphanius nor St. Auſtin ſhould have heard any thing of this incident; for common fame ſeldom ſuffers ſuch particulars, when once they are blazed abroad, to paſs into oblivion, unleſs they are palpably proved to be falſe; and even then, they are not always forgot. The reader will find in the following remark, in what manner theſe two Fathers may be reconciled with Alexandrinus.

(4) Epiphan. in Synopſi tom. 1. lib. 2. p. 397.

(5) Ἔπειτα ἐκκόψαι ἰδοῦσῃς κόραις ὀφθαλμῶν ἐμποιοῦσης τὴν θέλξιν. i. e. "They "aſcribe that to "an inſatiable "luſt, which "preſents ſuch "allurements to "the eyes." Epiphan. Hæreſ. 52. p. 460.

(6) Epiph. Hær. 52. p. 459.

(7) Matth. xxi. 12.

[D] So far St. Epiphanius informs us on this head.] He does not ſay, that in their aſſemblies every ſpark ruſh'd upon his damſel; but this was taken notice of in the preceding remark: much leſs does he declare that they had imbibed the heretical tenets of Prodicus, whereof Father Gaultier gives us the catalogue (10), and which Moreri charges them with. The latter is not ſo blame worthy upon this account, as for aſſerting, that St. Epiphanius calls their temples infamous places, becauſe of the abominable crimes they committed in thoſe caves of horror and proſtitution. Moreri adds, that they rejected prayer; which Danæus likewiſe affirms on the teſtimony of Clemens Alexandrinus: Deum à nobis precandum & orandum eſſe negant, quia ſcit ipſe per ſe quibus egeamus. Clemens hoc de illis tradit, lib. 7. Strom. (11). i. e. "They declared that prayers were not to be "offered

(8) Gaulter. Tabul. Chronogr. Sæculo 2. cap. 33.

(9) Danæus in Auguſtin. de Hæreſ. cap. 31. fol. 83.

(10) Gaulter. Tabul. Chronogr. Sæculo 2. cap. 33.

(11) Danæus in Auguſtin. de Hæreſ. cap. 31. fol. 83.

books, or the Adamites themſelves, but from the diſcourſes of ſeveral other perſons; and did not know, whether this ſect was totally aboliſhed in his time, or ſtill exiſted. Evagrius takes notice of certain Monks of Paleſtine, who, from an exceſs of devotion, and to mortify the body, uſed to withdraw into ſolitudes, both men and women, quite naked, thoſe parts excepted which decency will not permit us to name; where they uſed to expoſe themſelves in a moſt unaccountable manner [E], to the inclemencies of the weather (g). We ſhall ſpeak of the modern Adamites under the word PICARDS. I find that both Catholicks and Proteſtants reproach one another [F] with having ſome of theſe Adamites in thoſe countries where their reſpective religions prevail; but perhaps neither party has reaſon to reproach the other upon this account.

(g) Evag. Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 1. cap. 21.

" offered up to God, becauſe of himſelf he knows " what we want &c. Clemens relates this of them " in his Stromata;" yet St. Epiphanius and St. Auſtin declare the contrary: Γυμνοὶ γὰρ ὡς ἐκ μητρὸς . . συνάγονται, καὶ οὕτως τὰς ἀναγνώσεις καὶ εὐχὰς καὶ πᾶν ἑτιοῦν ἐπιτελοῦσι. i. e. " They all aſſemble as naked " as they come from the womb, when they read, " PRAY, and perform the reſt of their religious ex- " erciſes." Theſe are St. Epiphanius's words, in the Summary of book 2d, tom. 1ſt; and St. Auſtin ſpeaks as follows: Nudis itaque mares fœminæque conveniunt, nudi lectiones audiunt, nudi ORANT, nudi celebrant (12) ſacramenta (12). i. e. " Men and women meet to- " gether naked, and in this condition they hear the " leſſons read, they PRAY, and receive the ſacra- " ment." Now theſe two Fathers might be reconciled with Clemens Alexandrinus, if we ſuppoſe that the Adamites, whom the latter declares to have been founded by Prodicus, did not exactly follow all the erroneous rites of Prodicus. Such a ſuppoſition has nothing unlikely in it, ſince ſometimes a ſect, in thirty or forty years, ſhall be very much changed from what it was at its firſt inſtitution: So that it is not juſt to affirm, that the Adamites obſerve all the ridiculous inſtitutions of Prodicus, becauſe he was their founder. It is certain, indeed, from St. Epiphanius and St. Auſtin, that the Adamites uſed to ſtrip themſelves ſtark naked in their aſſemblies; but then Clemens Alexandrinus, ſo far from aſſerting any thing like this of the followers of Prodicus, obſerves, that before they joined in embraces, the candles were taken away to ſave their ſhame. Τὸ καταισχῦνον αὐτῶν τὴν πορνικὴν ταύτην δικαιοσύνην ἐκποδὼν ποιησαμένους φῶς τῇ ἕλκυτι περιτροπῇ μίγνυσθαι (13). Whence it appears, that Danæus ſhould not have applied to the Adamites, what this Father had related concerning the followers of Prodicus. In a word, when I conſider how much the Heathens traduced primitive Chriſtians, and the heavy charge of the Romaniſts againſt the Proteſtants, with regard to nocturnal aſſemblies, I cannot lightly give credit to every accuſation, which a prevailing party ſhall think fit to raiſe.

(12) Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. 31.

(13) Clem. Alex. Stromat. lib. 3. p. 430.

[E] In a moſt unaccountable manner.] Theſe improved on the other Monks ſpoken of by the abovementioned Evagrius, who, having no garment, they could call their own, (the clothes which a Monk wore one day, being uſed by another the next) they yet had always ſome garment to put on (14). But the anchorets in queſtion, wore a girdle only, and put off the human creature as much as they could; for they would not eat the ſame kind of aliments, on which the reſt of mankind fed; they grazed as the beaſts do, and took but juſt ſo much ſuſtenance as would keep them alive: In a word, they became at laſt mere brutes; their very exterior was changed, and the faculties of their minds alſo. The inſtant they ſaw one of their own ſpecies they took to their heels; and if they found themſelves purſued, they ran as faſt as they could, or fled for ſhelter to ſome inacceſſible hole or cave. Some, however, would come into cities, and counterfeit mad-men, the better to ſhew the great contempt they had for worldly glory. They eat in public houſes, went into public baths, convers'd and waſhed with the other ſex; but were ſo very inſenſible on theſe occaſions, that neither the ſight, the touch, nor even the embraces of a woman, excited the leaſt emotion. They were as men with their own ſex, and as women with the fair: in ſhort, they would be of both ſexes. Μετὰ ἀνδρῶν δὲ ἄνδρες εἶναι, μετὰ γυναικῶν τε αὖ γυναῖκας, ἐκστάσεις τε μετέχειν ἀΐδιον φύσεως καὶ μὴ μιᾶς εἶναι (15). We may ſuppoſe, that it was no very difficult matter for theſe anchorets to counterfeit mad-men, and that they were truly ſuch: To theſe we may juſtly apply what Rutilius Numatianus ought not to have ſpoken of all kinds of anchorets,

(14) Evagrius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 21.

(15) Idem, lib. 1. cap. 21.

Quænam perverſi rabies tam ſtulta cerebri
Dum mala formides, nec bona poſſe pati (16)?
In Engliſh,
" Whence comes this ſtart of a diſorder'd brain,
" Thus to dread ill, and yet not bear with good.

(16) Rutil. Itiner. lib. 1. ver. 445.

To conclude, their nakedneſs was directly repugnant to the principles of thoſe Monks whom I ſhall mention in the following remark, and could not even be well reconciled with the doctrine of Father Sanchez.

[F] Reproach one another.] Moreri aſſures that there are Adamites in England; that they hold their aſſemblies in the night, and are taught theſe words only, " Swear, forſwear, and don't reveal the ſe- " cret." The editors of the Amſterdam edition of his Dictionary, juſtly obſerv'd, that there is no ſuch ſect in England; that ſo prudent a Government as that of the Engliſh would never ſuffer ſuch vile obſcenities, which could not be concealed; and that it is not probable there are any Adamites in Poland; for Moreri had aſſerted, that ſome of theſe miſtaken wretches are found in that kingdom. The laſt mentioned author could not juſtify himſelf by ſaying, that he does not pretend to affirm that theſe people go naked in public, but only, that they ſtrip themſelves naked in their nightly conventicles, which might be done, and a prudent Government know nothing of the matter: he could not, I ſay, alledge this in his own juſtification, ſince he had juſt before ſpoke of the Adamites of Bohemia, who, it is ſaid, went always naked. Conſequently Moreri, if he knew what he ſaid, muſt aſſert that there are a ſett of people now in England, of which both ſexes go always naked, from a religious principle: now, this could not be concealed from perſons in power, nor would they tolerate it. . . Thus we hear a Romaniſt aſſerting that there are Adamites in Proteſtant countries. I ſhan't take any notice of theſe idle, ridiculous ſtories concerning Holland, which we meet with in the Sorberiana, pag. 17. . . But now, as a counter-part to this, let us hear a Proteſtant Clergyman, declaring that there are Monks in Italy, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Adamites, who go naked in conſequence of a vow they make, agreable to the moſt ſacred rules of their order. Ac ne nunc quidem, ſays he (17), nomen ejus (hæreſis Adamianorum) extaret, niſi Monachi quidam, qui ſe falſo pietatis & vitæ auſteritatis prætextu commendarunt, horum hæreticorum impudentes prorſus mores retinuiſſent, & inter ſanctiſſima ordinis & regulæ ſuæ præcepta poſuiſſent, quales ii qui etiam nunc hodie Adamitæ dicuntur, vigentque plurimum in Italia. . . Vivunt enim nudi, non neceſſitate quadam adacti vel inopia veſtimentorum, ſed ex voti profeſſione. i. e. " But the very name of this hereſy of the " Adamites) would not now ſo much as be heard of, " did not certain Monks, who recommend them- " ſelves by the falſe pretence of leading a pious " and auſtere life, retain the very impudent man- " ners of thoſe hereticks; and placed them among " the moſt holy precepts of their rule and order, " ſuch as they who are even now call'd Adamites, " and flouriſh chiefly in Italy. . . For they go naked, " to which they however are not forc'd either from " neceſſity or want of garments, but from the " vow they make." I wiſh this author had employ'd his endeavours to prove this aſſertion, rather than form account. Were there no other teſtimony than that of Lindanus (b), I would not believe, that in 1535, ſeveral of theſe Adamites, perſons of ſubſtance and of very good families, uſed to run up and down the ſtreets of Amſterdam, ſtark naked; and that ſome were frantic enough to climb up trees, and there wait ſo long, in expectation of bread falling from heaven, till they fell down, half dead, to the ground. I ſhall quote, elſewhere (i) an author (k) who atteſts part of theſe particulars.

(17) Lamb. Danæus in Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. 31.

(b) Lindan. Dubitantii, Dial. 2. p. 171.

(i) In the remark [B] of the article PICARDS.

(k) Lambertus Hortenſius, in Hiſt. Tumult. Anabaptiſt.

form a contraſt between the conduct of the Sectariſts in queſtion, and that of thoſe ancient Monks who had never ſeen themſelves naked (18); and who declared, that a man of their profeſſion who ſhould contemplate his own nakedneſs, would do an action unworthy of it (19). Nevertheleſs, a modern caſuiſt who is none of the moſt rigid (20), conſiders as a venial ſin, propria verenda aſpicere ex quadam curioſitate, abſque alia mala intentione & periculo: i. e. "To view the immodeſt parts in one's ſelf, "merely out of curioſity, without any evil intention;" and a mortal ſin, aſpicere verenda alterius ſexus operta veſtimentis ita ſubtilibus, ut parum aſpectui obſtent (21): i. e. "To ſee in another ſex the "immodeſt parts, covered with garments ſo thin, "that they obſtruct the ſight but very little." To ſee a perſon of a different ſex naked, and ſwimming, is, according to him, a mortal ſin; two men of a grave character (Prelates for inſtance) who ſhould ſee one another naked, would, ſays he (22), be guilty of a mortal ſin. Bernia takes notice of a man, who always put on a glove when he touched his own pudenda (23). Might not a Caſuiſt as well forbid us touching theſe with the naked finger, as the gazing upon them when unveiled? An ancient Philoſopher, from an affectation of chaſtity, would not touch theſe either with, or without a glove, in which he differed very much from the principle of Anacharſis (24). This ancient Philoſopher was the ſevere Xenocrates. Ariſtoles, irridens Chalcedonium Xenocratem, quod meiendo virilibus non admoveret manum, inquit. "Puræ quidem manus, at inquinata "mens (25). i. e. "Ariſtoteles bantering Xenocrates "who would not uſe his hand when he made water; "the hands, ſays he, are clean, but the heart is "impure.

We ſhall obſerve in the note [O] of the article ADRIAN VI. that la Mothe le Vayer ſhould not have taken the paſſage of Bernia in a literal ſenſe.

(18) Apud Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 23; and Sozomen, lib. 1. cap. 13.

(19) See in Balthaſar Boniface's Hiſtoria ludicra, pag. 181, in what manner St. Jerom aſſerted, Se quoque ipſam virginem erubeſcere debere, nec ſe ſibi nudam oſtendere.

(20) Sanchez, de Matrimon. lib. 9. Diſput. 46. num. 27 and 28.

(21) Ibid. num. 25 and 26.

(22) Ibid. num. 27 and 28.

(23) See la Mothe le Vaier, Hexam. Ruſt. pag. 79.

(24) Vide Plutarchum de Garrulit. p. 505, and Clement. Alexandrin. Stromat. lib. 5. pag. 568.

(25) Athen. lib. 12. p. 530.

☞ADDISON (LANCELOT) ſon of Lancelot Addiſon, a Miniſter, born at Mauldiſmeaburne in the pariſh of Croſby-Ravenſworth in the county of Weſtmorland, was educated at the Grammar-ſchool at Appleby in the ſame county, and ſent to Queen's-College in Oxford in 1650, where he became firſt a Poor Child (a), afterwards Batchelor of Arts January 25, 1654 (b), and Maſter of Arts July 4th 1657 (c). He was choſen for one of the Terræ-filii for the Act, that was celebrated in 1658; but his ſpeech reflecting ſeverely upon the rigid part of the Univerſity at that time, he was brought upon his knees, and made his ſubmiſſion and recantation for what he had ſaid. Soon after he left the Univerſity, and lived near Petworth in Suſſex till the reſtoration. Dr. Henry King then Biſhop of Chicheſter being informed by the Gentlemen of Suſſex of Mr. Addiſon's loyalty, and the danger and ſufferings to which he had expoſed himſelf on account of his principles, took him under his care, and would have preferred him, had he not accepted of the Chaplainſhip at Dunkirk, contrary to the Biſhop's approbation. He continued at Dunkirk till it was given up to the French in 1662, and after his return to England he accepted of the place of Chaplain at Tangier, where he reſided ſeveral years. He came back to England about the beginning of the year 1670, with a reſolution to return to Tangier; but another perſon being placed in his room, he was diſappointed of his purpoſe, and deſtitute of any preferment, till a worthy Knight who was acquainted with his circumſtances, beſtowed upon him the ſmall Rectory of Mileſton or Milſton near Ameſbury or Ambroſebury in Wiltſhire, whither he retired. He was afterwards made Prebendary of minor pars Altaris in the church of Sarum, Chaplain in ordinary to King Charles the Second, and in 1675 took both the degrees of Batchelor and Doctor in Divinity (d). In 1683, being then, as Mr. Wood ſuppoſes, Archdeacon of Coventry, he was preſented by the Commiſſioners for Eccleſiaſtical Affairs to the Deanery of Litchfield in conſideration of his former ſervices at Tangiers, and his loſſes by fire in Wiltſhire. He was inſtalled June 19th 1683 (e). He would probably have been raiſed to a Biſhoprick ſoon after the Revolution, if he had not been conſidered by the then Miniſtry, as too much attached to the contrary party. He died in 1703, and was buried in the weſt-part of the yard belonging to the Cathedral of Lichfield (f). He left three ſons, I. Joſeph, whoſe life we ſhall give in the next article. II. Gulſton, who died Governor of Fort St. George in the Eaſt-Indies. III. Lancelot, who was firſt entred in Queen's College, and was afterwards Maſter of Arts, and Fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford; and one daughter, firſt married to Dr. Sartre, formerly Miniſter of Montpellier, and afterwards Prebendary of Weſtminſter; and ſecondly to Daniel Combes Eſq;. Dr. Addiſon wrote ſeveral books, of which we ſhall give an account in the remarks [A].

(a) Wood's Athenæ Oxon. Part II. Col. 970. edit. 2da 1721.

(b) Wood's Faſti Oxon. p. 105.

(c) Ibid. p. 115.

(d) Wood's Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(e) Le Neve, Faſti Eccleſ. Anglicanæ, p. 128.

(f) Le Neve, ubi ſupra.

☞ADDISON

[A] He wrote ſeveral books, of which we ſhall give an account.] Weſt Barbary, or a ſhort Narrative of the revolutions of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. With an account of the preſent cuſtoms, ſacred, civil, and domeſtic. By Lancelot Addiſon, Chaplain to his Majeſty in ordinary. Oxford at the theater, 1671, in 8*vo, pages* 226. He aſſures us in the preface, that in order to be certain of the truth of the facts, which he relates, he had taken all the methods that appeared to him moſt proper for that purpoſe, as far as the nature of the ſubject would permit; that he had taken the advantage of converſing with the Moors and Jews, to enlarge or correct the obſervations, which he himſelf had made in travelling over that country. So that theſe remarks were not merely accidental or occaſional, but the reſult of an accurate enquiry for many years into the cuſtoms and manners of that nation. In ſhort, that he had not contented himſelf with examining once or twice into the facts which he mentions; but had rejected ſeveral

☞ADDISON (JOSEPH) the ſon of the preceding, was born at Milſton near Ambroſebury in the county of Wilts in the year 1671. He received his firſt education at ſeveral particulars, becauſe he could not procure a ſufficient confirmation of them; ſince it was his deſign not to amuſe the world with romantic and chimerical ſtories; but to write with the utmoſt regard to truth and to the public, and to advance nothing, but what was well confirmed. He tells us, that the reaſon of his ſaying nothing of the colleges or academies of that country, was becauſe they have none; and with regard to libraries, the Moors are ſo far from having any, that they ſhew the utmoſt ſurprize, when they ſee any old book in their language. Of this he gives ſeveral inſtances.

The preſent ſtate of the Jews; (more particularly relating to thoſe in Barbary) wherein is contained an exact account of their cuſtoms, ſecular and religious. To which is annexed a Summary Diſcourſe of the Miſna, Talmud, and Gemara. By L. Addiſon, one of his Majeſty's Chaplains in ordinary, and the author of the late revolutions and preſent cuſtoms of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. London, 1675, in 8vo, pages 249. It is dedicated to Sir Joſ. Williamſon, Secretary of ſtate, &c. from Milſton near Ambroſebury in Wilts, Jan. 28th 1674-5. He informs us in the introduction, that he propoſes nothing in that work but to act the part of a faithful hiſtorian, without attempting any other art to pleaſe the reader, than a plain and ſimple narration of truth; to obtain which he made uſe of the ſame care and examination as he had done in his former book. Had Mr. Baſnage ſeen this treati e, he might have received very conſiderable lights from it in order to compleat his Hiſtory of the Jews.

The primitive Inſtitution, or a ſeaſonable Diſcourſe of catechiſing; wherein is ſhewn the antiquity, benefit and neceſſity thereof; together with its ſuitableneſs to heal the preſent diſtempers of this national Church. By L. Addiſon, one of his Majeſty's Chaplains in ordinary, in 12mo (1).

(1) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Col 971.

A modeſt plea for the Clergy, wherein is briefly conſidered the original, antiquity and neceſſity of that calling; together with the ſpurious and genuine occaſions of their preſent contempt. London, 1677, 8vo (2). We find this book with ſome little alteration in the title, mentioned in a catalogue of books printed or ſold by W. Crooke in 1680, at the end of a piece entitled, Conſiderations upon the reputation, loyalty, manners and religion of Thomas Hobbes of Malmsbury. Written by himſelf by way of letter to a learned perſon. Printed by the ſame Crooke in 1680. Dr. Addiſon's book is in that catalogue under the following title: A modeſt Plea for the Clergy, wherein is briefly conſidered their original, antiquity and neceſſity; together with the true and falſe grounds of their being ſo much ſlighted, neglected, and unjuſtly deſpiſed. By L. A. D. D. in 8vo. Dr. Hickes reprinted this book in 1709, with two other pieces, one by Samuel Gibſon, entitled A Sermon of the ſacerdotal Benediction, &c. Printed in 1620; and the other by Dr. Peter Heylin, entitled, A Diſcourſe publiſhed to undeceive the people in point of tithes, &c. Printed in 1648, under the fictitious name of Phil. Treleinie, which is the anagram of his own name. Theſe three diſcourſes were republiſhed in order to be oppoſed to the rights of the Chriſtian Church, and were printed in 8vo. Dr. Hickes publiſhed this book with the former title mentioned by Wood, and without the author's name; and he tells us in his Preface to the collection abovementioned, that it was publiſh'd at London by W. Crooke 1677; but he owns, that the author of this anonymous piece had taken ſuch care to conceal his name, that after all his enquiry both at London and in the two univerſities, he could not poſſibly diſcover it, or even learn whether he was a Clergyman or a Layman; tho' he inclined to think, that he was the latter, ſince he always ſpeaks of the Clergy in the third perſon, as if he were not of that body. He declares likewiſe, that he knew nothing of this book, but that it was communicated to him by one of his friends, whom he mentions. He adds, that the author of this piece, whoever he was, has treated his ſubject with a great deal of ſtrength and accuracy, and mixed ſacred and profane learning very judiciouſly; and that he writes in a noble, elevated ſtile, and with a ſtrain of eloquence ſuitable to the dignity of the ſubject. If Dr. Hickes had ever ſeen the Catalogue of books, printed by Mr. Crooke, Dr. Addiſon's Bookſeller, he would never have been in doubt about the author, but immediately have aſcribed it to him.

(2) Id. ibid.

The firſt ſtate of Mahometiſm; or an account of the author and doctrine of that impoſture. Lond. 1678, 8vo (3). This book was reprinted the next year with ſome alteration in the title: The life and death of Mahomet, the author of the Turkiſh religion, being an account of his tribe, parents, birth, &c. 1679, 8vo, pages 136. The author in a ſhort advertiſement informs us, that he has endeavoured to give a juſt and faithful account of the life and doctrine of Mahomet, and to clear them both from ſeveral fabulous repreſentations, which had been long believed. He adds, that he had no other deſign in publiſhing this work, than to ſhew what kind of a man Mahomet was, whoſe execrable doctrine has impoſed at preſent ſo groſly upon the greateſt part of the world. This book contains 24 chapters. Dr. Addiſon ſpeaking of the means, which contributed to the propagation of Mahometiſm, among other principles mentions that of Toleration (4), which is clearly eſtabliſhed in the Koran, eſpecially with regard to Chriſtians. He mentions (5) the treaty of Alliance, which is reported to have been made between Mahomet and the Chriſtians; and takes notice afterwards (6) of the different opinions of learned men concerning that piece. Gabriel Sionita publiſhed it in France from the original, which it is ſaid was found in a monaſtery of mount Carmel, and was reprinted in Germany by John Fabricius in 1638. Grotius thought it to be a forgery. Hottinger who had never ſeen it would not venture to condemn it. Dr. Addiſon ſays, that we may conſider it as one of Mahomet's artifices to ſupport his authority, which was then in its infancy; but when he afterwards ſaw it ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, he changed his language, and added ſeveral chapters to his Koran, where he denounces death, impriſonment and ſlavery againſt the Infidels, by which expreſſion he particularly means the Chriſtians. Dr. Addiſon tells us afterwards, that having asked a perſon very well ſkill'd in the Arabic tongue, what he thought of this treaty of Mahomet with the Chriſtians, he replied, that when he had read it, he was of opinion it was a ſpurious piece, becauſe he found nothing in the ſtile, which was like that of the Koran; that in the edition of it in Arabic and Latin there is a Preface by the Printer, which informs us, that this piece was brought from the Eaſt by a Capuchin, named Pacifique Scaliger; and that it is very probable it had been forged by that Miſſionary. We have likewiſe another title to this book, which is as follows: The firſt STATE OF MAHUMEDISM, being an exact account of Mahomed, the author of the Turkiſh religion. His prophecies about his coming, pedigree, parents, tribe, birth, education, marriages, filthineſs of life, pretended revelation, retirement, collections and compoſure of his ALCORAN; of his conventicles at MECCA, where he gained his firſt proſelytes, &c. Likewiſe a Relation of his diſputes with the Jews, of his wars, of the propagation of his doctrines, of his paradiſes and miracles, with the remarkable paſſages of his death. To which is added, The ſtate and condition that Chriſtendom and Chriſtianity were in at that time. The ſecond edition, by the author of the Preſent ſtate of the Jews. London, printed for Will. Crooke, 1687, in 8vo, pages 136. This was the Bookſeller's title; for the edition is page for page the ſame with that abovementioned.

(3) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(4) Chap. xvii. P. 102, 103, which are wrong mark'd 92, 93.

(5) Ch. xviii.

(6) Ch. xix. p. 113 & ſeq.

An introduction to the Sacrament, or a ſhort, plain and ſafe way to the Communion-table; being an introduction for the worthy receiving of the Lord's Supper. Collected for, and familiarly to, every particular Communicant. By L. Addiſon, D. D. Dean of Lichfield. To which is added, The Communicant's Aſſiſtant, being a collection of devotions to that purpoſe. London, printed for W. Crooke, 1686, in 12°, pages 153. (7). Mr. Wood mentions an edition of the former of theſe tracts in 1681.

(7) In the Catalogue of books prefixed to this is, A modeſt Plea for the Clergy, wherein is conſidered the Reaſons why the Clergy are ſo contemn'd and neglected, by L. A. D. D. and Dean of Lichfield. Price 1 s. 6 d.

at the Charter-houſe in London, from whence he was removed to Queen's-College in Oxford. After he had been there about two years, the accidental ſight of a paper of his verſes in the hands of Dr. Lancaſter, then Dean of that Houſe, occaſioned his being elected into Magdalen College (a), where he took the degrees of Batchelor and Maſter of Arts. He employed his firſt years in the ſtudy of the ancient Greek and Roman writers, which had an admirable effect, in giving that noble and correct turn to his genius, for which he is ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed [A]. He gave very early proofs of his excellent talent in Poetry, by a ſhort Engliſh copy of verſes addreſs'd to Mr. Dryden, with a view particularly to his tranſlations [B]. This was ſoon followed by a verſion of the Fourth Georgic of Virgil, of which, the ſtory of Ariſtæus excepted, Mr. Dryden makes very honourable mention [C]. He wrote likewiſe The Eſſay upon the Georgics, prefixed to Mr. Dryden's tranſlation (b) [D]. We have alſo ſome other

(a) Mr. Tickell's Life of Mr. Addiſon prefix'd to his works.

(b) Id. ibid.

In the Dedication (To the right worſhipful Rob. Hyde Eſq; my truly and much honoured Patron) the author ſays, "The following papers were at firſt only "deſigned for the help and ſervice of my own Pa- "riſhioners (your tenants;) and being reſolved to "expoſe them to public cenſure, I need not delibe- "rate to whom they were due, &c." Then follows an Advertiſement of the Bookſeller to the reader, in this manner: "Having twice printed the following "Introduction, I now purely for the public good "commit it the third time to the preſs. In which "edition I have earneſtly ſollicited the author for "enlargements, but found him wholly deaf to any "ſuch propoſal, &c... However, I have prevail- "ed with him to add a Collection of Devotions, in- "ferior perhaps to none of this kind."

(8) Wood Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

A diſcourſe of TANGIER, under the Government of the Earl of Tiviot, &c. London, 4to, 2d Edit. (8). Mr. Wood likewiſe aſcribes to him the following book: The Catechumen; or an Account given by the young perſon of his knowledge in religion, before his admiſſion to the Lord's Supper, as a ground-work for the right underſtanding of the Sacrament. Lond. 1690, 12*mo*. This is the title of it according to Mr. Wood; but we find it with the following title: The Catechumen; or an Account given by the young perſon to the Miniſter of his knowledge in religion upon his firſt admiſſion to the Lord's Table. Recommended to the preſs by two eminent Divines of the church of England. London, Will. Crooke, 1690, in 12°, pagg. 100. After the title we find a letter, 1. To the Author, ſign'd L. A. who expreſſes not only his approbation of the book, but earneſtly deſires to have it made public. 2. To the Bookſeller, ſign'd Jo. Scott, who commends and approves the book. This ſhews, that Dr. Addiſon is not the Author of this little piece, tho' aſcribed to him in the catalogue at the end of the Chriſtian's daily Sacrifice, &c.

ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ ΑΥΤΟΘΕΟΣ; or an Hiſtorical Account of the Hereſy, denying the Godhead of Chriſt. London, for Robert Clavell, at the Peacock, St. Paul's churchyard, 1696, in 8vo, pagg. 107.

The following is mentioned by Mr. Wood, The Chriſtian's daily Sacrifice duly offer'd; or a Practical Diſcourſe teaching the right performance of prayer, by L. Addiſon Dean of Lichfield. Printed for Robert Clavell, 1698, 12°. An Account of the Millennium. The genuine uſe of the two Sacraments, viz. Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper; with the Chriſtian's obligation frequently to receive the latter. Theſe three laſt books with the Catechumen are aſcribed to Dr. Addiſon in a Catalogue printed at the end of his Chriſtian's daily Sacrifice, 1698.

[A] Which had an admirable effect, in giving that noble and correct turn to his genius, for which he is ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed.] "He caught, ſays Mr. Tickell (1), "their language and manner, as ſtrongly, "as other young people gain a French accent, or a "genteel air. An early acquaintance with the Claſ- "ſics is what may be called the good-breeding of "Poetry, as it gives a certain gracefulneſs, which "never forſakes a mind, that contracted it in youth, "but is ſeldom or never hit by thoſe, who would "learn it too late.... There is not perhaps any "harder task, than to tame the natural wildneſs of "wit, and to civilize the fancy. The generality of "our old Engliſh Poets abound in forced conceits and "affected phraſes; and even thoſe, who are ſaid to "come the neareſt to exactneſs, are but too fond of "the unnatural beauties, and aim at ſomething bet- "ter than perfection. If Mr. Addiſon's example "and precepts be the occaſion, that there now be- "gins to be a great demand for correctneſs, we "may juſtly attribute it to his being firſt faſhioned "by the ancient models, and familiariſed to pro- "priety of thought and chaſtity of ſtile."

(1) In his Life of Mr. Addiſon.

[B] A ſhort copy of verſes in Engliſh addreſſed to Mr. Dryden.] Theſe verſes are dated from Magdalen college in Oxford, June 2d, 1693, when the author was but 22 years of age. They contain a very fine compliment upon Mr. Dryden's tranſlations of Virgil, Horace, Juvenal, Perſius and Ovid. That great Poet was then reduced to very melancholy circumſtances by the change of affairs, and the loſs of ſuch of his friends as had intereſt at court; he having before been very deeply engaged againſt the revolution-party, ſo that he was immediately removed from the Laureat's place, when King William came to the crown. And yet we find, that Mr. Dryden's vivacity and poetical flame was not in the leaſt abated by age or the diſtreſs of his circumſtances; to which purpoſe Mr. Addiſon compliments him in the Poem abovementioned in the beautiful manner following.

Can neither injuries of time or age,
Damp thy poetic heat, and quench thy rage?
Not ſo thy Ovid in his exile wrote,
Grief chill'd his breaſt, and check'd his riſing thought:
Penſive and ſad his drooping Muſe betrays
The Roman Genius in its laſt decays.

He concludes with his wiſhes, that Mr. Dryden may have all the advantages of health and eaſe, in order to finiſh his tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſis; and ends with this fine alluſion to that Poet,

Then will thy Ovid, thus transform'd, reveal
A nobler change than he himſelf can tell.

[C] This was followed by a verſion of the fourth Georgic of Virgil, of which Mr. Dryden makes very honourable mention.] Theſe are his words: "The "moſt ingenious Mr. Addiſon of Oxford has alſo been "as troubleſome to me as the other two," (ſpeaking of two celebrated Poets, whoſe Poems, Mr. Dryden ſays, had put him to ſufficient pains to make his own not inferior to theirs) "and on the ſame account. "After his bees, my latter ſwarm is ſcarcely worth "the hiving (2)."

(2) Dryden's Virgil. Vol. III. p. 822. London printed for J. Tonſon 1709, 8o.

[D] The Eſſay upon the Georgics, prefix'd to Mr. Dryden's tranſlation.] Mr. Tickell having obſerved that Mr. Dryden had complimented Mr. Addiſon upon his tranſlation of Virgil's Fourth Georgic, tells us that he wonders, that he did not at the ſame time acknowledge his obligation to Mr. Addiſon for giving him this Eſſay. This has given occaſion to Sir Richard Steele to paſs a very ſevere cenſure upon Mr. Tickell, for charging Mr. Dryden with concealing his obligation to Mr. Addiſon, when it is plain (ſays Sir Richard) that the latter inſiſted upon his name's not being mentioned. The paſſage in Sir Richard Steele is as follows (3): "Mr. Dryden in his Virgil, after having ac- "knowledg'd, that a certain excellent young man had "ſhewed him many faults in his tranſlation of Vir- "gil, which he had endeavoured to correct, goes "on to ſay, Two other worthy friends of mine, who "deſire to have their names concealed, ſeeing me "ſtraitned in my time, took pity on me, and gave me "the Life of Virgil, the two Prefaces to the Paſto- "rals, and the Georgics, and all the arguments in "proſe to the whole Tranſlation. If Mr. Addiſon is "one other pieces of his, written by him in his youth, particularly a Song for St. Cecilia's Day at Oxford; a Tranſlation of the ſtory of Achæmenides and Polypheme out of the third Æneid, in Milton's ſtyle; and an Account of the greateſt Engliſh Poets; in the cloſe whereof he inſinuates a deſign he then had of going into holy orders, to which he was ſtrongly importuned by his father [E]. This laſt poem was written in the year 1694, and is addreſſed to Mr. Henry (afterwards the famous Dr.) Sacheverell, in the ſtrongeſt terms of friendſhip; though their intimacy was afterwards quite broke off by the different political principles which they eſpouſed [F]. Nor was he leſs eminent for the beauty

(3) In his Dedication of the ſecond edition of the DRUMMER to Mr. CONGREVE in 4°, 1722.

" one of the two friends, and the Preface to the " Georgics be what the Editor calls the Eſſay upon the " Georgics, as one may adventure to ſay they are, " from their being word for word the ſame; he has " caſt an inhuman reflexion upon Mr. Dryden, who, " tho' tied down not to name Mr. Addiſon, pointed " at him ſo as all mankind converſant in theſe mat- " ters knew him, with an Elogium equal to the high- " eſt merit, conſidering who it was that beſtowed " it." This Eſſay is an admirable criticiſm upon Virgil's Georgics, which is a ſpecies of poetry, that has been put under the ſame head with Paſtoral by ſome writers, tho', as Mr. Addiſon has ſhewn, it is eſſentially different from it. He obſerves, that this kind of poetry addreſſes itſelf wholly to the imagination; it is altogether converſant among the fields and woods, and has the moſt delightful part of nature for its province. It raiſes in our minds a pleaſing variety of ſcenes and landſcapes, whilſt it teaches us; and makes the dryeſt of its precepts look like a deſcription. In ſhort, our critic defines a Georgic to be ſome part of the ſcience of Husbandry put into a pleaſing dreſs, and ſet off with all the beauties and embelliſhments of Poetry. Virgil, ſays he, has ſingled out ſuch precepts of that ſcience, as are uſeful, and at the ſame time moſt capable of ornament: he often conceals the precept in a deſcription, and repreſents his countryman performing the action, in which he would inſtruct his reader. He takes care to relieve the ſubject with pleaſing and pertinent digreſſions, which riſe naturally from it, and are of a piece with the main deſign of the Georgic. His ſtile is raiſed above the common and familiar phraſe, and abounds with metaphors, greciſms and circumlocutions, to give his verſe the greater pomp. Mr. Addiſon concludes his Eſſay with this obſervation, that this Poem is the moſt compleat, elaborate, and finiſh'd piece of all antiquity. The Æneis indeed is of a nobler kind, but the Georgic is more perfect in its kind. The Æneis has a greater variety of beauties in it, but thoſe of the Georgic are more exquiſite. In ſhort, the Georgic has all the perfection that can be expected in a Poem written by the greateſt Poet in the flower of his age, when his invention was ready, his imagination warm, his judgment ſettled, and all his faculties in their full vigour and maturity.

[E] A deſign he then had of going into holy Orders, to which he was ſtrongly importuned by his father.] The verſes, in which he intimates that deſign, are as follows:

I've done at length; and now, dear friend, receive
The laſt poor preſent that my Muſe can give.
I leave the arts of Poetry and Verſe
To them, that practiſe 'em with more ſucceſs.
Of greater truths I'll now prepare to tell,
And ſo at once, dear Friend and Muſe, farewell.

Pauli Ferri, a very eminent Divine in France in the xviith Century, having publiſhed a volume of Poems, whilſt he was only a Student of Divinity, as he was ſoon to be promoted to the Miniſtry, ended his advertiſement to the reader with a ſentiment very like that of Mr. Addiſon;

Sat ludo nugiſque datum,
That is,
" Enough the Muſes have engag'd my thoughts;
" Their gay delights I now muſt quit for ever (4).

(4) Bayle, Dict. in Paul. Ferri, Not. [B].

However Mr. Tickell informs us, that his remarkable ſerioufneſs and modeſty, which might have been urged as powerful reaſons for his chuſing that life, proved the chief obſtacles to it. Theſe qualities, continues that Gentleman, by which the Prieſthood is ſo much adorned, repreſented the Duties of it, as too weighty for him; and rendred him ſtill more worthy of that honour, which they made him decline. It is happy, that this very circumſtance has ſince turned ſo much to the advantage of virtue and religion, in the cauſe of which he has beſtowed his labours the more ſucceſsfully, as they were his voluntary, not his neceſſary employment. The world became inſenſibly reconciled to wiſdom and goodneſs, when they ſaw them recommended by him with at leaſt as much ſpirit and elegance, as they had been ridiculed for half a Century. This paſſage of Mr. Tickell drew upon him a very ſevere cenſure from Sir R. Steele, who in his Dedication of the Drummer to Mr. Congreve, expreſſes himſelf as follows (5). " Theſe, (5) Pag. 121.
" you know very well, were not the reaſons, which " made Mr. Addiſon turn his thoughts to the " Civil world; and as you were the inſtrument of
" his becoming acquainted with my Lord Halifax,
" I doubt not but you remember the warm in-
" ſtances that noble Lord made to the Head of the " college not to inſiſt upon Mr. Addiſon's going " into Orders; his arguments were founded upon
" the general pravity and corruption of men of bu-
" ſineſs, who wanted liberal education. And I re" member, as if I had read the letter yeſterday,
" that my Lord ended with a compliment; that how" ever he might be repreſented as no friend to the " church, he would never do it any other injury,
" than keeping Mr. Addiſon out of it. The conten" tion for this man in his early years among the " people of the greateſt power, Mr. Secretary
" Tickell, the executor for his fame, is pleaſed to
" aſcribe to a ſerious viſage and modeſty of beha" viour."

[F] Their intimacy was afterwards quite broken off by the different political principles, which they eſpouſed.] In the year 1710, Mr. Addiſon wrote ſeveral papers under the title of the Whig-Examiner, in oppoſition to a paper called the Examiner, which was publiſhed by the contrary party. In one of theſe Whig-Examiners (6), he takes occaſion to divide (6) N° 4. Thurſday Octob. 5.
non-ſenſe into two kinds, high non-ſenſe and low non-ſenſe; the latter of which he ſays is the talent of a cold phlegmatic temper, that in a poor diſpirited ſtile creeps along ſervilely thro' darkneſs and confuſion. A writer of this complexion gropes his way ſoftly amongſt ſelf-contradictions, and grovels in abſurdities. Videri vult pauper, & eſt pauper. He has neither wit nor ſenſe, and pretends to none. On the contrary your high nonſenſe bluſters, and makes a noiſe; it ſtalks upon hard words, and rattles thro' polyſyllables. It is loud and ſonorous, ſmooth and periodical. It has ſomething in it like manlineſs and force, and makes one think of the name of Sir Hercules Nonſenſe in the play called The Neſt of Fools. In a word, your high nonſenſe has a majeſtic appearance, and wears a moſt tremendous garb, like Æſop's aſs in a lion's skin. He then proceeds to tell us, that as rational writers have been repreſented by wine, theſe two kinds of writing may be compared to ſmall-beer. Low nonſenſe is like that in the barrel, which is altogether flat, taſteleſs and inſipid. High nonſenſe is like that in the bottle, which has in reality no more ſtrength and ſpirit than the other, but frets, and flies, and bounces, and by the help of a little wind, that is got into it, imitates the paſſions of a much nobler liquor. Having thus diſtinguiſhed the two kinds of nonſenſe, he tells us, that we meet with the former in every Grub-ſtreet production; but I think, ſays he, there are none of our preſent writers, who have hit the ſublime in nonſenſe, beſides Dr. S———l, (who had juſt then publiſhed his famous Sermon) and the author of this letter (to the Examiner) in politicks; between whoſe characters in their reſpective profeſſions, there ſeems to be a very nice reſemblance. This public raillery upon Dr. Sacheverell is a convincing proof, that all their former friendſhip and endearments were then abſolutely extinguiſhed.

beauty of his Latin Poems, which were printed in the Muſæ Anglicanæ [G], and highly applauded by Monſieur Boileau [H]. In the year 1695 he wrote A Poem to King William upon one of his Majeſty's campaigns, addreſt to Sir John Somers, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, who received it with unuſual candor and humanity. This occaſioned a meſſage from that Nobleman to the Author to deſire his acquaintance. Mr. Addiſon was in his twenty eighth year when his inclination to ſee France and Italy was encouraged by the great Patron of Letters abovementioned, who obtained, by his intereſt, a yearly penſion of three hundred pounds from the Crown to ſupport him in his travels (c). In the year 1701 he wrote a Letter from Italy to the Right Honourable the Lord Halifax, which has been eſteemed by thoſe who have a taſte for antiquity, as the moſt exquiſite of his poetical performances [I]. It was tranſlated into Italian by Signor Salvini, Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue at Florence. The account of his Travels, which was publiſhed in the year 1705, and dedicated to the Lord Somers, ſoon obtained a general applauſe; though at firſt it was but indifferently received by the bulk of readers [K]. The materials for the Dialogues upon Medals were collected

(c) Id. ibid.

[G] His Latin Poems, which were printed in the Musæ Anglicanæ.] They were publiſhed in the ſecond volume of the Muſarum Anglicanarum Analecta, ſeu Poemata quædam melioris notæ, ſeu hactenus inedita, ſeu ſparſim edita, and dedicated to Mr. Montague, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterwards Lord Halifax, who was a great patron and good judge of polite literature, and who knew how to ſet a proper value upon theſe admirable performances, as was manifeſt from the friendſhip he indulged Mr. Addiſon ever after. His Latin pieces are eight in number. I. Pax Gulielmi auſpiciis Europæ reddita, 1697. i. e. "Upon the reſtoring of peace "to Europe by the conduct of King William." II. Barometri Deſcriptio. i. e. "A Deſcription of "the Barometer." III. ΠΥΓΜΑΙΟ-ΓΕΡΑΝΟ-ΜΑΧΙΑ, ſive Prælium inter Pygmæos & Grues commiſſum. i. e. "A Battle between the Pygmies and the Cranes." IV. Reſurrectio delineata ad altare Coll. Magd. Oxon. "i. e. A Poem upon the Reſurrection, being a Deſcrip-"tion of the Painting over the Altar in Magdalen "College in Oxford." V. Sphæriſterium. i. e. "A "Deſcription of a Bowling-Green." VI. Ad D. D. Hannes, inſigniſſimum Medicum & Poetam. i. e. "An "Ode to Dr. Hannes, an excellent Phyſician and "Poet." VII. Machinæ geſticulantes, Anglicè A "Puppet-Shew." VIII. Ad inſigniſſimum Virum D. Tho. Burnettum, Sacræ Theoriæ Telluris Autorem. i. e. "An Ode to the celebrated Dr. Tho. Burnet "author of the Theory of the Earth." Theſe Poems were tranſlated into Engliſh by Dr. Sewel of Peter Houſe, Cambridge, the author of the Tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh; Mr. Newcomb of Corpus Chriſti College; and Mr. N. Amhurſt of St. John's College, Oxon. In theſe pieces, as Dr. Sewell has remarked, "the language is pure, elegant, and ſound-"ing; the verſification eaſy and numerous, happily "adapted to the different ſubjects it deſcribes; free "from the affected turns, puerile levities, and other "flatneſſes, which betray a falſe taſte and defect of "judgment. His images are choſen with a nice "diſcernment, work'd up with delicacy of imagina-"tion, and placed in the ſtrongeſt light. Every one "ſtrikes at the firſt view, and yet will bear the ſtrict-"eſt eye to examine it. The deſcriptions, being "both juſt and ſurprizing, put the mind upon the "full ſtretch, as they are preparing, and exceed "the boldeſt expectations, when finiſhed." And with regard to one of theſe Poems, that upon the reſurrection, we are told by another ingenious writer (7), that it is eſteemed by the beſt judges to be the fineſt ſketch upon that ſubject, that any age or language has produced. Nor does its only excellence conſiſt in being an accurate Poem, but alſo in being an exact copy of the painter's original upon the altar in Magdalen college; but ſo much improved with all the ſtrongeſt figures, and moſt lively embelliſhments of a poetical deſcription, that the reader receives a double ſatisfaction in ſeeing the two ſiſter-arts ſo uſeful to each other, in borrowing mutual helps and mutual advantages. It is indeed, continues he, wonderful to find in the narrow compaſs of ſo few pages all the moſt dreadful circumſtances of that laſt terrible criſis of time. The Poem is a beautiful and ſucinct epitome of all that has or can ever be ſaid on that important ſubject... He then proceeds to a general character of Mr. Addiſon, who, he obſerves, is to be diſtinguiſhed thro' all his performances by the ſtrength of his images, and by a forcible and unaffected variety of expreſſion, which none of our moderns have attained to in ſo much perfection; and which is very rarely to be met with even in any of the ancients ſince Virgil and Horace.

(7) Mr. Amhurſt in his Preface to his tranſlation of that Poem.

[H] And highly applauded by Monſieur Boileau.] Mr. Tickell tells us, that our country owes it to him, that this celebrated French Poet firſt conceived an opinion of the Engliſh genius for Poetry, by peruſing the preſent he made him of the Muſæ Anglicanæ. It has been currently reported, that among the civilities he ſhewed Mr. Addiſon on that occaſion, he affirmed, that he would not have written againſt Perrault, had he before ſeen ſuch excellent pieces by a modern hand. But the abovementioned Gentleman is of opinion, that ſuch a ſaying would have been impertinent and unworthy Boileau, whoſe diſpute with Perrault turned chiefly upon ſome paſſages in the Ancients, which he reſcued from the miſinterpretations of his adverſary. The true and natural compliment, ſays he, made by him, was, that thoſe books had given him a very new idea of the Engliſh politeneſs; and that he did not queſtion but there were excellent compoſitions in the native language of a country that poſſeſſed the Roman genius in ſo eminent a degree.

[I] The moſt exquiſite of his poetical performances.] In this poem he gives a beautiful deſcription of that country, and declares the prodigious ſatisfaction he had in viewing the rivers, woods, mountains, &c. which are celebrated in the antient Poets,

For whereſoe'er I turn my raviſh'd eyes
Gay gilded ſcenes and ſhining proſpects riſe;
Poetic fields encompaſs me around,
And ſtill I ſeem to tread on Claſſic ground;
For here the Muſe ſo oft her harp has ſtrung,
That not a mountain rears its head unſung,
Renown'd in verſe each ſhady thicket grows,
And every ſtream in heavenly numbers flows.

He then proceeds to a deſcription of the antient monuments of the Romans, their amphitheatres, triumphal arches, ſtatues, and the modern paintings, palaces and churches. But he here takes occaſion to lament, that notwithſtanding all theſe advantages of nature and the charms of art, yet the oppreſſion and tyranny which reign over that country, render the inhabitants of it exquiſitely unhappy (8). He concludes this obſervation with an addreſs to Liberty, which he repreſents as the grand ſource of the happineſs which Britain enjoys, though vaſtly inferior to Italy in other reſpects.

We envy not the warmer clime, that lies
In ten degrees of more indulgent skies;
Nor at the coarſeneſs of our heav'n repine,
Tho' o'er our heads the frozen Pleiads ſhine;
'Tis Liberty that crowns Britannia's Iſle,
And makes her barren rocks and her bleak mountains ſmile.

(8) A certain Nobleman has written ſome very agreeable and ſharp verſes on the ſuperſtition, pride, and poverty of the Italians. Mr. de Voltaire has imitated them very beautifully in his Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation.

[K] Soon obtained a general applauſe, though at firſt it was but indifferently approved by the bulk of readers.] The reputation of theſe Travels increaſed from year to year; and the demand for copies was ſo collected in the native country of thoſe coins, and the book itſelf was begun to be caſt into the form he gave it at Vienna in the year 1702 (d). This work is a poſthumous piece, and was publiſhed by Mr. Tickell, who rendered a great part of the Latin quotations into Engliſh, in order to make them intelligible to thoſe who do not poſſeſs the learned languages. It contains a variety of curious learning on the ſubject of medals, and is enlivened with all the wit and elegance of the moſt polite converſation [L]; and an admirable Poem of Mr. Pope's is prefixed to it [M]. In the year 1702, Mr. Addiſon deſigning to return to England, received advice from his friends, that he was pitched upon to attend the army under Prince Eugene, who had juſt begun the war in Italy, as Secretary from King William; but the news of the King's death, which he heard at Geneva, put an end to that affair; and as his hopes of advancement in England were fallen with the credit of his friends, who were out of power at the beginning ſo urgent that their price roſe to four or five times the original value, till a ſecond edition of them was publiſhed. "It is not hard, ſays Mr. Tickell, to "conceive, why that performance was at firſt but "indifferently reliſhed by the bulk of readers, who "expected an account in a common way of the "cuſtoms and policies of the ſeveral governments "in Italy, reflexions upon the genius of the people, "a map of their provinces, or a meaſure of their "buildings. How were they diſappointed, when "inſtead of ſuch particulars they were preſented "only with a Journal of Poetical Travels, with Re-"marks on the preſent picture of the Country, com-"pared with the Landskips drawn by Claſſic Au-"thors, and other the like unconcerning parts of "knowledge! One may eaſily imagine a reader of "plain ſenſe, but without a fine taſte, turning over "theſe parts of the volume, which make more than "half of it, and wondering how an author, who "ſeems to have ſo ſolid an underſtanding, when he "treats of more weighty ſubjects in the other pages, "ſhould dwell upon ſuch trifles, and give up ſo "much room to matters of mere amuſement. There "are indeed but few men ſo fond of the Ancients, "as to be tranſported with every little accident, which "introduces them to their intimate acquaintance: "perſons of that caſt may here have the ſatisfaction "of ſeeing annotations upon an old Roman Poem, "gathered from the hills and vallies where it was "written. The Tyber and the Po ſerve to explain "the verſes, that were made upon their banks; and "the Alpes and Appennines are made commenta-"tors on thoſe authors, to whom they were ſub-"jects ſo many Centuries ago. Next to perſonal "converſation with the writers themſelves, this is "the ſureſt way of coming at their ſenſe; a com-"pendious and engaging kind of criticiſm, which "convinces at firſt ſight, and ſhews the vanity of "conjectures, made by antiquaries at a diſtance. "If the knowledge of Polite Literature has its uſe, "there is certainly a merit in illuſtrating the per-"fect models of it, and the learned world will "think ſome years of a man's life not miſpent in "ſo elegant an employment." Thus far Mr. Tickell, who preſently after obſerves, that this work may be conſidered as a large comment upon Mr. Addiſon's Letter from Italy. But let us now hear the excellent author himſelf in his Preface to his Travels: For my own part, ſays he, as I have taken notice of ſeveral places and antiquities, that no body elſe has ſpoken of, ſo, I think, I have mentioned but few things in common with others, that are not either ſet in a new light, or accompanied with different reflexions. I have taken care particularly to conſider the ſeveral paſſages of the ancient Poets, which have any relation to the places or curioſities that I met with. For before I entred on my voyage I took care to refreſh my memory among the Claſſic authors, and to make ſuch collections out of them as I might afterwards have occaſion for. I muſt confeſs it was not one of the leaſt entertainments that I met with in travelling, to examine theſe ſeveral deſcriptions, as it were, upon the ſpot, and to compare the natural face of the country with the landskips, that the Poets have given us of it. However, to avoid the confuſion that might ariſe from a multitude of quotations, I have only cited ſuch verſes, as have given us ſome image of the place, or that have ſomething elſe beſides the bare name of it to recommend them.

(d) Id. ibid.

[L] Contains a variety of uſeful learning upon the ſubject of medals, enlivened with all the wit and elegance of the moſt polite converſation.] The perſonages, whom he introduces in theſe Dialogues, are all of them repreſented to be very well verſed in the politer parts of learning, and to have travelled into the moſt refined nations of Europe; ſo that they were capable of entertaining themſelves on a thouſand different ſubjects without running into the common topics of defaming public parties or particular perſons. As they were intimate friends, ſays the author, they took the freedom to diſſent from one another in diſcourſe, or upon occaſion to ſpeak a Latin ſentence without fearing the imputation of pedantry or ill-breeding. Such is the general character of the interlocutors laid down by the author; and he has carried on the dialogue between them with the exacteſt propriety and conſiſtence with that character. Philander is a Gentleman who has a perfect knowledge of medals; Cynthio's humour is to run down every thing, that was rather for oſtentation than uſe. He was ſtill preferring good ſenſe to arts and ſciences, and often took a pleaſure to appear ignorant, that he might the better turn to ridicule thoſe, that valued themſelves on their books and ſtudies, tho' at the ſame time one might very well ſee, that he could not have attack'd many parts of learning ſo ſucceſsfully, had he not borrowed his aſſiſtances from them. Eugenius, the third perſon in the dialogue, is one, who endeavoured rather to be agreeable than ſhining in converſation, for which reaſon he was more beloved, tho' not ſo much admired as Cynthio. This manner of writing by way of dialogue Mr. Addiſon borrowed from the ancients, whoſe fineſt treatiſes are in that caſt; which has likewiſe been followed by ſeveral eminent Italian, French and Engliſh Authors. But perhaps there are few copies from thoſe noble originals of the Greeks and Romans ſuperior to this of our author. Dial. 1.

[M] An admirable Poem of Mr. Pope's prefixed to it.] He begins with a beautiful reflexion, that moſt of the grand monuments of antiquity, triumphal arches, temples and tombs, have been deſtroyed either by age, the irruption of the Barbarians, or the zeal of Chriſtians; whereas medals ſtill preſerve the memory of the greateſt perſonages in antiquity. Thence he takes occaſion to rally with the fineſt humour the exceſſes which ſome antiquaries are guilty of in proſecuting this ſtudy.

With ſharpen'd ſight pale antiquaries pore,
Th' inſcription value, but the ruſt adore:
This the blue varniſh, that the green endears,
The ſacred ruſt of twice two hundred years.
To gain Peſcennius one employs his ſchemes;
One graſps a Cecrops in ecſtatic dreams;
Poor Vadius long with learned ſpleen devour'd,
Can taſte no pleaſure ſince his ſhield was ſcour'd;
And Curio, reſtleſs by the fair one's ſide,
Sighs for an Otho, and neglects his bride.

He then addreſſes himſelf to Mr. Addiſon in this manner:

Theirs is the vanity, the learning thine.
Touch'd by thy hand, again Rome's glories ſhine:
Her Gods and God-like Heroes riſe to view,
And all her faded garlands bloom anew.
Nor bluſh, thoſe ſtudies thy regard engage;
Theſe pleas'd the Fathers of poetic rage;
The verſe and ſculpture bore an equal part,
And art reflected images to art.

beginning of her late Majeſty's reign, he had leiſure to make the tour of Germany in his way home (e). He remained without any public employment till the year 1704, when the Duke of Marlborough's ſucceſs furniſhed him with a ſubject worthy of the genius that appears in his Campaign, which a certain author (f) is of opinion was his moſt noble production, and incomparably preferable to Cato. We ſhall give the judgment of an ingenious writer in Holland upon this Poem [N]. The Lord Treaſurer Godolphin, who was an excellent judge of poetry, had a ſight of this work, when it was only carried on as far as the applauded ſimile of the Angel [O]; and approved the Poem, by beſtowing on the author, a few days after, the place of Commiſſioner of Appeals, vacant by the removal of the famous Mr. Locke to the Council of Trade. A Gentleman related to Mr. Addiſon has informed us of ſome remarkable circumſtances relating to that affair [P]. In 1705 he attended the Lord Halifax to Hanover, and in 1706 was made Secretary to Sir Charles Hedges, Secretary of State, in which employment he

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) The Critics, Vol. I. No 12. March 24, 1718.

[N] The judgment of an ingenious writer in Holland upon this Poem.] "It is not, ſays he (9), properly "an Epic-poem, but it is an incomparable piece in "heroic verſe, in which the author celebrates with "all the grandeur and magnificence imaginable the "victory at Hochſtet, and the noble actions of the "Engliſh Hero, who there laid the baſis of that vaſt "reputation, which he has gained over all Europe. "We may juſtly affirm, that there is nothing want-"ing to the perfection of this Poem; and that Mr. "Addiſon, thus rais'd and ſupported by the noble-"neſs of his ſubject, is as much ſuperior to him-"ſelf, as he is in all his other pieces to the greateſt "part of the other Poets of what nation ſoever. I "imagine I ſhall pay no extravagant compliment to "the author, if I venture to promiſe, that, un-"leſs Polite Literature ſhould abſolutely fall into "neglect in England, this work of his will prove "a more illuſtrious and laſting monument of the "Duke of Marlborough's glory, than Blenheim-"houſe, which the Parliament has ordered to be "built for him; in order to tranſmit to poſterity "the memory of his heroic actions, and the grati-"tude of the nation."

(9) Diſſertation ſur la Poëſie Angloiſe, in the Journal Literaire, tome ix. p. 189.

[O] The applauded ſimile of the Angel.] It is prodigiouſly commended in the Tatler, N. 43. where we have a diſcourſe upon the abſurdities, which Poets, eſpecially the writers of Tragedy, are guilty of in the uſe of ſimiles. I ſhall tranſcribe the paſſage, which relates to that of Mr. Addiſon, becauſe it is written with a juſt ſpirit of criticiſm. "There "is nothing more proper and natural for a Poet, "whoſe buſineſs it is to deſcribe, and who is a "ſpectator of one in that circumſtance, (viz. under "a weight of ſorrow, or full of meditation upon "what he is to execute,) when his mind is working "up a great image, and that the ideas hurry upon "his imagination; I ſay, there is nothing ſo natural "for a Poet to relieve and clear himſelf from the "burthen of thought at that time by altering his "conception in ſimile and metaphor. The higheſt "art of the mind of man is to poſſeſs itſelf with "tranquillity in imminent danger, and to have its "thoughts ſo free as to act at that time without "perplexity. The ancient authors have compared "this ſedate courage to a rock, that remains un-"moveable amidſt the rage of winds and waves; "but that is too ſtupid and inanimate a ſimilitude, "and could do no credit to the Hero. At other "times they are all of them wonderfully obliged to "a Lybian lion, which may give indeed very agree-"able terrors to a deſcription, but is no compliment "to the perſon to whom it is applied. Eagles, ty-"gers and wolves are made uſe of on the ſame oc-"caſion, and very often with much beauty; but "this is ſtill an honour done to the brute rather "than to the Hero: Mars, Pallas, Bacchus and Her-"cules, have each of them furniſhed very good ſi-"miles in their time, and made doubtleſs a greater im-"preſſion on the mind of a Heathen than they have "on that of a modern reader. But the ſublime I "am talking of, and which I really think as great as "ever enter'd into the thought of man, is in the "Poem call'd The Campaign, where the ſimile of a "miniſtring Angel ſets forth the moſt ſedate and the "moſt active courage, engaged in an uproar of na-"ture, a confuſion of elements, and a ſcene of di-"vine vengeance. Add to all, that theſe lines com-"pliment the General and his Queen at the ſame "time; and have all the natural horrors height-"ened by the image that was ſtill freſh in the mind "of every reader:

"'Twas then great Malboro's mighty ſoul was "prov'd,
"That in the ſhock of charging hoſts unmov'd,
"Amidſt confuſion, horror and deſpair,
"Examin'd all the dreadful ſcenes of war;
"In peaceful thought the field of death ſurvey'd,
"To fainting ſquadrons ſent the timely aid;
"Inſpir'd repuls'd battalions to engage,
"And taught the doubtful battle where to rage.
"So when an Angel, by divine command,
"With riſing tempeſts ſhakes a guilty land:
"Such as of late o'er pale Britannia paſt,
"Calm and ſerene he drives the furious blaſt;
"And pleas'd th' Almighty's orders to perform,
"Rides in the whirlwind, and directs the ſtorm.

Mr. Oldmixon (10) obſerves upon this occaſion, that the thought is doubtleſs very grand; but the critic, ſays he, had forgot Milton, when he ſaid, 'Tis as great as ever any was. To evince the contrary of which he refers us to a paſſage in that Poet, where the Son of God drives the fallen Angels out of Heaven (11). He remarks likewiſe that Mr. Congreve, in his Ode upon the taking of Namur, has a thought ſomething like that of Mr. Addiſon:

(10) Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, p. 305.

(11) Paradiſe Loſt, Book VI.

Amidſt this rage, behold where William ſtands,
Undaunted, undiſmay'd?
With face ſerene diſpenſing dread commands,
Which heard with awe, are with delight obey'd.
A thouſand fiery deaths around him fly,
And burning balls hiſs harmleſs by;
For every fire his ſacred head muſt ſpare,
Nor dares the lightning touch the laurels there.

The author of the notes on Mr. Pope's Dunciad (12) tells us, that this critic is ſo injurious as to ſuggeſt, that Mr. Addiſon himſelf wrote the Tatler quoted above, which ſays of his own ſimile, that it is as great as ever enter'd into the mind of man. Now Mr. Oldmixon's words are theſe; I can hardly think Mr. Addiſon wrote that Tatler, there being in it a juſt compliment to himſelf (13).

(12) Book II. ver. 199.

(13) Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, p. 304.

[P] Some remarkable circumſtances relating to that affair.] There is ſome variation between his account, and that of Mr. Tickell abovementioned. The author I mean is Mr. Budgell, who in the Life of the late Lord Orrery (14) writes as follows:

(14) P. 150.

"Soon after the battle of Blenheim Mr. Boyle, (late "Lord Carleton) then Chancellor of the Exchequer, "was entreated by the Lord Godolphin, to go to "Mr. Addiſon, and deſire him to write ſomething "that might tranſmit the memory of that glorious "victory to poſterity. As I believe this ſtory is not "commonly known, and as I think it does honour to "the late Lord Halifax, (whoſe memory I muſt ever "love and reſpect,) I ſhall lay it before my readers. "Upon the arrival of the news of the victory of "Blenheim, the Lord Treaſurer Godolphin, in the "fulneſs of his joy, meeting with the late Lord "Halifax told him, It was pity the memory of ſuch "a victory ſhould be ever forgot; he added, that he "was pretty ſure his Lordſhip, who was ſo diſtin-"guiſhed he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that the Earl of Sunderland, being made Secretary of State in December of the abovementioned year, he continued Mr. Addiſon in the ſame employment under him; convincing us by this choice, that the Stateſman may receive great aſſiſtance from the Man of Letters. The taſte for Operas beginning to prevail at that time in England, ſome of Mr. Addiſon's friends deſiring him to write one, he complied with their requeſt, and choſe for his ſubject Roſamond. He propoſed by this drama to excite an emulation in the Engliſh muſicians, to exert themſelves, without calling in any foreign aſſiſtance, and at the ſame time to give the ſpectators a piece in their own language, infinitely more exact and regular than the Italian Operas. However, Roſamond did not ſucceed upon the ſtage, whether from the defect of the muſic, for which our language is ſaid by ſome perſons to be very improper [Q], or from the prejudices in favour of the Italian taſte, which at that time began wholly to prevail; but the Poetry of this piece has been always juſtly admired; and, as Mr. Tickell obſerves (g), has given as much pleaſure in the cloſet, as others have afforded from the ſtage, with all the aſſiſtance of voices and inſtruments. About the ſame time the comedy called The Tender Huſband appeared, to which Mr. Addiſon wrote the Prologue. Sir Richard Steele

" guiſhed a Patron of Men of letters, muſt know " ſome perſon, whoſe pen was capable of doing " juſtice to the action. My Lord Halifax replied, " that he did indeed know ſuch a perſon; but would " not deſire him to write upon the ſubject his Lord- " ſhip had mentioned. The Lord Treaſurer entreating " to know the reaſon of ſo unkind a reſolution, Lord " Halifax briskly told him, that he had long with " indignation obſerved, that while too many fools " and blockheads were maintained in their pride and " luxury, at the expence of the public, ſuch men as " were really an honour to their country, and to " the age they lived in, were ſhamefully ſuffered " to languiſh in obſcurity: that, for his own part, " he would never deſire any Gentleman of parts " and learning to imploy his time in celebrating a " Miniſtry, who had neither the juſtice or gene- " roſity to make it worth his while. The Lord Trea- " ſurer calmly replied, that he would ſeriouſly conſi- " der of what his Lordſhip had ſaid, and endeavour " to give no occaſion for ſuch reproaches for the " future; but that in the preſent caſe he took it " upon himſelf to promiſe, that any Gentleman " whom his Lordſhip ſhould name to him, as a " perſon capable of celebrating the late action, " ſhould find it worth his while to exert his ge- " nius on that ſubject. The Lord Halifax, upon " this encouragement, named Mr. Addiſon; but in- " ſiſted that the Lord Treaſurer himſelf ſhould ſend " to him: His Lordſhip promiſed to do ſo; and ac- " cordingly deſired Mr. Boyle to go to him. Mr. " Addiſon, who was at that time but indifferently " lodged, was ſurprized the next morning with a " viſit from the Chancellor of the exchequer; who, " after having acquainted him with his buſineſs, ad- " ded, that the Lord Treaſurer, to encourage him " to enter upon his ſubject, had already made him " one of the Commiſſioners of appeals; but entreat- " ed him to look upon that poſt only as an earneſt " of ſomething more conſiderable. In ſhort, the " Chancellor ſaid ſo many obliging things, and in ſo " graceful a manner, as gave Mr. Addiſon the utmoſt " ſpirit and encouragement to begin that Poem, " which he afterwards publiſhed, and entitled, The " Campaign: A Poem equal to the action it cele- " brates; and in which that preſence of mind, for " which the late Duke of Marlborough was ſo re- " markable in a day of battle, is illuſtrated by a no- " bler ſimile than any to be found in Homer or Vir- " gil. The Lord Treaſurer kept the promiſe he had " made by Mr. Boyle: and Mr. Addiſon ſoon after " the publication of his Poem, was preferred to a " conſiderable poſt."

[Q] The defect of the muſic, for which our lan- language is ſaid by ſome perſons to be very improper.] We ſhall conſider this in the words of a late ingenious writer, and friend of Mr. Addiſon, the author of the Ode to the Creator of the World, occaſioned by the Fragments of Orpheus. " I know not, ſays he " (15), how it comes to be a late opinion among " ſome, that Engliſh words are not proper for muſic. " That the Engliſh language is not ſo ſoft and full " of vowels as the Italian, is readily granted; yet " this does not prove, that it is therefore incapable " of harmony. Let it be conſidered, whether too " great a delicacy in this particular may not run into " effeminacy. A due mixture of conſonants is cer- " tainly neceſſary to bind the words, which may be " otherwiſe too much diſſolved, and loſe their force. " And as theatrical muſic expreſſes a variety of paſ- " ſions, it is not requiſite, even for the advantage of " the ſound, that the ſyllables ſhould every where " languiſh with the ſame looſe and vowelly ſoftneſs." He proceeds then to conſider the reaſonableneſs of encouraging Operas in our own language. The paſ- ſage is ſo elegant and full of good ſenſe, that we can- not forbear tranſcribing it. " But what, ſays he, is " certainly of much more conſequence in dramatical " entertainments, is, that they ſhould be performed " in a language underſtood by the audience. One " would think there ſhould be no need to prove " this. The great pleaſure in hearing vocal muſic, " ariſes from the aſſociation of the ideas raiſed at the " ſame time by the expreſſions and the ſounds. " Where theſe ideas are ſeparated, half the impreſ- " ſion is wanting; and where they are improperly " joined, it is imperfect. It is probable too, that " the pleaſure we receive from the moſt pathetical " ſtrains of inſtrumental muſic, is in part aſſiſted by " ſome ideas, which we affix to them, of paſſions, " which ſeem to be expreſſed by thoſe ſtrains. If " the airs in Operas may be heard with delight, for " the ſame reaſon, even when the words are not " underſtood, yet it is impoſſible the recitative ſhould " give pleaſure, which can raiſe no ſuch ideas; this " being not ſo properly ſinging, as ſpeaking in mu- " ſical cadences. And the uſe of it ſeems to be in- " troduced for the very ſame reaſon, which is given " by Ariſtotle, for the eſtabliſhing the uſe of Iambic " verſe in the Greek Tragedy; which is, that tho' " it has not the charms of ſome other kinds of " verſe, yet it is more proper for action and dialogue, " as it approaches nearer to common ſpeech. Thus " recitative muſic takes its riſe from the natural " tones and changes of the voice in ſpeaking, and " is indeed no more than a ſort of modulated pro- " nunciation." He then obſerves, that the ſucceſs of entertainments of that kind depends chiefly on the muſic; and the difficulty of confining the ſcenes to ſuch ſhort interchanged ſtages of RECITATIVE and AIRS, and of binding the ſenſe in ſuch choſen meaſures and ſyllables, as will beſt give the compoſer room to diſplay his skill, is indeed very great; yet notwith- ſtanding this, ſome examples of Operas and Poems for muſic, originally written in our language, with great beauty of thought and expreſſion, (by which he un- doubtedly intends Mr. Addiſon's Roſamond, and a few others) have ſhewn us, that the poetical part is ca- pable of very agreeable heightnings.

It is very juſtly obſerved, that the verſe as well as the thoughts of the Opera of Roſamond are vaſtly beautiful. But ſome of the greateſt artiſts in the mu- ſical way declare it not fit for the muſical drama. How- ever, a Gentleman who made the ſong of Deborah and Barak ſo finely vocal, has ſet a great many of the ſongs in Roſamond. But the moſt exquiſite Mu- ſician now in England, having been often importuned by his friends to exert his genius upon it, has al- ways declared, that it was impoſſible for him to diſ- play it to any advantage on that occaſion; in ſhort, that it was not fit for an Opera. As the har- mony of the numbers in Roſamond are ſo exquiſite, the (15) Mr. John Hughes in the Preface to his Engliſh Opera of Calypſo and Telemachus.

Steele ſurprized him with a dedication of this play; and afterwards acquainted the public, that he owed ſome of the moſt taking ſcenes of it to Mr. Addiſon (b). The Earl of Wharton being made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1709, he appointed Mr. Addiſon Secretary for that kingdom. The ſalary of Keeper of the Records in Ireland was conſiderably augmented, and that poſt was beſtowed upon Mr. Addiſon at this time, as a mark of the Queen's favour. He was in that kingdom when he firſt diſcovered Sir R. Steele to be author of the Tatler, by an obſervation upon Virgil, which he had communicated to him. His aſſiſtance afterwards in the courſe of that paper was very conſiderable [R]. He had likewiſe a very large ſhare in the Spectators

(b) Spectator N° 555.

the declaration of this Gentleman appeared a kind of paradox to all but the perfect Adepts in ſounds. The majority of theſe Artiſts, indeed, always prefer ſound to ſenſe; and after a Poet has toiled to introduce the latter into his verſe, the muſical compoſer ſhall often oblige him to throw it all out, and ſubſtitute in its ſtead, a ſet of tuneful, melodious any things; or to lop off his verſe, till it appear as mutilated as the ſtatue of Paſquin at Rome. One great advantage of the muſic of the Greeks and Romans was, that the Poet was generally at the ſame time the Muſician and Performer both vocal and inſtrumental; talents which are ſeldom or never found united in the ſame perſon in theſe latter ages. In a word, Poetry is at preſent made uſe of as a kind of block, on which Muſic, if we may employ the figure, is curl'd and powdered. To one circumſtance in Roſamond, indeed, the muſical Compoſer may object, which is, that the principal character in it (Roſamond) has a ſoporiferous, and as it is ſuppoſed poiſonous, draught given her by Queen Eleanor, which ſends her off the ſtage ſooner than ſhe ought to go, for the gratification of ſuch Gentlemen as are all ear: for as it is natural that the principal character ſhould be given to the fineſt voice, (and there are few exquiſitely ſo) thoſe who ſee Roſamond repreſented, by that means loſe a great deal of pleaſure by the imaginary death or abſence of ſuch a Syren; but then this would be remedied, were it poſſible to get voices that were all excellent. However, that very circumſtance which forms the defect in the muſical Drama, is a very great beauty in the ſpeaking Drama, if I may ſo call it, by the agreeable ſurprize the Audience are in, to find that Roſamond is not dead as they ſuppoſed, but had only taken a ſleeping draught as was before obſerved. We muſt take notice of one particular in this piece which ſeems to have been overlooked, viz. that the comic Characters (Sir Truſty, Grideline, &c. which would be ſo ridiculous in Tragi-comedy) are here found to have a wonderful effect, as was particularly viſible in the latter of them when repreſented by the facetious Mr. Leveridge. Serious Opera is of too calm and ſtill a nature; and unleſs enlivened by comic ſtrokes, is found too languid; for on theſe occaſions the ear may be tired with ſounds, how exquiſitely ſoever they may be blended.

[R] His aſſiſtance afterwards in the courſe of that paper was very conſiderable.] "In the laſt paper, (16) ſays Mr. Tickell, which cloſed thoſe celebrated "performances, and in the Preface to the laſt vo- "lume, Sir Richard Steele has given to Mr. Addiſon "the honour of the moſt applauded pieces in that col- "lection. But as that acknowledgment was deli- "vered only in general terms, without directing the "public to the ſeveral papers; Mr. Addiſon, who "was content with the praiſe ariſing from his own "works, and too delicate to take any part of that "which belonged to others, afterwards thought fit "to diſtinguiſh his writings in the Spectators and "Guardians by ſuch marks, as might remove the "leaſt poſſibility of miſtake in the moſt undiſcerning "reader." This paſſage Sir Richard Steele conſidered as a reflection upon himſelf, for not having ſufficiently acknowledged what was due to Mr. Addiſon in theſe writings; to juſtify himſelf from which imputation he alledges (17) the following encomiums which he gave to Mr. Addiſon. "But I "have, ſays he (18), only one Gentleman, who will "be nameleſs, to thank for any frequent aſſiſtance to "me, which indeed it would have been barbarous "in him to have denied to one, with whom he has "lived in an intimacy from childhood, conſider- "ing the great eaſe with which he is able to diſ- "patch the moſt entertaining pieces of this nature. "This good office he performed with ſuch force "of genius, humour, wit, and learning, that I fared "like a diſtreſſed Prince, who calls in a powerful "neighbour to his aid; I was undone by my aux- "iliary. When I had once called him in, I could "not ſubſiſt without dependance on him. The "ſame hand writ the diſtinguiſhing characters of "men and women, under the names of Muſical In- "ſtruments, the Diſtreſs of the News Writers, the In- "ventory of the Play-houſe, and the Deſcription of "the Thermometer, which I cannot but look upon "as the greateſt embelliſhments of this work.

(16) In his Life of Mr. Addiſon.

(17) Dedication of the Drummer to Mr. Congreve, p. 7, 8.

(18) Preface to the 4th volume of the Tatlers.

"As to the work itſelf, ſays Sir Richard (19), the (19) Tatler, N° "acceptance it has met with is the beſt proof of its 271. "value; but I ſhould err againſt that candor, which "an honeſt man ſhould always carry about him, if "I did not own, that the moſt approved pieces in "it were written by others, and thoſe, which have "been moſt excepted againſt by myſelf. The hand "that has aſſiſted me in thoſe noble diſcourſes upon "the immortality of the ſoul, the glorious proſpects "of another life, and the moſt ſublime ideas of re- "ligion and virtue, is a perſon, who is too fondly "my friend ever to own them; but I ſhould little "deſerve to be his, if I uſurped the glory of them. "I muſt acknowledge at the ſame time, that I think "the fineſt ſtrokes of wit and humour in all Mr. Bic- "kerſtaff's Lucubrations, are thoſe, for which he is "alſo beholden to him."

Sir R. Steele then goes on to ask what Mr. Tickell meant by ſaying, that the Tatler was however dropt at laſt, as it had been taken up, without Mr. Addiſon's participation. "Let him ſpeak out, ſays he, "and ſay, why, without his knowledge, would not "ſerve his purpoſe as well. If, as he ſays, he re- "ſtrains himſelf to Mr. Addiſon's character, as a "writer, while he attempts to leſſen me, he exalts "me; for he has declared to all the world, what I "never have ſo explicitly done, that I am to all intents "and purpoſes, the author of the Tatler. He very "juſtly ſays, the occaſional aſſiſtance Mr. Addiſon "gave me in the courſe of that paper, did not a lit- "tle contribute to advance its reputation, eſpecially "when, upon the change of the Miniſtry, he found "leiſure to engage more conſtantly in it. It was ad- "vanced indeed, for it was raiſed to a greater thing "than I intended it; for the elegance, purity and "correctneſs, which appeared in his writings, were "not ſo much my purpoſe, as in any intelligible "manner as I could, to rally all thoſe ſingularities of "human life, thro' the different profeſſions and cha- "racters in it, which obſtruct any thing that was "truly good and great. After this acknowledgment "you will ſee, that is, ſuch a man as you will ſee, "that I rejoiced in being excelled, and made thoſe "little talents, whatever they are which I have, "give way and be ſubſervient to the ſuperior quali- "ties of a friend whom I loved, and whoſe mode- "ſty would never have admitted them to come in- "to day-light but under ſuch a ſhelter. So that all "which the editor has ſaid, either out of deſign or "incapacity, Mr. Congreve muſt determine to end "in this, that Steele has been ſo candid and upright, "that he owes nothing to Mr. Addiſon, as a writer; "but whether he does or does not, whatever Steele "owes to Mr. Addiſon, the public owes Addiſon to "Steele. But the editor has ſuch a fantaſtical and "ignorant zeal for his patron, that he won't allow "his correſpondents to conceal any thing of his, "tho' in obedience to his commands. What I ne- "ver did declare was Mr. Addiſon's, I had his di- "rect injunctions to hide, againſt the natural warmth "and paſſion of my own temper towards my friends.

"Many

Spectators and (i) Guardians, which were publiſhed in the years 1711, 1712, 1713, and 1714. The papers which he wrote in the former are marked with the letters of the word CLIO [S]. Mr. Tickell informs us, that in the courſe of this work (k), the particular papers were ſeldom or never ſhewn to each other by their reſpective authors; and that Mr. Addiſon made little or no uſe of the letters ſent in by the numerous correſpondents of the Spectator, and therefore he could not have executed his large ſhare of this taſk in ſo exquiſite a manner, had he not ingrafted into it many pieces that had laid by him in little hints and minutes, which he collected from time to time, ranged in order, and moulded into the form, in which they now appear; particularly the Eſſays upon Wit; The Pleaſures of the Imagination; The Critique upon Milton; and ſome others. Several volumes of this work have been tranſlated into French, which met with univerſal applauſe [T]. And Sir Richard Blackmore in his Eſſays (l) has given a very (i) Mr. Dennis was diſpleas'd with the character of the Guardian, as we find in his Letters, Vol. II. p. 285, printed 1721, where he ſays, "That 'Squire "Ironſide is too "grave and too "ſerious an off-"ſpring of his "ludicrous ance-"ſtors; that the "reader com-"plains that he "meets with no-"thing at all to "divert him in "his neighbour's houſe, Humphrey Wrongſide, and among others does not forget Neſtor Blindſide.

(k) The Spectator.

(l) Vol. I. pag. 202.

"Many of the writings now publiſhed as his, I have "been very patiently traduced and calumniated for, "as they were pleaſantries and oblique ſtrokes upon "certain the wittieſt men of the age, who will now "reſtore me to their good-will, in proportion to the "abatement of wit, which they thought I employed "againſt them (20)."

(20) Dedication of the Drummer, p. 9, 10.

[S] Mark'd with the letters of the word CLIO.] Mr. Tickell tells us, as we obſerved in the preceding note, that Mr. ADDISON thought fit to diſtinguiſh his writings in the SPECTATORS and GUARDIANS by ſuch marks, as might remove the leaſt poſſibility of miſtake in the moſt undiſcerning reader. This paſſage has been animadverted upon by Sir Richard Steele with peculiar ſeverity. "I have obſerved, ſays he (21), that "the editor will not let me or any one elſe obey "Mr. Addiſon's commands in hiding any thing he "deſires ſhould be concealed. I cannot but take "further notice, that the circumſtance of marking "his Spectators, which I did not know till I had "done with the work, I made my own act; be-"cauſe I thought it too great a ſenſibility in my "friend, and thought it, ſince it was done, better to "be ſuppoſed mark'd by me than the author him-"ſelf; the real ſtate of which this zealot raſhly and "injudiciouſly expoſes. I ask the reader whether "any thing but an earneſtneſs to diſparage me, "could provoke the editor in behalf of Mr. Addiſon "to ſay, that he mark'd it out of caution againſt "me, when I had taken upon me to ſay, it was I "that did it out of tenderneſs to him." But in order to judge of this affair, let us ſee in what manner Sir Richard Steele expreſſed himſelf concerning Mr. Addiſon's ſhare in the Spectators. "I hope, "ſays he (22), the apology I have made as to the "licenſe allowable to a feigned character, may ex-"cuſe any thing, which has been ſaid in theſe diſ-"courſes of the SPECTATOR and his works. But "the imputation of the groſſeſt vanity would ſtill "dwell upon me, if I did not give ſome account by "what means I was enabled to keep up the ſpirit of "ſo long and approved a performance. All the pa-"pers mark'd with a C, L, I, O; that is to ſay, all "the papers, which I have diſtinguiſh'd by any letter "in the name of the Muſe CLIO, were given me "by a Gentleman, of whoſe aſſiſtance I formerly "boaſted in the Preface and concluding leaf of the "Tatler. I am indeed much more proud of his "long-continued friendſhip, than I ſhould be of the "fame of being thought the author of any writings, "which he himſelf is capable of producing. I re-"member, when I finiſh'd the Tender Husband, I "told him, there was nothing I ſo ardently wiſh'd "as that we might ſome time or other publiſh a "work written by us both, which ſhould bear the "name of the Monument, in memory of our friend-"ſhip. I heartily wiſh what I have here, were as "honorary to that ſacred name, as learning, wit and "humanity, render thoſe pieces, which I have taught "the reader how to diſtinguiſh for his. When the "Play abovementioned was laſt acted, there were ſo "many applauded ſtrokes in it, which I had from "the ſame hand, that I thought very meanly of "my ſelf, that I had never publickly acknowledged "them. After I have put other friends upon impor-"tuning him to publiſh dramatic as well as other "writings he has by him, I ſhall end what I think "I am obliged to ſay on this head, by giving my "reader this hint for the better judging of my pro-"ductions. That the beſt comment upon them "would be an account, when the Patron to the "Tender Husband was in England or abroad."

(21) Ibid. p. 11.

(22) Spectator, N° 555.

[T] Met with univerſal approbation.] Let us hear the judgment of the author quoted in note [N], upon that work. The fineſt Genius's in England, ſays he (23), have exerted in the Spectator, all the force of their reflexions, all the delicacy of the ſtyle, and all the fire of imagination that can be conceived. ... It is an admirable work; and it has preſerved a great part of its original graces and beauty in the French tranſlation. There is ſuch a prodigious variety in it both with regard to the ſtile and the ſubjects which it treats of, that we may juſtly affirm, the French nation has nothing to oppoſe to this work, that can be conſidered in all reſpects equal to it. The author of the Lay-Monaſtery, the late Mr. John Hughes, in his Preface to that work, gives us this character of the Spectator, to which his diſcourſes were deſigned as a ſequel. "The world has been obliged to an author of diſ-"tinguiſh'd merit, now living (24), for having been "the inventor of a manner of writing no leſs en-"tertaining than any which had been eſtabliſhed by "the practice of the moſt celebrated ancients. "The form, into which the beſt writer among the "Romans generally choſe to caſt his thoughts, was that "of dialogue or of his converſations related, in which "the perſons introduced were all Philoſophers, and "the diſcourſes wholly ſerious; yet this he borrow-"ed from Plato, and others of the Greeks; whom "he profeſſed to imitate. But the introducing a ſet "of perſons of different humours and characters, "acting on ſome imaginary occaſion, which might "draw out a variety of incidents and diſcourſes, "and in which every paper ſhould be an entire "piece, at the ſame time, that it is a part of the "whole, is the invention of the writer already "mentioned, who ſeems at once to have introduced "it, and carried it to perfection." A very ingeni-"ous and polite writer gives the following general "character of Mr. Addiſon's writings: "I may re-"commend Mr. Addiſon, ſays he, as a perfect pat-"tern of true poetic writing. .. This author is more "labour'd; like his great Maſter Virgil, he has "weighed every word, nor is there one expreſſion "in all his lines, that can be changed for any juſter, "or more forcible than it ſelf (25)." Poſſibly this laſt compliment may be a little overſtrained. We may obſerve here, that the Tatlers, Spectators, and Guardians, have been tranſlated into moſt of the European Languages, and given birth to ſeveral papers in imitation of them in foreign countries. The French had for ſome time their Babilliard, or Tatler; the Dutch have to this day their Spectator; and the Germans had for ſome years together their Guardian. This laſt paper was printed at Hamborough, and compoſed by a ſociety of Gentlemen, who underſtood Engliſh; they tranſlated ſeveral of the Spectators, which had not before appeared in the German language; and this gave their Guardians ſo great a reputation, that nine or ten thouſand of them were uſually ſold. Theſe particulars we are informed of by a relation of Mr. Addiſon's (26), who likewiſe tells us, "that when the Old Spectator was laid down "by thoſe hands which at firſt compoſed it, the pa-"per was immediately ſet on foot again by ſome of "the greateſt Wits in England. Several of whoſe "writings of different kinds had been received with "the utmoſt applauſe by the public; yet even theſe "Gentlemen, to their great ſurprize, found the "thing would not do; and had the good ſenſe not "only to drop their deſign, but to conceal their "names. Mr. Addiſon ſaid upon this occaſion, that

(23) Diſſertat. ſur la poëſie Angloiſe, in the Journal Literaire, tome IX. p. 159, 160.

(24) i. e. in 1714.

(25) Diſſertation on reading the Claſſicks, and forming a juſt ſtyle, p. 209, 210, London, printed for J. Bowyer 1713, 12°.

(26) See the Bee, or an Univerſal Weekly Pamphlet, N° I. p. 26, 27.

a very handſome encomium upon them. His words are theſe. " Many more books " on other moral ſubjects have been compoſed with much wit and vivacity in our " own and foreign countries to expoſe vice and folly, and promote decency and ſo- " briety of manners. But the productions of this nature, which have of late appear- " ed in this nation, whether we regard the juſt and generous ſentiments, the fertile in- " vention, the variety of ſubjects, the ſurprizing turns of wit and facetious imagination, " the genteel ſatyr, the purity and propriety of the words, and the beauty and dignity of " the diction, have ſurpaſſed all the productions of this kind that have been publiſhed in " any age or country. The reader no doubt is beforehand with me, and concludes, " that I mean the Tatler and Spectator, which, for the greateſt part, have all the per- " fection of writing, and all the advantages of wit and humour that are required to " entertain and inſtruct the people; and it muſt chiefly be owing to the great depra- " vity of manners in theſe looſe and degenerate times, that ſuch worthy performances " have produced no better effects." Mr. Addiſon in the Freeholder (m) has taken notice of this complement of Sir Richard Blackmore in the manner following. " As for the (m) Numb. 45.

" Tatlers " he looked upon the undertaking to write Spectators " to be like the attempt of Penelope's lovers to ſhoot " in the bow of Ulyſſes; who ſoon found, that no " body could ſhoot well in that bow, but the hand " which uſed to draw it." He then relates two ſtories, which ſhew, that among all the characters in that work, that of Sir Roger de Coverly was the favourite with Mr. Addiſon; who, a little before he laid down the Spectator, (foreſeeing that ſome nimble Gentleman would catch up his pen the moment he had quitted it,) ſaid to an intimate friend, with a certain warmth in his expreſſion, which he was not often guilty of, By G—d, I'll kill Sir Roger, that no body elſe may murder him. Accordingly the whole Spectator, N. 517, conſiſts of nothing elſe but an account of the old Knight's death and ſome moving circumſtances, which attended it. The other inſtance of Mr. Addiſon's tenderneſs for Sir Roger, is as follows: Sir Richard Steele, in one of his Spectators (27) has a little injudiciouſly made the old Knight pick up a looſe woman in Covent-Garden (28). Mr. Addiſon was ſo heartily vexed when he read this paper, that he immediately called a coach, went to his friend Sir Richard, and never left him till he had made him promiſe, that he would meddle no more with Sir Roger's character.

(27) N° 410. Vol. 6.

(26) Here the ingenious author miſtakes the place, it being in the Temple Cloyſters.

But as the Spectator was received with ſo general an applauſe, it could not be exempt from an attack (a fate to which the nobleſt compoſitions are obnoxious.) for in the year 1711 there appeared a pamphlet entitled A Spy upon the Spectator (29). The preface declares, " That there may be ſeen more than ordi- " nary reaſons to look narrowly into the Spectator's " deſigns and management. The tyranny that he " pretends to exert over the ſenſe and reaſon of his " countrymen, and the ſmall ſtock of diſcretion " with which he lays this daily burthen of ſpeculati- " ons upon them, makes it neceſſary to ſtop him in " the beginning, and let him know that the founda- " tions of his power are only imaginary, and his no- " tions are of the ſame nature as the clouds and " miſts, that he pretends to caſt over his actions. " Care ſhould be taken leſt by following him we " loſe our wit, morality and religion. For ſhould " we look upon him to be the touchſtone of wit, " and the rule and ſtandard of judgment, and after- " wards find that he is flat in the one, and exerciſes " the other upon trifles (N° 10) it may at laſt make " us have a contemptible opinion of ingenuity and " learning.

(29) It was printed for John Morphew near Stationer's Hall, and contains 24 pages in 8*vo*. See Part I.

The author then proceeds to ſhew the danger that may ariſe from the Spectator with regard to morality; " which, ſays he, is a ſerious thing, and of too " much value to be loſt; and therefore, although the " Spectator at preſent, under the pretence of enli- " vening it by wit (N° 10) may impoſe only the ſha- " dow of it upon us inſtead of the ſubſtance, yet he " ſhould not be permitted to proceed ſo far as to " make a buffoon of Ariſtotle, and write a burleſque " upon Epictetus."

The laſt danger which he inſinuates may be occaſioned by the Spectator is that of religion. " The " profeſſion, ſays he, as well as character of the " Clergy, are too ſacred for the trivialneſs of ſuch " papers; and who knows but the Spectator, who " expreſt his averſion to bells at two months old " (N° 1) and has contracted a friendſhip with a Di- " vine, that under the ſhelter of a weak conſtitution, " has laid aſide the cares and buſineſs of his function " to attend upon clubs and chamber-council (N° 2), " may have ſome deſign againſt the fifty new churches, " at leaſt will be againſt having any Steeple-houſes " and Belfries to them."

He concludes his preface with theſe words: " The ſeveral Spectators being a disjoined and con- " fuſed huddle of unmethodized notions, I do not " look upon my ſelf obliged to take them in order. " However (notwithſtanding his magiſterial autho- " rity) every one of them in proper time and place, " may meet with due correction. And perhaps he " ſhall ſhortly find, he has not art enough to diſguiſe " himſelf; and that a net is too thin a cloak for a " party-man to dance in." But the ſame dull criticiſm might be made on all the excellent pieces that were ever publiſhed; and that theſe aſſertions were groundleſs and malicious, appears from the beauty of thoſe papers, and the good effect they wrought (30).

Mr. Oldmixon has likewiſe cenſured the Spectator's character as a critic; for he tells us (31), " That in oppoſition to his own rule, he ſeldom " takes notice of any beauty, which had not been " diſtinguiſhed before by others, as well as by him- " ſelf, either in writing or converſation. I do not " ſay this in the leaſt diminution of the merit of " that Gentleman as a Poet or Critick. He had as " much of it as any man, but to let the reader a " little into the art of the Spectator; for if we are " not to remark beauties, which have been remarked " before, he has in a great meaſure engroſſed the " market to himſelf, by tranſcribing the moſt beau- " tiful paſſages of Milton and other Poets. Beſides, " that art appears viſibly in his caution as to the cha- " racter of authors, there being no better way to " ſecure his own valuable one, than in doing ho- " nour to that of others (32). The Spectator, as a " Critic, is not without a ſmack of the character " of Lord Plauſible, as a Gentleman."

We have likewiſe another paſſage in that Critic to the ſame purpoſe. " I cannot help taking notice, " ſays he (33), that the criticiſms in the Tatlers, " Guardians and Spectators, are a little too common " and ſuperficial, and not always juſt. Thoſe on " Milton are rather a collection of the beauties in " the Paradiſe Loſt, than an exact criticiſm on the " mechaniſm of the Poem. Of the ſame kind " are the quotations out of other Poems; and it is " ſurely moſt praiſe-worthy, that ſeveral of theſe " Poems were written by the friends of the writers " of thoſe papers, and very often of the printers. " However, in other ſpeculations they are the moſt " polite and entertaining of any modern pieces, per- " haps in any modern language. With this high and " juſt opinion of thoſe authors, I muſt be ſo free as to " obſerve, that there is too much artifice in their re- " marks on writers and their writings. They ſeldom " meddle with any whoſe reputation is not well eſta- " bliſhed. Contrary to the Spectator's obſervation, " N° 291. One great mark by which you may diſcover " a Critic who has neither taſte nor learning, is this, " that he ſeldom ventures to praiſe any paſſage in an " author, which has not been before received. Whoever " is acquainted with the Tatlers, Guardians and Spec- " tators, need not to be told, that moſt of the paſ- " ſages, which are praiſed in theſe papers, were well " known before to men of taſte, though they were " not become ſo common as they have been ſince."

(30) The formidable Mr. Dennis (in his Letters familiar, moral and critical) cenſures ſome of Mr. Addiſon's (but without ſeeming to know that they were his) Spectators, ſpeaking of the Templer (one of the Characters in that paper) he ſays, " That " Shadwell is of " opinion, that " the Sharper " (cenſured in the " Tatler) with " his box and his " falſe dice is an " honeſter fellow " than the rhe- " torical author " the Templer, " who makes uſe " of his tropes " and figures, " which are his " high and his " low-runners, to " cheat us at once " of our money " and of our in- " tellectuals." And a little after, ſpeaking of N. 40 of the Spectator, he declares, " That there are " as many bulls, " and blunders, " and contradic- " tions in it al- " moſt as there " are lines, and " all delivered " with that inſo- " lent and that " bluſtering air, " which uſually " attends upon " error and delu- " ſion; while " truth, like the " Deity that in- " ſpires it, comes " calmly and " without noiſe." Dennis's Letters Vol. II. p. 407, 408, London 1721. There is much bluſter in this Criticiſm, but we don't find any in the Diſcourſe on which it animadverts.

(31) Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, p. 295, 296. A dry, unpromiſing title to the imitation of a very agreeable French work, Father Bouhour's Humiere de bien penſer.

(32) This ſevere inſinuation might perhaps deſerve to be animadverted upon.

(33) Ibid. p. 66.

" Tatlers and Spectators in particular, which are obliged to this ingenious and uſeful " author for the character he has given of them, they were ſo generally diſperſed in " ſingle ſheets, and have ſince been printed in ſo great numbers, that it is to be hoped " they have made ſome proſelytes to the intereſts, if not to the practice of wiſdom and " virtue, among ſuch a multitude of readers." The ſituation of affairs in England in the year 1713 rendring the doctrine of liberty very ſeaſonable, Mr. Addiſon endeavoured to awaken the nation to a ſenſe of it by his excellent Tragedy of Cato. It received an univerſal applauſe, and all parties, however divided and oppoſite to each other, conſpired in giving it the commendations it deſerved (n). It run for a month together, and then was ſtopt only by the indiſpoſition of one of the principal performers. The author received a meſſage, that the Queen would be pleaſed to have it dedicated to her (o); but as he had deſigned that compliment elſewhere, he found himſelf obliged by his duty on the one ſide, and his honour on the other, to ſend it into the world without any dedication. Mr. Pope wrote the prologue to it, which is very beautiful, and Dr. Garth the epilogue. It was tranſlated into French and Italian, and acted in moſt of the languages of Chriſtendom [U]. Immediately after the publication of this Tragedy there was a pamphlet publiſhed by Mr. George Sewell, who was afterwards a Phyſician, and author of the Tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh. This pamphlet is entitled Obſervations upon Cato, a Tragedy by Mr. Addiſon, in a letter to , dated April 25, 1713, pages 21, in 4°. (p). It contains ſeveral ingenious remarks in favour of that performance (W).

This

(n) The honours to which Mr. Addiſon was raiſed, and the wealth he got, made Mr. Voltaire obſerve, " That had he " been in France, " he would have " been elected a " member of one " of the Academies, and by " the credit of " ſome women, " might have " obtained a " yearly penſion of twelve " hundred livres; " or elſe might " have been impriſon'd in the " Baſtile, upon " pretence that " certain ſtrokes " in his Tragedy " of Cato, had " been diſcovered, " glanced at the " porter of ſome " man in power. Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, Letter XXIII.

(o) It is the opinion of many, that ſome Characters in this Tragedy glanced at certain men (the Tories) then in power, who, in order to ward off the reflections which might ariſe from hence, affected to applaud it with the Whigs, by which means the approbation became univerſal.

(p) Printed for A. Baldwin in Warwick-Lane 1713.

[U] It was immediately tranſlated into French and Italian, and acted in moſt of the languages of Chriſtendom.] The French tranſlation of Mr. Boyer was publiſhed at London in 1713. The Abbot du Bos likewiſe tranſlated it; but only the three firſt ſcenes of that verſion were printed (34). We have an Italian tranſlation by the Abbot Salvini; and this tragedy having been acted at Leghorn during the Carnival by the Academici Compattiti, it was received with ſuch prodigious applauſe, that the author was obliged to publiſh it at Florence (35). Mr. Tickell ſays, that he has not been able to learn, whether that of Signor Valetta, a young Neapolitan Nobleman, has ever been made public. We have a Latin tranſlation of the celebrated Soliloquy of Cato in the beginning of the fifth act of that Tragedy, which, as the publiſher of it in the Spectator obſerves (36), for conciſeneſs, purity, and elegance of phraſe cannot be ſufficiently admired. This is ſaid to have been done by the late Dr. Francis Atterbury, Biſhop of Rocheſter. The Engliſh college of Jeſuits at St. Omers tranſlated the whole Tragedy into Latin, and had it acted by their pupils there with vaſt magnificence and prodigious applauſe. They ſent a copy of their verſion over to Mr. Addiſon.

(34) See the ſupplement to the Nouvelles Literaires for the 17th of October 1716.

(35) Nouvelles Liter. du 25 Juillet 1716. p. 51.

(36) Numb. 628. Vol. 8.

[W] It contains ſeveral ingenious remarks in favour of that performance.] The author declares at the beginning of his Pamphlet his approbation of it, and tells us, that this Tragedy, which had raiſed the expectation of the town to a great height, had juſtly ſatisfied it; and he divides his obſervations upon it into the following heads; 1. He gives a general idea of the character of Cato, in order to ſhew more evidently with what juſtneſs and propriety his character, with all his ſentiments, is preſerved to the laſt. 2. He points out how juſtly all the other characters are diſtinguiſhed from each other, and made ſubſervient to the conduct of the whole. 3. He concludes with obſerving ſome extraordinary beauties in it, and ſhewing how exactly they are conformable, not only to the true ſpirit of Poetry, but the beſt rules of Criticiſm. The reader we preſume will not be diſpleaſed to ſee a more particular extract from this piece, ſince there is ſuch a peculiar fatality attending Pamphlets, even the beſt of them, that in a ſhort time they are neglected and forgotten by the public, and are only to be found in the hands of the Curious. Our ingenious author tells us, that " in order to form a general idea of Cato, we muſt " have a view of the ſcene of affairs in which he " acted, an age full of vice and corruption, de- " bauch'd from their old generous Roman Principles, " abounding with plots and conſpiracies againſt the " preſent model of their Government, divided into " parties, headed by violent and ambitious ſpirits, " and carried on with all the arts of deſign, hy- " pocriſy and diſſimulation; and in ſhort ſuch an " age, wherein, as Cicero deſcribes it, it was as dan- " gerous for a good man to hazard himſelf in buſi- " neſs, and act in public offices, as it was diſgrace- " ful and mean to retire from them." In this age, continues our critic, the great Cato appeared, acting merely upon the principles of honour and juſtice, neither aw'd nor ſeduced by parties, with the trueſt notions of the ancient republic form, and a hearty zeal for it, publickly oppoſing both its diſguiſed and open enemies. When the civil war broke out, he ſided indeed with Pompey, as moſt of the Senators and lovers of their country did, not thinking him ſo dangerous an enemy as Cæſar; and Cato particularly hoping by the influence he had over him to bring him to reſettle the State upon its old bottom, if Pompey happened to prove the Conqueror. Dr. Sewell proceeds then to ſtate Cato's public and private character as it is repreſented by Lucan, who in that deſcription had as ſtrict a regard to truth as any Hiſtorian. This Poet in the ſecond book of the Pharſalia has extremely well painted the ſimplicity of his manners and habit, his notions of Philoſophy and his manner of behaviour; and then deſcribed his zeal for the State, and his anxiety for the calamities, that were likely to befall it; his generous concern for his fellow-ſufferers and neglect of himſelf, when Brutus comes to conſult him in the dead of the night. Our author has given us an elegant tranſlation of theſe paſſages; and then remarks, how agreeable to this, the character of Cato is ſuſtained thro' the whole Play. In the ſecond Act, ſays he (37), we find him beſieg'd and encompaſſed by Cæſar at Utica, in conference with a few Senators, who had adher'd to the cauſe of liberty, in this utmoſt exigence, regulating their debates, and returning an anſwer to Cæſar with an air ſuperior to his fortune. And tho' in this debate he utters many ſentences, which would not be graceful for another to ſpeak, yet according to Quintilian's rule, they are very proper and juſt in him; for, ſays the Orator, ſentences are moſt properly put in the mouth of men of authority, that the perſon may give a confirmation to the weight and importance of the ſubject. In the third Act we have another inſtance of the greatneſs of his ſoul, where he ventures himſelf unarmed amidſt a band of conſpirators, who by the ſingle awe of his virtue are ſo abaſh'd, that they dare not execute their purpoſe, when it was in their power. This is very agreeable to Virgil's ſentiment, where he compares in his firſt Æneid the ſudden fall of the waves and ceaſing of the winds, at the appearance of Neptune, to the compoſing of a popular tumult in an inſtant by the ſight and words of a grave and good man. After Cato has delivered the mutineers up to juſtice, he wiſely takes an opportunity from thence to recommend their darling liberty to his friends, and goes off as calm and ſedate as if no ſuch thing had happened. In the fourth Act we ſee a greater trial of his conſtancy, where when the relation of his ſon Marcus's death is brought to him by his brother Portius, before the narration is finiſh'd, he thinks not of

(37) Obſervations &c. p. 8.

This Dramatic Piece was begun long before it was brought upon the ſtage [X].

of the loſs of his ſon, but only of his behaviour; and when he finds it glorious, cries out, I am ſatisfied! This inſtance of fortitude our critic obſerves is not unlike that in Corneille's Tragedy of Horace, obſerved by Monſieur Boileau in his Preface to Longinus, where the Father of the three Horatii being told, that two of his ſons were killed in the combat with the three Curiatii, and that the third fled away; grieves only for the ſhameful flight of the laſt; and their ſiſter asking him what he would have had him ſingly done againſt three, he replied,—Die. When we conſider Cato under another view, we ſee his friendſhip for Juba, and his generous endeavours to form his mind to true greatneſs, and to raiſe his hopes on future proſpects of a dignity, that would be the reward of his virtues, not of his birth. When we view him under the light of Philoſophy, we ſee him making uſe of it to form his reſolutions how beſt to diſengage himſelf from the world and Cæſar. There is a great variety to be obſerved in that excellent ſpeech upon this occaſion; his reſolution, his agreeable proſpects of eternity, and yet the uncertainty where and when, which throws him into ſome little ſuſpence, till upon a view of the book and ſword, he reſumes his reſolution. Cicero has a paſſage which ſeems to warrant the uncertainty of Cato's conduct in this point. "While "I am reading, ſays he, Plato's book, I am allur'd "and charmed into a conviction of the immortality "of the ſoul, and its exiſtence in a future ſtate; "but as ſoon as I have laid down the book, I re-"lapſe into uncertainty, and all my former convic-"tion ſlides away from me." Cato, after a ſound ſleep, (the bleſſing of a good and compoſed mind) executes his purpoſe, and even in the agonies of death ſhews a kind concern for his ſon, daughter, and friends; and then with an abhorrence of the world, and a ſeeming diſtruſt of his conduct, expires in a prayer to the Gods. Dr. Sewell proceeds next to the diſtinction of the remaining characters from each other; which rule is too much neglected in many of our celebrated Plays. Portius and Marcus are nicely diſtinguiſh'd in their complexions, manners and tempers; and this difference of ſouls runs viſibly thro' the whole Play into a friendly diſparity of ſentiments, the one ſedate and calm, the other warm and paſſionate. They both act upon the ſame principles of honour and virtue, and the example of their Father. The elder conſiders him as a lover of liberty and his country; the younger merely in oppoſition to Cæſar. The one copies his Morality and Philoſophy, the other ſhews his zeal for Rome. The critic points out other differences in their characters; and obſerves with regard to Juba, that his character is entirely new. He copies from Cato's example, and is particularly animated to a noble imitation of him by his love for Marcia. His confuſion at the diſcovery of this love; his ſubmiſſion to Cato's authority; his diſcourſe with Syphax on the preference of the arts of the mind to thoſe of the body; and in ſhort, every incident of his character is admirable. Nor is there a leſs difference in the vicious than in the virtuous parts introduced. Sempronius and Syphax are both villains, traytors and hypocrites, but of a diſtinct kind; and the Roman and the African differ as much in their treachery as their complexion. Lucius, the oppoſite to Sempronius, tho' a friend to Cato, is of a mild, calm and merciful diſpoſition, full of tenderneſs for ſufferers of all ſorts; and inclines to a gentler method, not ſo much out of weakneſs, as from the review of the calamities that afflicted his country. The two women inherit the different ſpirits of their fathers. The daughter of Cato, concerned deeply for her father and the cauſe of virtue, checks an untimely paſſion, with the reflection of the relation ſhe bears to the Head of that cauſe, and by an excellent artifice of the Poet, upon the ſuppoſition of the death of her lover, diſcovers her value for him. This incident is natural as well as neceſſary, ſo that it takes away all indecency unworthy of a daughter of Cato. On the other ſide, Lucia of a ſoft and compaſſionate temper, cannot diſguiſe her thoughts, but after ſhe has revealed them, fearful of the conſequences, reſolves to wait the event of things before ſhe makes her lover happy. Here is the timidity and pity of her father Lucius; and at the ſame time her kindneſs to Marcia engages her as far as his friendſhip to Cato did him. Dr. Sewell remarks, that the plot is juſtly worked up from theſe characters; and that in the Cataſtrophe, which is of a mixed nature, unfortunate goodneſs is left upon conjecture and to the Gods, and the other virtuous characters are all rewarded. The Critic then obſerves, with regard to the particular beauties of the Play, that the paſſions which the character of Cato is moſt apt to raiſe, are indignation, admiration and pity; indignation, to ſee ſuch exalted virtue oppreſſed by ſucceſsful tyranny; admiration, in obſerving the Patriot, in the midſt of all his calamities, great, good, and intrepid; pity, for his ill ſucceſs in the public cauſe and his domeſtic misfortunes, which are apt ſo much the more to move others, as they affected him leſs. Dr. Sewell tells us likewiſe, that he would have but a mean opinion of an audience, who ſhould not be moved by it. He remarks, that moſt of Cato's ſpeeches are filled with indignation againſt Cæſar; and that, according to Quintilian, interrogations agree beſt with that paſſion, and heighten the ſentiments. Of this kind we have ſeveral beautiful inſtances in the ſecond act, between Decius and Cato, particularly where Decius tells him how anxious Cæſar was for his life, and Cato replies;

Would he ſave Cato? Bid him ſpare his country.

We have another fine inſtance in the fourth act, where Juba ſays;

While Cato lives, Cæſar will bluſh to ſee
Mankind enſlav'd, and be aſham'd of Empire.

And he returns;

Cæſar aſham'd! has he not ſeen Pharſalia?

The very mention of Pharſalia is the ſtrongeſt mark of indignation, without any other exaggeration. The Critic obſerves one more beauty, which is as follows. It is upon a common topic, which all our Poets have occaſion for ſome time or other, an impoſſibility. What work do they make here? Sometimes you might as well move Olympus; at others, Stars muſt be graſp'd at; and the more moderate are contented with making Rivers flow backward to the fountain head. But here we may obſerve the judgment of the Poet in the firſt act, where Sempronius is telling Portius what a happineſs he ſhould enjoy, if Cato his father would give him his ſiſter Marcia; to which he replies,

Alas! Sempronius, wouldſt thou talk of love
To Marcia, while her father's life's in danger?
Thou might'ſt as well court the pale trembling veſtal
When ſhe beholds the holy flame expiring.

This image is new, beautiful, and judiciouſly ſuited to the circumſtances; and nothing could be more agreeable to the notions of a Roman, than ſuch an impoſſibility; beſides that the glance at religion improves and exalts the idea to the higheſt pitch. Dr. Sewell obſerves, that it appears from a dialogue de Oratoribus (38), attributed by ſome to Tacitus, and by others to Quintilian, that Curiatius Maternus compoſed a Tragedy upon this ſubject; and it is probable, by the hint which Horace gives in his firſt Ode of the ſecond book to Pollio, that Cato bore a conſiderable part in his Tragedy, which he adviſed him to defer publiſhing, till matters were better compoſed, and forbear a ſubject, which could not but be ungrateful to many at that time. Dr. Sewell concludes with this obſervation, that this was not deſigned as a State or Party-play; but that the character of Cato was drawn from the life, without any regard to the circumſtances of the time, when the Tragedy appeared. It is very certain indeed, that Cato's character is juſt, and formed upon the truth of hiſtory; but Mr. Tickell has aſſured us, as we obſerved above in ſtage [X]. Mr. Deſchamps having ſeen this Tragedy wrote one upon the ſame ſubject, and under the ſame title, which has been oppoſed to that of Mr. Addiſon [Y]. Mr.

(38) C. 2 and 3.

in the text of this article, that Mr. Addiſon was induced by the ſtate of affairs at the time when it was acted, to bring it upon the ſtage then. Dr. Sewell has ſubjoined to his Obſervations a Poem upon this Tragedy, wherein having complained that Operas had long triumphed over Poetry and Tragedy, he takes notice that this performance had awakened men from their ſtupid indolence:

Thoſe heads, that us'd moſt indolent to move
To Sing-song Ballad, and Sonata love,
Began their buried ſenſes to explore,
And found they now had paſſions as before:
The power of nature in their boſoms felt,
In ſpite of prejudice compell'd to melt.

He then applauds Cato's conſtancy, and obſerves that the Soul of Rome appeared more eminent and great in his ſingle character, than when it reigned in whole crowds of Senators.

Obſerve the juſtneſs of the Poet's thoughts,
Whoſe ſmalleſt excellence is want of faults:
Without affected pomp and noiſe he warms,
Without the gaudy dreſs of beauty charms:
Love, the old ſubject of the buskin'd Muſe,
Returns, but ſuch as Roman virgins uſe.
A virtuous love, chaſtis'd by pureſt thought,
Not from the fancy, but from nature wrought.

He then calls upon the Britons, to do honour to their modern Poet, and place him in a rank ſuperior to the moſt admired of their ancients, Johnſon and Shakeſpear.

While Phœbus binds the lawrel on his brow,
Riſe up ye Muſes, and ye Poets bow:
Superior worth with admiration greet,
And place him neareſt to his Phœbus's ſeat,

[X] This Tragedy was begun long before it was brought upon the ſtage.] "This Tragedy, ſays Mr. "Tickell, appeared in public in the year 1713, when "the greateſt part of the laſt act was added by the "author to the foregoing, which he had kept by "him for many years. He took up a deſign of "writing a play upon this ſubject when he was very "young at the Univerſity, and even attempted "ſomething in it there, though not a line as it now "ſtands. The work was performed by him in his "travels, and retouched in England, without any "formed reſolution of bringing it upon the ſtage, "till his friends of the firſt quality and diſtinction "prevailed with him to put the laſt finiſhing to it, "at a time when they thought the doctrine of liber-"ty very ſeaſonable." This paſſage has given a new occaſion to Sir Richard Steele to animadvert upon Mr. Tickell with his uſual vehemence and aſperity. We ſhall give Sir Richard's obſervation entire, becauſe it acquaints us with ſome particulars relating to that Tragedy and the author of it. "All the "town knows, ſays he (39), how officious I was in "bringing it on; and you that know the town, the "theatre, and mankind very well, can judge how "neceſſary it was to take meaſures for making a "performance of that ſort, excellent as it is, run "into popular applauſe. I promis'd before it was "acted, and performed my duty accordingly to the "author, that I would bring together ſo juſt an au-"dience on the firſt days of it, that it ſhould be im-"poſſible for the vulgar to put its ſucceſs or due "applauſe to any hazard; but I don't mention it only "to ſhew, how good an Aid de Camp I was to Mr. "Addiſon, but to ſhew alſo that the editor does as "much to cloud the merit of this work as I did to "ſet it forth. Mr. Tickell's account of its being "taken up, laid down, and at laſt perfected, after "ſuch long intervals and pauſes, would make any "one believe, who did not know Mr. Addiſon, that "it was accompliſhed with the greateſt pain and la-"bour, and the iſſue rather of learning and induſtry, "than capacity and genius. But I do aſſure you, "that never Play, which could bring the author "any reputation for wit and conduct, notwitſtand-"ing 'twas ſo long before it was finiſh'd, employed "the author ſo little a time in writing. If I re-"member right, the fifth Act was written in leſs "than a week's time; for this was particular in "this writer, that when he had taken his reſoluti-"on, or made his plan for what he deſigned to "write, he would walk about a room, and dictate "it into language with as much freedom and eaſe "as any one could write it down, and attend to "the coherence and grammar of what he dictated. "I have been often thus employed by him, &c."

(39) Dedication of the Drummer, p. 15, 16.

[Y] Which has been oppoſed to that of Mr. Addiſon.] This Tragedy of Des Champs was even preferred to that of Mr. Addiſon, in a diſſertation publiſhed in the Mercure Galant, a collection worthy ſuch an extraordinary piece of criticiſm. Des Champs's Cato was dedicated by him to the Duke of Orleans, and it was tranſlated into Engliſh in Blank Verſe, and publiſhed with a Parallel betwixt that piece and the Tragedy of Cato written by Mr. Addison, at London, 1716. The author of this Parallel pretends to ſhew, by an analyſis of the two Plays, that Mr. Addiſon's is very faulty in the ſtructure of the fable, while the French Tragedy is extremely beautiful; and that the Epiſodes of the Engliſh Poet are abſolutely detached from the principal action, and make it diſappear: whereas thoſe of the French Poet depend upon the ſubject, are full of diſtreſs, and diſcover the plot; in ſhort, that the conduct of the latter is regular, wonderful, agreeable to truth, moving and great. Mr. Des Champs ſuppoſes, that Portia, the daughter of Cato being fallen into the hands of the Parthians, after the defeat of Craſſus, is advanced at the Court of Arſaces, under the denomination of his daughter, and that after that Prince was dead, ſhe becomes Queen of Parthia. He attempts, as he ſays himſelf (40), to throw a concern of paſſion betwixt her and Cæſar which he could not have done, if ſhe had been known to be Cato's daughter. Cato is ſurpriz-ed to find his daughter a Queen; and inſtead of mak-ing uſe of her aſſiſtance to ſupport his liberty, he thought it criminal to keep a Scepter in his family, and takes occaſion frequently to perſuade Portia to re-nounce her Crown. This ſudden change exaſperates Pharnaces King of Pontus, who deſigned to marry the Queen; upon this he reſolves to aſſaſſinate Cato; he propoſes it to Cæſar, who abhorring ſuch a treachery informs Cato of it. Pharnaces in deſpair attempts to kill Cato and Cæſar, and makes himſelf Maſter of their place of conference, and ſiezes Portia and the city of Utica. The danger that Cæſar was in makes him run to ſuccour his troops; Pharnaces is defeated; but the Romans who followed Cato join themſelves to Cæſar's army; and Cato having no other reſource but to ſubmit to Cæſar, or kill himſelf, choſe the latter. This is the plot of Mr. Des Champs's Tragedy. The author of the Parallel then gives us ſeveral paſſages of the French piece in oppoſition to the beauties of the Engliſh, tho' he confeſſes he is puzzled in the choice. He extolls the extracts which he makes; compares them to the moſt applauded parts of Corneille and Racine; and concludes the whole Parallel in this manner: The cauſe is ready to be heard; pronounce, my Lord, I have ſaid it, and don't repent, I conſent to be judged by an English man. As for the reſt, I have no other intention than to excite between Mr. Addison and Mr. Des Champs an emulation, which may encourage the latter to proceed upon the foot of Corneille, and puſh on the firſt to become a Corneille to England. However, after all theſe Elogiums Mr. Des Champs's piece did not ſucceed in the leaſt, and was generally deſpiſed here by all good judges. It met with the ſame fate among perſons of taſte and learning in other countries; and we find that one of the authors of the Journal Literaire having recommended this Play, a brother-writer of his, (whom we have quoted above,) diſowned that Elogium of it in expreſs terms. "With regard to Mr. Addiſon, ſays "he (41), foreigners may form a judgment of his "genius by the volumes of the Spectator, which "have been already publiſhed in French. But we "could

(40) In the Preface to his Cato.

(41) Journal Liter. ubi ſupra, p. 215.

" could not juſtly have denied him the greateſt " commendations imaginable, tho' he had written " nothing elſe beſides his Cato. We cannot imagine, " continues he, how it happened, that in one of " our Journals among the literary news from the " Hague, there was publiſhed ſuch an extravagant " Elogium upon the French Cato, and at the ſame " time ſo injurious a reflexion upon that of Mr. " Addiſon. We are ſo far from approving this, " that we are of opinion, the Parallel which the " French have publiſhed between theſe two pieces " equals all that unjuſt contempt, which the Engliſh " in every age have caſt upon the French. There " is no exaggeration in this; for nothing can be " conceived more extravagant, than to prefer a " piece, which is ſcarce equal to the worſt of " Pradon's works, to one of the moſt perfect com- " poſitions, which England has produced." This critique is very judicious, but perhaps it would have been more juſt, if inſtead of fixing this ridiculous Parallel between the Cato of Mr. Des Champs and that of Mr. Addiſon, upon the French in general, the author had obſerved, as it was done in another Journal, that the Engliſh would not do juſtice to the French nation, if they ſhould impute to it the ſentiments of the author, who compared the French and Engliſh Cato together, and was even ſo raſh as to give the preference to the former (42).

(42) Supplem. des Nouvelles Liter. du 17 Octob. 1716, p. 337.

[Z] We cannot avoid taking notice here of an anonymous author, who wrote a Critique upon Mr. Addiſon's Cato (43); and it appears very clearly, that his deſign was to find fault with that piece, in order to revenge the French nation for the preference, which Mr. Addiſon in ſome of his Spectators had given to the Engliſh writers over the French. But this over-officious Champion will hardly be acknowledged by the French any more than the author of the Parallel between the two Cato's. In ſhort, he had neither candour nor abilities ſufficient to execute the task, which he had undertaken. He cenſures Mr. Addiſon for faults, which he was not guilty of, and which can only be charged upon the French tranſlator. For inſtance, he ranks among the faults againſt common ſenſe, the firſt words of the Tragedy according to Mr. Boyer's tranſlation;

(43) See Nouvelles Liter. du 1 & du 16 de Janvier 1717.

L'Aurore s'obſcurcit, & ſe couvrant d'afreux nuages n'ameine qu'avec peine le jour fatal, qui doit decider du ſort de Caton & de Rome.

Or according to Mr. Hullin;

L'Aurore ſe couvrant d'un voile tenebreux
N'annonce qu'à regret un jour ſi malheureux;
Jour fatal à Caton, plus funeſte pour Rome,
Puiſqu'il va decider du ſort de ce grand homme.

" This, ſays he, is contrary to all the rules of the " Drama to open the cataſtrophe of the Play in the " firſt words of it, which inform us, that it is a " fatal day, a day which is to decide the fate of " Cato; this is expreſly ſaying, that Cato muſt die, " or at leaſt ſubmit to Cæſar." But Mr. Addiſon has taken care to avoid ſo flagrant a miſtake, for the original has nothing to that purpoſe; and the (44) Abbé Du Bos has tranſlated it very exactly in the following manner, which is equally agreeable to good ſenſe and to the rules of the Drama. L'Aurore ſe leve? Qu'elle a l'air ſombre? Quels nuages lui couvrent le front? N'ameneroit elle qu'à regret ce grand jour, ce jour memorable, qui doit enfanter la deſtinée de Caton & de Rome. In ſhort the faults, which the abovementioned author pretends to find in the ſtructure and œconomy of this Tragedy, either are not to be found in it, or are no faults at all, or are ſuch faults, as may with equal juſtice be imputed to Corneille and Racine, and yet have never been objected to thoſe great Poets: It were very eaſy to produce inſtances of all this, and to confute this critic beyond any poſſibility of contradiction.

(44) This Gentleman who is Secretary to the French Academy has written, among other pieces, a work entitled, Reflexions Critiques ſur la Poëſie & la Peinture. This work abounds with a multitude of very curious obſervations.

Mr. Voltaire, in his Diſcourſe on Tragedy (45), to the Right Honourable the Lord Viſcount Bolingbroke, prefixed to the 4th Edition of his Eſſay upon the Civil Wars of France, and upon the Epic-Poetry of the European Nations (46), having obſerved the defects of the French ſtage, where the benches ſet on the ſtage contract the ſpace of it, and make it almoſt impoſſible to repreſent the whole action. " To this de- " fect, ſays he, it is owing, that the ſcenes and de- " corations, which are ſo ſtrongly recommended by " the ancients, ſo ſeldom ſuit the Play. Above all, " it hinders the actors from paſſing out of one room " into another before the ſpectators, as was the ju- " dicious practice of the Greeks and Romans, in or- " der to preſerve at one and the ſame time the unity " of place and probability." He then proceeds to ſhew that the French writers could not attempt to bring Pompey's Ghoſt, or the Genius of Brutus, on their ſtage, among ſo many young people, who view the moſt ſerious incidents purely that they may have an opportunity of ſaying ſome ſmart thing: " How " could we, ſays he, bring in the midſt of theſe " the body of Marcus to Cato his father, who " makes the following ſpeech?

(45) Tranſlated by Mr. Lockman.

(46) Pag. 7, 8.

Welcome, my ſon; here lay him down, my friends,
Full in my ſight, that I may view at leiſure
The bloody coarſe, and count thoſe glorious wounds;
How beautiful is death, when earn'd by virtue!
Who would not be that youth? what pity is it
That we can die but once to ſerve our country?

Alas! my friends?
Why mourn you thus? let not a private loſs
Afflict your hearts! 'Tis Rome requires our tears,
The Miſtreſs of the world.
Rome is no more;
O liberty! O virtue! O my country! &c.
Cato, laſt Scene of Act IV.

" This is what Mr. Addiſon did not ſcruple to bring " before an Engliſh Audience; this is what was tranſ- " lated into Italian, and played in ſeveral cities of " Italy. But were we to exhibit ſuch a ſcene in " Paris, would not the pit immediately cenſure it, " and the Ladies turn away their faces with an air " of diſtaſte?"

The ſame author has likewiſe in the dedication of his Tragedy of Zayre, to Mr. Falkoner an Engliſh Merchant, taken occaſion to commend Mr. Addiſon's Cato, and at the ſame time to cenſure it in ſome points. Having obſerved that ſimplicity was one of the moſt remarkable characteriſtics of the beſt writers of antiquity; and adviſed the Engliſh to introduce this ſimplicity upon their ſtage, which is generally too full of ſcenes of horror, and the moſt ſhocking ſights, and to mix more of truth and nature with their nobleſt images, he proceeds in this manner:

Addiſſon l'a deja tenté;
C'étoit le Poëte des ſages;
Mais il étoit trop concerté,
Et dans ſon Caton ſi vanté,
Ses deux filles en verité,
Sont d'inſipides perſonnages.
Imitez du grand Addiſſon,
Seulement ce qu'il a de bon.

That is,
" Immortal Addiſon, a Bard
" Form'd to delight the men of ſenſe, attempted
" By theſe juſt maxims to reform the ſtage.
" Yet even he how great ſoe'er his merit,
" Is too elaborate for ſimple nature
" And in his Cato ſo admir'd, the Ladies
" With all their love-ſcenes form two characters
" Dull and unworthy of the noble Drama.
" Tho' mighty Addiſon ſhould lead the way,
" Yet imitate his excellencies only.

The ſame author in ſome Letters, (juſt publiſhed) which he wrote concerning the Engliſh Nation (47), tells us, that " the firſt Engliſh writer, " who compoſed a regular Tragedy, and infuſed a " ſpirit of elegance thro' every part of it was the " illuſtrious Mr. Addiſon. His Cato is a maſter- " piece both with regard to the diction, and the " beauty and harmony of the numbers. The cha- " racter of Cato is in my opinion greatly ſuperior to " that of Cornelia in the Pompey of Corneille; for " Cato is great without any thing of fuſtian; and " Cornelia, who beſides is not a neceſſary character, " tends ſometimes to bombaſt. Mr. Addiſon's Cato

(47) Letter XVIII. on Tragedy.

" appears

Mr. Dennis likewiſe wrote a Criticiſm upon Cato [Z]. Mr. Addiſon had a deſign to write

" appears to me the greateſt character that was ever " brought upon any ſtage (48); but then the reſt of " them don't correſpond to the dignity of it; and " this dramatic piece, ſo excellently well written, is " disfigured by a dull love-plot, which ſpreads a cer- " tain languor over the whole, that quite deſtroys " the beauty of it." He informs us afterwards, that the cuſtom of introducing love at random, and at any rate in the Drama paſſed from Paris to London about 1660, with our ribbons and our perruques. The Ladies, who adorn the theatrical circle there in the ſame manner as in this city (Paris), will ſuffer love only to be the theme of every converſation. The judicious Mr. Addiſon had the effeminate complaiſance to ſoften the ſeverity of his dramatic character ſo as to adapt it to the manners of the age, and from an endeavour to pleaſe, quite ruined a maſter-piece in its kind. Since his time, the Drama is become more regular, the audience more difficult to be pleaſed, and writers more correct and leſs bold. Perhaps Mr. de Voltaire's aſſertion, that Mr. Addiſon was the firſt Engliſh writer, who compoſed a regular Tragedy, will admit of ſome doubt; ſince Mr. Otway's and Mr. Rowe's Tragedies, and Mr. Congreve's Mourning-Bride are generally conſidered by the critics not only as elegant, but alſo as regular performances, tho' they were written before Mr. Addiſon's Cato.

The ingenious Mr. de Voltaire having cenſured ſo much the love-plot in Cato, we ſhall now give the very oppoſite opinion of a very celebrated writer (49). " In our degenerate age, ſays he, the Poet muſt have " more than ordinary skill to raiſe the admiration of " the audience ſo high, in the great and public " parts of his Drama, to make a looſe people attend " to a paſſion which they never, or that they very " faintly, felt in their own boſoms. That perfect " piece, called CATO, which has done ſo great honour " to our nation and language, excells as much in the " paſſions of its lovers, as in the ſublime ſentiments " of its Hero; their generous love, which is more " heroic than any concern in the chief characters of " moſt Drama's, makes but ſubordinate characters in " this." . . Sir Richard gives an inſtance of the heroiſm in this love-plot, in the noble anſwer which Juba makes to Marcia's reproof for entertaining her with his paſſion at a juncture when the common cauſe ſhould take place of all other thoughts. Juba's words begin thus:

Thy reproofs are juſt
Thou virtuous maid; I'll haſten to my troops &c.

The learned Dr. Fiddes cenſures the two following lines in this Tragedy. The verſes are theſe;

In ſpight of all the virtues we can boaſt,
A woman that deliberates is loſt,

" I do not know, ſays the Doctor (50), whether this " be any great compliment to the Ladies. We grant " it is ſpoken by a Heathen Lady; but it is by one " that makes profeſſion of a rigid and ſtrict virtue, " to which regard ought always to be had, before a " Chriſtian auditory. Yet why ſhould it happen " that a woman muſt fall whenever ſhe happens to " make a falſe ſtep? Why ſhould we not allow the " other ſex a liberty of mind, wherein the great tri- " umph of virtue conſiſts, to reſiſt an inclination " they might at firſt have indiſcreetly entertained? " Tho' were the words to be underſtood only as a " caution to the Ladies, againſt all indecent or irre- " gular advances upon the firſt motions of love, the " author's deſign had been very juſt; but then he " ought to have ſpoken it to them as a caution, and " not in terms ſo general as appear to turn it into " a reflexion." However in our opinion the Poet put thoſe words into Marcia's mouth as a caution to her ſex, to prevent their falling into temptations of any kind, by ſuggeſting that the leaſt approach to them is fatal. We find the following characters of the lovers in Cato (51). "Theſe, ſays the author, " are more warm though more diſcreet than " ever yet appeared on the ſtage, have a conſtant " ſenſe of the great cataſtrophe which was expected " from the approach of Cæſar. But to ſee the mo- " deſty of a Heroine, whoſe country and family were " at that time in the moſt imminent danger preſerv'd, " while ſhe breaks out into the moſt fond and open " expreſſions of her paſſion for her lover, is an in- " ſtance of no common addreſs.

[Y] Mr. Dennis wrote a criticiſm on Mr. Addiſon's Cato.] This was a Pamphlet, the deſign of which was to ſhew (to uſe the critick's own words) "the ab- " ſurd conduct of the Tragedy of Cato," and was printed by Bernard Lintott. But Mr. Dennis obſerving, " that the numerous idolizers of that Tragedy, " whoſe unparallel'd zeal was the child of their un- " parallel'd ignorance, having ſheltered themſelves " under the beauty of the ſentiments of that Poem;" (52) he thereupon had afterwards writ two long letters to a Gentleman, wherein he endeavoured to ſhew, " that the ſentiments of Cato were as incon- " gruous as the conduct (53);" but that afterwards having been deprived of the copy of thoſe letters by a poor artifice, as the Gentleman had been of the originals, he would endeavour to recollect as many of thoſe remarks as he could; and theſe he work'd up into ſeven letters, ſome particulars of which we ſhall now take notice of. Mr. Dennis after making an apology to his correſpondent, by deſiring him " not to expect any thing of that little force and that " little grace of expreſſion which they (his remarks) " might have in the two fore-mentioned letters," (54) proceeds to his criticiſm, the firſt of which is a query, " Whether the exclaiming againſt the Pharſalia ſo of- " ten in Cato, two years after the battle had been " fought in a different and diſtant part of the world, " and but two days after the battle of Thapſus, " which was fought at the very gates of Utica, and " by the loſs of which the preſent danger of the " people in Utica was occaſioned, is not as abſurd as " it would have been in the Marſhal de Villeroy to " have cried out after the defeat at Ramelies, Blen- " heim, Blenheim, oh Blenheim!" . . But the critic ſeems to have anſwered this, tho' he will not allow it, by an objection he himſelf ſtarts, viz. That the defeat at Pharſalia deſtroyed the flower of the Republican Army (55). He indeed obſerves a little lower, " that as great paſſion is occaſioned by great ſurprize, " it always dwells upon the laſt diſaſter." But why may it not reflect back upon the original cauſe of diſaſters be they ever ſo many, when it is to them that all the ſucceeding ones are owing? Mr. Dennis in his ſecond letter, among other particulars, cenſures the following from the ſpeech of Sempronius to Portius:

Good morrow, Portius! let us once embrace,
Once more embrace; whilſt yet we both are free.

Now are not theſe formal embraces, ſays our Critic, between two people who ſaw one another every hour, ſomething upon the comique (56)? But this may be anſwered by another queſtion, What can be more natural than for two friends who expect every inſtant to be enſlaved, and poſſibly will never ſee one another more, to embrace in the tendereſt manner? Mr. Dennis goes on to obſerve, " that this mock Senate " at Utica) in burleſque, was compoſed of a parcel of " ſcoundrels, who had never ſeen Pharſalia (57)." If any one ſhould ask the critic how he knows them to have been ſuch ſcoundrels; his anſwer is, " Can any one believe, that if they had been " of real ſenatorial rank, Cæſar would have uſed " them as he did, who hanged up as many of " them as fell into his hands?" Admirable! The third letter begins with cenſuring what Syphax tells Sempronius in theſe words,

Syph. Sempronius, all is ready;
I've ſounded my Numidians man by man,
And find them ripe for a revolt.

" Now where's the policy, ſays the critic, or the pru- " dence of ſounding them man by man? The common " ſoldiers obey their Commanders, and it is danger- " ous to truſt a conſpiracy with too many (58)?" This reflexion ſeems juſt. Then after cenſuring ſeveral

(48) We have the following fine character of Cato in the Guardian N° 33. " The " principal character is moved by no conſideration but " reſpect to that " ſort of virtue, " the ſenſe of " which is retained in our " language under the word " Publick Spirit. " All regards to " his domeſtic " are wholly " laid aſide, and " that Hero is " drawn as having by this " motive ſubdued " inſtinct itſelf; " calling comfort from the " diſtreſſes of his " family, which " are brought " upon them by " their adhe- " rence to the " cauſe of truth " and liberty. " There is no- " thing uttered " by Cato but " what is wor- " thy the beſt of " men; and the " ſentiments " which are gi- " ven him, are " not only the " moſt warm for " the conduct of " this life, but " ſuch as we " may think " will not need " to be eras'd, " but conſiſt " with the hap- " pineſs of the " ſoul in the " next." See the Guardians N. 33, for the general character of Cato. N. 43 for ſome of its beauties; and N. 64 for its beautiful ſimiles.

(49) Sir Richard Steele in the Lover, p. 28. London printed for J. Tonſon 1715, 12°.

(50) In his Prefatory Epiſtle concerning ſome remarks to be publiſhed on Homer's Iliad, occaſioned by the propoſals of Mr. Pope towards a new Engliſh verſion of that Poem. To the Revd Dean Swift. By Richard Fiddes, p. 101, 102. London printed for J. Wyat, 1714, 12°.

(51) Guardian, N. 33. London printed for J. Tonſon 1714, 12°.

(52) Original Letters, Familiar, Moral and Critical, by Mr. Dennis. Vol. II. p. 303. London printed for W. Mears, 1721, 8°.

(53) Idem, ibid.

(54) Idem, 304.

(55) Idem, ibid. p. 305.

(56) Idem, pag. 307.

(57) Idem, pag. 308.

(58) Idem, pag. 401, which ſhould be 311.

write another Tragedy upon the death of Socrates [AA]. At the latter end of Queen Anne's veral other paſſages, he proceeds to the fourth letter, which is a critique on the ſcene between Juba and Syphax. This ſcene Mr. Dennis declares, "tho' it "was ſo extravagantly commended, is one groſs "fault; that Syphax is very much in the wrong in "his invectives againſt the Romans; and that Juba (59) Pag. 317. "is more in the wrong in his defence of them (59)." He concludes his general invective againſt this ſcene with theſe words, "What ſhall we ſay of the taſte "and judgment of its admirers, ſhall we forbear to "cry out with indignation, Quantum eſt in rebus in- "ane?" He then cites ſome part of that ſcene, which is ſo beautiful that a reader of taſte cannot forbear admiring the taſte of the critic. To give one inſtance of this, in his animadverſion on the following ſpeech which Juba makes to Syphax who had applauded the military excellencies of the Numidians.

Juba. Theſe all are virtues of a meaner rank;
Perfections that are placed in bones and nerves.
A Roman ſoul is bent on higher views:
To civilize the rude, unpoliſh'd world,
And lay it under the reſtraint of laws;
To make man mild and ſociable to man;
To cultivate the wild, licentious ſavage;
With wiſdom, diſcipline, and liberal arts;
Th' embelliſhments of life: Virtues like Theſe,
Make human nature ſhine, reform the ſoul,
And break our fierce Barbarians into men.

Here Mr. Dennis, inſtead of admiring the beauty of the ſentiment and the dignity of the expreſſion, breaks out into this exclamation: "Now, Sir, are "you able without a juſt indignation to behold in "Juba this baſe admiration of a nation, which in "its progreſs to univerſal Monarchy endeavoured to (60) Idem, pag. 322. "enſlave the very Kings of Africa (60)?" But does not the excellent author himſelf invalidate this Encomium by the following lines which Syphax is ſuppoſed to ſpeak on this occaſion; and, which is pleaſant enough, the critic himſelf has quoted;

Syph. Patience kind heav'ns! — Excuſe an old man's warmth,
What are theſe wond'rous civilizing arts,
This Roman poliſh, and this ſmooth behaviour,
That render man thus tractable and tame?
Are they not only to diſguiſe our paſſions,
To ſet our looks at variance with our thoughts,
To check the ſtart and ſallies of the ſoul,
And break off all its commerce with the tongue;
In ſhort, to change us into other creatures,
Than what our nature and the Gods deſign'd us.

How nobly this ſpeech ends! But the Critic, inſtead of admiring it, makes the following reflection. "Here "are not above two or three of the ſentiments which "are found in Salluſt, whereas that admirable Hiſto- "rian employs whole pages in deſcribing the prodi- (61) Idem, pag. 323. "gious corruption of the Roman manners (61)." So that Mr. Addiſon ſhould have employed as many pages on this occaſion as Salluſt does, and then he would have ſpun out his Tragedy to a very decent length. The fifth letter is a continuation of the remarks on this ſcene between Syphax and Juba. Here the critic, after deſcending to particulars, declares that "Juba is a character that is not only ſhocking "and contemptible to men of ſenſe," (he had before called this Numidian Prince a Younker and a Milk-ſop) "at the ſame time that the author endeavours to "render him eſtimable and agreeable, but he is "ſhocking and contemptible by the very ſame "qualities by which the author endeavours to "render him eſtimable and agreeable; and theſe are "his eſteem and admiration of the Romans. For "in admiring the Romans who were his contempo- "raries, he not only admired the moſt profligately "wicked of all nations — but a nation — who were (62) Idem, pag. 331, 332. "about to ruin and enſlave Numidia (62)." Mr. Dennis is ſtrangely angry with all the Romans in general, for a little after he calls them, "The ac- "curſed plagues of human race." (But we muſt ſuppoſe that Juba ſpeaks of the virtuous Romans who were ſhut up in Utica.) The ſixth letter is levelled at the firſt ſcene of the ſecond Act, which exhibits the Senate aſſembled; and to know whether it deſerves the applauſe which it at firſt met with from the readers and ſpectators. Mr. Dennis conſiders 1ſt, the deſign with which Cato, who preſides over the aſſembly, ſummoned it; 2dly, the manner of ſpeaking in it; and laſtly, the ſpeeches themſelves (63). He ob- (63) P. 336. ſerves on the ſecond head, that "as ſoon as Cato "propoſes the buſineſs of peace or war, Sempronius "riſes, and declares for the latter; when Cato im- "mediately contradicts him without ſtaying to ſee, if "the reſt of the Senators were of his opinion (64)." (64) Idem, 337. This, our critic obſerves, "is contrary to the me- "thods of all Councils, either thoſe of Parnaſſus or "thoſe of the world, becauſe ſuch a proceeding is "not conſonant to reaſon, nor to the deſign of con- "vening ſuch aſſemblies (65)." This undoubtedly (65) Idem, ibid. ought to be the method of all Councils, but that it is not ſo, is plain from Hiſtory, if not in the Councils of Parnaſſus, (to purſue the critick's diviſion,) at leaſt in thoſe of the world. Mr. Dennis then proceeds to the third head, (the ſpeeches,) and begins with that of Cato,

Fathers we once again are met in council,
Cæſar's approach has ſummon'd us together &c.

This ſpeech which Mr. Dennis afterwards calls a bleſſed Harangue, he ſays (66), "he will begin to exa- (66) Idem, pag. "mine by the tail; for that, it is not till the four laſt 339. "lines that Cato puts the queſtion to this mock-ſenate, "whether they were for peace or war," which, he obſerves, is putting a wrong queſtion (67). The firſt (67) Idem, ibid. ſix lines of the ſpeech of Lucius (who by the way he calls a fool) he declares contain but a meer poetical flouriſh (68); but we ſhall give them here. (68) Ibid, pag. 344.

Lucius. My thoughts, I muſt confeſs, are turn'd on peace.
Already have our quarrels fill'd the world
With widows and with orphans. Scythia mourns
Our guilty wars, and earth's remoteſt regions
Lie half unpeopled by the feuds of Rome:
'Tis time to ſheathe the ſword, and ſpare mankind.

This ſurely is the firſt time that ever ſuch noble reflexions dropt from a fool's mouth. But the critic ſeems to be exaſperated againſt the whole Senate at Utica. In his ſeventh and laſt letter, where he again attacks Juba, (who is the object of his ſtrongeſt reſentment) he cenſures the following words, which Cato is ſuppoſed to ſpeak, after hearing of Decius, Cæſar's Embaſſador:

His (Cæſar's) cares for me are inſolent and vain:
Preſumptuous man! The Gods take care of Cato.
Would Cæſar ſhew the greatneſs of his ſoul?
Bid him employ his care for theſe my friends,
And make good uſe of his ill-gotten power,
By ſhelt'ring men much better than himſelf.

"Which is as much as to ſay, ſays Mr. Dennis, Cæſar "ſhews inſolence and vanity in taking care of me; "but he would ſhew the greatneſs of his ſoul in tak- "ing care of theſe ſcoundrels here about me, who are "as much better than him, as I am better than they "are." Now obſerve the inference. "Is not this, ſays he, "to ſay in plain Engliſh, as long as the Gods "take care of me, let the Devil take care of my "friends here: For has not he painted Cæſar, but "ſix lines before this, as black as any modern can "paint the Devil (69)?" So far our polite critic. We (69) Idem, pag. ſhould have taken notice of the Pamphlet, in which 355, 356. he cenſures the conduct of the Tragedy of Cato before we came to the Letters we have now animadverted upon; but as theſe fell firſt under our hands, and we have made ſuch large extracts from them, we are perſuaded that our readers will, for their own ſakes, excuſe us from proceeding any farther with Mr. Dennis's critique.

[AA] Another Tragedy upon the Death of Socrates.] "However unpromiſing, ſays Mr. Tickell, that ſub- "ject may appear, it would be preſumptuous to "cenſure his choice, who was ſo famous for raiſing Anne's reign, when the Miniſtry was changed, and he had no expectation of any further employment, he reſolved to compoſe an Engliſh Dictionary, which he thought was extremely wanted in our language. And as he deſigned the firſt volume of Archbiſhop Tillotſon's Sermons, publiſhed by himſelf, as the chief ſtandard, he actually marked the particular phraſes, after the manner of the Dictionary della Cruſca. But being ſoon after brought again into employment, that noble project was entirely laid aſide. After the death of Queen Anne he was made Secretary to the Lords Juſtices; and when the Earl of Sunderland was conſtituted Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in September 1714, he became a ſecond time Secretary for the affairs of that kingdom; and was made one of the Lords Commiſſioners of Trade, a little after the abovementioned Earl had reſigned the poſt of Lord Lieutenant. Mr. Budgell gives us an account (q) of a converſation between the late Lord Halifax and Mr. Addiſon, at which himſelf was preſent. This happened a little before they went to wait upon the late King George I. at Greenwich at his firſt landing after his acceſſion to the throne. The Lord Halifax told them, that he expected the White-Staff, and intended, as ſoon as he had got it, to recommend Mr. Addiſon to the King for one of the Secretaries of State. "Mr. Addiſon, I believe, ſays Mr. Budgell, very ſincerely told his Lordſhip, that "he did not aim at ſo high a poſt, and deſired him to remember he was not a "ſpeaker in the Houſe of Commons. Lord Halifax briſkly replied, Come, prithee Addiſon, "no unſeaſonable modeſty. I made thee Secretary to the Regency with this very view. Thou "haſt now the beſt right of any man in England to be Secretary of State; nay, it will be "a ſort of diſplacing thee not to make thee ſo. If thou couldſt but get over that ſilly "ſheepiſhneſs of thine, that makes thee ſit in the houſe, and hear a fellow prate for half "an hour together, who has not a tenth part of thy good ſenſe; I ſhould be glad to ſee it; "but ſince I believe that's impoſſible, we muſt contrive as well as we can. Thy pen has al- "ready been an honour to thy country, and I dare ſay will be a credit to thy King." Mrs. Manley was very angry with Mr. Addiſon, for leaving the Muſes, and devoting himſelf to buſineſs [BB], though ſhe gives him the higheſt encomiums at the ſame time, as appears from the ſequel to her Atalantis (that ingenious detail of polite ſcandal). The Freeholder was undertaken at the time when the rebellion broke out in Scotland [CC]. The ſcheme for the Treatiſe upon the Chriſtian Religion was formed, as Mr. Tickell

(q) Letter to Cleomenes King of Sparta, p. 207.

"the nobleſt plants from the moſt barren ſoil. It "ſerves to ſhew, that he thought the whole labour "of ſuch performance unworthy to be thrown "away upon thoſe intrigues and adventures, to "which the Romantic taſte has confined modern "Tragedy; and after the example of his predeceſ-"ſors in Greece, would have employed the Drama "to wear out of our minds every thing that is mean "or little; to cheriſh and cultivate that humanity "which is the ornament of our nature; to ſoften in- "ſolence, to ſooth affliction, and to ſubdue our minds "to the diſpenſations of providence (70)."

(70) Spectator N. 39.

[BB] Mrs. Manley is very angry — with Mr. Addiſon for his leaving the muſes &c.] "I (ſays that "Lady) who can't be properly nam'd a Judge of the "Greek, yet find ſuch enchantment in Maro's (a name under which ſhe ſhadowed Mr. Addiſon) "ſtrains, that feeling how I myſelf, a foreigner, am "raviſhed, muſt thence conclude his better judges "the Grecians entranc'd by him. I could not be-"hold him in (71) Sergius's gallery without ſome-"thing of an ejaculation, an oblation due to Maro's "ſhrine from all that can read him. O pity! that "politicks and ſordid intereſt ſhould have carried him "out of the road of Helicon; ſnatch'd him from "the embraces of the Muſes, to throw him into an "old withered artificial Stateſman's arms! Why did "he prefer gain to glory? Why chuſe to be an idle "ſpectator, rather than a celebrater of thoſe actions "he ſo well knows how to define and adorn? Vir-"gil himſelf, nor Virgil's greater Maſter Homer, "could not boaſt of finer qualifications than Maro; "Maro! who alone of all the Poets truly inſpired, "could ceaſe to be himſelf; could degenerate his "Godlike ſoul, and proſtitute that inborn genius, "all thoſe noble accompliſhments of his, for gold; "could turn away his eyes from the delicious gar-"dens of Parnaſſus, of which he was already in poſ-"ſeſſion, to tread the wandring maze of buſineſs. "Farewell Maro; till you abandon your artificial "Patron, fame muſt abandon you (72)." Very poſ-ſibly this Lady who thus cenſures our excellent author for engaging in politicks, would have applauded him had he gone over to that ſide of which ſhe was an avow'd partizan. From this circumſtance and the liberty ſhe takes to cenſure any perſon right or wrong throughout her whole work, we believe this accuſation will be found to have very little weight. Applauſe is too thin a diet for man to ſubſiſt upon, therefore every writer who has no fortune of his own, would be to blame ſhould he refuſe any advantageous offers which are made him by a miniſtry, when they are not inconſiſtent with the laws of juſtice and honour.

(71) The late Lord Halifax.

(72) Memoirs of Europe towards the cloſe of the eighth Century, Vol. II. written by Eginardus &c. p. 153. London, printed for John Morphew 1716, 8vo.

[CC] When the rebellion broke out in Scotland.] The reaſon of his aſſuming that title, was, as he informs us (73), becauſe the arguments of an author loſe a great deal of weight, when we are perſuaded, that he only writes for argument's ſake, and has no real concern in the cauſe, which he eſpouſes. "This, "ſays he, is the caſe of one, who draws his pen in "defence of property, without having any; except "perhaps in the copy of a libel or a ballad. One "is apt to ſuſpect, that the paſſion for liberty, "which appears in a Grub-ſtreet Patriot, ariſes only "from his apprehenſions of a goal; and that, what-"ever he may pretend, he does not write to ſe-"cure, but to get ſomething of his own. Should "the Government be overturned, he has nothing to "loſe but an old ſtandiſh. I queſtion, continues he, "but the reader will conceive a reſpect for the au-"thor of this paper from the title of it; ſince he "may be ſure, I am ſo conſiderable a man, that I "cannot have leſs than forty ſhillings a year. I "have rather choſen this title than any other, be-"cauſe it is what I moſt glory in, and what moſt "effectually calls to my mind the happineſs of that "Government, under which I live." He tells us afterwards, that it ſhall be his buſineſs more immediately to conſult the happineſs of the age in which he lives. "And ſince, ſays he, ſo many profligate "writers have endeavoured to varniſh a bad cauſe, "I ſhall do all in my power to recommend a good "one, which indeed requires no more than barely "to explain what it is. While many of my gallant "countrymen are employed in purſuing rebels half "diſcomfited thro' the conſciouſneſs of their guilt, "I ſhall labour to improve thoſe victories to the "good of my fellow-ſubjects; by carrying on their "ſucceſſes over the minds of men, and by recon-"ciling them to the cauſe of their King, their "country, and their religion. To this end I ſhall "in the courſe of this paper (to be publiſhed every "Monday and Friday) endeavour to open the eyes

(73) Freeholder, No I. Dec. 23, 1715.

Tickell tells us, about the end of the late Queen's reign, at which time he had carefully peruſed the antient writings, which furniſh the materials for it. His continual employment in buſineſs prevented him from executing it, till he reſigned his poſt of Secretary of State; and his death put a period to it, when he had imperfectly performed only half of the deſign; he having propoſed, as appears from the introduction, to add the Jewiſh to the Heathen teſtimonies, for the truth of the Chriſtian Hiſtory. He was more aſſiduous than his health would well allow in the purſuit of this work; and had long determined to dedicate his Poetry alſo for the future wholly to religious ſubjects. We are credibly informed that he deſigned to give a paraphraſtic verſion in Engliſh of a large number of David's Pſalms. Our author was raiſed to the poſt of Secretary of State in April 1717, ſoon after which he found his health impaired by the return of that aſthmatic indiſpoſition, which continued often to afflict him during his exerciſe of that employment, and at laſt obliged him to reſign it. His freedom from this anxiety ſo far re-eſtabliſhed his health, that his friends began to hope he might laſt for many years; but a long and painful relapſe into an aſthma and dropſy deprived the world of this eminent man at Holland Houſe near Kenſington, on the 17th of June 1719. He left behind him only one daughter by the Counteſs of Warwick and Holland, to whom he was married in 1716 (r). A ſecond edition of his Comedy called The Drummer, or the Haunted Houſe, has been publiſhed ſince his death by Sir Richard Steele [DD]. This play, though it has all the marks of its author's genius, had (r) Mr. Tickell in his Life of Mr. Addiſon.

" of my countrymen to their own intereſt, to ſhew " them the privileges of an Engliſh Free-holder, " which they enjoy in common with myſelf, and " to make them ſenſible how theſe bleſſings are ſe- " cured to us by his Majeſty's title, his adminiſtra- " tion and his perſonal character. I have only one " requeſt to make to my readers, that they will per- " uſe theſe papers with the ſame candor and impar- " tiality, in which they are written; and ſhall hope " for no other prepoſſeſſion in favour of them, than " what one would think ſhould be natural to every " man, a deſire to be happy, and a good will to- " wards thoſe, who are the inſtruments of making " them ſo." At the concluſion of this work he tells us (74), that he endeavoured to make every paper a diſtinct Eſſay upon ſome particular ſubject, without deviating into points foreign to the tenor of each diſcourſe. " They are indeed, ſays he, moſt of them " Eſſays upon Government, but with a view to the " preſent ſituation of affairs in Great Britain; ſo that " if they have the good fortune to live longer than " works of this nature generally do, future readers " may ſee in them the complexion of the times, " in which they were written... As to the reaſon- " ings in theſe ſeveral papers, I muſt leave them to " the judgment of others. I have taken particular " care, that they ſhould be conformable to our con- " ſtitution, and free from that mixture of violence " and paſſion, which ſo often creeps into the works " of political writers. A good cauſe doth not want " any bitterneſs to ſupport it, as a bad one cannot " ſubſiſt without it. It is indeed obſervable, that an " author is ſcurrilous in proportion as he is dull; and " ſeems rather to be in a paſſion, becauſe he can- " not find out what to ſay for his own opinion, " than becauſe he has diſcovered any pernicious ab- " ſurdities in that of his antagoniſt's. A man ſatiriz- " ed by writers of this claſs, is like one burnt in the " hand with a cold iron. There may be ignomini- " ous terms and words of infamy in the ſtamp, " but they leave no impreſſion behind them." He then tells us, that as for thoſe papers of a gayer turn, the reader will of himſelf conſider how requiſite they are to gain and keep up an audience to matters of this nature; and will perhaps be the more indulgent to them, if he obſerves, that they are none of them without a moral, nor contain any thing but what is conſiſtent with decency and good manners. " It is obvious, ſays he, that the deſign of the " whole work has been to free the people's minds " from thoſe prejudices conveyed into them by the " enemies of the preſent eſtabliſhment againſt the " King and Royal Family, by opening and explain- " ing their real characters; to ſet forth his Maje- " ſty's proceedings, which have been groſly miſre- " preſented, in a fair and impartial light; to ſhew " the reaſonableneſs and neceſſity of our oppoſing the " Pretender to his dominions, if we have any regard " to our religion and liberties; in a word, to in- " cline the minds of the people to the deſire and " enjoyment of their own happineſs." But let us

(74) N. 55. June 29, 1716.

ſee the judgment of a foreign writer upon this work (75). " The deſign of the author or authors " is to ſhew that ſort of people [i. e. the Freeholders of " Great Britain] their true intereſt, and the conduct, " which it is their intereſt to obſerve, in the ſitua- " tion in which their country is at preſent. He " does this in an eaſy and inſinuating ſtyle, and " he very often joins to the ſtrongeſt reaſoning all " the agreeable dreſs, that can recommend the light- " eſt ſubject. It is ſaid, that the Public is obliged " to Mr. Addiſon and Mr. Philips for this excellent " piece, which is publiſhed on Mondays and Fri- " days." This author ſeems to be miſtaken in aſcribing ſome of theſe papers to Mr. Philips, ſince Mr. Tickell aſcribes the whole to Mr. Addiſon; and the ſtyle and manner of writing, which run thro' it without any variation, ſhew it to be his.

(75) Journal Literaire 1716, tom. 8. part 1. p. 209.

[DD] A ſecond edition of his — DRUMMER — has been publiſhed ſince his death by Sir Richard Steele.] The firſt edition of this Comedy had been publiſhed by him without the author's name, with a Preface, in which he informed the world, that " it had been " ſome years in the hands of the author; and fal- " ling under my peruſal, ſays he, I thought ſo well " of it, that I perſuaded him to make ſome additi- " ons and alterations to it, and let it appear upon the " ſtage. I own I was very highly pleaſed with it, " and lik'd it the better, for the want of thoſe ſtudied " ſimiles and repartees, which we, who have writ " before him, have thrown into our Plays, to in- " dulge and gain upon a falſe taſte, that has prevailed " for many years in the Britiſh Theatre. I believe " the author would have condeſcended to fall into " this way a little more than he has, had he before " the writing of it been often preſent at theatrical " repreſentations. I was confirmed in my thoughts " of the Play, by the opinion of better judges, to " whom it was communicated, who obſerved that " the ſcenes were drawn after Moliere's manner, and " that an eaſy and natural vein of humour ran thro' " the whole. I do not queſtion but the reader will " diſcover this, and ſee many beauties that eſcaped " the audience; the touches being too delicate for " every taſte in a popular aſſembly. My brother- " ſharers were of opinion, at the firſt reading of it, " that it was like a picture, in which the ſtrokes " were not ſtrong enough to appear at a diſtance. " As it is not in the common way of writing, the " approbation was at firſt doubtful, but has riſen " every time it has been acted, and has given an op- " portunity in ſeveral of its parts for as juſt and good " action as ever I ſaw on the ſtage."

But as this Comedy was omitted by Mr. Tickell in his edition of Mr. Addiſon's works, Sir Richard Steele thought proper to publiſh a ſecond edition of it, with an Epiſtle dedicatory to Mr. Congreve, containing ſome animadverſions upon Mr. Tickell's Preface. He tells us there (76), that it was he, who at firſt recommended that Play to the ſtage, and carried it to the preſs; the copy of which, as he informs us before (77), was ſold to the Bookſeller for fifty gui- neas.

(76) P. 14.

(77) Ibid. p. 4.

had yet not the good fortune to ſucceed upon the ſtage (s). The political diſputes in the late Queen's reign engaged him in a conteſt with the ingenious Mr. Prior, in which the latter was treated with a peculiar ſeverity and contempt, not uſual in our author [EE]. We have a very keen reproof to Mr. Addiſon, publiſhed after his death, and written by the great Poet of the preſent age [FF]. And there is likewiſe neas. He then proceeds in this manner. " No " one, who reads the Preface which I pub- " liſhed with it, will imagine I could be induced " to ſay ſo much as I then did, had I not known " the man I beſt loved had had a part in it, or had I " believed, that any other concerned had much more " to do than as an Amanuenſis. But indeed had I " not known at the time of the tranſaction, concern- " ing the acting on the ſtage and ſale of the copy, " I ſhould, I think, have ſeen Mr. Addiſon in every " page of it; for he was above all men in that ta- " lent we call Humour, and enjoyed it in ſuch per- " fection, that I have often reflected, after a night " ſpent with him apart from all the world, that I " had had the pleaſure of converſing with an inti- " mate acquaintance of Terence and Catullus, who " had all their wit and nature heightened with hu- " mour, more exquiſite and delightful than any " other man ever poſſeſſed. They who ſhall read " this Play after being let into the ſecret that it was " written by Mr. Addiſon, or under his direction, " will probably be attentive to thoſe excellencies, " which they before overlooked, and wonder they " did not till now obſerve, that there is not an ex- " preſſion in the whole piece, which has not in it " the moſt nice propriety and aptitude to the cha- " racter, which utters it; there is that ſmiling " mirth, that delicate Satire, and genteel raillery, " which appeared in Mr. Addiſon, when he was " free among intimates; I ſay, when he was " free from his remarkable baſhfulneſs, which is a " cloak that hides and muffles merit; and his abi- " lities were covered only by modeſty, which dou- " bles the beauties which are ſeen, and gives cre- " dit and eſteem to all that are concealed.

(s) See the Note [BB]

" The Drummer made no great figure on the ſtage, " tho' exquiſitely well acted; but when I obſerve " this, I ſay a much harder thing of the Stage than " of the Comedy. When I ſay the Stage in " this place, I am underſtood to mean in gene- " ral the preſent taſte of theatrical repreſentations, " where nothing that is not violent, and, as I may " ſay, groſly delightful, can come on without ha- " zard of being condemned or ſlighted. It is here " republiſh'd and recommended as a cloſet-piece, " to recreate an intelligent mind in a vacant hour; " for vacant the reader muſt be from every ſtrong " prepoſſeſſion, in order to reliſh an entertainment " (quod nequeo monſtrare & ſentio tantum,) which " cannot be enjoyed to the degree it deſerves, but " by thoſe of the moſt polite taſte among Scholars, " the beſt breeding among Gentlemen, and the leaſt " acquainted with ſenſual pleaſures among Ladies."

As Mr. Addiſon was not known to be the writer of the Drummer at its firſt repreſentation, it did not ſucceed tho' exhibited at Drury-lane houſe. But no ſooner had Mr. Rich inform'd the town by the Play-bills, that it was written by our author, but his theatre was crowded for a great many nights together, tho' it had been but very thinly tenanted for ſome years. A proof that the bulk of an audience are incomparable judges of the Drama.

[EE] A conteſt with the ingenious Mr. Prior, in which the latter was treated with a peculiar ſeverity and contempt.] In the year 1710, Mr. Addiſon wrote the paper called the Whig-Examiner, the deſign of which he tells us (78) was to cenſure the writings of others, and to give all perſons a rehearing, who have ſuffered under any unjuſt ſentence of the Examiner. " As that author has hitherto pro- " ceeded, ſays he, his paper would have been more " properly entitled the Executioner; at leaſt his " examination is like that, which is made by the " rack and wheel. I have always admired a critic, " that has diſcovered the beauties of an author, and " never knew one, who made it his buſineſs to " laſh the faults of other writers, that was not guil- " ty of greater himſelf; as the hangman is generally " a worſe malefactor than the criminal, that ſuffers " by his hand." He then tells us, that there is ſuch a ſhocking familiarity both in his railleries and civilities, that one cannot long be in doubt who is the author. " The remaining part of the Preface, ſays he, has ſo much of the pedant, and ſo little of the " converſation of men in it, that I ſhall paſs it over. " . . Before I take my farewell of this ſubject, I ſhall " adviſe the author for the future to ſpeak his mean- " ing more plainly. I allow he has a happy ta- " lent at Doggrel, when he writes upon a known " ſubject; where he tells us in plain intelligible " language, how Syriſca's ladle was loſt in one hole, " &c. he is very jocular and diverting; but when " he wraps a lampoon in a riddle, he muſt conſider " that his jeſt is loſt to every one, but the few " merry wags, that are in the ſecret. . . The next " criticiſm upon the ſtars ſeems introduced for no " other reaſon but to mention Mr. Bickerſtaff, whom " the author every where endeavours to imitate and " abuſe. But I ſhall refer the Examiner to the " frog's advice to her little one, that was blowing " itſelf up to the ſize of an ox;

(78) N. 1.

——— " Non ſi te ruperis, inquit,
" Par eris."

[FF] Written by the great Poet of the preſent age.] The reproof (in which ſeveral writers had before been cenſur'd), goes on thus.

PEACE to all ſuch! but were there one, whoſe fires
Apollo kindled, and fair Fame inſpires,
Bleſt with each talent, and each art to pleaſe
And born to write, converſe, and live with eaſe;
Should ſuch a man, too fond to rule alone,
Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the Throne;
View him with ſcornful, yet with fearful eyes,
And hate for arts that caus'd himſelf to riſe;
Damn with faint praiſe, aſſent with civil leer,
And without ſneering, teach the reſt to ſneer;
Wiſhing to wound, and yet afraid to ſtrike,
Juſt hint a fault, and heſitate diſlike;
Alike reſerv'd to blame, or to commend,
A tim'rous foe, and a ſuſpicious friend,
Dreading ev'n fools, by flatterers beſieg'd,
And ſo obliging that he ne'er oblig'd:
Who, if two wits on rival Themes conteſt,
Approves of each, but likes the worſt the beſt;
Like Cato gives his little Senate laws,
And ſits attentive to his own applauſe;
While Wits and Templers ev'ry ſentence raiſe,
And wonder with a fooliſh face of praiſe.
What pity, heav'n! if ſuch a man there be.
Who would not weep, if A——n were he? *

* Miſcellanies, by Dr. Swift and A. Pope Eſq; the laſt volume, p. 219, 220. printed for B. Motte, 1731, 12°.

Mr. Pope has been charged upon account of theſe verſes) in very ſevere terms of ingratitude towards Mr. Addiſon; who, it was urged, had raiſed him from obſcurity, obtained him the acquaintance and friendſhip of the whole body of our nobility, and transferred his powerful intereſts with thoſe great men to this riſing Bard, who frequently levied by that means unuſual contributions on the Public. No ſooner was his body lifeleſs, but this author, reviving his reſentment, libell'd the memory of his departed friend; and what was ſtill more heinous, made the ſcandal public. This was the charge againſt Mr. Pope in one of the public papers (79). In anſwer to which the author of the Prolegomena to the Dunciad (80) expreſſes himſelf in the ſtrong, and at the ſame time, humorous manner following. " Grievous the accuſation! un- " known the accuſer! the perſon accuſed no wit- " neſs in his own cauſe! the perſon in whoſe re- " gard accuſed, dead! But if there be living any " one Nobleman, whoſe friendſhip, yea any one " Gentleman, whoſe ſubſcription Mr. Addiſon pro- " cured to our author, let him ſtand forth, that truth " may appear! Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, ſed " magis amica veritas. In verity, the whole ſtory of " the likewiſe a cenſure paſſed upon his ſtyle by another Poet, Mr. Welſted [GG]. However, in regard to this great man's memory, to whom the world is infinitely obliged for the moſt valuable inſtruction conveyed in the moſt beautiful dreſs, we ſhall cloſe his article with the judgment of ſeveral eminent writers upon him [HH], and an extract from ſome of the Poems, which were written on occaſion of his death [II]. Beſides the works abovementioned, we have ſeveral other pieces of his, particularly, An Epilogue to the Britiſh Enchanters, a dramatic Poem written by the Lord Lanſdown.

(79) See Miſt's Journal June 8, 1728.

(80) P. 28. 2d edit. in 8vo, 1729.

" the libel is a lye; witneſs thoſe perſons of inte" grity, who ſeveral years before Mr. Addiſon's de-
" ceaſe, did ſee and approve of the ſaid verſes, in no
" wiſe a libel but a friendly rebuke, ſent privately
" in our author's own hand to Mr. Addiſon himſelf,
" by him, and never made public, (till after their
" own Journals, and Curl their own Bookſeller had " printed the ſame.) One name alone, which I am
" authorized here to declare, will ſufficiently evince
" this truth, that of the Right Honourable the EARL
" OF BURLINGTON."

[GG] By another Poet, Mr. Welſted.] This author in the Preface to his Poems gives us his judgment of Mr. Addiſon in the following words. (81, 2d Edit. in 1080, p. 39, 40.) " A late very popular author has, I own, car" ried the eſſay-turn of writing to a great height,
" and left behind him fine models of a terſe and
" chaſte diction; his defect, if he has any, ſeems to
" be, that he lies too much in courte ſentences,
" that do not run cleverly into one another, and are
" not ſo connected, as to depend naturally enough
" together: the chain is ſometimes wanting, and the " full ſtop or cloſe of the period returns too fre" quently upon us; which is the vice alſo of the " French writers; or it is at leaſt the opinion of
" the beſt critics of their nation, that their language
" has ſuffered in this particular, under its modern
" refinements, and that their ancient writers had,
" not only more of the vigorous and maſculine, but
" were alſo freer and more diſengaged. The Engliſh
" author I am ſpeaking of, as he followed, or ſeem-
" ed to follow very cloſely in the traces of Fonte-
" nelle, and has ſtudied much his manner, ſo did
" he ſucceed extremely well in it; however he is
" not without his maſter's alloy; and there is beſides,
" if I may be allowed to ſpeak my impartial ſenſe of
" the matter, ſomething in his way, that I may call
" too imitable; that is, one eaſily ſees thro' his art;
" one finds out the ſecret clue, by which he con-
" ducts himſelf." One obſervation we ſhall make on the proſe of Mr. Welſted (who has obliged the town with ſome beautiful Poems, and among the reſt with a copy of verſes on which Sir Richard Steele beſtows the epithet very fine) is, that it often ſeems to run into the contrary extreme of that for which he accuſes Mr. Addiſon. Such of the French, indeed, as imitate Fontenelle, are too ſhort in their periods, and have ſometimes three or four in the compaſs of ſo many lines. But a medium ſhould be obſerved, and it is well known that when a period is ſpun to too immoderate a length, it grows heavy and tedious. With regard to Mr. Welſted's obſervation, that Mr. Addiſon has imitated Mr. Fontenelle's manner, one eſſential difference may be obſerved in it, viz. that the latter great writer is often ſo delicate that he is obſcure, whereas the former is always plain and clear.

[HH] The judgment of ſeveral eminent writers upon him.] Mr. Pope, in his verſes occaſioned by Mr. ADDISON's Treatiſe of Medals, pays a very elegant compliment to him in the following lines;

Oh when ſhall BRITAIN conſcious of her claim,
Stand emulous of Greek and Roman fame?
In living medals ſee her wars enroll'd,
And vanquiſh'd realms ſupply recording gold?
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Then future ages with delight ſhall ſee,
How Plato's, Bacon's, Newton's looks agree:
Or in fair ſeries laurel'd Bards be ſhewn,
A Virgil there, and here an Addiſon.

Dr. Fiddes having quoted the following words from the Spectator; Every one that has read the critics, who have written upon the Odyſſey, the Iliad, and the Æneid, knows very well, that tho' they agree in their opinion concerning the great beauties in theſe Poems, they have nevertheleſs each of them diſcovered ſeveral maſter-ſtrokes, which have eſcaped the obſervation of the reſt; tells us, that " the ingenious author had " a right to apply this remark to himſelf. It is ac" knowledged Mr. Addiſon has diſcovered a multi" tude of beauties in Milton's Paradiſe loſt. Several
" of which might perhaps have been undiſcover-
" ed for many ages (82)." But in another place the Doctor cenſures Mr. Addiſon, for aſcribing to himſelf an obſervation which was far from being new (83). Mr. de VOLTAIRE, in his Eſſay upon the EPIC-POETRY of the European Nations, tells us (84), that " Mr. Addiſon was the firſt, who conſider-
" ed in a proper view the materials, which compos'd
" the ſtructure of the Æneid;" and having remark'd, that he borrowed from Lucan's Pharſalia ſome ſtrokes in the drawing of his Cato, he obſerves (85), that
" this ancient Poet never received a greater honour
" than when he was imitated by Mr. de Corneille
" and by Mr. Addiſon, two men every where ſupe-
" rior to him." He tells us in another place (86), that " one would be apt to think, that Milton had " not obtained his true reputation, till Mr. Addiſon,
" the beſt critic, as well as the beſt writer of his age,
" pointed out the moſt hidden beauties of the Para-
" diſe loſt, and ſettled for ever its reputation." Signior Paul Rolli, in his Remarks upon Mr. Voltaire's Eſſay abovementioned, having undertaken to vindicate Milton from the exceptions of that ingenious writer, deſires his reader (87) to look over thoſe Spectators, which the celebrated Mr. Addiſon has writ upon Milton's Paradiſe loſt; for he will then, ſays he, recollect thoſe right notions, which that Eſſay may perhaps have lulled aſleep. There he will ſee Homer in his true light, and the different impreſſions ſome parts of the Paradiſe loſt have made in the minds of Mr. Addiſon and Mr. Voltaire. He tells us afterwards (88), that " there is a degree of perfection and taſte,
" which when authors and critics are arrived at,
" make them all of one nation, called The Common-
" wealth of Letters. Amelot, la Bruyere, the Arch" biſhop of Cambray, &c. Addiſon, the Authors of " the Spectators and Tatlers, &c. Bembo, Caſtiglione,
" della Caſa, &c. might, by their ſtyles, paſs for " countrymen; they think in the ſame degree of " perfection, and their ſtyles keep equal pace with " their thoughts. ... When I read Addiſon's works,
" I imagine I read Plato; a clear, eaſy, and Gen" tleman-like way of thinking and writing appears
" alike in both." The Abbé Du Bos having quoted a paſſage from the Spectator, ſtyles Mr. ADDISON one of the greateſt Tragic-Poets of ENGLAND (89); and in another place, one of the moſt eminent Engliſh Poets (90). He makes very frequent uſe of Mr. Addiſon's authority in his work, Sur la Poëſie & la Peinture.

(82) See Dr. Fiddes, Prefatory Epiſtle concerning ſome remarks upon Homer, to Dr. Swift, p. 12, 13.
(83) Idem, p. 97.
(84) P. 53. edit. 1727.
(85) Pag. 65.
(86) Pag. 108.
(87) Pag. 21
(88) Pag. 12.
(89) Reflexions Critiques ſur la Poëſie & ſur la Peinture, tom. I. Sect. 42. p. 340. edit. d'Utrecht, 1732.
(90) Ibid. Vol. II. Sect. 39. p. 503.

[II] Written on the occaſion of his Death.] The moſt conſiderable of theſe is that by Mr. Tickell, addreſſed to the Earl of Warwick; which Sir Richard Steele indeed calls Proſe in Rhime (91), but with what juſtice the reader will eaſily judge from a few lines of it. He begins with an apology for not paying his tribute to Mr. Addiſon's memory ſooner; viz. becauſe intenſe ſorrow damps the poetical faculty. He then deſcribes the ſolemnity of his funeral in very ſtrong and moving images; and declares that Mr. Addiſon's memory will always be preſent to his mind, and that it ſhall be his task to honour it with all the regard due to ſo great a man, after which he proceeds as follows:

(91) See his dedication of the 2d edit. of the Drummer, p. 17.

Oft let me range the gloomy iſles alone,
(Sad luxury to vulgar minds unknown)
Along the walls, where ſpeaking marbles ſhow
What Worthies form the hallow'd mould below:
Proud names, who once the reins of empire held;
In arms, who triumph'd, or in arts excell'd;

There

Lanſdown. The third Ode of the third Book of Horace tranſlated. A tranſlation of The ſecond and third Books of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, with the Story of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus from the four books, and notes upon ſome of thoſe ſtories. A Prologue to Phædra and Hippolitus, a Tragedy written by Mr. Edmund Smith. A Poem to her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Wales, with the Tragedy of Cato, Nov. 1714. A Poem to Sir Godfrey Kneller on his Picture of the King. The late Trial and Conviction of Count Tariff; and the preſent State of the War, and the Neceſſity of an Augmentation conſidered, 1707. The Whig Examiner. Some aſcribe to him likewiſe a little Tract, ſaid to be written in the year 1692, and entitled Diſſertatio de inſignioribus Romanorum Poëtis, i. e. A Diſſertation upon the moſt eminent Roman Poets; and The Old Whig, two pamphlets occaſioned by the Peerage Bill (t).

(t) See Memoirs Mr. Addiſon's Life and Writings, prefix'd to a book entitled, The Chriſtian Poet, a Miſcellany of Divine Poems, written by the late Mr. Secretary Addiſon, &c. 8°, 1728.

Chiefs, grac'd with ſcars, and prodigal of blood;
Stern Patriots, who for ſacred freedom ſtood;
Juſt men, by whom impartial laws were given;
And Saints, who taught, and led, the way to heaven.
Ne'er to theſe chambers, where the mighty reſt,
Since their foundation came a nobler gueſt,
Nor e'er was to the bowers of bliſs convey'd
A fairer ſpirit, or more welcome ſhade.

He then images to himſelf what the employment of ſo great a ſoul muſt be in his ſuperior ſituation in the other world; and invokes his aſſiſtance in all the dangerous or diſtreſsful circumſtances of life. Next follow theſe beautiful lines:

That awful form (which, ſo ye heavens decree Muſt ſtill be lov'd and ſtill deplor'd by me)
In nightly viſions ſeldom fails to riſe,
Or, rous'd by fancy, meets my waking eyes.
If buſineſs calls, or crowded courts invite,
Th' unblemiſh'd Stateſman ſeems to ſtrike my ſight;
If in the ſtage I ſeek to ſooth my care,
I meet his ſoul, which breathes in Cato there;
If penſive to the rural ſhades I rove,
His ſhape o'ertakes me in the lonely grove:
'Twas there of juſt and good he reaſon'd ſtrong,
Clear'd ſome great truth, or rais'd ſome ſerious ſong;
There patient ſhew'd us the wiſe courſe to ſteer,
A candid cenſor, and a friend ſevere;
There taught us how to live; and (oh! too high
The price for knowledge) taught us how to die.

Mr. Tickell then addreſſes himſelf in a poetical manner to the ſeat of the Warwick-Family, the ſight of which revives in him all the ideas of thoſe pleaſures, which he enjoyed there in Mr. Addiſon's company; but now by his death all the charms of it are extinguiſhed:

His image thy forſaken bowers reſtore;
Thy walks and airy proſpects charm no more;
No more the ſummer in thy glooms allay'd,
Thy evening breezes, and thy noon-tide ſhade.

He cloſes the whole with a pathetic lamentation for Mr. Craggs, who was Mr. Addiſon's intimate friend, to whom he dedicated his works a few days before his death, and who died immediately after Mr. Addiſon.

Bleſt pair! whoſe union future bards ſhall tell
In future tongues, each other's boaſt! farewel.
Farewel! whom join'd in fame, in friendſhip try'd,
No chance could ſever, nor the grave divide.

We have likewiſe An imperfect copy of Verſes, occaſioned by ſeeing the funeral of Mr. Addiſon in Weſtminſter-Abbey; written by Dr. George Sewell (92), in which we have have the following lines:

(92) It is printed in A New Collection of Original Poems, by the author of Sir Walter Raleigh, in 8°, 1720, p. 13.

Earth open wide! rejoice thy greedy womb!
Be proud, O death! and triumph o'er the tomb!
This was a conqueſt — at a ſingle ſpoil
To plunder half the learning of our iſle.
In fields of battle, where the ſword waſtes wide,
And you o'er ruin heap'd in triumph ride;
Sedate the thinking mind the fate ſurveys
Of creatures form'd to laſt but half our days:
And often feels a deeper loſs in one,
Mourning a Plato, or an Addiſon.

He then addreſſes himſelf to Mr. Addiſon in this manner:

Great Bard! what various thoughts diſturb my head,
When I beheld thee number'd with the dead?
Diſtinguiſh'd only by a decent care,
To ſay - what late immortal gueſt lodg'd -- there.
Is this, I cry'd, then roſe the thought profane,
But by thy virtue check'd, recoil'd again. ——
" Such pow'r the aſhes of the virtuous crave,
" To ſhoot a ſecret influence from the grave;
" Their tombs are lectures, and diſcharge the truſt
" Of living eloquence from ſilent duſt.

The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to ſee a ſhort extract of the performance of a Lady upon this occaſion. It is intitled An Expoſtulatory Epiſtle to Sir Richard Steele upon the death of Mr. Addiſon. She begins in this manner:

If I, O Steele, preſumptuous ſhould appear,
And theſe unskilful notes offend thy ear,
Forbear to cenſure what I've artleſs writ;
No well-bred man e'er damn'd a woman's wit:

She complains then of his neglecting to pay the due regard to Mr. Addiſon's memory:

Shall Ramſay (93) and Meliſſa, lays produce,
That a mechanic's, this a woman's muſe,
While thou, wit's ſole ſurviving hope! ſupine
The melancholly theme doſt ſtill decline!

(93) Who wrote a Paſtoral in the Scots Dialect upon Mr Addiſon's death, entitled, Richy and Sandy.

We have then an addreſs to Mr. Addiſon:

Thou kind preceptor of the tender fair!
Great was the charge, and generous the care.
You ſhew'd us virtue, ſo celeſtial bright,
So amiable, in ſo divine a light;
Aſham'd at laſt falſe glories we reſign'd
By thee inſtructed to improve the mind.

She then applauds the beautiful characters, which he has drawn of Marcia and Lucia in Cato; and calls upon the Ladies to copy from thoſe excellent models.

Here, O ye fair! in this bright mirrour learn
Your minds with never-fading charms t'adorn!
On theſe accompliſhments beſtow ſome care;
'Tis no great merit to be only fair.

Next follows a compliment to his Opera of Roſamond; where ſhe gives us theſe two fine lines:

Beauty's a ſnare, unleſs with virtue join'd,
An Angel-form ſhould have an Angel-mind.

She then proceeds to the merit of his other writings.

How learned he was, O Steele, do thou declare,
For that's a task beyond a woman's ſphere.
Some works I've ſeen, wrought up by rules of art,
Where poor excluded nature had no part;
But he the STAGYRITE'S ſtrict axioms knew,
Yet ſtill to nature, as to art was true.
He touch'd the heart, the paſſions could command,
'Twas nature all, but mended by his hand.
His ſtyle is noble, ſentiments refin'd,
Full of benevolence to all mankind.

T.

After a conſiderable part of the article was printed off, an ingenious Gentleman favoured us with the following materials, which we hope will be found a good ſupplement to it.

☞Dean ADDISON had by Jane his wife, whoſe maiden name was Gulſtone, ſix children, whereof Jane the eldeſt was born April 23, 1671. The ſecond ſon, Gulſtone, in April 1673, Dorothy in May 1674, Anne in April 1676, and Lancelot the youngeſt ſon in November, 1680. Both Mr. Gulſtone and Mr. Lancelot Addiſon were reputed to be very well ſkilled in the Claſſics and in Polite Literature. Dr. Addiſon's living at Milſton was 120 l. per ann. and after his deceaſe his ſon Joſeph (his heir) was ſued for dilapidations by the next incumbent.

☞ADDISON (JOSEPH) the eldeſt ſon of Dr. Lancelot by Jane his wife, was born at Milſton near Ameſbury in Wiltſhire, and being thought unlikely to live was baptized the ſame day, which, as appears by the Church-regiſter there, was the firſt of May 1672 (a), and not the year before as Anthony Wood and others after him relate. He was ſent firſt to Ameſbury ſchool under the care of the Reverend Mr. Naiſh, the preſent Sub-dean of Sarum; afterwards removed to Sarum ſchool under the tuition of the Reverend Mr. Taylor; and from thence to the Charter Houſe London, under the learned Dr. Ellis, where he laid the foundation of his friendſhip with the late Sir Richard Steele, "which (ſays the author of the Memoirs of Sir Richard) "laſted as long as they lived, except the interruption of a few little bickerings "on certain œconomical occaſions, which however ſoon terminated in a good under-"ſtanding on both ſides. For it was by Mr. Addiſon that he was firſt introduced to "the acquaintance of the Earls of Halifax and Sunderland, by whoſe means Mr. "Steele was made Gazeteer, one of his firſt preferments." There is a tradition in the town where he was born, relating to a little excurſion Mr. Addiſon made when a boy [A]. We are told that it was in Oxford he firſt became acquainted with the late Earl of Halifax, that great patron of the Learned, who nevertheleſs was very ſatyrically characteris'd (a circumſtance that is but too common) by a noted Gentleman for the great favour he ſhewed to ſome of the brighteſt men his cotemporaries. We ſhall give ſeveral lines from the Poem we hint at, which is written with ſome ſpirit [B]. Whilſt at the Univerſity he contracted many debts, all which, after his return from Italy, he diſcharged very honourably with intereſt. A very plauſible reaſon is given why the author of the Tatler aſſumed a fictitious character [C]. There is an epigram of Mr. Addiſon not inſerted in his works [D]. A ſharp but witty anſwer of his is related concerning a copy of Engliſh

(a) This was communicated by a Gentleman who ſearch'd the Regiſter.

[A] A little excurſion he made when a boy.] 'Twas this: Being at a country-ſchool, he committed ſome ſlight fault, when his fear of being corrected for it was ſo great, that he ran away from his father's houſe and fled into the fields, where he lived upon fruits and took up his lodging in a hollow tree, till upon the publication of a reward to whoever ſhould find him, he was diſcover'd and reſtored to his parents.

[B] We ſhall give ſeveral lines from the Poem &c.] It is entitled Faction diſplay'd, printed in one of the volumes of State-Poems, 8*vo*, 1703. where, under the Character of Bathillo, that Earl is ſaid to be ſhadowed, and a deſcription is alſo given of his Band of Penſion Poets, as they are called.

Laſt roſe Bathillo deck'd with borrowed bays
Renown'd for others projects others lays,
A gay pragmatical pretending tool
Opiniatively wiſe and pertly dull.
A Demy-Stateſman talkative and loud,
Hot without courage, without merit proud;
A leader fit for the unthinking crowd.
With dapper geſture, but with haughty look
His lewd aſſociates vainly he beſpoke:
Do you perform the Politician's part,
I'll bring th' aſſiſtance of the Muſes art.
The Poet-tribe are all at my devoir,
And write as I command, as I inſpire.
Congreve for me Paſtora's death did mourn,
And her white name with ſable verſe adorn.
Rowe too is mine and of the Whiggiſh train,
'Twas he who ſung immortal Tamerlane;
Tho' now he dwindles to an humbler ſtrain.
I help'd to poliſh Garth's rough aukward lays,
Taught him in tuneful lines to ſound our party's praiſe.
Walſh votes with us, who tho' he never writ,
Yet paſſes for a critic and a wit.
Van's bawdy plotleſs Plays were once our boaſt,
But now the Poet's in the builder loſt.
On Addiſon we ſafely may depend,
A penſion never fails to gain a friend.
Thro' Alpine hills he ſhall my name reſound,
And make his Patron known in claſſic ground.
Theſe pay the tribute to my merit due,
Call me their Horace and Mecænas too.
Princes but ſet unſettled on their thrones,
Unleſs ſupported by Apollo's ſons.
Auguſtus had the Mantuan and Venuſian Muſe,
And happier Naſſau has his Mountagues.
But Anna that ill-fated Tory Queen
Shall feel the vengeance of the Poet's pen (1).

(1) Page

[C] Why the author of the TATLER aſſum'd a fictitious character.] We find this in a miſcellaneous paper of thoſe times, containing a conference between Sir Heſter Ryley and Mr. Aaron Hill, where the latter tells him, "My relation (Eſq; Bickerſtaff) "is as far from the family of the Bickerſtaffs as my "true age is from my pretended one, proceeding not "from his inclination to impoſe upon the world, but "the knowledge he has of its vitiated taſte: "Pride and conceit are the epidemic diſeaſes of the "age; and a fool or knave won't hear themſelves "deſcribed by any particular perſon; parties and pre-"judices are become ſo common, and their influ-"ences ſo univerſal, that it is neceſſary where a per-"ſon would be believed by every body, he ſhould "be known by no body: For inſtead of liſtening to "the good advice of the man, we are ſtudying how, "by retorting upon his frailties, to alleviate our "own (2)."

(2) Sir Heſt. Ryley's Viſions, 2°, p. 107, printed in 1710.

[D] There is an epigram of Mr. Addiſon's not inſerted in his works.] As it very poſſibly was made off hand, the ingenious Editor perhaps did not think it worthy the great and more labour'd pieces of our excellent author. However, as moſt of our readers will in all probability not think it unworthy of his genius, we therefore ſhall inſert it here, with the occaſion of its being written, which is as follows: Mr. Addiſon was in 1703 a Member of the Kit-Cat Club. It was uſual for the bright Wits who compoſed it, to celebrate the ſeveral beauties they toaſted, in verſe, which they wrote on their drink-

On

Engliſh verſes which were ſubmitted to his peruſal and correction [E]. Our author kept his Tragedy of Cato by him, but unfiniſhed, for ſeveral years, and we find it taken air before it appeared on the ſtage, as appears by a compliment that was paid him [F]. Mr. Dennis's Criticiſm upon Cato (beforementioned) drew upon him the reſentment of a very conſiderable writer, who expoſed his impertinent and paſſionate manner of writing very agreeably, in a piece entitled, The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris concerning the ſtrange and deplorable frenzy of Mr. J——n D——is, an officer of the Cuſtom Houſe (b). It is impoſſible to give a juſt extract of a writing of ſo peculiar a kind; and we cannot do the reader a greater pleaſure, than by referring him to ſo exquiſite a piece of wit and humour.

(b) Printed in the Miſcellanies by Mr. Pope and Dr. Swift, Vol. 3. p. 1.

ing glaſſes. Among theſe ingenious pieces, which were ſo many Epigrams, (preſerved in the fifth volume of Dryden's Miſcellany) we meet with one written by Mr. Addiſon, which is as follows:

On the Lady Mancheſter.

While haughty Gallia's Dames, that ſpread
O'er their pale cheeks, an artful red,
Beheld this beauteous ſtranger there (3),
In native charms, divinely fair;
Confuſion in their looks they ſhew'd;
And with unborrow'd bluſhes glow'd.

(3) The Earl of Mancheſter was our Embaſſador at Paris, and was accompanied by his Lady.

[E] A ſharp but witty anſwer of his is related.] This is told by a Gentleman, (a perſon of great veracity,) who a few years ſince was well known in Grays-Inn. The ſtory is as follows: A certain author was introduced by a friend to Mr. Addiſon, who was deſired to peruſe and correct a copy of Engliſh Verſes, which were then preſented to him. Mr. Addiſon took the Verſes, which he afterwards found very ſtupid; and obſerving that above twelve lines from Homer were prefixed to them by way of motto, he only erazed the Greek lines, but did not make any amendments in the Poem, and return'd it. The author ſeeing this, deſired his friend who had introduced him, to enquire of Mr. Addiſon the reaſon of his doing it; expecting however to hear that his Poem was ſo beautiful, that it had no occaſion for any foreign embelliſhment. But his friend putting the queſtion to Mr. Addiſon, he ſaid, "That "whilſt the ſtatues of Caligula remain'd all of a "piece, they were little regarded by the people; "but that when he fixed the heads of Gods upon "unworthy ſhoulders, he profaned them, and made "himſelf ridiculous. I therefore, ſays he, made no "more conſcience to ſeparate Homer's Verſes from "this Poem, than the thief did who ſtole the ſilver "head from the brazen body (4) in Weſtminſter-Abbey."

(4) In Henry the Seventh's chapel.

[F A compliment that was paid him.] By Mr. Webſter, of Chriſt Church Oxon, who prompted him to oblige the public with his Cato in the following lines.

And thou, O Addiſon, no more detain
The free-born Cato, ſtruggling in his chain;
'Tis liberty he loves; diſcloſe thy vaſt deſign,
And let us ſee that every Muſe is thine (5).

It is ſaid that Mr. Addiſon gave the benefit-nights to the houſe, which doubtleſs muſt be of ſome advantage to his Tragedy, abſtracted from its great merit. It was exhibited thirty five nights without interruption.

I. T.

☞ AL ADED LIDÎN ALLAH was the ſurname of Abu Mohammed Abd'allah the ſon of Yûſof the ſon of al Hâfedh, the eleventh (a) and laſt Khâlif of Egypt of the race of Ali and Fâtema. He ſucceeded his couſin al Fâyez in the year of the Hejra 555 (b); but was nominal Sovereign only, the whole power and management of affairs being, during his reign, in the hands of his Vizirs. The firſt of them was al Sâleh Talâyé Ebn Zoreic, who had ſerved al Fâyez in the ſame capacity, and was one great cauſe of weakening the kingdom, by the oppreſſions and cruelties which he exerciſed in order to maintain himſelf in his poſt (c). Al Sâleh being aſſaſſinated in the year 556 (d), by the procurement of the Khalif's aunt, and not dying immediately of his wounds, ſent to al Aded to expoſtulate with him, ſuppoſing he had been privy and conſenting to the fact; but the Khalif ſwore he knew nothing of the matter, and to clear himſelf of all ſuſpicion, delivered his aunt into the hands of al Sâleh, who put her to death, and expired ſoon after, having firſt obtained of al Aded that his ſon al Adel Zoreic ſhould ſucceed him (e). In 558 (f) al Adel, having, contrary to his father's advice, attempted to take the Government of al Saîd, or the upper Egypt, from Shâwer, one of his Officers, and a man of great power, was by him diſpoſſeſſed of the Vizirate and ſlain. Shâwer, however, ſoon found a ſtronger competitor in Darghâm, by whom being attacked and defeated, he fled into Syria to beg aſſiſtance of Nûro'ddin Mahmûd Ebn Zenghi Lord of Damaſcus; Darghâm, in the mean time, governing all things in Egypt at his pleaſure, and haſtening the ruin of that kingdom, by putting to death many of the chief officers, that he might have none left to oppoſe him (g). In 559 (h) Nûro'ddin, in compliance with the ſolicitations of Shâwer, and on his engagement to pay him one third of the revenues of Egypt, in caſe by his aſſiſtance he recovered his dignity, ſent a conſiderable army thither for that purpoſe, under the command of Aſado'ddîn Shîrcûh, who was accompanied in the expedition by his nephew Salâho'ddin Yûſof. Shîrcûh, being arrived in Egypt, overthrew the forces ſent againſt him by Darghâm, who was ſlain in his retreat from al Kâhira, and reinſtated Shâwer in the Vizirate; but he, inſtead of performing the promiſe he had made to his reſtorer, entred into a treaty with the Franks (i), and by their aſſiſtance obliged Shîrcûh to retire, for that time, into Syria, without the expected recompence. The perfidious dealing of Shâwer in the end proved his ruin: for keeping his word with the Franks no better than he had with the Syrians, and leaguing ſometimes with the former, and ſometimes with the latter, as ſerved his preſent purpoſe, he was at length driven by the Franks to the neceſſity of calling in Shîrcûh again to his aſſiſtance, who coming into Egypt the third time, in 564 (k), and obliging the Franks to retire, ſoon after got Shâwer ſeized, and put to death; al Aded himſelf, when he was informed of his confinement, ſending to demand his head (l). After this execution the Khalif inveſted Shîrcûh with the robe of Vizir: SHAWER.

(a) He was the eleventh who reigned in Egypt, tho' the fourteenth of that family who took the title of Khalif.

(b) A. C. 1160. Ebn Khalecân, Nokhbat al Tawârikh. MS. Abu'lfaragius places the death of al Fâyez a year later Hiſt. Dynaſt. p. 398.

(c) Ebn Khalecân. MS.

(d) A. C. 1161.

(e) See the article of TALAYE EBN ZOREIC.

(f) A. C. 1162.

(g) Idem, Abu'lfeda in Hiſt. Gen. V. Excerpta ex eodem apud Schultens ad calcem vitæ Saladini, p. 1, 2. & Vit. Salad. p. 30, &c.

(h) A. C. 1163.

(i) That is, with Almeric King of Jeruſalem. Vide Gulielm. Tyr. Hiſt. l. 19.

(k) A. C. 1168.

(l) For a more particular account of theſe tranſactions, ſee the articles of SHIRCUH and SHAWER.

Vizir: but he enjoyed his new dignity not much above two months, dying and leaving Salaho'ddin his heir; who being created Vizir by al Aded, in a little time made himſelf abſolute maſter of Egypt (m). In 567 (n) Nuro'ddin, whom Salâho'ddin acknowledged, in appearance, as his Sovereign, and who was intirely devoted to the Khalifs of Baghdâd of the race of Abbâs, ſent orders to Salâho'ddin to forbid the the name of the Egyptian Khalif to be mentioned in the public prayers, and to cauſe him of Baghdâd to be prayed for in his ſtead; and notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of Salâho'ddin, who apprehended ſo great a change could not be made without danger, perſiſted to have thoſe orders executed: whereupon al Moſtadi, then Khalif of Baghdâd, was publickly prayed for [A], and the name of al Aded omitted, and that without the leaſt diſturbance; and from thenceforth the ſupremacy of the Khalifs of the race of Ali became utterly aboliſhed in Egypt, after that dignity had continued in the family two hundred and ſeventy two years. Al Aded, in the mean time, was ignorant of what had paſſed; for he being then ill of the ſickneſs of which he ſoon after died, no body acquainted him with the revolution (o). This Khalif is ſaid to have been a ſtaunch partiſan of the houſe and ſect of Ali, and to have born an inveterate hatred to the memories of the four firſt ſucceſſors of Mohammed, againſt whom he uſed often to vent his ſpleen in outrageous invectives; he was conſequently a bitter enemy of the Sonnites, whom he made no ſcruple to put to death meerly on account of their opinions (p). He died in the 23d year of his age (q). His extream ſubjection to his Vizirs gives no room to enquire into his character as a Prince, or his qualifications for government. His dream, which prognoſticated ſome miſchief to him from one who was a chief inſtrument in his depoſition, has been related by ſeveral authors [B], and his ſurname obſerved by ſome to have been impoſed with an ill omen [C].

(m) See the article of SALAHO'DDIN.

(n) A. C. 1171

(o) Abu'lfeda ubi ſupra, p. 12, &c. Bahâo'ddin in vita Saladini, p. 38. Abu'lfaragius, Hiſt. Dyn. p. 404, &c. Ebn Khalecân.

(p) Ebn Khalecân in vita al Aded.

(q) Nokhbat al Tawârikh.

[A] The Khalif of Bagdad was prayed for in Egypt without the leaſt diſturbance.] It is ſaid that Salaho'ddin was under ſome difficulty to get a perſon to break the ice; none daring to pray, for the firſt time, for the Khalif of Baghdâd, till a blind man, named al Amîr al Alem, then lately arrived in Egypt, obſerving the ſtrait he was in, offered his ſervice, and on the firſt Friday in al Moharram, mounting the pulpit before the Preacher, prayed for al Moſtadi, no man contradicting him (1).

(1) Abu'lfarag. Hiſt. Dynaſt. p. 404.

[B] A dream prognoſticated ſome miſchief to him from one who was a chief inſtrument in his depoſition.] It was this. He dreamed that a ſcorpion came out of a certain moſque in al Kâhira, and ſtung him; and awaking in a fright, called for proper men to interpret it: they told him it ſignified that ſome perſon, who ſhould come out of that moſque, would do him a great prejudice; whereupon he ordered the Governor of the city to ſee who had retired into the moſque, and to bring him before him. The man, when brought before the Khalif, proved to be one who profeſſed the religious life of the Sûfis, and his name was Nojmo'ddin al Jawſhâni: being asked ſeveral queſtions by the Khalif, as to the place whence he came, and the reaſon of his taking up his abode in that moſque, he gave ſuch plain and ſincere anſwers, that al Aded, judging him too ſimple and weak to do him any injury, beſtowed ſome money on him, and deſiring his prayers, ſent him back to his ſtation. But when Salâho'ddin had reſolved to put an end to the power of the houſe of Ali, and not venturing to do it without the approbation of the Doctors and Learned in the law, aſſembled a conſiderable number of them, to have their judgment in the matter; among the reſt appeared Nojmo'ddin al Jawſhâni, who in giving his opinion inſiſted ſo largely and particularly on the wicked actions, and heretical infidelity of the Fâtemite Khalifs, that he drew the whole aſſembly into a ſentence againſt them, and ſo fulfilled al Aded's dream (2).

(2) Ebn Khalecân, Ebn Shohnah, Abulfeda, in excerptis ubi ſupra, p. 14.

[C] His ſurname has been obſerved to have been impoſed with an ill omen.] It is a common ſtory in Egypt, that this family, when their power was firſt eſtabliſhed, ordered a certain learned man to write down a liſt of ſurnames proper to be borne by Khalifs, that when any of them was raiſed to that dignity, he might take ſome one of thoſe ſurnames: whereupon the ſaid learned perſon gave in a liſt of ſeveral ſurnames, the laſt of which was al Aded; and it is remarkable that the laſt of the family, who poſeſſed the Khalifate, was ſurnamed al Aded (3).

(3) Ebn Khalecân.

☞ ADELME (a), or ALDHELM, according to Camden, ſon to Kenred, nephew to Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, after having been educated abroad, was Abbot of Malmſbury thirty years. He was the firſt Engliſhman who wrote in Latin, the firſt who brought Poetry into England, and the firſt biſhop of Sherburn. He wrote a book for the reducing the Britons to the obſervation of Eaſter. He is highly applauded by Bede for his learning. The Monks have related ſome fabulous particulars concerning him [A]. Coming to Rome to be conſecrated Biſhop of Sherburn, he reproved Pope Sergius for getting a baſtard, which was then newly born. This however is denied by other authors [B]. Returning home he lived in great eſteem till his death which happened in 709. His corps was inſhrined at Malmſbury, and had (a) He is called Aldhelmus, Durotellus, or Bladunius, by Bale.

[A] The Monks have related fabulous particulars concerning him.] They tell us that a beam of his church having been cut too ſhort by the carpenter, Adelme ſtretch'd it by his prayers the length required (1). The Romiſh Legends relate ſomething like this of our Saviour and Joſeph his father, when they followed the buſineſs of carpentry. "That at ano- "ther time St. Adelme hung his veſtments upon the "ſun-beams, which ſupported them in a miraculous "manner (2)." This miracle is related more at large in the Salisbury Breviary. Leſſ. 7. "The "fame of St. Adelme coming to Rome, Pope Ser- "gius by his letters called him thither, and there "received him honourably, whom God glorified "with miracles; for on a certain day as he celebra- "ted Maſs in the Lateran church, he reach'd his "Caſula (one of the Prieſts garments) behind him, "thinking to deliver it to one of the attendants; "but none of them being preſent, a ſun-beam break- "ing thro' the window, kept it from falling a long "time in memory of the Saint (3)."

(1) Fuller & Angler. Spec. ibid.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Reflexions upon the Devotions of the Roman Church, &c. p. 342. London printed for R. Royſton 1674, 8vo.

[B] This however is denied by other authors.] Another miracle is told upon this occaſion. "A "child being born in Rome of an inceſtuous mother "and uncertain father, the Pope's fame was injured, "which Adelme underſtanding, he commanded that "child who was but twenty days old to be brought "forth, when our Saint charged it to confeſs, whe- "ther Pope Sergius was to be accounted guilty of "inceſt? the child reply'd, that he was innocent (4)." This is alſo related by Fuller (5).

(4) Idem, p. 343.

(5) Fuller's Worthies, p. 147.

had in great veneration (b), he being afterwards canonized. Fuller ſays (c), that poſſibly he was eſteemed a native of Malmſbury, becauſe he lived ſo many years, and died there. Bale gives him a great character [C]. He is mentioned with great honour by Camden [D]; and his life is written by William of Malmſbury &c. I.

(b) Fuller's Worthies, pag. 147. London printed by J. G. &c. 1662. fol. Anglorum Speculum, or the Worthies of England in Church and State, p. 849. London printed for T. Wright &c. 1684, 8vo.

(c) P. 147.

[C] Bale gives him a great character.] He ſays that Adelme had ſo prodigious a knowledge in letters both human and ſacred, that he far excelled all the Divines of his time. He underſtood the Latin and Greek proſe-writers as well as the Poets, and writ in a very good ſtyle. He was vaſtly fond of muſic, and played on all ſorts of inſtruments to wonderful perfection. Tho' he was not ignorant of Pope Sergius's fornications, he yet was as intimate with him as ever. He is not to be condemned for not deſpiſing the ſociety of women, as is the cuſtom of hypocrites. What the Papiſts affirm of him is an entire falſhood, viz. that when he was an Abbot, he uſed to lie all night with maidens, (but without offering any thing that might offend their modeſty) in order to ſubdue all ſtimulations of the fleſh. But we had better hear our author. Et Abbas effectus, adeò literis humanis & divinis incumbebat, ut omnes ſui temporis theologos longè ſuperavit. Erat quidem tam carmine quàm proſa Latinè & Græcè doctiſſimus, ingenio & ſermone nitidus: atque in edendis poematis, Cælio ſedulio vati, ut teſtes ſunt Boſtius & Bedas, per omnia ſimillimus. Artem muſices omnibus mundi deliciis prætulit, inſtrumentorum omnium peritiam perappoſitè callens. Sed unum hoc in eo deflendum occurrit, quod cum Sergio primo Pontifice Romano longam conſuetudinem habens (cujus interim non ignorabat inceſtum) cauterio peruſtam avehebat conſcientiam. Shireburnenſis eccleſiæ quæ nunc Salisburia dicit, ordinatus Præſul, poſt 34 alterius regiminis annos, Evangelii prædicationi obnixè invigilabat. Quod verò mulierum conſortia, hypocritarum more, nuſquam ſpreverit, vituperabile non eſt. Multo minori periculo tamen, Brytannorum more ſub ſacroſanctis conjugii legibus id fieri poterit, ſed quod adhuc Abbas, cum virginibus pro ſubigendo carnis æſtu pernoctaverit, illæſo ſemper virginitatis earum permanente pudore, impudens Papiſtarum eſt commentum (6). We find a catalogue of his works in the ſame author, who informs us, that his life was writ by Oſmundus, Faritius, &c.

(6) Baleus Scriptorum Illuſtrium Majoris Britanniæ Catalogus, p. 83, 84. Baſileæ apud Joannem Oporinum 1559. Folio.

[D] He is mentioned with honour by Camden.] His Maſter was one Maildulphus, an Iriſh Scot, a great Scholar, and eminent for his devotion and ſtrictneſs of life, who being delighted with the pleaſantneſs of the wood under the hill (Ingelborne), lived here an hermit; but afterwards inſtituting a ſchool, and with his Scholars devoting himſelf to a monaſtic life, he built a little monaſtery. From this Maildulphus, the town of Ingelborne was called Malmesbury. Among Maildulph's ſcholars, Aldhelm was the moſt eminent; who being deſigned his ſucceſſor, did, by the help of Eleutherius Biſhop of Wincheſter (to whom the ground of right belonged) build here a ſtately monaſtery, of which himſelf was the firſt Abbot... A meadow near this place was called St. Aldhelm's mead; and before the reformation they had ſeveral other memorials of him, as his Pſalter, the robe wherein he ſaid Maſs, and a great bell in the abbey ſteeple, call'd St. Aldhelm's bell. Upon his feaſt-day a great fair was kept, at which time a company of ſoldiers were uſually liſted to prevent diſorders amidſt ſuch a concourſe of people. And indeed, his memory deſerves immortal honour, not only for the ſanctity of his life, but alſo for his learning; due allowance being made for the ignorance of the times he lived in. He was the firſt Saxon that ever wrote in Latin, and the firſt that taught the Saxons the way of compoſing Latin verſe; and ſo performed what he promiſed of himſelf in theſe verſes:

Primus ego in patriam mecum, modo vita ſuperſit,
Aonio rediens deducam vertice muſas.

That is,

" I to my country firſt, if fates permit,
" Will bring the Muſes from their native ſeat.

The great Æthelſtan made this Aldhelm his tutelar Saint (he having been canonized), and for his ſake granted the town large immunities, and enriched the monaſtery with ample donations. He choſe this for the place of his burial, and the inhabitants ſhew his monument to this day. [Which monument, however, ſeems to have been ſet up long after the conqueſt]. From the time of Æthelſtan this abbey was famous for its wealth; and there was educated (beſides many other learned men) William of Malmsbury, ſo called from this town. This abbey increaſed daily in buildings and revenues, inſomuch that it exceeded all the reſt in Wiltſhire both in riches and honour, the Lord Abbot ſitting in Parliament as Peer of the Realm till the diſſolution of abbies (7). See Note [C] of the article St. FRANCIS &c.

(7) Camden's Britannia. Tranſlated into Engliſh by Biſhop Gibſon. Vol. I. pag. 103, & ſeq. 2d edit. London printed for J. Knapton, &c. Folio.

☞ADIMARI [A] ALESSANDRO (ALEXANDER) (a) ſon of Bernard, one of the renowned men whom the ancient and noble family Adimari of Florence [B], has given

(a) See Glorie degl' incogniti, p. 15.---Negri Iſtoria degli Scritt. Fiorent. p. 13.

[A] Adimari.] In Latin Adimarus, Adimarius, and Ademarius as it is written under his picture in the Glorie degli Incogniti; or, The illuſtrious men of the Academy of the Incogniti of Venice, a book in 4°, printed at Venice by Francis Valvaſenſe in 1647. I alſo find this family call'd de Adimariis; and that Adimarius or Odimarius, who was Biſhop of Volterra, was one of his family; his name being the ſame with Adimarius (1). Our Adimari made a ſonnet upon him as one of the fifty illuſtrious men of his family, whom he applauds.

(1) Ughell. Ital. Sacr. Volater. Epiſcop. tom. 1. p. 1440.

[B] Ancient and noble family Adimari of Florence.] L'Antichiſſima, ſays Negri, e nobiliſſima famiglia degli Adimari hà dato per più ſecoli alla ſua Republica, e Patria Firenze più di cinquanta ſoggetti riguardevoli, chi per la porpora, o per legazioni alle Corone, ed a concilii, come Alamano; chi per le mitre epiſcopali, come Filippo, e Roberto; chi per eſtimaſione di non ordinaria religioſa bontà, come Ubaldo; chi per la letteratura, come lo ſtorico Dollabella. That is, " The moſt ancient and noble family Adimari has " for many ages given to its republic and country " Florence, above fifty remarkable perſons, ſome for " the purple, or for embaſſies, to Kings and Coun- " cils, as Alamanus; others for the epiſcopal mitre " as Philip and Robert; ſome eminent for their ex- " traordinary religion and piety as Ubaldus; and " ſome for their learning as the hiſtorian Dolabella." Our Alexander himſelf made a Poem intitled Clio, conſiſting of fifty ſonnets in praiſe of fifty illuſtrious perſons of his family. To this Poem Negri had an eye in the words before quoted, only that not content with the number 50, he added the word Più above. Ugelinus Verinus a Florentine Poet, who wrote upon the noble families of Florence in Latin verſe gives the following account of his family (2).

(2) De Illuſt. Urb. Florent. lib. 3. p. 22. &c. of the Paris edit. by Patiſſon 1583. fol.

Quin & vicini Feſulano è vertice montis
Venit ſanguineis notus bellator in armis
Adimar; unde genus clari duxere nepotes;
Cum Longobardos victor Pipinius heros
Diruit, & noſtram majorem reddidit urbem:
In multos ramos mutato nomine proles
Scinditur, & plures complexa nepotibus urbes.
Ex hac illuſtris profluxit Trotta propago,
Qua nunc attollit ſeſe Alexandria pubes,
Armipotens genus, & ſacris memorabile chartis.

Don Vincenzio Borghini (3) a Florentine author alſo, and very much eſteemed for his writings on Florence, includes the family of Adimari among the ancient and noble of that city, altho' he does not agree in what Verinus ſays, viz. that the family of Trotti of Aleſſandria was a branch of the Adimari. He does not mention Verinus, but I take him however to be the man, whom he deſcribes by the following words (4). Souviemmi óra d'un, che ſcriſſe in verſi Latini delle famiglie noſtre, e diſſe molte coſe, ancorchè è non par, che e' ne ſapeſſe molto. i. e. " I " now remember, ſays he, a certain perſon, who " writ upon our families in Latin verſe, and ſaid ma-

(3) In his Diſcorſi, p. 2. Diſc. 1. and in his Trattilo della chief, e Veſcov. Fiorent. p. 557.

(4) Diſc. 1. p. 46.

given to the world was born at Florence in the year 1579 [C]. From his youth he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of human literature, and in particular to the Greek language and poetry, in both which he gave proofs of his ability by the tranſlation of Pindar into Italian verſe [D], as alſo in many other poems of his own invention. The great Duke of Tuſcany [E] in conſideration of his merit and ſervices [F], honoured one of his ſons with the order of knighthood of St. Stephen [G]; but, as is the common fate of learned men and courtiers, he met with many troubles and perſecutions [H], which he bore however with great courage and tranquillity, inſomuch, that even when he was moſt expoſed to danger, he made the ſtudy of poetry his occupation and delight [I]. He was very much eſteemed by the Learned, and was a member of the Academy of the Incogniti of Venice. He died in 1649 in the ſeventieth year of his age, having acquired great reputation for his poems, which are the greateſt part of his works [K]. We ſhall give in the Remarks the judgment Creſcimbeni gives of his manner of writing [L].

" ny things, tho' it appears that he did not know " much of it." The arms of this family are a ſhield party par feſs, or and azure. Scutum æqualiter bipartitum aureum, & cæruleum.

[C] In the year 1579.] The date of his death, which happened in 1649, fixes the date of his birth to the year 1579.

[D] The tranſlation of Pindar into Italian verſe.] The tranſlation of Pindar gave more reputation to Adimari's name in the learned world, than all the reſt of his works. The author of Le Glorie degl' Incogniti aſſures us, that this tranſlation was celebrated with the higheſt encomiums by the greateſt pens of the age. Celebrata con ſuperbiſſimi encomii dalle prime penne del ſecolo. And by the verſes under his picture it is remarked, that this work of his alone is ſuperior to any of the reſt.

Plurima ſcripſiſti, vir docte, volumina: verum
Cunctorum pondus Pindarus unus habet.

(5) Glor. degl' Incogniti.

[E] The great Duke of Tuſcany.] The author (5), who informs me of this, does not mention the great Duke's name; but I take him to be Ferdinand the ſecond, who ſucceeded Coſmo the ſecond in the dukedom in 1621, and died in 1670 (6).

(6) Hubner Genealog. Tabl. 301.

[F] His merit and ſervices.] The ſame author before quoted ſays, that he was employed by the great Duke not only in public ſervices, but alſo in private and domeſtic affairs. Datoſi al ſervigio publico è ſtato adoperato dal grand Duca ſuo ſignore in diverſi officii, e governi, non meno che in domeſtici affari.

[G] The Order of Knighthood of St. Stephen.] This order (7) was inſtituted by Coſmo, the firſt great Duke of Tuſcany in the year 1560. He gave it the name of St. Stephen in remembrance of the great victory gained by the Emperor over the French, who aſſiſted Peter Strozzi againſt him. The battle was fought at Marciano a place ſituated on the borders of the Florentine territory, and thoſe of Siena, on the ſecond of Auguſt 1554, in which day is celebrated the feaſt of St. Stephen, Pope and Martyr. This order was in 1562 confirmed with a grant of privileges by Pius the fourth. As for the name of Adimari's ſon, who was made Knight of St. Stephen, I believe it was Bernardin, from the title of Knight that Negri gives him. Il Cavaliere Bernardino ſuo figliuolo.

(7) Spond. Annal. Eccleſ. ad an. 1554. Bonan. degli ordin. equeſtr. e mil. n. 112.

[H] With many troubles and perſecutions.] What were the cauſes of Adimari's troubles and perſecutions, I cannot tell, ſince the author (8), from whom I have this particular, ſpeaks of it only in general terms; unwilling, as we may probably ſuppoſe, to reflect upon ſome perſons then living.

(8) Glorie degl' Incogn.

[I] He made the ſtudy of Poetry his occupation and delight.] The ſame author tells us this of our Adimari, upon which I cannot forbear making a ſhort reflection. It is not a ſmall conſolation to a man under troubles and perſecutions, to have an opportunity of ſpending ſome hours of the day in reading or writing. The pleaſure a man of letters receives from the peruſal of books, is ſo delicate and ſo conformable to the nature of the ſoul, that reading, like charms againſt pain, quiets and expells for ſome time thoſe gloomy thoughts and reflections, which if perpetual would render a man the moſt miſerable of all creatures. But ſtudy diverts the mind with agreeable and inſtructive images, and by application to them makes us inſenſible to our misfortunes. Grotius, Sir Walter Raleigh, and many others when in priſon and under afflictions, ſpent their hours in this manner, whereby they had an opportunity of obliging the Public with many learned works, and have immortalized their names. But on the other ſide, how miſerable muſt the condition of thoſe fine Gentlemen be who deſpiſe learning, ridicule ſtudy, and inſtead of cultivating their minds with true knowledge, and exerciſing it in uſeful or laudable applications, give themſelves up entirely to vain and empty pleaſures. What will become of them ſhould they once fall under misfortunes, or be afflicted with diſeaſes? In what manner will they paſs their time? How will it be poſſible for them to ſupport or alleviate the heavy weight of thoſe evils with which they are afflicted? Nay, by their ignorance the want of thoſe pleaſures, (in the knowledge of which they fancy wiſdom and happineſs conſiſts,) evils will appear greater, and torments heavier than they really are; ſo that, at laſt, finding no methods either within or from without, to make themſelves, if not eaſy at leaſt leſs miſerable, they fall as victims to dejection and deſpair. It were to be wiſhed, that thoſe Gentlemen, who do not love, and even deſpiſe reading, would at leaſt imitate the ancient Heroes, who did not think it a diſhonour to their quality to know even the mechanical arts (9). But our Gentlemen value themſelves for their ignorance and indolence, and laugh at all the Heroes and great Men of antiquity as well as at the learned among the moderns. To this ſort of Gentlemen, whom neither reaſon or example can perſuade, we have nothing to ſay, but what Horace ſpeaks of the covetous,

(9) Vide Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. 7. c. 4, 5.

Quid facias illi? jubeas miſerum eſſe.
Satyr. 1. ver. 63.

[K] The greateſt part of his works.] The author of Le glorie degli Incogniti, who writ whilſt Adimari was living, gave the Public a catalogue of ſuch of our Adimari's works as at that time (which was 1647) were publiſhed, and of thoſe he intended to publiſh. But afterwards Negri in his Bibliotheca gave us in the article ALESSANDRO ADIMARI a more copious and particular liſt of all his works either publiſhed or in manuſcripts, which would be too long and tedious to inſert here. The reader may therefore conſult Negri's book to ſatisfy his curioſity, and I will mention thoſe only which are the moſt curious and moſt applauded: Della parafraſi in Pindaro, lib. 4. Oſſervazioni, e confronti fra Pindaro, & Orazio. Of his Coro delle nove Muſe, there are but ſix of theſe printed, among which is Clio, conſiſting of fifty Sonnets upon fifty illuſtrious perſons of his family. The Abbot Eugenio Gamurini in his fourth part Of the noble families of Tuſcany and Umbria, quotes the hiſtory of our Adimari.

[L] The judgment Creſcimbeni (10) gives of his manner of writing.] Il Pindarico, ſays he, fù lo ſtile dell' Adimari, il quale gli fece ſommo onore anche in altri componimenti di ſua invenzione. Ma allorchè volle maneggiare le proprie fraſi, e forme volgari, anch' eſſo s'ingannò co' moderni novatori, come apertamente manifeſtano i nove volumi delle ſue rime &c. The ſenſe of which words is, that " Adimari's ſtyle was " the Pindaric, which gained him a great deal of ho- " nour even in the other compoſitions of his own in- " vention; but when he employed his own particular " phraſes and common forms of ſpeech, he then (as " well as the modern innovators in Poetry) was miſ- " taken, as appears plainly from his nine volumes of " Poetry &c."

(10) Comment. int. all' Iſtor. della Volg. Poeſ. Vol. 2. p. 2. l. 5. n. 45.

☞ADONIJAH, the fourth ſon of David by Haggith (a) was born at Hebron (b), during the time that his father was acknowledged by one part of Iſrael for their King, while the other part obeyed Iſhboſheth, the ſon of Saul. Adonijah finding that Ammon and Abſalom, his elder brothers, were dead, thought that the kingdom was due to him by birth-right. And as David was now ſo extremely reduced by old age, that he was not able to execute the affairs of government, he imagined it would be very proper for him to procure himſelf to be acknowledged King before his father's death [A]. He therefore prepared himſelf a very magnificent equipage; and chariots, and horſemen, and fifty men to run before him (c). He was the eldeſt ſon of the royal family; he had all the advantages of perſon imaginable; he was extremely beloved by his father; and he had a very ſtrong party in the court. But his chief engagements were with Joab, the General of David's armies, and Abiathar the Prieſt [B]. However Zadok the other High-Prieſt [C], for there were then two High-Prieſts in the kingdom, and Benaiah, the ſon of Jehoiada [D], the Captain of the Guards, and the Prophet Nathan [E], with the moſt conſiderable part of the army [F], were

(a) Joſ. Antiq. l. 7. c. 14. §4. calls her Ægiſtha.

(b) 2 Sam. iii 4.

(c) 1 Kings i. 5, 6, &c.

[A] To procure himſelf to be acknowledged King before his father's death.] It is no wonder, that a Prince, who was the eldeſt ſon of the family, and had ſo many circumſtances in his favour, ſhould conſider the kingdom as his own. David had ſeen the equipage, which his ſon had aſſumed, and which were only ſuitable to the preſumptive heir of the Crown, and had made no remonſtrance to him upon it; and therefore his ſilence in ſo important an occaſion might be conſidered by Adonijah and the people in general, as a tacit conſent. We may obſerve here, that the order of ſucceſſion in the Jewiſh kingdom was not at that time regulated in any particular manner. God had appointed, that he, whom he ſhould chooſe, ſhould be made King. Thou ſhalt in any wiſe ſet him King over thee, whom the Lord thy God ſhall chooſe: one from among thy brethren ſhalt thou ſet King over thee; thou mayſt not ſet a ſtranger over thee, which is not thy brother (1). In this manner Saul and David had been made Kings. No regard was paid to blood and family in the election; but only to the merit of the perſon, and the determination of God. But out of a particular regard to David's family, God was pleaſed to recede from his firſt appointment, by promiſing the kingdom to him and his poſterity for ever (2). All Iſrael was acquainted with this determination and deſign of God; but there was nothing fixed with reſpect to the order of this ſucceſſion; for he had not declared, whether the eldeſt ſon ſhould ſucceed the father. However as it was a general cuſtom among all nations for the eldeſt ſons to poſſeſs the empire, as appears from Herodotus (3), Juſtin (4), and as this cuſtom ſeems moſt agreeable to nature, Adonijah acted openly as the Succeſſor of David, and aſſumed the authority and equipage ſuitable to ſuch a character, either not knowing, or diſſembling the promiſe, which the King his father had made to Bathſheba of leaving the kingdom to her ſon Solomon; which promiſe had been approved of God? who loved him, and ſent by the hand of Nathan the Prophet, and called his name JEDIDIAH, (that is, Beloved of the Lord,) becauſe of the Lord (5). The people, who were in ſuſpence between Adonijah and Solomon, waited for the King's declaration, in order to acknowledge him, whom he ſhould appoint: The eyes of all Iſrael are upon thee, ſays Bathſheba to David (6), that thou ſhouldeſt tell them who ſhall ſit on the throne of my Lord the King after him. Thus it appears, that leſs regard was had to the order of birth, than to the choice and will of the King. And we find almoſt the ſame kind of regulation among the Kings of Judah, who ſucceeded David. The eldeſt ſucceeded of courſe, when the King died without any particular declaration; but the Kings very often appointed long before their death, which of their ſons ſhould have the crown (7).

(1) Deut. xvii. 15.

(2) 2 Samuel vii. 12, 26.

(3) L. 7. c. 2.

(4) L. 2. c. 10. Artemenes maximus natu ætatis privilegio regnum ſibi vindicabat, quod jus, & ORDO NASCENDI, & NATURA IPSA gentibus dedit.

(5) 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25.

(6) 1 Kings i. 20.

(7) See Calmet and Le Clerc in locum.

[B] His chief engagements were with Joab, the General of David's armies, and Abiathar the Prieſt.] Theſe two powerful men had particular inducements to ſupport his pretenſions as well as he had occaſion for their aſſiſtance. Joab, who was General, had an intereſt in raiſing him to the Throne, in order to ſecure his own authority. He wanted to continue himſelf at the head of the army; and nothing was more proper for that purpoſe than to have a King, who was obliged to him for the Crown, and whom he could always keep in dependence upon him. On the other hand Adonijah, who knew Joab to be a man of reſolution and an enterprizing genius, and the great influence, which he had over the army, and among the people, could not have fix'd upon any expedient more proper to promote his deſign, than to engage a man of his importance and character to his intereſts. Abiathar's authority was likewiſe no leſs conſiderable over the Prieſts and Levites, than Joab's in the army. The Prieſts among the Jews were greatly honoured, and they formed a very eminent body in the State, diſtinguiſhed by their rank and employments. And therefore ſuch a perſon, who was the head of a powerful order of men, was of vaſt conſequence to Adonijah's intereſt (8).

(8) See Calmet in locum.

[C] Zadok, the other High-Prieſt.] Abiathar and Zadok were High-Prieſts together. They were of diſferent families, tho' both of the race of Aaron. Abiathar was of the family of Ithamar, and Zadok of that of Eleazar. The former had been very faithful to David during his troubles and flight in the time of Saul; and the other had been Prieſt in the tabernacle in the reign of the latter King. David therefore, by a peculiar appointment, of which there had never been any inſtance before, left both the Prieſts in poſſeſſion of their office. It is very probable, that there was no abſolute harmony between them, ſince one of them engaged himſelf to Adonijah, and the other to Solomon. Zadok was the moſt fortunate; for Solomon, when he was raiſed to the Throne, removed Abiathar from the Prieſthood, and confirmed Zadok in it.

[D] Benaiah the ſon of Jehoiada.] Benaiah was eminent for his valour (9). David had ſet him over the Cherithites and Pelethites (10), who are ſuppoſed to have been the ſoldiers of his guard. Solomon afterwards gave him the command of all his armies in the room of Joab (11). Theſe two Generals Joab and Benaiah conſider'd each other as rivals; and this probably hinder'd them from joining in the ſame party.

(9) 2 Sam. xxiii. 20.

(10) Ib. viii. 18. and xx. 23.

(11) 1 Kings ii. 35.

[E] The Prophet Nathan.] He had a great ſhare in David's eſteem. Several writers (12) imagine, that he had intruſted him with the care of his ſon Solomon; and that Solomon being raiſed to the Throne, gave him a very conſiderable authority over his houſe; ſo that he was commonly called, the King's father. This opinion of Nathan's having educated Solomon, is founded upon a paſſage in the 2d Book of Samuel quoted above (13), where the words in our Engliſh tranſlation, And he ſent by the hand of Nathan the Prophet, and called his name Jedidiah, that is, the Beloved of the Lord, are render'd by ſome interpreters, Miſit eum in manu Nathan Prophetæ, & vocavit eum Amabilis Domino. i. e. "David placed his ſon Solomon in the hands of "Nathan, who gave him the name of the Beloved "of the Lord;" or, as Peter Comeſtor reads it, Commiſit eum in manu Nathan. i. e. "He committed "him to Nathan's hands." But the Vulgate tranſlation, Miſit in manu Nathan, is more agreeable to the Hebrew original and the Septuagint, as well as to our Engliſh verſion. So that the opinion abovementioned has no manner of foundation.

(12) Lyran. Hugo Cardin. Petr. Comeſtor. Gebrar. l. 1. Chronol. Pineda de Reb. Salom. c. 19. Menoch. apud Calmet.

(13) Note [A].

[F] With the moſt conſiderable part of the army.] Our Engliſh tranſlation tells us, that Shimei and Rei, and the mighty men, which belonged to David, were not were not of his party. Adonijah having therefore made a feaſt for thoſe, who were in his intereſts, he invited all the King's ſons, except Solomon, and all the chief men of Judah, except Nathan, Zadok, and Benaiah. His deſign was to procure himſelf to be proclaimed King, and to take poſſeſſion of the government before David's death. But this attempt was attended with very ill ſucceſs. For Nathan being informed of what was tranſacting, went to Bathſheba Solomon's mother, and deſired her to expoſtulate with David upon his promiſe, that Solomon ſhould reign after him [G]; aſſuring her, that he himſelf would come in, and confirm what ſhe ſaid. This was immediately done, and David renewed his promiſe in favour of Solomon; and ordered Zadok, and Nathan, and Benaiah, to ſet him upon his own mule, and carry him to the fountain of Gihon; and that Zadok and Nathan ſhould anoint him King there, and then bring him back, and place him upon the throne in his father's ſtead [H]. Adonijah and his party were ſoon informed of this by Jonathan the ſon of Abiathar the Prieſt in the midſt of their banquet, they were ſtruck with prodigious terror at the news, and retired immediately. But Adonijah, who had the greateſt reaſon to apprehend the reſentments of Solomon, fled to the tabernacle and caught hold of the horns of the altar [I]. Solomon not with Adonijah (14). Some authors (15) imagine, that this Shimei was the ſame with Nebat the father of Jeroboam, who reigned over the ten Tribes. This Shimei, they ſay, was Solomon's Maſter or Tutor. But this is very uncertain. However it is plain he was a different perſon from that Shimei, who curſed David, when he was flying from Abſalom (16), and who was put to death by Solomon's order (17). The words, which our tranſlators render, the Mighty Men, which belonged to David, in the Vulgate are, Robur Exercitus David, i. e. "The "ſtrength of David's army." This perhaps means his guards, which were the Cherithites and Pelethites, who were his beſt troops, and probably the only forces, which he had in conſtant pay. But the armies which Joab was General of, conſiſted of all the people, who were capable of bearing arms. The number of them was very conſiderable; but they were not always kept together and formed into a regular and ſtanding body. The learned father Calmet has advanced ſome new conjectures upon theſe words, Shimei and Rei, and the mighty Men, which belonged to David. He obſerves that the Septuagint render them, Shimei and his friends, the mighty Men of David; and the Syriac and Arabic thus; Shimei and Daia, the Heroes or Giants of David. To which we may add Joſephus's repreſentation of this paſſage, who tells us (18), that Semei, the friend of David, and all the moſt valiant Men oppoſed Adonijah's deſigns; καὶ Σεμεΐς ὁ Δαυίδου φίλος, καὶ πᾶσης οἱ ἀνδρειότατοι. But Calmet is of opinion, that it ſhould be render'd thus: Neither the hearers, nor the ſeers, nor the mighty Men of David, were with Adonijah. The hearers and ſeers, ſays he, ſignify the public, as appears from the 20th verſe, where we are told, that the eyes of all Iſrael were upon David, &c. they ſignify thoſe, who knew the King's intention, and were informed of God's determination; or perhaps the Prophets and the ſons of the Prophets, both the Maſters and the Diſciples, whoſe authority was very great in that country.

[G] His promiſe that Solomon ſhould reign after him.] It may be asked when this promiſe was made by David to Bathſheba, ſince we find no clear account of it in Scripture? The greateſt part of interpreters (19) ſuppoſe, that David, after the death of the firſt ſon, whom he had by Bathſheba, in order to comfort her for the loſs of that child (20), promiſed her, that if God ſhould give him another ſon, he would make him his ſucceſſor. But the opinion of Grotius, Le Clerc and Calmet, is much more probable, who ſuppoſe, that this promiſe was made by God's appointment. He ſeems to have revealed to David, that he ſhould have a ſon, to whom he ſhould reſerve the honour of ſucceeding him in the kingdom, and of building the temple (21). David was fully perſuaded, that Solomon was he, in whom theſe promiſes were to be fulfilled, when the Prophet Nathan came, and gave him the name of the Beloved of the Lord. It was then very probably, that David declared to Bath-ſheba, that her ſon ſhould ſucceed him. Adonijah himſelf acknowledged, that it was from the Lord, that his brother ſhould enjoy the kingdom (22). David's choice of Solomon, and the promiſe which he made to Bath-ſheba, were not antecedent to Nathan's prophecy. They were only the effect of it. We find, that Bath-ſheba in her expoſtulation with David, repreſents the ill conſequences, which would follow, if he ſhould not declare in her ſon's favour; I and my ſon, ſays ſhe, ſhall be counted offenders, or ſinners, as it is render'd in the margin of our Engliſh tranſlation. Grotius (23) expounds it thus; We ſhall be put to death for having attempted to ſieze the kingdom: Rei mortis crimine regni affectati. Solomon having juſt pretenſions to the Crown, both from God's promiſes, and your own, Adonijah will not fail to ſeek ſome pretext or other in order to remove ſo dangerous a rival, and I myſelf ſhall inevitably be involved in his misfortune. The Hebrew may be likewiſe render'd thus, as it is by Vatablus and Eſtius; I and my ſon Solomon ſhall be diſappointed of our hopes. But Tirinus, and other interpreters mentioned by Vatablus, explain the paſſage to this purpoſe: I and my ſon ſhall be treated as criminals; I, as an adultereſs, and he, as the product of an unlawful marriage.

[H] Anoint him King there, and then bring him back, and place him upon the throne in his father's ſtead.] This anointing was performed with the ſacred oil, with which the High-Prieſt was anointed. But this ceremony was very ſeldom obſerved afterwards, when the kingdom became hereditary in the family of David. It was practiſed only, when there was ſome difficulty about the ſucceſſion. Solomon and Jehoaſh were anointed, becauſe they had competitors for the Crown. Apud Hebræos, Reges extra controverſiam regni hæredes ungi non ſolebant; ſed exortis controverſiis adhibita unctio ad majorem cautionem (24). It was abſolutely unlawful among the Perſians for a perſon to ſit upon the King's Throne, unleſs at his expreſs command, as we find from the learned Barn. Briſſonius (25); and therefore it was the uſual cuſtom to inaugurate their Kings by placing them upon the Throne of their predeceſſors. Plutarch tells us (26), that when Artabanus, who was choſen Arbitrator between the ſons of Darius, had adjudged the kingdom to Xerxes, Artamenes immediately took hold of his brother's right hand, and placed him upon the King's Throne; καὶ λαμβανόμενος τῆς δεξιᾶς εἰς τὸν θρόνον καθίζει τὸν βασίλειον.

[I] Caught hold of the horns of the Altar.] Some commentators (27) are of opinion, that he fled to Gibeon, where there was an altar for burnt-offerings; others, as Vatablus and Peter Martyr, that he only went to the brazen altar of the tabernacle, which was at Sion. The latter opinion ſeems moſt probable, becauſe Moſes's brazen altar had horns, which it is doubtful whether any other altars, that were built with ſtones, had; and this ſeems to have been the ſame with that altar, which Joab fled to (28). However that be, the law of Moſes did not ſuffer thoſe, who had been guilty of a wilful crime, to take ſanctuary at the altar. This privilege was reſtrained to thoſe, who had the misfortune to kill a perſon ignorantly and undeſignedly. Wilful murderers were immediately drag'd from the Altar, and put to death (29). We find that altars and temples were conſidered as Aſylums among almoſt all nations; as appears particularly from Virgil (30);

Talibus orabat dictis, Araſque tenebat.

(14) 1 Kings i. 8.
(15) Author. Tradit. Heb. in Libb. Reg. & Salom. apud Toſtat.
(16) 2 Sam. xvi. 5, 6.
(17) 1 Kings ii. 46.
(18) Antiq. Jud. l. 7. c. 14. § 4. p. 406. edit. Havercamp. in 1726.
(19) Author. Tradit. Hebr. in Reg. Toſtatus, Menochius, Tirinus, &c.
(20) 2 Sam. xii. 24.
(21) 1 Chron. xxii. 10. and xxviii. 5, 6. and 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13.
(22) 1 Kings ii. 15.
(23) In locum.
(24) Grotius in locum.
(25) De Regno Perſico, l. 1. p. 20.
(26) De Amore Fraterno.
(27) Menoch. Malv.
(28) 1 Kings ii. 28.
(29) Exod. xxi. 14.
(30) Æneid. 6.

lomon hearing of this, ſent and promiſed him impunity, if he ſhould behave himſelf well, otherwiſe he ſhould certainly be put to death. This promiſe removed his apprehenſions, and he went to Solomon to return him thanks in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner. But ſome time after, when David was dead, Adonijah deſired Bathſheba to intercede with her ſon King Solomon, that he might have Abiſhag the Shunamite, who had been employed in cheriſhing David in his old age for his wife [K]. Solomon was highly enraged at this demand, and anſwered his mother with a tone of ſeverity; And why doſt not thou aſk Abiſhag the Shunamite for Adonijah? Aſk for him the kingdom alſo (for he is mine elder brother) even for him, and for Abiathar the Prieſt, and for Joab the ſon of Zeruah. He ſwore then to put Adonijah to death that very day [L], which was executed

(31) Myſtel. Act. 5. Scen. 1.

And Plautus (31);

Ego interim hanc aram occupabo. Th. Quid ita?
Tr. Nullam rem ſapis.
Ne enim illi huc confugere poſſunt quæſtioni quos dabit.

That is: "In the mean time, ſays Tranio, I will take "poſſeſſion of this altar. Why ſo, replies Theuropides. "Tr. You know nothing. I do it leſt thoſe, "whom he ſhould put to the queſtion in order to "make a diſcovery ſhould take ſanctuary here." But the reader may have a full account of the ancient Aſylums in George Ritterhuſius's Book De Jure Aſylorum (32). The regard, that was paid to ſacred places, ſometimes prevented even the greateſt criminals from being forced away to puniſhment. But upon ſome occaſions, they took this method to oblige them to quit the altars, by making fires round them. For it was the general opinion, that an Aſylum was a privilege, which belonged only to the innocent. To this purpoſe Euripides:

(32) C. III.

Ἐγὼ γὰρ ὅστις μὴ δίκαιος ὢν ἀνὴρ
Βωμὸν προσίζει τὸν νόμον χαίρειν ἐᾶν,
Πρὸς τὴν δίκην ἄγοιμ' ἄν, οὐ τρέσας Θεούς·
Κακὸν γὰρ ἄνδρα χρὴ κακῶς πάσχειν ἀεί.

That is,

"I would not doubt to drag that man to juſtice,
"Who conſcious of his crime, avoids the law,
"And flies for refuge to the ſacred altars.
"For that baſe wretch, who dares commit an evil,
"Should always ſuffer evil in return."

[K] That he might have Abiſhag the Shunamite .. for his wife.] Adonijah told Bathſheba, that ſhe knew, that the kingdom was his, and that all Iſrael ſet their faces on him, that he ſhould reign (33); by which he intimated, that he had a right to the Crown as the eldeſt ſon of David; which right the people had acknowledged; and that he might have diſputed the kingdom with Solomon by the ſtrength of his own party; tho' he had quitted all ſuch deſigns, when he found that God had declared for Solomon. Some writers (34) imagine, that Joab had engaged this young Prince to ask for Abiſhag to be his wife, by the hopes of being raiſed to the Throne, and removing Solomon. His party was ſtill entire. Joab, and Abiathar, and the reſt, who had been attached to his intereſts, were ſtill ready and inclined to ſupport his pretenſions. Adonijah was the eldeſt ſon, he had a very advantageous perſon, and he was beloved by the People; and if he ſhould likewiſe marry Abiſhag, who had been wife to the late King, this muſt undoubtedly have contributed very much to the ſucceſs of ſuch a deſign. But we have no poſitive proof that this was his intention; love might have as much ſhare in this tranſaction as ambition. Grotius expreſly declares himſelf for the opinion abovementioned. He ſays, that Adonijah's motive for deſiring Abiſhag, was becauſe ſhe had been the King his father's wife. Now, it was contrary to the Jewiſh cuſtom, that thoſe, who had ſerved a deceaſed King, ſhould ſerve any perſon but his ſucceſſor; or that his wives or concubines ſhould marry any but a King. Adonijah therefore by deſiring Abiſhag, intimated that the kingdom was his right; and he tried Solomon by this method, that if he ſhould grant his requeſt out of youthful fear, he might then attempt ſomething of greater conſequence. And his reaſons for applying himſelf to Bath-ſheba were, becauſe women are generally ignorant of the arts of government, and at the ſame time grant their aſſiſtance in love-affairs: Multæ ſatis erant in Judæâ fœminæ, ſed hanc voluit quod Regis fuiſſet. Non ferebat autem mos Hebræorum, ut aut qui in miniſterio fuerant regio, ulterius ſe quam Regis ſucceſſoris miniſterio addicerent, aut quæ uxores aut concubinæ fuerant, privatò ſociarentur. Hanc ergo cupiens, jus ad ſe regni pertinere oſtendit, tentatque animum Solomonis, ut ſi metu juvenili hoc ei conceſſiſſet, auderet mox majora. Mulierem autem aggreditur ut regnandi ignaram, ita amoribus facilem.

(33) 1 Kings ii. 15.

(34) See Theodoret Qu. 7. Abul. qu. 20. Dionyſ. Carthuſ. Hugo Cardinal. Sanct. hic ad v. 17. apud Calmet in locum.

[L] He ſwore then to put Adonijah to death that very day.] This action of Solomon has been excepted againſt by ſome very conſiderable writers, who accuſe him of too cruel and precipitate a judgment againſt his brother. Was Adonijah, ſay they, convicted of treaſon by making ſuch a requeſt? Should not the ordinary rules of juſtice have been obſerved in his caſe? Was it proved ſufficiently, that he deſired Abiſhag, with a deſign to revolt and ſeize the kingdom? And could not Solomon have eaſily ſecured himſelf from his attempts, without putting his brother to death? Such an haſty puniſhment of him ſeems to ſhew ſomething of revenge in Solomon, who may be ſuppoſed to have made uſe of this opportunity to puniſh Adonijah's former deſign upon the kingdom, which he had ſome colour for, being the eldeſt ſon of David. "I can "eaſily allow, ſays Mr. Le Clerc, Solomon's con-"duct to be defended; but he would have deſerved "greater commendation, if he had acted with more "lenity to his brother, tho' he was guilty, and if "he had ſpared his life." Tam ſubitum ſupplicium de fratre ſumptum videri potuit ultio, captatâ occaſione quæſita; ob regnum affectatum, nec id ſine ſpecie juris, quia Adonija maximus erat natu filiorum Davidis. Facilè patior Salomonis famam defendi, ſed magis laudari potuit, ſi mitior erga fratrem delinquentem fuiſſet, vitæque ejus peperciſſet. On the other hand, Theodoret (35), Procopius, and the greateſt part of the commentators juſtify Solomon's conduct in this point. A Prince, ſay they, cannot always follow in his ſentences the rules of the moſt perfect morality; policy and the good of the State very often oblige him to do things oppoſite to the precepts of the Goſpel. It was evident that Adonijah had a deſign upon the kingdom. He had before attempted to ſeize it, contrary to David's will, and in prejudice of Solomon, to whom he knew it was promiſed. His asking for Abiſhag ſeem'd to ariſe from the ſame views and intentions; and tho' perhaps in reality he had no ſuch deſigns, and did not ſee the conſequences of his requeſt, yet Solomon was not obliged to inform himſelf of that, or to interpret it in his brother's favour. It was ſufficient, that the action itſelf was criminal, and of dangerous conſequence to the ſtate. We never judge criminals by their intentions, but by their actions. Beſides upon ſuch a critical occaſion as this, all delays were dangerous, for there are ſome crimes, which require immediate puniſhment, without any formal deliberation. But whether any political reaſons will juſtify ſuch a rigour, as is oppoſite to the precepts of the Goſpel; and whether Kings can be exempted from the rules of the moſt perfect morality, upon any conſiderations of intereſt, let the impartial reader judge. Morality is of a fixed and invariable nature; it is of the ſame obligation to the Prince, as to the loweſt of his ſubjects; and cruelty or ambition in the former are ſo much the more criminal, as the conſequences of them are more extenſive, than in perſons of an inferior ſtation.

(35) Qu. 7.

executed by Benaiah the ſon of Jehoiada [M]. This happened, according to Uſher, in the year of the world 2990, before Chriſt 1010, and before the Vulgar Æra 1024.

[M] Which was executed by the hand of Benaiah, the ſon of Jehoiada.] It was uſual among the ancients for Kings to employ thoſe of their Officers or Courtiers, whom they moſt confided in, in ſuch executions. Thus Romulus ordered his brother Remus to be ſlain by Fabius Celer the Centurion. Among the Romans the ſoldiers uſed to torture and execute criminals. Tertullian makes uſe of this argument to diſſuade the Chriſtians from going to war, leſt they ſhould be obliged to undergo ſuch ſervices (36). The ſame cuſtom was likewiſe in uſe among the Perſians. Thus Arioch Prince or Chief of Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon's army, was ſent to put to death the wiſe-men of Babylon, who could not explain the King's dream (37).

(36) De Coronâ Militis c. 11.

(37) Dan. ii. 24.

ADONIS, the darling of the goddeſs Venus, was ſon to Cinyras King of Cyprus [A]. The Poets tell us, that Myrrha (a) daughter of this Monarch (b), grew ſo diſtractedly fond of her father, that ſhe got herſelf conveyed privately into his bed, without his knowing who ſhe was. According to ſome writers, ſhe uſed the artifice which the daughters of Lot employed (c). Adonis ſprung from this inceſtuous commerce. He was exquiſitely beautiful, and appeared ſo lovely in the eyes of Venus, that ſhe carried him off [B], and abandoned every thing for the ſake of his company. Heaven itſelf was to her undelightful, when compared to the woods and mountains where ſhe uſed to follow Adonis, who was prodigiouſly fond of hunting [C]. The reader may judge, whether the Poets have not exerted all the figures of their art (d), to repreſent the inexpreſſible grief which ſeized the heart of that Goddeſs, when a wild boar

(a) See the article MYRRHA.

(b) Ovid. Metam. lib. x. verſ. 337.

(c) Hygini, cap. 164.

(d) Ovid. Metam. lib. x. Bion, Εἰδύλλ. α. See alſo Theocritus, Εἰδύλλ. λά: and among the moderns Menage in his Greek Poems, p. 167.

[A] Son to Cinyras, King of Cyprus.] It is agreed by moſt authors, that Cinyras was Monarch of this iſland (1); tho' a few affirm, that he had reigned firſt in Aſſyria (2). See the article BYBLOS. According to Ovid, he was born in the iſland of Cyprus; but this Poet tells us, that Myrrha, after having fled from her father who attempted to kill her, when he knew their inceſtuous commerce, croſſed Arabia, and was delivered of Adonis, in the country of the Sabæans (3). He would have done well, had he mentioned tranſiently, that Cinyras went from the iſland of Cyprus to Arabia, or that Myrrha had embark'd in that iſland: For Adonis's Mother had been metamorphoſed into the tree whence myrrh diſtills, before he was brought into the world. We learn from Ptolomy ſon of Ephæſtion, that Venus ſeeking Adonis after news was brought her of his death, found him in Argos, a city of Cyprus, in the temple of Apollo Erythius. Some authors therefore believed, that he was killed in that iſland. Among theſe is Propertius, who, in the 13th Elegy of his ſecond book, has theſe lines:

(1) See Meurſius de Inſula Cypro, lib. II. cap. 9.

(2) Apollodor. lib. III. p. 238.

(3) Ovid. Metam. lib. x. ver. 480, and 513.

Teſtis, qui niveum quondam percuſſit Adonim
Venantem Idalio vertice, durus aper.

Engliſh'd,

" Witneſs, the cruel boar who ſlew Adonis,
" (Bright charmer!) hunting on th' Idalian
" mountain.

In Amathus, a city of Cyprus, ſtood a temple ſacred to Venus and Adonis (4). Strabo informs us that Byblos was the reſidence of King Cinyras, and that there were ſome temples of Adonis in that city (5). Obſerve that Antonius Liberalis relates, that Myrrha whom he calls Smyrna, was born on mount Libanus, and that her father's name was Theias (6). *[To Antoninus Liberalis we may add the teſtimony of Oppian, who ſays Hal. III. 402. Δάκρυον Ἀσυρίης ΘΕΙΑΝΤΙΔΟΣ... μίξε δὲ κύρης. Crit. Rem. by the author of Miſcell. Obſervat.] Panyaſis had call'd him by that name, and not Thoas, as we now read in Apollodorus (7). We alſo find this name in Probus on the 10th Eclogue of Virgil, with this circumſtance, that Thoas was King of Syria and Arabia. Probus borrowed this from Antimachus.

(4) Pauſan. in Boeticis.

(5) Strabo. lib. 16. p. 520.

(6) Antonin. Liberalis, cap. 34.

(7) Vide Munckeri Notas in Hygin. cap. 58.

[B] Venus carried him off.] The ancient writers take very little notice of this incident, which I wonder at, ſince it was ſo univerſally known. Painters took this for the ſubject of their pictures no leſs than the rape of Ganymede, as Plautus informs us,

ME. Dic mihi; nunquà vidiſti tabulam pictam in pariete,
Ubi aquila catamitum raperet, aut ubi Venus Adoneum?
PE. Sæpe (8).

(8) Plaut. in Menæchmis, Act. I. Scen. II. ver. 34.

Engliſh'd,

" ME. Tell me; did you never ſee the picture
" on the wall, repreſenting the eagle carry" ing off the Catamite; or Venus carrying " off Adonis?
" PE. Often.

[C] Heaven was to her undelightful, when compared to the woods and mountains, where ſhe uſed to follow Adonis, who was prodigiouſly fond of hunting.] This appears from the following page in Ovid;

Abſtinet & cælo; cælo præfertur Adonis:
Hunc tenet: huic comes eſt: aſſuetaque ſemper in umbrâ
Indulgere ſibi, formamque augere colendo,
Per juga, per ſylvas, dumoſaque ſaxa vagatur (9).

(9) Ovid. Metam. lib. x. ver. 532.

That is,

" Ev'n heav'n it ſelf with all its ſweets unſought,
" Adonis far a ſweeter heav'n is thought.
" On him ſhe hangs, and fonds with every art,
" And never, never knows from him to part,
" She, whoſe ſoft limbs had only been diſplay'd
" On roſie beds beneath the myrtle ſhade,
" Whoſe pleaſing care was to improve each grace,
" And add more charms to an unrivall'd face,
" Now, buskin'd like the virgin huntreſs, goes
" Thro' woods, and pathleſs wilds and mountain
" ſnows. Euſden.

Adonis is not repreſented under the image of a hunter by Virgil,

Nec te pæniteat pecoris, divine Poëta,
Et formoſus oves ad flumina pavit Adonis (10).

(10) Virgil. Eclog. x. verſ. 18.

That is,

" The ſheep ſurround their ſhepherd as he lies:
" Bluſh not, ſweet Poet, nor the name deſpiſe;
" Along the ſtreams his flock Adonis fed,
" And yet the Queen of beauty bleſt his bed.
Dryden.

Few authors, I believe, have mentioned this minion of Venus as a ſhepherd. Servius gives us certain particulars on this head, which differ as widely from vulgar tradition, as what we laſt took notice of. Some writers tell us, that the Muſes were the occaſion of his taking delight in the chace (11). The tuneful ſiſters were exaſperated againſt Venus, for having inſpired ſome of them with a love for mortals; and therefore out of revenge, they ſang certain airs to Adonis, which fired him with a ſtrong paſſion for hunting. Poſſibly this might make Diana hate him, for two of a trade ſeldom agree. According to ſome writers, the anger of Diana was the cauſe why this youth was killed by a wild boar (12).

(11) Tzetzes in Lycophron.

(12) Apollod. lib. 3. p. 238.

boar had killed her dear Adonis [D]. No grief was ever more celebrated, or more immortalized than this, and moſt nations in the world perpetuated the memory of it, by a mighty train of anniverſary ceremonies [E]. According to ſome authors, Adonis was not killed by a wild boar, but by a God who aſſumed the form of that beaſt. Some tell us, that this God was Mars (e), and others, that it was Apollo (f). Mars, ſay the former, gave the deadly wound, to ſatiate his jealouſy, and from a ſpirit of revenge,

(e) Servius in Eclog. x. Firm. Matern. p. 22. Nonnus Dionyſ. lib. 41. Cyrillus in Eſaiam.

(f) Ptolem. Hephæſt. apud Photium, p. 472.

[D] That a wild boar had killed her much-loved Adonis.] Theocritus feigns, that Venus having ordered this wild boar to be brought before her, took him ſeverely to task; but the beaſt made his apology, by ſaying that the unhappy accident aroſe from the violent paſſion he was fired with, at the ſight of ſo beautiful a thigh, which he intended to kiſs only, but happened to imprint it too eagerly: However, he was ſo ſorry for what he had done, that he himſelf thought that his tuſhes ought to be cut off, and that he himſelf burnt them (13). Such is the explication which a learned and polite writer (14) has given of the laſt verſe of this Idyllium of Theocritus. It is in the ſeveral editions, ἴκαυε τὸς ἵμερτας, exuſſit amores; but he thinks we ought to read ὀδόντας, dentes, (his teeth or tuſhes) inſtead of ἵμερτας, (his love.) This dreadful kiſs brings to my remembrance a flight of Il Cavalier Marino, who introduces the God Pan, boaſting, that the ſpots which we ſee in the moon, are the impreſſion of the kiſſes he gave that Planet. Pan muſt have gone very furiouſly about it. A ſtrange hugging this! and had it been ever ſo little ſtronger, it would have reſembled that of the monkies, who, we are told, hug their young ones to death. How would Horace have treated this ſubject, ſince he writes as follows on a much ſlighter occaſion?

(13) Theocr. Εἰδύλλ. xxxi, or xxx, according to other editions.

(14) Mr. Longepierre, ſee his tranſlation of Bion, pag. 47. Paris edition, in 1686. 12o.

Sive puer furens
Impreſſit memorem dente labris notam.
Non ſi me ſatis audias,
Speres perpetuum dulcia barbare
Lædentem oſcula, quæ Venus
Quinta parte ſui Nectaris imbuit (15).

(15) Horat. Ode XIII. lib. I.

That is,

" When on thoſe paſſive lips the marks I find
" Of frantick, boiling kiſſes left behind;
" I rave to think theſe cruel tokens ſhew
" Things I cannot miſtake, and wou'd not know,
" How fond's the hope, how fooliſh and how vain,
" Of laſting love from the ungrateful ſwain!
" Who that ſoft lip ſo roughly can invade;
" Hurting, with cruel joy the tender maid.
" Quickly they're glutted who ſo fierce devour;
" They ſuck the nectar, and throw by the flower.

Mr. Glanvill. In The Odes and Satyrs of Horace; by the moſt eminent hands. London, printed for J. Tonſon, 1715.

We may, poſſibly, ſpeak of theſe kind of bites, in the article FLORA.

I am to acquaint the reader, that a very good critic tells us that there is no occaſion to correct ὀδόντας for ἵμερτας. The true explication of this verſe, ſays he, is, that the wild boar τῷ πυρὶ προσιλθὼν, (throwing himſelf into the fire,) ἴκαυε τὸς ἵμερτας, (burnt his love at the ſame time.) It is not only rational, but witty, to obſerve that this wild boar, after having been burnt with love, had afterwards found the ſecret to burn it. Polytian has made a happy uſe of this thought, in his epigram on. Picus Mirandola, committing his amorous verſes to the flames. To which we ſhall add, that we cannot eaſily conceive how it was poſſible for the wild boar to burn his tuſks, without burning himſelf at the ſame time.

(16) Venus, in the 31ſt Idyllium of Theocritus calls him her husband. Σύ μιν τὸν ἄνδρ' ἔτυψας; Haſt thou ſtruck my husband? Bion, in the Idyllium on the death of Adonis, repreſents Venus, βοώσα πόσιν, calling her husband: and Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 23. ſpeaks of a Syrian Venus married to Adonis. See Idyllium 15 of Theocritus; and Firm. Matern. de Error. prof. Relig. p. 21.

(17) Amm. Marcel. lib. 19. c. 1.

[E] A mighty train of anniverſary ceremonies.] Ariſtophanes in his Comedy of Peace, deſcribes Adonis's feſtival, as one of the principal among the Athenians. It was ſolemnized by moſt of the Greek Nations, and the women were the chief perſons of this Drama, they bewailing the death of this gallant, or husband (16) of Venus. Fœminæ miſerabili planctu in primævo flore ſucciſam ſpem gentis ſolitis fletibus conclamabant, ut lacrymare cultrices Veneris ſæpe ſpectantur in ſolemnibus Adonidis ſacris (17). i. e. " The women with dreadful wailings, " called upon the hopes of the Nation cut off in " the flower of his age; in like manner as the " worſhippers of Venus are often ſeen to do upon the " ſolemn feſtivals of Adonis." They uſed to exhibit funerals in painting, as Plutarch relates in the Lives of Alcibiades and Nicias: The Curtizans celebrated this mighty feſtival with as much zeal as the reſt of the people; as may be gathered from a paſſage of the Poet Diphilus, quoted by Athenæus (18). Two beds were always ſet on this occaſion, in one of which the image of Venus, and in the other that of Adonis, were laid, as we are informed by Theocritus (19). The free thinkers uſed to laugh at a religious worſhip, which conſiſted of nothing but crying; Quid abſurdius quam ... homines jam morte deletos reponere in Deos, quorum omnis cultus eſſet futurus in luctu (20). That is, " What can be more abſurd, than to deify " deceaſed perſons; and to conſtitute their worſhip " only of tears." St. Auſtin approves this raillery: Sacra ſunt Veneris, ſays he (21), ubi amatus ejus Adonis aprino dente extinctus juvenis formoſiſſimus plangitur. i. e. " In ſome of the rites of Venus, her " beloved Adonis, a moſt beautiful youth who was " killed by a boar's tuſk, is bewailed." The Syrians acted ſtill more fooliſhly than the Greeks on this occaſion; for theſe, not contented with groaning and weeping, uſed to ſcourge themſelves; and after having done this, and wept their fill, they ſolemnized the ſacrifice of the dead in honour of Adonis, and ſhaved their heads. Such women as would not be ſhaved, were obliged to proſtitute themſelves a whole day to ſtrangers, and the monies ariſing from this commerce, was laid out in a ſacrifice that was offer'd up to Venus; but the mourning concluded with joy, it being pretended that Adonis was reſtored to life. Lucian, from whom we have extracted theſe particulars, relates farther, that the Syrians declared, that Adonis had been killed by a wild boar in their country (22). See the remark [I], where we ſhall obſerve, among other particulars, that this feſtival was ſolemnized, ſo late as St. Cyril's time in Alexandria. The proceſſion muſt have been pompous, ſince the Queen herſelf uſed to carry the image of Adonis on that occaſion; for which Arſinoe, conſort to Ptolomy Philadelphus, is applauded by Theocritus (23). The women who accompanied the Queen, carried fruits, flowers, and a great variety of other things; all which, we are told, and even Adonis's image, were thrown into the ſea, or into fountains. See Heſychius, Zenobius, Suidas, and the Scholiaſt on Theocritus cited by Faſoldus, page 75 and 76 of his Hierologia of the ancient Greeks. The gardens of Adonis have been mentioned in a proverbial ſenſe, to ſignify a tranſient thing, a thing that is but of a ſhort duration. It is manifeſtly in this ſenſe, that Plato, Plutarch and the Emperor Julian, employed this proverb, the hint of which was borrowed from the pots and baskets of flowers, which were carried in proceſſion on Adonis's feſtival. See Eraſmus's Adagia, page 23. By the way, it is probable that this feſtival was celebrated as many years in Antioch as in Alexandria. Julian the apoſtate made his entry into the former city, anno 362, during the ſolemnization of Adonis's feſtival, which was look'd upon as an evil omen. Evenerat autem iiſdem diebus, annuo curſu completo, Adonia ritu veteri celebrari, amato Veneris, ut fabulæ fingunt, apri dente ferali deleto, quòd in adulto flore ſectarum eſt indicium frugum. Et viſum eſt triſte, quòd amplum urbem Principumque domicilium introëunte Imperatore nunc primum ululabiles undique planctus & lugubres ſonus audiebantur (24). i. e. " It happened at the " time of the celebration of the ancient anniverſary " rites of Adonis Venus's darling, who, as the fables " relate, was killed by the teeth of a wild boar. And " it ſeemed an ill omen, that upon the Emperor's " entry into a large city, the reſidence of Princes, " the firſt thing heard ſhould be howlings, lamenta- " tions and mournful cries on all ſides." An incident of this kind appeared of evil augury to the Athenians on two occaſions (25).

(18) Athen. lib. 7. p. 292.

(19) Theocrit. Eidyll. 15.

(20) Cicero de Natura Deor. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(21) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. lib. 6. cap. 7. See alſo Firm. Matern. de Errore profan. Relig. pag. 21.

(22) Lucianus de Dea Syria.

(23) Theocrit. Eidyll. 15. See the Summary of this Idyllium.

(24) Amm. Marcell. lib. 22. cap. 9.

(25) Plutarch. in Alcib. p. 200. in Nicia, p. 532.

venge, becauſe Venus had preferred this rival to him. Apollo, ſay the latter, was hurried to this exceſs of violence, to revenge his ſon Erymanthus, who had been ſtruck blind, for having ſeen Venus bathing, the inſtant after ſhe was come from the arms of her Adonis (g). The part where the wound was given would make one imagine that there was ſomething of jealouſy in the caſe (b); but the ſecond tradition does not quadrate with thoſe writers who relate, that Adonis was an hermaphrodite, who, in his male character enjoyed Venus, and in that of a female, was embraced by Apollo (i). Others relate, that though he was but of one ſex, he yet was the favourite both of Venus and Bacchus [F]. One of the Scholiaſts aſſures, that Adonis was dear to Jupiter (k), and that Proſerpine fell in love with him in hell [G]. The latter had yet ſome compaſſion for her diſconſolate rival, who earneſtly imploring that her lover might be reſtored to life (l), Proſerpine conſented that Venus ſhould poſſeſs him ſix months, and it was agreed, that Adonis ſhould ſpend ſo many months with this Goddeſs, and the ſame number with Proſerpine. The Scholiaſt abovecited tells us ſome contradictory particulars on this head [H]; and there are writers who don't ſpeak ſo advantageouſly of Proſerpine's complaiſance [m]. This diviſion of the year is allegoriz'd, as though we were thereby to underſtand, either the time that the ſeeds are ſucceſſively under and above the ground (n); or the time which the ſun employs in his courſe through the northern and ſouthern ſigns of the Zodiac (o). Methinks there is leſs

(g) Διότι ἰδοῦσα λουομένην Ἀφροδίτην, ἀπὸ τῆς Ἀδώνιδος μίξεως. i. e. "Becauſe he "had ſeen Venus bathing "herſelf, after "her amorous "dalliance with "Adonis. ibid.

(b) Trux aper inſequitur, totoſque ſub inguine dentes Abdidit. Ovid. Metam. lib. x. ver. 715. "And now too "late to fly the "boar he ſtrove, "Who in his "groin his tuſks "impetuous "drove. Euſd.

(i) Ptolem. Hephæſt. apud Photium, p. 485.

(k) Scholiaſt. Theocriti in Syracuſ. ſive Eidyll. 15.

(l) Vide Seldenum de Diis Syris, lib. 2. c. 11. p. 259. and the remark [I].

(m) See the remark [G].

(n) Scholiaſt. Theocrit. Eidyll. 15.

(o) Macrobius Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 21.

[F] Favourite both of Venus and Bacchus.] Athenæus does not omit, in that part where he gives ſome examples of enigmatical expreſſions (26), the oracle that was pronounced to Cinyras, which is as follows:

(26) Athen. lib. x. c. 22. p. 456.

Ὦ Κινύρα βασιλεῦ Κυπρίων ἀνδρῶν δυσπρόσλων
Παῖς σοι καλλίσσος μὲν ἔφυ θαυμασότατός τε
Πάντων ἀνθρώπων, δύο δ' αὐτὸν δαίμονε ἔχητον
Ἡ μὲν ἐλαυνομένην λαθρίοις ἑρετμοῖς, ὁ δ' ἐλαύνων.

English'd,

" O Cinyras, King of Cyprus, whoſe poſteriors
" Are rough with hair, to thee a ſon is born
" Whoſe beauty far exceeds the reſt of mortals.
" He, by two Deities, ſhall be poſſeſt.
" One he ſhall preſs in lonely, ſecret paths;
" And he by th' other Deity be preſt.

Athenæus tells us, that Venus and Bacchus were ſignified by theſe, Adonis being dear to both. This oracle had been quoted by Plato the comic writer (27), who is not the only Poet that has taken notice of theſe amours of Bacchus; for we find by two verſes in Plutarch, that Bacchus happening to ſee the beautiful Adonis in the iſland of Cyprus, fell in love with him, and carried him off (28). What Plutarch adds is curious; and may, upon occaſion, ſerve as a leſſon to thoſe, who give us ſo many Eaſtern genealogies of the religion and mythology of the Heathens. One of the interlocutors in Plutarch aſſerts with great ſeriouſneſs and gravity, that Bacchus and Adonis are the ſame Deity; and that the Jews abſtained from eating ſwine's fleſh, becauſe Adonis had been killed by a wild boar. Now he pretends, that their religion, their feſtivals and ceremonies, differed very little from thoſe with which Bacchus was honoured in Greece; and even tells us, that their Levites were ſo called, from Λύσιος or Εὐιος, Lyſius, Evius, two names of that Divinity. Auſonius aſſures, that Bacchus, Oſyris, Adonis &c. were one and the ſame God (29); but Macrobius goes ſtill farther (30).

(27) In Adonide, apud Athen. lib. 10. cap. 22. pag. 456.

(28) Plut. Sympoſ. lib. 4. cap. 5.

(29) Auſon. Epigramm. 30.

(30) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 1. cap. 18 and 21.

[G] Proſerpine fell in love with him in hell.] If Apollodorus may be credited (31), her heart was fired before this, and even when he was in his cradle; Venus being ſmit with the beauty of the babe, laid him in a trunk, and ſhewed him only to Proſerpine. This Goddeſs proteſted that ſhe would have the keeping of him, upon which they carried their diſpute ſo far, that Jupiter was obliged to decide it, which he did in the following manner, viz. that Adonis ſhould have the firſt four months in the year to himſelf; that he ſhould ſpend the ſucceeding four with Proſerpine, and the four laſt with Venus. Adonis's diviſion ſhould rather have been between the other two; and, perhaps, it was ſo expreſſed, before the epitomizers and copiſts of Apollodorus, put his Bibliotheca into the condition we now ſee it. But however this be, Adonis would not accept of the vacation which Jupiter granted him, Venus charming him to ſuch a degree, that he devoted his own months to her ſervice. Other authors (32) relate firſt, that Jupiter having commanded the Muſe Calliope to decide the diſpute, ſhe decreed, that Venus ſhould enjoy Adonis ſix months, and Proſerpine poſſeſs him as many. Secondly, that Venus, enraged that ſhe was allowed but half of what ſhe would have engroſs'd wholly to herſelf, inſpired all the Thracian women with ſo violent a paſſion for Orpheus, the ſon of Calliope, that each ſtriving to get him from the reſt, they at laſt tore him to pieces. Among the complaints which Venus makes of her ſon in Lucian's Dialogues, this is one; that he ſometimes ſends her a rambling over mount Ida after Anchiſes, and at other times over mount Libanus after the beautiful Aſſyrian, half of whom he had robbed her of, by ſo induſtriouſly inſpiring Proſerpine with a paſſion for her dear Idol (33). Arnobius (34) and Clemens Alexandrinus (35) mention the paſſion which the laſt named Goddeſs had for Adonis; and Sylburgius had no reaſon to read Ἀιδωνῆ for Ἀιδώνδι in Clemens Alexandrinus; for if we read Ἀιδωνῆ, this Greek Father would be made to aſſert a falſhood, viz. that Proſerpine had an adulterous paſſion for Pluto. We owe this laſt remark to Meziriac, for which, ſee page 403 of his Commentary on Ovid's Epiſtles. The judgment of Calliope puts me in mind of theſe two verſes,

(32) Hygin. Aſtronom. lib. 2. cap. 7.

(33) Lucian. Dial. Veneris & Lunæ.

(34) Arnob. lib. 4. p. 145.

(35) Clem. Alex. in Protrep. p. 21.

Et vitula tu dignus, & hic, & quiſquis amores,
Aut metuet dulces, aut experietur amaros (56).
That is,

(36) Virg. Ecl. III. ver. 99.

" So nice a difference in your ſinging lies,
" That both have won, or both deſerve the prize.
" Reſt equal happy both, and all who prove " The bitter ſweets and pleaſing pains of love.
Dryden.

[H] Tells us ſome contradictory particulars on this head.] Firſt, with very little probability, that Adonis paſſed ſix months with Proſerpine, and as many with Venus, without touching them, they lying in ſeparate beds; Ἄνευ τοῦ συγκαθεύδειν καὶ προσμίζεσθαι (37): and ſecondly, that he ſpent ſix months in the arms of Proſerpine, and as many in thoſe of Venus. Ἐξ μῆνας ἱποίησεν ἐν ταῖς ἀγκάλαις τῆς Ἀφροδίτης ὥσπερ καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἀγκάλαις τῆς Περσεφόνης (38). We are to obſerve, that ſomething like this was ſaid of the agreement between Ceres and Pluto, viz. that Proſerpine ſhould live ſix months with this God, and ſpend the remaining part of the year with Ceres. The ancients had not variety of invention enough, ſince they applied the unravelling of their fables to ſo many ſubjects. Beſides, Egypt, Phœnicia, and the iſland of Cyprus, in which places Adonis is ſaid to have lived, are not far enough diſtant from the ſun, from the month of September to the month of March, for it to be ſaid, that Adonis is then in the grave, or in hell; and I don't know what Moreri means, by his ſix months, during which the days are ſo ſhort, and the nights ſo long: for in the countries abovementioned, the difference between the longeſt day in the year and the ſhorteſt is not conſiderable enough, to give room for ſuch an expreſſion. A great many other particulars in the Adonis of this author want correction.

(37) Scholiaſt. Theocriti, ad verſ. 21. Idyll. 5.

(38) Ibid.

leſs ſolidity in this allegorical interpretation, than in the notion of thoſe writers, who explain the fable of Adonis into the hiſtory of Oſiris (p). The Antients are not agreed upon the country, which was the ſcene of Adonis's gallantries; for ſome place it in Syria, others in the iſland of Cyprus, or in Egypt, as may be ſeen in the remarks. Two particulars of a very oppoſite nature have been related of Hercules with reſpect to Adonis: the firſt, that he had a paſſion for him; and that Venus, out of jealouſy, inſtructed the Centaur Neſſus, how to enſnare Hercules (q): the ſecond, that this Hero, ſeeing a great crowd of people coming out of a temple in a city of Macedonia, was for entring it, in order to pay his devotions there; but upon hearing that Adonis was the Deity worſhiped in it, he ridiculed him (r). A writer tells us, that Adonis ſprung from Jupiter, without the concurrent aſſiſtance of woman (s). St. Jerom is of opinion, that the Prophet Ezekiel mentions the feſtival of Adonis [I]. By the way, we cannot eaſily account, why the Ancients have feigned that Venus concealed, or even buried her minion under lettices [K], ſince they obſerve that this plant cauſes impotency. We, perhaps, ſhould comprehend their allegory, had they thereby underſtood, that Venus had quite exhauſted her gallant, and had ſo much worked him in the Still, that he was now become, as it were, a mere chymical terra damnata, a caput mortuum of the Chymiſts, but they don't hint at any ſuch explication. It is not univerſally allowed, that he died of his wound [L]. Near the city of Byblos was a river called ADONIS, which deſcended

(p) See Vol. III. of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, pag. 7. Berkelius in Stephanum Bizant. Voce Ἀμαθοῦς.

(q) Ptolem. Hephæſt. apud Photium, p. 473.

(r) Scholiaſt. Theocriti, ad ver. 21. Eidyll. V. Zenobius and Apoſtolius in Proverb.

(s) Val. Probus in Ecl. x. Virgil ex Philoſtephano.

[I] That the Prophet Ezekiel mentions the feſtival of Adonis.] St. Jerom is of opinion, that the Tammuz mentioned in theſe words of Ezekiel, Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the Lord's houſe, which was towards the North, and behold, there ſat women weeping for Tammuz (39), is Adonis. He has not forgot the double face under which the feſtival appeared; for, in the beginning of it, Adonis was bewailed as dead, and afterwards his praiſe was ſung by the women as reſtored to life: Plangitur à mulieribus quaſi mortuus, & poſtea reviviſcens canitur atque laudatur (40). We learn ſeveral particulars of this feſtival from St. Cyril, who relates, that it was ſtill ſolemnized in his time in Alexandria (41); and tells us, that by the following words, Woe to the land.... that ſendeth Embaſſadors by the ſea, even in veſſels of bulruſhes upon the waters (42), we are to underſtand, the letters which were ſent, to give notice of Adonis's being found again. They uſed, ſays he (43), to take an earthen veſſel; and afterwards writing a letter to the women of Byblos, as tho' Adonis had been really found again; they put it into this veſſel, and ſealing it, they committed it to the ſea, after employing ſome ceremonies. This veſſel, as they aſſured, went of itſelf to Byblos on certain days of the year, when ſome women there, who were dear to Venus, ceaſed their tears after having opened the letetr, as though Venus had found her Adonis. Lucian informs us, that he had ſeen in Byblos the paſteboard head, which the Egyptians uſed to ſend annually thither, with no other ceremony, than barely throwing it into the ſea; when the winds uſed to waft it directly to Byblos in ſeven days, which was the time uſually employed in ſailing from Egypt to that city. Procopius Gazæus relates theſe particulars in the ſame manner as St. Cyril (44). According to the latter, the Greeks believed that Venus was gone to hell, in order to recover Adonis from thence; and as they declared that at her return, it was well known ſhe had found him (45); it was but natural, that as the feſtival opened with ſorrow and mourning, it ſhould conclude in a very joyful manner.

(39) Ezekiel viii. 14.

(40) Hieron. lib. 3. Comment. in Ezekiel.

(41) Cyrill. in Eſaiam, lib. 2.

(42) Iſaiah xviii. ver. 1, 2.

(43) Cyrill. in Eſaiam, lib. 2. I made uſe on this occaſion of Mr. Longepierre's French verſion, who has this paſſage in his notes on Bion, p. 45.

(44) Procop. Gaz. Comment. in Eſai. cap. 18.

(45) Ἀνελθόσης δὲ ἐξ Ἅιδου καὶ μὴν καὶ ἠυρῆσθαι λεγόντας τὸν ζητούμενον συνήδεσθαι καὶ ἀνασκιρτᾶν. Cyrill. in Eſaiam, lib. 2.

(46) Apud Athenæum, lib. 2. cap. 28. p. 69.

(47) Ibid.

[K] Under lettices.] It is Callimachus who informs us that Venus hid Adonis under lettices (46). According to Cratinus, ſhe concealed Phaon, whom ſhe paſſionately loved, after the ſame manner. What was Athenæus thinking of, when he declared, that the Poets ſignify by ſuch an allegory, that lettices reduce thoſe to a kind of impotency, who eat frequently of them? Had they this property, would Venus have made theſe a coverlet for her minions? Would ſhe not have abhorred their very name and ſight; and feared leſt their bare touch ſhould be noxious? We are to obſerve a circumſtance in which Callimachus and Eubulus differ; the latter declaring, that Venus buried the corps of her Adonis under lettices, whence he infers, that this plant is of uſe only to the dead (47). Poſſibly, the circumſtance which gave riſe to all theſe fictions, was, its having been ſaid that Adonis, after having eat very heartily of a certain lettice which grew in the iſland of Cyprus, was killed by a wild boar. They who conſider the part where this beaſt gave the wound, will eaſily ſee thro' the myſtery of all this: Adonis rendred himſelf impotent, by feeding too heartily on theſe lettices; whence it was feigned, that after this he was wounded mortally in the groin. We muſt not, therefore, prefer the word καταφυγὼν to καταφαγὼν (48); and it is much more natural to ſuppoſe, that Nicander ſpeaks of this lettice as a food uſed by Adonis, than to believe it ſpoke as an aſylum which Adonis ſought, to ſecure himſelf from the fury of the wild boar.

(48) In the paſſage of Nicander, quoted by Athenæus, ibid.

I am to acquaint my readers, that Mr. de la Monnoie is of a different opinion, as appears from the following remark he was pleaſed to favour me with. "The καταφυγὼν of the manuſcripts, is much preferable to the καταφαγὼν of the printed copies. Nicander, in the paſſage cited by Athenæus, ſpeaks of a kind of lettice, under which, he tells us, Adonis had ſhelter'd himſelf, when the wild boar killed him. This is very good ſenſe, whereas it would hardly be ſo, to aſſert that Adonis had fed too heartily on this lettice when the wild boar killed him; ſince the expreſſion would be obſcure and unconnected, and a mere confuſed medley of allegory and fiction. Beſides, it muſt be obſerved, that θρίδαξ being of the feminine gender, it then ſhould be ἧς or ἣν καταφαγὼν, becauſe then οὗ is taken adverbially for quo." It is certain that Caſaubon preferred καταφυγὼν to καταφαγὼν (49); and confirmed his opinion by the following words which are found in the ſame page of Athenæus, ἐν καλαῖς θριδακίναις ἀποκρύψαι (50) (lay hid in beautiful lettices); but he ſhould have obſerved, that Athenæus ſpeaks thus, after giving us a long quotation from a Poet, who declared, that whoever eats of thoſe lettices, can never have any commerce with a woman (51). We are to take particular notice, that the words of this Poet follow immediately thoſe of Nicander. Now this ſhews that Athenæus did not write οὗ καταφυγὼν, but ἣν or ἧς καταφαγὼν. This proves it ſo much the more clearly, as we find that this author having cited Callimachus, who relates that Venus hid Adonis under lettices; obſerves that this is uſed by way of allegory to denote, that thoſe who eat often of this herb, become ſo many invalids in love-matters; Ἀλληγορεῖσθαι τῶν ποιητῶν ὅτι ἀσθενεῖς εἰσὶ πρὸς ἀφροδίσια οἱ συνεχῶς χρώμενοι θριδακῖ. We are not to regard the objection that is raiſed, viz. that Nicander in this caſe would have given us a confuſed jumble of allegory and fiction, ſince the Poets are full of them. We are farther to obſerve, that he did not underſtand the word he attempted to explain. Βρίνθιν λέγεσθαι φησὶ παρὰ Κυπρίοις θρίδακα (52). That is, "He ſays that the lettice is called "Brenthis by the Cyprians." He miſtook a fir-tree for a lettice (53). This error muſt have prompted him to change the tradition; for he found it would be ridiculous to ſuppoſe that Adonis ſhelter'd himſelf under a lettice, and therefore he ſays, that he fed upon it.

(49) Caſaubon. in Athen. lib. 2. cap. 27. p. 144.

(50) Caſaubon ſays καταχρίσαι. The ſenſe is the ſame.

(51) Amphis in Falemo.

(52) Athenæus, lib. 2. cap. 28. p. 69.

(53) See the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, tom. 3. p. 28.

[L] It is not univerſally allowed that he died of his wounds.] See the third volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle

ed from mount Libanus. The waters of this river grew red once a year, occaſioned by a great quantity of duſt of the colour of vermilion, which was carried thither by the winds. On this occaſion the general cry was, that this was the ſeaſon for bewailing Adonis; that he was then receiving wounds on Mount Libanus, and that his blood flowed in that river (t).

(t) Lucian. de Dea Syria.

(54) Pag. 31.
(55) Apud Photium, p. 472.

verſelle (54). To the remarks we there meet with, we may add a paſſage of Ptolomy Ephæſtion (55); the paſſage I mean where it is aſſerted, that the following verſe of Euphorion's Hyacinth,

Κωκυτὸς μοῦνος τὸν ἀφειλκέα νίψεν Ἄδωνιν,

" Cocytus only waſh'd the wound
" Of beautiful Adonis,

has not been underſtood. It ſignifies a very different thing from what it is ſuppoſed to imply; for it informs us, that one Cocytus, diſciple to Chiron, had healed the wound which Adonis had received from the wild boar. We may be perſuaded from the ceremonies of the feſtival, that Adonis did not die of it. The people mourned at the beginning of it, as tho' he were really dead; and afterwards rejoiced, as tho' he were reſtored to life. " We may ſuppoſe with " probability, that this fable took its riſe from ſome " ſtrong expreſſions of the Egyptians or Phœnicians, " who uſed to ſay of thoſe who were recovered from " a grievous fit of ſickneſs, or had eſcaped an immi- " nent danger, that they had been taken out of the " grave, of which we have ſeveral inſtances in " the Pſalms (56)." Add to this, " that it was " the cuſtom of the Eaſtern Nations, to conſecrate " golden figures, ſhaped like thoſe parts of the body, " in which they had been afflicted, whereof we " have an example in Samuel, book I. chap. vi. " ver. 4. Adonis having been wounded in the " groin, and recovered of his wound, conſecrated " a golden Phallus... which figure was highly ve- " nerated in the myſteries of Oſiris (57)" We here ſee the preceding remark confirmed; the clouds begin to diſappear, and day breaks in upon us. Venus imagined ſhe had loſt for ever, not the life, but the ſex of her husband, whether a wild boar had really injured that part, or ſome principle which we know nothing of, had thrown a mortification into it. Hinc illæ lacrymæ, i. e. " hence her tears." But the wound cloſing, or the ſpell being taken off, Venus was perſuaded, that her husband roſe from the dead, and came from the deepeſt hell; hence her joy; and therefore, in order to perpetuate the remembrance of this, in a more myſterious and at the ſame time more ſolemn manner; it was declared, that Adonis's feſtival ſhould be celebrated annually, in a certain manner. The explications of Macrobius might eaſily be made to ſquare with this hypotheſis; his Sun deſcending to the inferior parts of the Zodiac, and afterwards returning to the ſuperior parts of it; his wild boar; the image of cold, and conſequently of thoſe which belong to that head of the canon-law De frigidis & maleficiatis; his Venus, grievouſly afflicted becauſe ſhe is the relict of her darling Sun; and afterwards ſmiling or laughing at the return of that beautiful planet, which renders her fruitful. It is very plain, that it would be no difficult matter to apply to ſome uſe the agreement between Venus and Proſerpine; I mean thoſe ſeeds concentred in the boſom of the earth during ſome months, which afterwards iſſue from it to propagate the ſpecies.

(56) Biblioth. Univerſ. tom. 3. p. 31.

(57) Ibid. p. 33.

ADRASTUS King of Argos, ſon of Talaus and Lyſianaſſa (a) daughter of Polybius, King of Sicyon, acquired great fame in the celebrated war of Thebes, in which he engaged to ſupport the rights of Polynices his ſon-in-law [A], who had been excluded the Sovereignty of Thebes by Eteocles his brother (b), notwithſtanding their reciprocal agreement. Adraſtus, followed by Polynices and Tydeus his other ſon-in-law, by Capaneus and Hippomedon his ſiſter's ſons, by Amphiaraus his brother-in-law, and by Parthenopæus (c), marched againſt the city of Thebes; and this is the expedition of the ſeven Worthies, which the Poets have ſo often made the ſubject of their Muſe. They all loſt their lives in this war, Adraſtus excepted, who was ſaved by his horſe, called Arion. This was a horſe of mighty importance, as we ſhall ſhew in his place. This war was followed by ſome others; for Adraſtus being denied the bodies of ſuch Argives as had been killed before Thebes, applied for ſuccour to the Athenians (d), who, under Theſeus their leader, forced the new King of Thebes (e) to comply with Adraſtus's requeſt. However, the ſatisfaction that was thus made did not put an end to the war; for the ſons of thoſe warriors who had been ſo unſucceſsful in the firſt expedition, undertook a ſecond ten years after, called the war of the Epigones [B], which ended with the taking and plundering of Thebes. None of the Chiefs loſt their lives in it (f), Ægialeüs ſon of Adraſtus excepted, which was a kind of compenſation made by Fortune (g); but Adraſtus, being very much weakned by old age, was ſo ſenſibly afflicted with this loſs, that he died of grief [C] in Megara (h), as he was leading back

(a) Pauſan. lib. 2. p. 50.
(b) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 286.
(c) Hygin. cap. 70. Apollod. lib. 3. Diodor. Sicul. lib. 5. cap. 6.
(d) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 37.
(e) Eteocles and Polynices had killed each other.
(f) Hygin. cap. 71.
(g) See the remark [H].
(h) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 41.

[A] The rights of Polynices his ſon-in-law.] According to Pauſanias, Adraſtus had given his daughter in marriage to Polynices, before the diviſion broke out, with regard to the crown of Thebes (1); but others pretend, that this marriage was not ſolemnized till Polynices was come to Adraſtus's court, after his brother had excluded him the kingdom. Theſe tell us, that Tydeus fled thither for refuge at the ſame time, and that the latter was covered with the ſkin of a wild boar, and the former, with that of a lion; upon which account, Adraſtus gave them his daughters in marriage; he recollecting that an oracle (2) had commanded him to marry them to a wild boar and to a lion (3). A falſhood is inſerted in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary, where it is ſaid, that Tydeus being ask'd the reaſon why he wore a wild boar's skin, anſwered, it was becauſe Oeneus his father had killed the Calydonian wild boar. He did not make any ſuch anſwer, and it was Meleager, not Oeneus, who ſlew that furious wild boar. In the abovementioned ſupplement, the oracle which had been pronounced to Adraſtus, is not juſtly quoted.

(1) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 286.

(2) 'Tis in the Scholiaſt of Euripides ad Phæniſ. ver. 415. See alſo Statius, Theb. lib. 1. ver. 395.

(3) Hygin. cap. 79. Apollodorus lib. 3. ſays, in the ſhields of one of theſe the figure of a boar's head was repreſented.

[B] The war of the Epigones.] Had the compilers of the third volume of Moreri's Dictionary conſidered, that there was but an interval of ten years, between theſe two expeditions, they would not have tranſlated the word Epigones, Thoſe who were born after the ſiege of Thebes; but have contented themſelves with writing, Thoſe who ſurvived their fathers; or in general, The Deſcendants of the firſt Chiefs.

[C] That he died of grief.] According to Moreri's ſupplement, he threw himſelf upon his ſon's funeral pile, and for this purpoſe Hyginus fab. 242, and Herodotus, Book 5. are cited. Now it is to be obſerved, that this laſt author does not mention one of thoſe particulars concerning Adraſtus, which have been employed in this article of the ſupplement. The only circumſtance which one might ſuſpect was borrowed from Herodotus, is the following, which is in the beginning of that article. Adraſtus was forced to withdraw back the victorious army, who had taken the city of Thebes. This proves, that he was perſonally preſent at the ſecond expedition [D], though very few writers take notice of it. The citizens of Megara paid great honours to his memory, which, however, were not to compare to thoſe by which the Sicyonians ſolemnized it [E]; for the latter erected a Mauſoleum to him in the middle of the great ſquare of their city, and inſtituted feſtivals and ſacrifices in his honour, which they celebrated annually with great pomp. We may read in Herodotus, how Caliſthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, ſuppreſt all theſe things, out of hatred to the Argives (i). The reader is to know, that Adraſtus had inherited the crown of Sicyon (k), by virtue of the laſt will of Polybius his uncle, by the mother's ſide, to whom he once fled for refuge, after having been forced to leave Argos [F]; and that during his reign, the city of Sicyon (l) became very famous, by his inſtituting the Pythian Games in it (m). Some writers obſerve, that Sicyon was his hereditary kingdom, and that he obtained the kingdom of Argos by election; he being of ſo mild and gentle a nature, that the Argives had beſought him [G] to come and civilize their ſavage manners. Homer does not tell us all this, but only, that he firſt reigned in Sicyon (n), which Servius likewiſe aſſerts in his Commentary on the ſixth Æneid, and alſo Pindar (o) and his old Scholiaſt. 'Tis commonly ſaid he had but two daughters, viz. Orgia wife to Polynices, and Deiphyle wife of Tydeus (p); but he had alſo two ſons, Ægialeüs and Cyanippus; and a daughter, Ægialea by name, who was married to his nephew Diomedes, ſon of Tydeus, and overwhelmed him with grief, by her lewd conduct. Some writers inform us, that Adraſtus was the firſt who built a temple in honour of the Goddeſs Nemeſis (Revenge) and that ſhe was thence called Adraſtea [H]; but I am perſuaded that they confound him with another ADRASTUS. He who raiſed the firſt altar to this Goddeſs, built it on the river Æſepus in Phrygia (q). Now it does not appear that the Adraſtus of this article was ever in Aſia, but we meet with a King of that name in Phrygia, at the time of the ſiege of Troy (r). It will therefore be more reaſonable to aſcribe the eſtabliſhment of this worſhip of Nemeſis, to an Aſiatic Prince called Adraſtus, than to a King of Argos of that (i) Herod. lib. 5. cap. 67.

(k) Id. ibid. and Pauſan. lib. 2. p. 150.
(l) Pindar. Nem. Od. 9.
(m) Scholiaſt. Statii, apud Barthium, tom. 2. p. 361, in hæc verba Statii, Thebaidos, lib. 2. ver. 179. Quis te ſolio Sicyonis avitæ Excitum in frenos componere legibus Argos Neſciat?
(n) Homer. Il. lib. 2. ver. 79.
(o) Pindar. Nem. Od. 9.
(p) Stat. Theb. lib. 1. ver. 393.
(q) Antimachus apud Strabonem, lib. 13. p. 405.
(r) Homer. Il. lib. 2. ver. 337.

withdraw to the city of Sicyon, to King Polybius, who received him very graciouſly, and gave him Amphitea his daughter in marriage; but even this differs widely from the account of Herodotus, who declares, that Polybius bequeathed his kingdom to Adraſtus his daughter's ſon. Peruſe the following remark. The citing Hyginus is ſtill worſe; for this author does not ſpeak of our Adraſtus in that place, but of another, who was father to Hipponoüs, and who threw himſelf into the flames, in obedience to the command of Apollo; which Hipponoüs did alſo from the ſame motive. The author of the Index to Hyginus in the Amſterdam edition of 1681, makes the abovementioned Adraſtus and Hipponoüs ſons to Hercules; and yet he pretends, that this very Adraſtus is the father of Ægialea, mentioned by Hyginus chap. 71ſt, who is manifeſtly father in-law to Polynices and the ſon of Talaüs. This is owing to his miſtaking the ſenſe of the following words; Hercules Jovis filius ipſe ſeſe in ignem miſit. Adraſtus & Hipponoüs ejus filius, ipſi ſe in ignem jecerunt ex reſponſo Apollinis (4). i. e. "Hercules the ſon of "Jupiter threw himſelf into the fire. Adraſtus and "Hipponoüs his ſon, threw themſelves into the fire, "in compliance with the anſwer which the oracle of "Apollo gave."

(4) Hygini Fabul. cap. 242.

[D] That he was in perſon at the ſecond expedition.] We have not only the teſtimony of Pauſanias but that of Pindar, who declares expreſly, that Adraſtus having got together the ſcattered bones of his ſon, marched back the army very happily to Argos (5). He does not therefore tell us, with Pauſanias, that he died in his march, at Megara; however, theſe two authors agree in this, viz. that Adraſtus was preſent in the ſecond Theban war.

(5) Pindar. Pyth. Od. 8.

[E] By which the Sicyonians ſolemnized it.] We find in the Scholiaſt on Pindar (6), that Dieutuchides aſſerts, that there was only a Cænotaphium (an empty or honorary Mauſoleum) of Adraſtus in Sicyon; and that his real monument ſtood in Megara (7).

(6) Schol. Pindari in Nem. Od. 9.
(7) Dieutuchides, Hiſtoriæ Megaricæ, lib. 3.

[F] Being conſtrained to leave Argos.] It is related in the Supplement to Moreri, that Adraſtus was drove from the kingdom of Argos by Amphiaraüs his brother-in-law, and obliged to withdraw to the city of Sicyon; but from a negligence that is not very pardonable, no teſtimony is given of this; which conſequently muſt give a reader, who will not take things upon truſt, a great deal of trouble in turning over authors. I ſearch'd ſo long that I at laſt found in Pindar, that Adraſtus left Argos, and withdrew to Sicyon, to ſecure himſelf from Amphiaraüs; becauſe the family of Talaüs was diſpoſſeſſed of the ſovereign power (8). This Poet adds, that Adraſtus put an end to the troubles; and that the marriage of Eriphyle with Amphiaraüs heal'd all their diviſions; conſequently, Amphiaraüs was not brother-in-law to Adraſtus, when the latter was forced to ſhelter himſelf in Sicyon. Pindar does not ſay, that this fugitive Prince married King Polybius's daughter, nor that Amphiaraüs ſlew Talaüs; but both theſe incidents, (the former of which is ſo contradictory to Herodotus,) are found in Pindar's Scholiaſt. Diodorus Siculus relates, that the marriage of Amphiaraüs with Eriphyle ſiſter of Adraſtus, did not reconcile the diviſions; ſince theſe two brothers-in-law, were ſtill diſputing for the crown, a little before the Theban war broke out (9). They were divided upon another account, for Amphiaraüs did not care to join in the expedition, and Adraſtus earneſtly deſired that he ſhould: Eriphyle being appointed to judge all their differences, pronounced in favour of her brother. Apollodorus ſays partly the ſame thing, but in a pretty confuſed manner (10). Barthius has quoted Diodorus Siculus wrong, when he ſuppoſes that Eriphyle was Adraſtus's daughter (11). The Latin verſion of this hiſtorian, printed at Baſil, in 1548, ſays erroneouſly, that Eriphyle decreed that her husband ſhould wear the crown.

(8) Pindar. Nem. Od. 9.
(9) Diod. Sicul. lib. 5. cap. 6.
(10) Apol. lib. 3. p. 187.
(11) Barth. in Stat. tom. 2. p. 870. See alſo pag. 914.

[G] The Argives beſought him.] Had Moreri known this, he would not have declared that Adraſtus, after a reign of four years, left the city of Sicyon, but for what reaſon is not known; and came to Argos where he reigned, and had two daughters &c. (12). But be this as it will, here is a ſubject for hiſtorical ſcepticiſm, the ancients claſhing with regard to the two kingdoms of Adraſtus; I mean, with reſpect to the order and title of the poſſeſſion. Conſult the article TALAUS.

(12) He ſhould have ſaid three ſons and two daughters.

[H] And that ſhe was thence called Adraſtea.] The Scholiaſt on Pindar ſays, that the Goddeſs Nemeſis was ſo called from the compenſation abovementioned. Adraſtus was the only Chief, who eſcaped with his life in the firſt Theban war; and his ſon was the only Chief who was ſlain in the ſecond. The equilibrium is much better preſerved according to the ſuppoſition of thoſe, who declare that the Epigones had the whole management of the ſecond war; but ſuch as aſſert that Adraſtus was perſonally engaged in it; and give him the glory of leading back the triumphant army, ſuppoſe neceſſarily that he commanded there. He therefore ſhould have been ſlain in this battle, in order that the balance might have been kept even, between himſelf and his ſix collegues in the firſt war.

that name. Herodotus takes notice of one ADRASTUS, who fled for refuge to the court of Crœsus King of Lydia, and who killed the son of this Monarch inadvertently (s). Moreri has given us a pretty good article of this Adraſtus [I].

(s) Herod. lib. 1. cap 35, & ſeq.

[I] Moreri has given us a pretty good article of this Adraſtus.] I have found only the few ſmall errors following. I. Adraſtus is there made ſon of Gordius, inſtead of ſon of Midas, and grandſon of Gordius agreeable to the Latin tranſlation of Herodotus. I know indeed, that, according to the Greek text, he was ſon of Gordius, and grandſon of Midas (13); but then, I am ſenſible, firſt; that Moreri was not capable of rectifying the verſion of a Greek author from the original; and ſecondly, that there is a Greek reading agreeable to the Latin tranſlation. II. He ſhould not have omitted, that Crœſus cauſed ſuch expiatory ceremonies to be performed for Adraſtus, as were employed to purify involuntary murthers. III. It ſhould not have been ſaid, that Adraſtus killed himſelf on the body of Crœſus's ſon, but on his monument: for Herodotus obſerves that Crœſus, after having pardon'd and comforted the murtherer, cauſed his ſon to be interred. IV. He ſhould not have cited Clio or Li: for the names of the Muſes, by which the books of Herodotus are diſtinguiſhed, are of no uſe in quotations; and eſpecially in a French work of ſo general a uſe as an hiſtorical Dictionary; at leaſt he ſhould have told the reader, that Clio anſwered to the firſt book.

(13) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 35.

ADRIAN Emperor, Pope, &c. Look for HADRIAN.

ADRIANI (JOANNI BATTISTA) born in Florence, anno 1511, of a Patrician family, wrote a Hiſtory of his own Times in Italian. This work is a continuation of Guicciardine, and begins at the year 1536 [A]. It is written with a great deal of judgment, ſincerity, care and accuracy; and we find that Coſmo, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, a Prince of a prodigious genius, and the moſt conſummate prudence, had communicated his own memoirs to our author [B]. Thuanus, from whom I borrow the abovementioned particulars, confeſſes ingenuouſly, that he was very much obliged to this Hiſtory, and that none had furniſhed him with a greater number of materials (a). He is ſurprized that the Italians don't conſider Adriani according to his merit. Beſides this Hiſtory, there are extant ſix funeral orations of this author's compoſition, viz. On the Emperor Charles V; the Emperor Ferdinand; Eleonora of Toledo, Conſort to Coſmo Duke of Florence; Iſabella, Queen of Spain; Coſmo, Grand Duke of Tuſcany; and one Joan of Auſtria, wife to Francis de Medicis (b). He died in Florence, anno 1579. I believe he alſo writ a long Letter relating to antient Painters and Sculptors, which is prefixed to the third volume of Vaſari.

(a) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 68. ſub fin.

(b) Jacobo Rilli, Notizie Litterarie ed Iſtoriche intorno à gli huomini illuſtri dell' Academia Fiorentina, p. 45. That is, "James "Rilli's Literary "and Hiſtorical "Advice concerning the illuſtrious Men "of the Academy of Florence."

He was ſon to the learned Marcello Virgilio (c), Secretary to the Republic of Florence, and Profeſſor of Polite Literature in the Academy. He ſucceeded him in that chair (d), and left a ſon called MARCELLO ADRIANI who was a man of vaſt erudition, and who exerciſed the ſame function (e), and aſſumed the title of il Torbido, in the Academy de gli Alterati (f). Some authors are of opinion, that our Adriani was a little prejudiced againſt Pope Paul III. (g).

(c) Michael Poccianius, de Scriptor. Florent. pag. 103.
(d) Rilli Notizie Literarie, p. 253.
(e) Ibid. p. 255.
(f) See Bocchi, in book I. of Elogiums annex'd to Rilli, p. 48.
(g) Spondan. Annal. ad Ann. 1545, numb. 18. p. 492.

[A] Begins at anno 1536.] Not having this work by me, I muſt depend on the teſtimony of Thuanus; but I muſt obſerve, that according to Spondanus (1), Adriani's hiſtory begins at anno 1537, and ends at 1574. It conſiſts of 22 books, and was printed in Folio at Florence by the Giunti, in 1583, and at Venice in two volumes 4to, in 1587. Marcello Adriani, the author's ſon, publiſhed this hiſtory, which he dedicated to Francis de Medicis, Grand Duke of Tuſcany. According to Bocchi (2), it takes in forty four years.

(1) Spond. Ann. ad Ann. 1534, num. 18. p. 426.

(2) See Bocchi in Book I. annex'd to the Elogiums of Rilli, p. 49.

[B] Communicated his own memoirs to our author.] Thuanus had already given, in his 37th book, his thoughts, on this head, with reſpect to the ſecret conferences between Catherine de Medicis and the Duke of Alva, at the interview of Bayonne. Thoſe of the reformed religion, who are a very ſuſpicious people (3), gave out, ſays he, that it was debated in theſe controverſies by what arts their ſect might beſt be extirpated. What happened afterwards will truly inform poſterity, whether this be a true or a falſe aſſertion. He adds, that Joanni Battiſta Adriani, a very ſincere and very judicious hiſtorian, who probably collected a great number of particulars from the Duke of Tuſcany's Memoirs (4) relates, that it had been concluded in this interview, (purſuant to the opinion of the King of Spain explained by the Duke of Alva,) that the Heads of the principal Proteſtants ſhould be ſtruck off; and that after this, they ſhould all be butcher'd after the manner of the Sicilian veſpers. I wiſh, d'Aubigné had not improved upon, or heightened the author from whom he copied. Moſt hiſtorians, ſays he (5), and among theſe, Joanni Battiſta Adriani, who was poſſeſſed of the cyphers and ſecrets of the Duke of Florence, unanimouſly pretend, that this was the ſcene where the wars of the Low-Countries were projected, and the maſſacres which followed after them. There is no doubt but Thuanus is the original whence d'Aubigné copied theſe particulars; but has not the latter taken too much liberty? Has not he related a thing as fact, which Thuanus gives us only as probable? Does not he ſpeak of the great Duke's cyphers and ſecrets, when Thuanus does not mention any thing like them? for Commentarii does not ſignify cyphers and ſecrets. The more heinous an accuſation is, the more we ought to keep the very words of the depoſition, even when, as on this occaſion, the appearances are very favourable. Had Zeiller caſt his eye on this paſſage of Thuanus, he would not have ventured to aſſert that Adriani's hiſtory ends at the death of Charles V (6).

(3) Genus hominum ſuſpicax, i. e. "A miſtruſtful, "ſuſpicious kind "of people," Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 37. p. 749. ad Ann. 1565.

(4) Ex Coſmi Etruriæ Ducis Commentariis, ut vero ſimile eſt, multa hauſit, id. ibid.

(5) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. tom. 1. lib. 4. cap. 5.

(6) Zeiller, de Hiſtoricis, Part 2. pag. 1.

ADRICHOMIA (CORNELIA) a Nun of the order of St. Auſtin in the ſixteenth Century, daughter to a Dutch Gentleman, acquired great fame by her poetical genius, which ſhe applied to ſubjects ſuitable to her character; ſhe having put the Pſalms of David into verſe, and written ſeveral other ſacred Poems. Faber Stapulenſis admired her fine ſenſe and erudition; and Cornelius Muſius had an intimate, but very chaſte correſpondence with her, as Franciſcus Swertius informs us (a). I am ſurprized that Valerius Andreas takes no notice of this illuſtrious Dutch Maiden, ſince his Collection of the Writers of the Low-Countries, is much more copious than that of Francis Swertius; for he could not but have read what the latter has related of her.

(a) Swertius, Athen. Belgic. pag. 181.

ADRICHOMIUS (CHRISTIAN) was born at Delft in Holland, anno 1533. He was a Prieſt zealous for the religion he profeſſed, and applied himſelf to ſtudy. He was a conſiderable time Director of the Nuns of St. Barbara in the place of his birth; but the civil wars which broke out upon the account of religion, obliging him to leave his country, he withdrew firſt to Brabant [A], and afterwards to Cologne, where he undertook a conſiderable work, which was printed after his death [B]. The ſubject of his ſtudies, was, a Deſcription of the Holy Land in general, and that of the city of Jeruſalem in particular, as appears from his Theatrum Terræ Sanctæ, printed with Geographical Maps, at Cologne, anno 1593, in folio. This work, beſides what I juſt now obſerved, contains a Chronicle of the Old and New Teſtament. It is pretty much eſteemed, and would be more ſo, had not the author relied too much on the Manetho, the Beroſus, and ſuch other chimerical writings of the Monk Annius of Viterbo. Adrichomius ſometimes took the name Chriſtianus Crucius, under which he publiſhed at Antwerp (a), the Life of Chriſt, and an oration de Chriſtiana beatitudine, which had been ſpoke in a general chapter (b). He died at Cologne in June 1585, being the 13th year of his exile, and was buried in the convent of the Canoneſſes of Nazareth, of which he had been Director for ſome time (c).

(a) In 1578.
(b) The 23d of July 1570.
(c) Ex Valer. Andrea, Bibl. Belg. p. 131.

[A] To Brabant.] The author whom both Moreri and I quote, expreſſes himſelf thus; Inde à primis Gueſio-Calviniſtis pulſus, Machliniæ, Trajectæ & Coloniæ vixit (1). i. e. "Being drove away by the be-" garly * Calviniſts, he lived at Machlin, Maeſtricht " and Cologne." I am perſuaded that Moreri is here miſtaken in taking Trajectum for Utrecht, he ſhould rather have tranſlated it Maeſtricht.

(1) Idem, p. 132.
* The Calviniſts in the Low-Countries were called Gueux, i. e. Beggars, by the Spaniards.

[B] A conſiderable work, which was printed after his death.] Moreri aſſerts a double falſhood, in declaring that Adrichomius publiſhed this work himſelf; and that his Theatrum terræ ſanctæ, i. e. "the " Theatre of the Holy Land," is diſtinct from the deſcription of the Holy Land &c.

ÆGEATES (JOHN), a Prieſt of the ſect of Neſtorius, ſirnamed Διακενόμυκτος, i. e. Separated, which was a title generally aſſumed by the followers of Dioſcurus and Eutyches (a). He flouriſhed according to Voſſius (b) under the Emperor Zeno, about the year 483. But Dr. Cave (c) is of opinion, that he lived ſome years later, ſince he continued his hiſtory five books after the depoſing of Peter the Fuller, which are not extant. He wrote an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory [A], which began with the reign of Theodoſius the Younger, when Neſtorius publiſhed his opinions, and was depoſed on account of them, and ended with the reign of Zeno, and the depoſition of Peter the Fuller, who had uſurped the See of Antioch. He wrote likewiſe a particular Treatiſe againſt the council of Chalcedon, in which he treated it with the utmoſt ſeverity and the keeneſt reproaches imaginable (d). Photius ſays (e), that his ſtyle was clear and florid, and adorned with the greateſt nobleneſs; but he ſtiles him an Heretic (f), and an impious man (g), on account of his favouring the Neſtorian party.

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Litter. p. 294. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720.
(b) De Hiſt. Græc. l. 2. c. 21.
(c) Ubi ſupra.
(d) Cave, ubi ſupra.
(e) Cod. xli. and Cod. lv.
(f) Cod. xli.
(g) Δυσσεβὴς, Cod. lv.

[A] An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.] It contained ten books, but Photius (1) ſays, that he had read only five of them, which began with Neſtorius, and ended with depoſing of Peter the Fuller. In this Hiſtory he ſhewed every where his peculiar attachment to the Neſtorian party; he gave an account of the third general Council at Epheſus, and of another Council held in the ſame city under Dioſcurus, which was ſtigmatized with the name of the Council of Robbers, σύνοδος ληστρικὴ; and yet he calls this a Divine Council, and repreſents Dioſcurus and his followers as Saints; but in his accouut of the Council of Chalcedon, he ſpeaks of it in the moſt injurious and reproachful terms imaginable. We have a fragment of this work of Ægeates in the 5th Seſſion of the ſecond Council of Nice (2), and in the Collections of Theodorus Lector (3).

(1) Cod. xli. p. 27. edit Rhotomagi, in fol. 1653.
(2) Concilior. tom. 7. p. 369.
(3) L. 2. p. 563.

ÆGIALEA, daughter of Adraſtus King of Argos, and wife to Diomedes [A], was ſo infamouſly looſe, that one of Ovid's imprecations againſt a man whom he mortally hated, was, to wiſh him ſuch a wife [B]. 'Tis related that Venus (a) out of revenge to (a) Schol. Homeri, Iliad. lib. 5. verſ. 412.

[A] Wife to Diomedes.] By this marriage Diomedes, who was grandſon to Adraſtus, (for he was ſon of Tydeus and Deïpyle (1), daughter of Adraſtus, became alſo his ſon-in-law. They therefore who read gener inſtead of genus in the following paſſage of Ovid, muſt have had a very critical eye;

Seu gener Adraſti, ſeu furtis aptus Ulyſſes,
Seu pius Æneas eripuiſſe ferunt (2).
Engliſhed,
" Whether Adraſtus' ſon, or ſly Ulyſſes,
" Or good Æneas took the fam'd Palladium.

(1) He is thus called by Apollodorus, p. 49: but others, and Statius among the reſt, call her Deïpyle.
(2) Ovid. Faſtor. lib. 6. ver. 433. See Meziriac on Penelope's Epiſtle, p. 77.

[B] One of Ovid's imprecations againſt a man he mortally hated, was, to wiſh him ſuch a wife.] Theſe are his words:

Nec tibi contingat matrona pudicior illa
Qua potuit Tydeus erubuiſſe nuru (3).
Engliſhed,
" Nor may thy wife be more for virtue fam'd,
" Than ſhe whom Tydeus bluſh'd to call his " daughter.

(3) Idem, in Ibin. ver. 349.

I have therefore taken notice (4), that it was the cuſtom to wiſh the wives of criminal offenders might bring diſhonour on them. Since the writing this circumſtance, the learned Mr. Drelincourt has inform'd me, that we meet with a confirmation of this in the Iliad; and indeed, Homer tells us, that thoſe who ſwore to a treaty of peace, uſed to wiſh, among other puniſhments, that their wives might cuckold them (5).

(4) Citation (16) under the article CAIN.

(5) Ἄλοχοι δ' ἀλλοῖσι μιγεῖεν. Uxores vero aliis miſceantur, i. e. " (may their " wives have in-" trigues with " other men." Homer. Iliad. lib. 3. ver. 301.

The abovementioned Mr. Drelincourt referred me to verſe 11th of chapt. xiith of the ſecond book of Samuel. I have read in the Menagiana, that the Lacedemonians uſed to make three or four wiſhes, againſt thoſe who were odious to them; they wiſhed, they might have a paſſion for building, for fine clothes and houſes, and that their wives might have gallants (6). Adrianus Valeſius told Menage in a letter, that we meet with the form of this oath three times in Suidas . . under the words ἀμφιδρόμους, διακόμενος, and οἰκοδομεῖν (7). Briſſonius cites only two words of Suidas, one of which differs from the three abovemention'd. Theſe are his words (8): Lacedæmonios quidem cum acerbiſſima execratione adverſus eos quos vehementer odiſſent, uti vellent, inter cætera domus exitia, hoc imprecari ſolitos traditum eſt, ut eorum uxores adulteris delectarentur. i. e. "It is ſaid, that " the (6) Menagiana, p. 341 of the Dutch edition.

(7) Ibid. p. 342. it ſhould have been οἰκοδομὰ.
(8) Barnab. Briſſonius ad Leg. Julian de Adult. p. 135. editio Lugdun. 1558, verbo διακόμενος & in verbo ἵππους.

to Diomedes [C], who had wounded her in the arm at the ſiege of Troy, fired his wife with ſo laſcivious a paſſion [D], that ſhe was for ever running after all the young fellows ſhe met with. However, ſhe was particularly fond of a man who fell naturally in her way, and was at all times within call, I mean the ſon of Sthenelus, whoſe name was Cometes. To him Diomedes had left the care of his houſhold, and the government of his kingdom, during his abſence. Hiſtorians have not told us, whether he acquitted himſelf worthily of this part of his commiſſion; but for the other kind of Viceroyalty with which he was not entruſted, I mean the acting as the huſband's deputy, he was the more careful and aſſiduous in this employment, as he undertook it merely out of inclination; for Venus had inſpired him with a paſſion for Ægialea. This woman did not only diſgrace her huſband, but conſpired againſt his life as ſoon as he was returned to Argos [E]; and he very narrowly eſcaped being aſſaſſinated, when he fled for ſanctuary to the temple of Juno, a little after which he withdrew into Italy. According to ſome writers he ſailed directly for that country (b), firmly reſolved not to return any more to his own kingdom, becauſe of his wife's ſcandalous character.

(b) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 8. ver. 9.

Ennodius ſuppoſes, 1ſt, that he reſolved to return on board again, the inſtant he heard of his wife's infidelity; and to remove for ever from a place, where it was impoſſible but he muſt lead a life of infamy; 2dly, That at the ſame time he bewailed his own unhappy fate, he applauded his wife's former conduct [F].

" the Lacedemonians uſed to vent moſt horrid exe-
" crations againſt thoſe they hated; and among other
" family diſtractions they wiſh'd them, one was,
" that they might be cuckolds."

[C] Venus out of revenge to Diomedes.] This is a very odd ſort of revenge, which plainly ſhews, that the Heathen Poets have proſtituted the glory of God to all ſorts of abominations for what can be more unjuſt, than to puniſh the ſin of a man by prompting his wife to ſin? They have aſcribed a hundred ſuch pranks to Venus, as when they relate that ſhe blew up ſuch a flame in Clio's boſom, that this poor Muſe ſuffered herſelf to be got with child. Such was the return that was made for prudent counſels; for Clio's only crime was, her having repreſented to Venus the injury ſhe did her character, in loving Adonis (9). Don't the abovementioned Poets tell us (10), that Tyndarus father of Helen had the misfortune to have daughters who either had two or three husbands each, or abandoned their husbands; and this for no other reaſon but becauſe he had forgot Venus in a ſacrifice he offered to all the Gods? Had writers made this Goddeſs only play ſuch pranks, the circumſtance would not be ſo extraordinary; but they make Pallas the Goddeſs who preſided over the ſciences and the polite arts, notwithſtanding the chaſte character under which they repreſent her, practiſe the ſame tricks. See after what manner Minerva puniſhes a crime in Alcinoë, in Parthenius (11): but I ſhall make this an article apart.

(9) Κλειὼ δὲ Πιέρα τὸ Μάγνητος ἠράσθη κατὰ μῆνιν Ἀφροδίτης. ὠνείδισε γὰρ αὐτῇ τὸν τὸ Ἄδωνιδος ἔρωτα συνελθοῦσα δὲ ἐγέννησεν ἐξ αὐτοῦ παῖδα Ὑάκινθον. Clio Pierum magnetis filium Veneris ira, quod ei Adonidis amorem exprobraſſet deperivit, cujus compreſſu Hyacinthum filium concepit. Apollod. lib. 1. That is, " Clio, becauſe " ſhe reproached " Venus with " loving Adonis, " was by her in- " ſpired with " a violent paſſi- " on for Pierus " ſon to Magnes, " and had a ſon " by him called " Hyacinthus.

(10) Heſich. apud Schol. Euripid. in Oreſt.

(11) Parthen. cap. 27.

(12) Lycophron. in Caſſand. ver. 612.

(13) In Iliad. lib. 5. ver. 412.

(14) Stati. Sylv. 5. lib. 3. ranks Ægialea among thoſe wives who were very faithful to their huſbands.

(15) See de Boiſſieu on Ovid's Ibis, pag. 72. where he ſuppoſes the error occurs in the text of Dionyſius, whereas it is only in Euſtathius's Commentary.

(16) Under the article DOMITIAN, note [B].

[D] Fired his wife with ſo laſcivious a paſſion.] The words which the Greek authors employ on this occaſion are much ſtronger. Lycophron points out Ægialea as follows:

Ὅταν θρασεῖα θουρὰς οἰστρήσῃ κύων
Πρὸς λέκτρα (12).

Engliſhed,

" When the bold, luſtful B——— ſhall be excited " To Venery (12).

His Scholiaſt borrows the explication of this enigma from Minermus, and paraphraſes it thus: Ὅταν ἡ θρασεῖα θουρὰς καὶ ἡ ὁρμητικὴ κύων ἤτοι ἡ γυνὴ Διομήδους Αἰγιάλεια οἰστρήσῃ καὶ μανικῶς ὁρμήσῃ πρὸς τὰ λέκτρα καὶ τὰς μίξεις. The Scholiaſt on Homer (13), not conſidering the elogium which is given in the text of his author to Ægialea, viz. that ſhe was capable of vaſtly regretting the loſs of her husband, ſays (14), that ſhe was mad with love. Ἐκμῆναι περὶ πορείαν ὡς περὶ πᾶσαν τὴν τῶν νέων ἡλικίαν συγχορεύειν ἀσελγαίνουσαν. See Euſtathius on the 486th verſe of Dionyſius Periegetes, where he has miſtaken one name for another (15). Μιχθῆναι, ſays he, Σθένελῳ τῷ τοῦ Κομήτου; he ſhould have ſaid, Κομήτῃ τῷ τοῦ Σθενέλου.

[E] Conſpired againſt his (her husband's) life, as ſoon as he was return'd to Argos.] Had we the liſt of all the wives who have followed her example, I mean of thoſe who, after violating the marriage-bed, have endeavoured to diſpatch their husbands, ſuch a collection would be very voluminous. We ſhall ſhew hereafter (16), that the wife of Domitian would juſtly deſerve a place in ſuch a liſt. But how large ſoever the number of theſe wives may be, it is yet much ſmaller than that of thoſe wives who go no farther than adultery; and who, this caſe excepted, are very kind and officious to their husbands, provided they are but informed with a ſpirit of patience; for if we take notice, it will be found that moſt of thoſe gay women, who get rid, or endeavour to make away with their husbands, never go ſuch violent lengths, unleſs theſe are jealous, and check the liberty their wives would take. Only blot from the minds of husbands, that reſtleſs principle of jealouſy, which prompts them to interfere with the gallantry of their wives, and they will be ſecure from the ſword or poiſon; and could the Lacedemonians have ſuppoſed, that husbands could be endued with the patience which many of them have, (and that early,) in ſeveral countries, and ſometimes even from a principle of œconomy, they would not have entertained ſo formidable an idea of the imprecation abovementioned; but taking it undoubtedly for granted, that a wife's intrigues would inſpire her husband with a moroſe temper, which would occaſion a multitude of domeſtic jarrs, and from which the ſuffering party would endeavour to rid herſelf by all the arts that could poſſibly be thought of, they conſider'd this as a terrible imprecation. The reader muſt not object to me, that in the News-papers, and particularly under the article of France, we are frequently told of certain proſecutions carried on againſt women whoſe husbands have been murthered, or very near being ſo; for how few are theſe, when compared to the multitudes who live very comfortably, till they are ſeparated by a natural death from their adulterous wives? Neither let the reader cite Mr. Tiquet, who was ſo vaſtly kind, ſo very gracious, as to ſue for his wife's pardon, after being found guilty of an attempt to aſſaſſinate him, and ſo fully convicted, that ſhe was beheaded for it (17), after having confeſſed her crime: this does not prove, that he indulged his wife in all the liberties ſhe would gladly have taken. In a word, if the maxim of Cato the Cenſor (18), viz. that thoſe women who commit adultery, alſo poiſon their husbands, was verified in that age, when the Romans were but beginning to have a taſte for luxury, it was quite otherwiſe in the times of extreme pravity and corruption, and in the age we live in; for as depravity gathers ſtrength, cuckoldom grows more familiar; it is look'd upon as a trifle, and is ſubmitted to with patience; this forces the murthering weapon out of the adultereſs's hand, and prevents her having recourſe, either to the ſword of her gallant, or to poiſonous drugs.

(17) In Paris, anno 1699.

(18) I ſhall ſpeak of that in the note [Q] of his article under the word PORTIUS.

[F] Ennodius ſuppoſes that Diomedes, at the ſame time that he bewailed his own unhappy fate, applauded his wife's former conduct. We find in Ennodius's works, a little diſcourſe entitled Verba Diomedis cum uxoris adulteria cognoviſſet (19). i. e. " The Diſ- " courſe of Diomedes, after he was inform'd of " his wife's adulteries." Diomedes owns therein, that his wife had been the mirrour of modeſty. Nature and education had conſpired to form her mind to chaſtity, ſo that thus ſecured by this double bulwark, ſhe was thought incapable of committing an impure

(19) It is the XXIVth among thoſe which are called Dictiones, and is in pag. 331 of the 15th tome of the Bibliotheq. des Peres, Paris edition 1644.

☞ÆGISTHUS was the ſon of Thyeſtes, by his own daughter Pelopeia, who, to conceal her ſhame, expoſed him in the woods. Some ſay that he was found by a ſhepherd, who brought him up; others that he was ſuckled by a goat (a), whence he was called Ægiſthus. He corrupted Clytemneſtra the wife of Agamemnon, and with her aſſiſtance ſlew her huſband [A], and reigned ſeven years in Mycenæ [B]. He was afterwards, together with Clytemneſtra, ſlain by Oreſtes [C]. Pompey uſed to call Julius Cæſar Ægiſthus, on account of his having corrupted his wife Mutia, whom he afterwards put away, though he had had three children by her (b).

(a) Αλλα και τον Αλιτης Αλεξανδρον τον Πριαμιδ. υπο αρκτα φασι τραφηναι. Αιγισθον δε τον Θυεστ και Πηλοπιας, υπο αιγος, Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 42.

(b) Pompeio & à Curionibus patre & filio & a multis exprobatum eſt, quod cujus cauſa poſt tres liberos exegiſſet uxorem, & quem gemens Ægiſthum appellare conſueſſet, ejus poſtea filiam potentiæ cupiditate in matrimonium recepiſſet. Sueton. in Julio Cæſ.

impure action. Ut gemino defenſa propugnaculo, nullatenus facinorum crederetur ictibus ſubjacere, nec dura caſtimoniæ obſcænitatis eviſceratione mollire (20). She never delighted to adorn herſelf with gold and pearls, but always behaved like a woman of honour. In ſumma, it concludes, talis periit, quales ſolent à maritis lachrymas impetrare. Circæo, ut aiunt, poculo à ſe tranſlata eſt, & in votum migravit adulteri (21). i. e. "She was bewailed by her husband as tho' "ſhe had been the beſt of wives; ſhe was made to "ſwerve from her duty, and follow the advice of "her aſſociate in adultery, by the Circæan cup, as "the phraſe is." Theſe words reflect an honour on Diomedes: they are prudent, and very different from the unjuſt violence with which the diſcourſes of a thouſand husbands in this ſituation would be enflamed. Theſe, on ſuch an occaſion, would forget all the good qualities their wives poſſeſſed; and would give the name of preciſeneſs, hypocriſy and treachery, to the wiſdom which till then had ſhone forth in their conduct. Let us on the other ſide obſerve, that the morality of this little work of Ennodius is of dangerous conſequence; as it may awake diſtruſt in the minds of the moſt contented husbands: for if a wife, of ſo conſummate a virtue as that of Diomedes, is not proof againſt frailty during her husband's abſence, how can a man be ſure that thoſe wives won't go aſtray, who delight in dreſs, and have not received either from nature or education, thoſe principles which may enable them to reſiſt the allurements of vice? But then, few husbands are ſo long abſent from their families as Diomedes was; and if the Grecian Generals who continued ten years at the ſiege of Troy, fancied, at their return, that their wives could not poſſibly live without gallants, they might partly thank themſelves for it. Why ſhould they leave them for ſo many years? They ſhould have had the ſame advice at parting from their husbands, as a Prelate's miſtreſs one day gave her gallant. "The Biſhop of—going one day to "take leave of the Counteſs of U--whom he loved, de-"clared: how much he regretted to go from her, tho' "it was but for a little time. After a great many "compliments had paſt between them, the Biſhop "roſe up to go away, when the Counteſs as ſhe "was waiting upon him out, ſpoke as follows: "Well, Sir, let your ſtay be as ſhort as poſſible, and "remember that a miſtreſs is a benefice which the "incumbent is obliged to reſide upon." Vol. II. pag. 355.

(20) Ennodius, ibid.

(21) Idem, ibid.

(22) Menagiana, pag. 112 of the firſt edition of Holland.

[A] He corrupted Clytemneſtra the wife of Agamemnon, and with her aſſiſtance ſlew her husband.] Homer tells us that Agamemnon had committed the care of his young wife to a Poet, whoſe leſſons kept her a long time in the paths of virtue: but that at laſt, by the inſtigation of Ægiſthus, the Poet was baniſhed, and then ſhe fell a prey to his luſt.

——— Ὁ δ' ἰύκηλος μυχῷ Ἀργεία ἱπποβότοιο
Πολλ' Ἀγαμεμνονίην ἄλοχον θελγεσκε ἐπέεσσιν,
Ἠδ' ἤτοι τὸ πρὶν μὲν ἀναίνετο ἔργον ἀεικὲς
Διὰ Κλυταιμνηστρη (φρεσὶ γὰρ κέ χρητ' ἀγαθῇσι·
Παρ' γὰρ ἔην καὶ ἀοιδὸς ἀνὴρ ᾧ πολλ' ἐπέτελλεν
Ἀτρείδης Τροίηνδε νέον ἴμεναι ἄκοιτιν.)
Ἀλλ' ὅτε δὴ μοῖρα θεῶν ἐπέδησε δαμῆναι,
Δὴ τότε τὸν μὲν ἀοιδὸν ἀγων ἐς νῆσον ἐρήμην,
Κάλλιπεν οἰωνοῖσιν ἔλωρ καὶ κύρμα γενέσθαι,
Τὴν δ' ἐθέλων ἐθέλουσαν ἀπήγαγεν οἴκαδε δόμοιδε (1).

(1) Hom. Odyſſ. γ.

" He, ſtretch'd at eaſe in Argos' calm receſs,
" (Whoſe ſtately ſteeds luxuriant paſtures bleſs)
" With flattery's inſinuating art
" Sooth'd the frail Queen, and poiſon'd all her heart.
" At firſt with worthy ſhame and decent pride,
" The royal Dame his lawleſs ſuit deny'd.
" For virtue's image yet poſſeſt her mind,
" Taught by a Maſter of the tuneful kind:
" Atrides, parting for the Trojan war,
" Conſign'd the youthful conſort to his care,
" True to his charge, the Bard preſerv'd her long
" In honour's limits (ſuch the pow'r of ſong):
" But when the Gods theſe objects of their hate
" Dragg'd to deſtruction, by the links of fate;
" The Bard they baniſh'd from his native ſoil,
" And left all helpleſs in a deſart iſle:
" There he, the ſweeteſt of the ſacred train,
" Sung dying to the rocks but ſung in vain.
" Then virtue was no more (her guard away)
" She fell, to luſt a voluntary prey. Pope.

Strabo (2) quotes this as an inſtance of the excellence of Poetry and Muſick. They ſlew Agamemnon and his companions treacherouſly at a banquet, who defended himſelf ſo well, that of the aſſaſſines Ægiſthus alone ſurvived (3).

(2) Lib. 1.

[B] He reigned ſeven years in Mycenæ.] Homer informs us of this;

——— Δέδμητο δὲ λαὸς ὑπ' αὐτῷ.
Ἑπτάετες μὲν ἄνασσε πολυχρύσοιο Μυκήνης (4).

(3) Hom. Odyſſ. δ, λ.

(4) Idem, Odyſſ. γ.

" Sev'n years, the traytor rich Mycenæ ſway'd
" And his ſtern rule the groaning land obey'd."
Pope.

[C] He was afterwards, together with Clytemneſtra, ſlain by Oreſtes.] Homer does not tell us expreſly, that Oreſtes ſlew his mother along with the adulterer, but he ſeems to imply as much, by ſaying that he made a funeral feaſt for them both.

Τῷ δὲ οἱ ὀγδοάτῳ κακὸν ἦλυθε δῖος Ὀρέστης
Ἂψ' ἀπ' Ἀθηάων, κατὰ δ' ἔκτανε πατροφονῆα
Αἴγισθον δολόμητιν, ὅς οἱ πατέρα κλυτὸν ἔκτα.
Ἤτοι ὅ τὸν κτείνας δαῖνυ τάφον Ἀργείοισιν
Μητρός τε ψυχρῆς καὶ ἀνάλκιδος Αἰγίσθοιο (5).

(5) Ibid.

" The eighth, from Athens to his realm reſtor'd,
" Oreſtes baniſh'd the revenging ſword
" The murd'rer ſlew (6), and gave to fun'ral flame
" The vile Aſſaſſin, and adult'rous dame." Pope.

(6) Mr. Pope has it, Slew the dire pair. I was obliged to alter theſe words, for a reaſon, which the learned reader cannot but obſerve.

He mentions only the killing of Ægiſthus at the beginning of the Odyſſey.

☞ÆLIAN (CLAUDIUS), was a native of Præneſte a city of Italy (a). He taught Rhetoric at Rome, as Suidas tells us (b), after the time of Adrian the Emperor, but as Perizonius is of opinion, under Alexander Severus. He was ſirnamed Μελίγλωσσος or Μελίφθογγος (c), on account of the delicacy and ſweetneſs of his ſtyle; and Philoſtratus tells us (d), that he wrote Greek with the ſame elegance, as if he had been a native of Athens. However, he valued himſelf upon his never having been upon the ſea, to leave his own country, of the manners of which he was very tenacious (e). He was High-Prieſt, as Suidas informs us; from whence we may infer with Perizonius that he was of a noble extraction, and in favour with the great men of thoſe times. He was likewiſe honoured with the title of Sophiſt (f), which in his days was beſtowed upon

(a) Suidas in Lexico.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

(d) L. 2. de Vitis Sophiſt. Αιλιανος δε Ῥωμαιος μεν ην, αττικιζε δε ωσπερ οι εν τη μεσογαια Αθηναιοι.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) Philoſtrat. and Suidas.

upon thoſe only, who were eminent in learning and wiſdom; whence Philoſtratus adds, that he was not elated with pride on account of the great honour conferred upon him (g). He tells us of himſelf in his Epilogue to the Hiſtory of Animals, that he lived far from the noiſe of courts, where he might have acquired great riches, as others had done, but that he preferred a retired and ſtudious life to all the wealth and grandeur of the world. His works ſhew him to have been a man of excellent principles and ſtrict honeſty; we have not one indecent or improper expreſſion in all his writings; on the contrary, he recommends virtue and honeſty, inveighs againſt vice, mentions often the puniſhments reſerved by the Gods for the vicious, profeſſedly attacks the Atheiſts, Epicurus, and all ſuch as deny the providence of the Gods. He ſeems to have ſtudied with great application, not only Plato, Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, Plutarch, but likewiſe Homer, Anacreon, Archilochus, &c. and he commends them highly, and indeed thoſe of the Greek nation in general, whom he openly declares (h), tho' a Roman himſelf, to love above all others (i). He lived to about ſixty years of age, and left no children behind him, having an averſion to the married ſtate (k) [A]. Voſſius has committed a miſtake concerning him [B]. Authors are divided in their opinions with regard to his works [C]. Beſides his Various Hiſtory, and that of Animals, he wrote ſeveral other works [D]. We ſhall mention an objection that has been made againſt his manner of writing [E]. There

(g) Οὐκ ἐπίστευσεν, οὐδὲ ἐκόλασεν (perhaps ἐκολάκευσεν) τὴν ἑαυτῦ γνώμην, οὐδὲ ἐπήρθη ὑπὸ τῦ ὀνόματος ὥτω μεγάλα ὄντος.

(h) Var. Hiſt. l. 9. c. 32.

(i) Ὃυς φιλῶ πάντων μάλιστα.

(k) Philoſtrat. ubi ſupra.

[A] Having an averſion to the married ſtate.] Philoſtratus having mention'd this particular, obſerves, that it may bear a diſpute, whether celibacy or the contrary ſtate is the moſt happy; tho' he ſays it was not a proper opportunity for him to diſcuſs that point there. Matrimony has been conſider'd by ſome writers as a condition not ſo well ſuited to the circumſtances of Philoſophers and Men of learning. We have a particular examination of this queſtion in a little Tract intitled, De Matrimonio Literati, an cælibem eſſe, an verò nubere conveniat. i. e. "Of the Marriage of a Man of letters, with an enquiry whether "it is moſt proper for him to continue a batchelor, "or to marry (1)." The author alledges the great merit of ſome women, and particularly that of Iſabella Gonzaga, the wife of Guido Ubaldo de Montefeltro, Duke of Urbino, who was a Lady of ſuch diſtinguiſh'd accompliſhments, that Peter Bembus ſaid, that he muſt be a man of uncommon ſtupidity, who would not prefer one of her converſations to all the formal meetings and diſputations of the Philoſophers. Quid de Elizabethâ Gonzagâ? quam Bembus ita laudat, ut lapideum eum eſſe dicat, qui non unam ejus ſeſſiunculam omnibus Philoſophorum ambulationibus & diſputationibus anteponat. The Ladies perhaps will be ſurprized to find, that it is a queſtion among the Learned, whether they ought to marry; and will think it an unaccountable property of learning, that it ſhould lay the profeſſors of it under an obligation to diſregard the ſex. But whatever opinion theſe Gentlemen may have of that amiable part of the ſpecies, it is very queſtionable whether, in return for this want of complaiſance in them, the generality of Ladies would not prefer the Beau and the Man of modern gallantry to the Man of ſenſe and learning. However if the latter be conſidered as valuable in the eyes of any of them, let there be Gonzaga's, and I dare pronounce, that this queſtion will be ſoon determined in their favour, and they will find converts enough to their charms.

(1) It was printed in a collection of pieces of that kind, Urſellis 1606, and in a book intitled, Baudii Amores.

[B] Voſſius has committed a miſtake concerning him.] He is of opinion (2), that our Ælian was the ſame, who is mentioned by Martial, and diſtinguiſh'd by him with the epithet of Eloquent, in the xxivth epigram of his xiith book,

O jucunda, Covine ſolitudo,
Carrucâ magis, eſſedoque gratum,
Facundi mihi munus Æliani.

(2) De Hiſtor. Græcis, l. 2. c. 11.

He grounds this opinion upon the ſuppoſition, that Martial and Ælian were contemporaries, and upon Suidas's obſervation, that the latter was celebrated for the delicacy of his ſtyle. But Perizonius has confuted this notion of Voſſius without leaving any room for a reply.

[C] Authors are divided in their opinions with regard to his works.] Some writers, and particularly John Gerard Voſſius, aſcribe the various or miſcellaneous Hiſtory, that De Animalibus, and the work intitled Tactica or De Re Militari to the ſame author. Bochart (3), and Iſaac Voſſius (4) are of opinion, that the two firſt belong to different authors. But Perizonius maintains, that theſe two books were written by the ſame Ælian, whom he diſtinguiſhes from the author of the Tactica, who was likewiſe nam'd Ælian. He obſerves, that the author of the Tactica was a native of Greece, as plainly appears from his Preface; whereas the author of the Varia Hiſtoria, and De Animalibus was born according to Suidas at Præneſte; and as Philoſtratus aſſerts, a Roman Citizen; whence in the Medicean Manuſcript he is called Ῥωμαῖος, and he himſelf often tells us in his Varia Hiſtoria, that he was a Roman (5). It is true we read at the end of the Tactica in the Medicean Manuſcript, Αἰλιανῦ ἀρχιερέως Τακτικὴ Θεωρία, i. e. "The Theory of Tactics of Ælian the High-prieſt, which ſeems to inſinuate, that Ælian, whom Suidas mentions and calls Ἀρχιερέα, was likewiſe the author of the Tactica; but as the author of this piece was without doubt a native of Greece, and Ælian, whom Suidas mentions, a Roman, Perizonius is of opinion, that this was inſerted by ſome ignorant tranſcriber: We may add, that the author of the Tactica lived under the Emperor Adrian, who began to reign in the year of the Chriſtian Æra 117, and to whom he dedicates his work; whereas our Ælian wrote about the end of Alexander Severus's reign, who was created Emperor in 222, as Perizonius demonſtrates (6).

(5) L. 2. c. 38. L. 12. c. 25. L. 14. c. 45.

(6) See Hiſtoria Litteraria, or an early and exact Account of the moſt valuable Books publiſhed in the ſeveral parts of Europe, Vol. 2. N° 8. Art. 19. p. 158. printed for N. Prevoſt 1731, 8o.

[D] He wrote ſeveral other works.] An invective intitled Κατηγορία Γύννιδος, where by the fictitious name of Gynnis he meant, as he declared to Philoſtratus Lemnius, that Tyrant, who had lately diſhonoured the Roman empire with his lewd converſation and infamous behaviour. This tyrant was very probably the Emperor Heliogabalus, tho' Voſſius is of opinion it was Domitian. Philoſtratus told Ælian upon this occaſion, that he ſhould have admired his reſolution more, if he had accuſed the tyrant, while he was living, ſince it would have ſhewn a noble and manly ſpirit to have attacked him then; whereas the meaneſt of mankind might ſafely fall upon him, when he was dead. Ælian compoſed alſo a book intitled, Περὶ Προνοίας, i. e. "Of Providence," mentioned by Euſtathius (7); and another, Περὶ Θείων Ἐναργειῶν, i. e. "Of the divine Appearances," or rather, "Of the Declarations of Providence," which ſome maintain to be the ſame with the former, tho' under a different title. Stephanus Byzantinus in the word Χερρόνησος quotes Ælian's firſt book Ἱστορικῆς Διαλεξίως; which Voſſius (8) ſuppoſes to be a diſtinct work from the Ποικίλης Ἱστορίας, i. e. "The various Hiſtory," ſince Stephanus tells us, that Ælian in that book forms Χερρονήσιος from Χερρόνησος; whereas we have no ſuch word in the firſt book of Ælian's Various Hiſtory.

(7) In Periegetam Dionyſii.

(8) Ubi ſupra.

[E] An objection, that has been made againſt his manner of writing.] It is ſaid (9), that there is juſt reaſon of complaining of him, for borrowing ſo frequently from other writers what he relates, and even in their own words, without ſo much as making mention of them. The authors from whom he has chiefly copied are Plato, Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, Thucydides, Herodotus, Plutarch, and Athenæus. He ſometimes relates the ſame thing twice and with quite different circumſtances, having found it ſo reported by different authors. We have a plain inſtance in L. 2. c. 6. and

(9) Hiſtor. Litteraria, ubi ſupra.

(3) Hierozoic. Part I l. 2. c. 46. p. 522. and c. 55. p. 627. Part II. l. 1. c. 4. p. 21.

(4) Append. Obſerv. ad Pompon. Melam, p. 38.

There have been ſeveral editions of his Various Hiſtory [F].

and L. 14. c. 8. of his Various Hiſtory; in both which places he tells us of one Hippomachus, who chaſtiſed his diſciple, becauſe in performing his exerciſe he had been applauded by the people; adding, that without doubt he had done ſomething amiſs, and not according to art, ſince they had been ſo favourable to him. In the ſecond book he calls Hippomachus Γυμναστὴς, or the Wreſtling-maſter, and tells us, that this happened while he was teaching his diſciples to wreſtle; whereas in the 14th book he calls the ſame Hippomachus Αὐλητὴς, or a Player upon the flute, and acquaints us that this happened while he was teaching his diſciple to play upon that inſtrument. In this Hiſtoria Animalium, he in two different places deſcribes the Apes of India, viz. L. 16. c. 10. and L. 17. c. 39. In the former he tells us, that their head is white, and the reſt of their body black; in the latter, that their head is reddiſh, but the reſt of their body white. However, we may obſerve, that ſome critics, and particularly Gerard John Voſſius, are of opinion, that he died before he had revis'd and finiſhed his Various Hiſtory, ſince the ſtyle of it is not near ſo elegant as that of his Hiſtoria Animalium; and it is very probable, that he would have put thoſe chapters, which begin with the word ὅτι, into another form, ſince no writers but thoſe, who give abſtracts of other authors, expreſs themſelves in that manner; as appears from the Abridgment of Strabo, Photius's Bibliotheca, and other works of that nature. This conſideration may extenuate the miſtakes, which our author may have committed in a work of that various and complicated kind; but it is undoubtedly a conſiderable error in him not to mention the originals, from which he borrowed his accounts of things.

[F] Several editions of his Various Hiſtory.] The Greek text was firſt publiſh'd at Rome in 1545, by Camillus Peruſcus; ſoon after Juſtus Vulteius tranſlated it into Latin, which tranſlation was printed ſeparately by John Oporinus in 1548, and joined to the Greek text in a new edition by Henricus Petrus, at Baſil, 1555. This is a large volume, containing beſides Ælian's Various Hiſtory, the works of ſeveral other authors, who have treated on ſuch ſubjects as Ælian. The year following Conrad Geſner publiſh'd all the works of Ælian at Bern with ſome ſhort notes. He likewiſe confronted Vulteius's verſion with the original, altering it in ſome places. John Tornæſius did the ſame in his Lyons editions of 1587, 1610, and 1625. In the Preface to the firſt edition he tells us, that he had followed Geſner's edition in the Greek text, that Vulteius's had been compared with the original, and corrected in innumerable places; and in the Preface to the two latter editions he informs us, that he had illuſtrated the text with the learned notes and conjectures of Iſaac Caſaubon added in the margin; but the reader will ſcarce find in both theſe editions any thing beſides the bare notes and conjectures of Geſner. However Ælian was reprinted with the ſame preface and marginal notes by John Libertus, at Paris 1618, and Jac. Stoerius at Geneva in 1630. All theſe editions were eclipſed by that of John Schefferus in 1647 and 1662. This judicious commentator, by only confronting Ælian with other authors, and collating the ſeveral editions, without receiving the leaſt help from manuſcript copies, rectified the text in many places; corrected ſeveral faults, which had not been obſerved by others, and illuſtrated the whole with very learned notes and animadverſions. But at the ſame time he ſhews himſelf but a very indifferent Greek Scholar. As for inſtance, wherever he meets with οἱ, he takes it to be the nominative of the plural number, not knowing that it is often uſed by the Greek writers in the dative of the ſingular inſtead of αὐτῷ. This leads him into ſome groſs miſtakes, and makes him confound paſſages, which are otherwiſe very clear; as he likewiſe confounds the compounds of the verbs εἰμὶ, εἶμι, and ἵημι. This tranſlation of Schefferus was republiſhed by Tan. Faber at Saumur 1668; which edition is the moſt incorrect of all, tho' Faber pretends in his Preface, that he had reviſed it with the utmoſt care imaginable, and corrected it wherever it was neceſſary: Se Græcum Æliani contextum quanta maxima fieri potuerit diligentia recenſuiſſe, & ubi res poſtulabat emendaſſe. The ſame verſion of Schefferus was publiſh'd again in 1685 by Joach. Kuhnius, who added his own notes to thoſe of Schefferus and Faber. But Perizonius finding ſeveral defects both in the notes of other commentators, and the tranſlation of Vulteius, gave a new edition of Ælian's Various Hiſtory in two volumes in 8vo at Leyden 1701, after having collated the ſeveral editions, and whatever manuſcript copies he could procure. He followed the tranſlation of Vulteius, which he rectified in many places, together with the Greek text, illuſtrating the moſt intricate paſſages with learned notes. The laſt edition is that of Abraham Gronovius, who has given the Greek text and Latin verſion of Vulteius as rectified and corrected, by Perizonius; together with the notes of Conrade Geſner, Joh. Schefferus, Tanaquil Faber, Joach. Kuhnius, and Jac. Perizonius: to which he has added ſhort Notes of his own, and the Fragments of Ælian, which Kuhnius collected from Suidas, Stobæus, and Euſtathius. He has annexed to this edition two copious Indexes, the one Greek and the other Latin; and prefixed to it all the Dedications and Prefaces of the other commentators (10). T.

(10) See Hiſtoria Litteraria, ubi ſupra.

☞ÆLIUS, the name of ſeveral eminent men among the Romans. I. Ælius (a) Pætus, a Roman Prætor, who gained the eſteem of the Romans by a very remarkable inſtance of his diſintereſted love for his country [A]. II. Ælius Catus a Conſul, famous for his knowledge of the civil law (b), and for his plain and frugal manner of living. The Embaſſadors of the Ætolians having paid him a viſit during his Conſulſhip, and finding him eating out of earthen diſhes, made him a preſent of ſilver ones; which he excuſed himſelf from accepting, and never uſed any veſſels of that metal in his houſe, except two cups, which L. Paulus gave him after the conqueſt of King Perſeus on account of his diſtinguiſhed merit (c). III. Luc. Ælius, who was called Stylo, becauſe he uſed to dedicate orations to all the men of quality (d). He was born at Lanuvium an ancient city of Latium, near Rome. He was Varro's maſter, which ſhews the time when he flouriſhed (e). Varro gives him the character of a man of great learning, though he differed from him very frequently in the etymology of words.

(a) Some writers call him Lælius, and others Cælius.

(b) Cicero de Oratore l. 1.

(c) Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 33. c. 11.

(d) Sueton. de Illuſtrib. Grammatic. c. 3.

(e) Aul. Gell. l. 16. c. 8.

[A] A remarkable inſtance of his diſintereſted love for his country.] While he was upon the bench, hearing cauſes, a wood-pecker ſat upon his head. The Augurs being conſulted upon this occaſion, gave anſwer, that if he kept the bird alive, his family ſhould enjoy the greateſt proſperity imaginable, while the commonwealth ſhould labour under the moſt dreadful misfortunes. But if he killed it, the reverſe ſhould happen both in his family and in the commonwealth. Upon this he immediately tore the bird to pieces with his teeth before the Senate. Agreeable to this preſage he loſt ſeventeen of his family, all men of diſtinguiſh'd valour, in one day at the battle of Cannæ, while the Roman Republic was gradually raiſed to the higheſt pitch of grandeur and magnificence. Valerius Maximus obſerves, after relating this ſtory, that Sylla, and Marius, and Cinna, thoſe oppreſſors of their country, muſt certainly have laugh'd at ſuch inſtances of public ſpirit as the greateſt folly. Hæc nimirum exempla, Sylla, & Marius, & Cinna tanquam ſtulta riſerunt (1). The ambitious and the tyrant are apt to conſider virtue in others either as hypocriſy or ſtupidity; for their own vicious minds are too often the ſtandard, by which they judge of other men.

(1) Valer. Max. l. 5. c. 6. Exemp. 4.

words (f). Aulus Gellius ſtiles him the moſt learned of all the Romans of his age (g). He wrote ſeveral works, and particularly one de Proloquiis (h). He followed Quintus Metellus Numidicus into baniſhment (i). Cicero gives him a very noble character [B]. IV. Ælius (k) Mancia of Formiæ, ſon of a freedman, who in his old age accuſed L. Libo before the Cenſors, and being oppoſed by Pompey the Great, made a very keen repartee to him [C]. V. Ælius Gallus, a Roman Knight (l), and a particular friend of Strabo the Geographer (m). He was Governor of Egypt (n), and was ſent by Auguſtus on an expedition into Arabia [D]. VI. Ælius Lamia, the firſt huſband of Domitia Longina, was condemned to death by Domitian's order, who had debauched his wife. His pretence for this ſeverity was a few innocent jeſts that Ælius had made (o). VII. Ælius Meliſſus who lived in the time of Aulus Gellius, and had the character of a conſiderable Grammarian at Rome. But he had more oſtentation than real knowledge, and more pedantry and ſophiſtry than polite learning. He wrote ſeveral Treatiſes, and among the reſt a book De Loquendi Proprietate, i. e. Of the Propriety

(f) Id. l. 1. c. 18.
(g) L. 10. c. 21.
(h) Id. l. 16. c. 8.
(i) Sueton. ubi ſupra.
(k) He is named Helvius in ſome editions of Val. Maximus.
(l) Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 28.
(m) Strabo l. 2. p. 179. edit. Amſtelod. 1707.
(n) Idem, ibid.
(o) Sueton. in Domitian, c. 10.

[B] Cicero gives him a very noble character.] He tells us, that he was an excellent man, and a very honourable Roman Knight; that he was extremely well skill'd in the Roman and Greek learning, and particularly in the Roman Antiquity, and Hiſtory, and in the ancient Writers; which kind of Literature, ſays he, our Varro learn'd of him, and as he is a man of admirable genius, enlarged the bounds of it himſelf, and explain'd it with the greateſt learning and elegance. Fuit is vir omnino egregius, & Eques Romanus cum primis honeſtus, idemque eruditiſſimus & Græcis literis, & Latinis, antiquitatiſque noſtræ & in inventis rebus & actis, ſcriptorumque veterum literatè peritus; quam ſcientiam Varro noſter acceptam ab illo, auctamque per ſeſe, vir ingenio præſtans, omnique doctrinâ pluribus & illuſtrioribus literis explicavit (2). He tells afterwards that Ælius was a Stoic, but never affected the character of an Orator; tho' he wrote Orations for others, as for Qu. Metellus the younger, Qu. Cæpio, and Qu. Pompeius Rufus.

(2) Cicero in Bruto ſeu de Claris Oratoribus.

[C] Made a very keen repartee to him.] Pompey had reproach'd him with the meanneſs of his birth, and his extreme old age, and told him, that he ſeem'd to have come from the infernal regions in order to form accuſations againſt men. "Yes, ſays Mancia, "it is true, Pompey, I am come from thence to ac- "cuſe L. Libo; but while I ſtaid there, I ſaw Cn. "Domitius Ahenobarbus all bloody and lament- "ing, that himſelf who was born of a noble fami- "ly, and was a man of excellent character, and a "great lover of his country, was ſlain by your or- "ders in the very flower of his youth. I ſaw Bru- "tus, who had all the ſame accompliſhments as Do- "mitius, covered with wounds, and complaining, "that your perfidiouſneſs at firſt, and afterwards your "cruelty, was the occaſion of his misfortune. I ſaw "Cn. Carbo, who had ſo vigorouſly defended you "in your childhood, and ſecured your father's eſtate "to you, and who was bound by your orders in "chains in his third Conſulſhip, and expoſtulated "with you in vain; while you, without any regard "to his high quality and your own rank, (for you "was but a Roman Knight then,) and contrary to "all law and reaſon, commanded him to be put to "death. I ſaw Perpenna, a man of prætorian qua- "lity, in the ſame condition, curſing your cruel diſ- "poſition. In ſhort, all of them were unanimouſly "expreſſing their reſentments, that you who was "but a mere boy, ſhould prove their executioner, "without ever admitting any defence from them "(3)."

(3) Val. Max. l. 6. c. 2. Exem. 8.

[D] Sent by Auguſtus on an expedition into Arabia.] We have a very particular account of this expedition in Strabo (4), who, as we obſerved above, was an intimate friend of this General. Auguſtus Cæſar ſent Ælius into Arabia, in order to diſcover that country, and likewiſe the boundaries of Æthiopia, and Troglodytica, which borders upon Ægypt, and the Arabian bay, which is very narrow, and divides the Arabians from the Troglodytes. His deſign was, that the General ſhould either treat with them, if they would comply, or ſubdue them by force, if they ſhould reſiſt. He had heard that they were extremely rich, and exchanged their ſpices for gold, and ſilver, and precious ſtones. So that he was in hopes of making uſe of their riches if they ſhould agree to an alliance with him, or of ſeizing them, if they ſhould prove enemies. He was encouraged to this deſign by his friendſhip with the Nabatheans, who promis'd to aſſiſt him in every reſpect. Gallus upon theſe news march'd his army forward; but he was deceived by Syllæus the Procurator of the Nabatheans, who had engaged to ſhew him the way, and ſupply him with proviſions and all things neceſſary, tho' he acted in the moſt treacherous manner imaginable. For inſtead of directing him to the quickeſt and ſafeſt paſſage both by ſea and land, he expoſed him to the utmoſt dangers and fatigues. The firſt miſtake was in building ſhips of war, which were unneceſſary, becauſe there was no probability of any ſea-fight, ſince the Arabians are not very formidable at land, much leſs at ſea, and are generally merchants rather than ſoldiers. Ælius had built ninety ſhips of war and galleys at Cleopatris near the old canal of the Nile. But when he had diſcovered his error, he ordered a hundred and twenty ſhips of burden to be built, and ſet ſail with ten thouſand foot of the Romans, who were in Egypt, and the allies, beſides five hundred Jews, and one thouſand Nabatheans under Syllæus. After fifteen days ſailing, and a variety of fatigues, he came to the White Town (5), a great mart of the Nabatheans, having loſt ſeveral ſhips with the men in them in the voyage. This was occaſioned by the treachery of Syllæus, who affirmed that there was no paſſage by land thither for an army, when the caravans of Merchants with their camels, which are as numerous as an army, go thither, and even beyond, with the utmoſt ſecurity. This misfortune happened to Gallus, becauſe King Obeidas took no manner of care of theſe affairs, which was the common fault of the Arabian Kings, but truſted the whole to Syllæus his Procurator; whoſe deſigns were very treacherous. For he wanted to view the country, and reſolved to attend the Romans, till they had ſubdued ſome cities and nations; and when they were deſtroyed by diſeaſes, and hunger, and labour, to take poſſeſſion of all they had conquer'd. When Ælius's army were come to the White Town, they were ſeized with the diſtempers common in that country, which affected their mouths and legs, and are called Stomacace, and Scelotyrbe (6), and were occaſioned by the water and the herbs they made uſe of. So that they were obliged to winter there, in order to recover the ſick. Gallus then march'd his army thro' ſuch places, that he was forced to carry water upon camels, which was occaſioned by the treachery of the guides. After ſeveral days he reached the country of Aretas, who was related by marriage to Obeidas. He ſhew'd the utmoſt civility to Gallus, and preſented him with ſeveral valuable gifts. But they met with a great many difficulties in their paſſage thro' this country, thro' Syllæus's means. However they paſs'd thro' it in thirty days, and came into the country of the Nomades, which is for the moſt part a deſert. It was call'd Ararena, and the King of it Sabus. This they paſs'd thro' in fifty days, and then came to the city of the Agranians, and to a country remarkable for its fertility, and the peaceableneſs of its inhabitants. The King fled, and the city was taken at the firſt aſſault. Six days after they came to a river, where they were met by the Barbarians, ten thouſand of whom were ſlain, while only two of the Roman ſoldiers were killed. For this people were very unſkilful in the uſe of their arms, which were bows and priety of Words, and their different Significations, in which he obſerved, that matrona is a woman, who has been brought to bed but once; whereas mater familias is one who has had ſeveral children. Aulus Gellius has given an account of this trifling criticiſm of Meliſſus, but explodes it with the utmoſt contempt (p). Suetonius mentions one Lenæus Meliſſus (q), and likewiſe Caius Meliſſus, who was a great favourite of Mecænas, and recommended by him to Auguſtus (r). VIII. Ælius Serenianus, a Civilian, and one of the ſcholars of the famous Papinian, and Counſellor to the Emperor Alexander Severus (s). Lampridius ſays (t), that he was a man of exemplary integrity. Baronius pretends, that this was the Governor of Cappadocia, mentioned by Firmilian Biſhop of Ceſarea, in one of his letters to St. Cyprian. IX. Ælius Succeſſus, the father of Pertinax the Emperor, was a Ligurian (u), and traded in wood (x). He brought up his ſon to learning, but he choſe rather to follow his father's buſineſs, and could not be induced to alter his reſolution; which obſtinacy of his occaſioned his father to give him the name of Pertinax (y). X. Ælius Xifidius, Prefect of the Exchequer under the Emperor Valerian. We have a letter of that Emperor to him in favour of Aurelian, who was then Conſul, inſerted in Vopiſcus's Life of Aurelian (z). Moreri has committed ſeveral errors in theſe ſhort articles [E]. Collier is likewiſe very faulty.

(4) L. 16. pag. 1126. edit. Amſtelod. 1707.

(5) Εἰς Ἀυκὴν Κώμην.

(6) See likewiſe Plin. l. 25. c. 3.

(p) Noct. Attic. l. 18. c. 6.
(q) De Illuſtrib. Grammat. c. 3.
(r) Idem, ibid. c. 21.
(s) Lamprid. in Vitâ Alex. c. 68.
(t) Ibid.
(u) Dion. Caſſius in Pertinace.
(x) Jul. Capitolinus in Pertin. c. 1.
(y) Id. ibid. and Caſaubon in loc.
(z) C. 12.

and lances, and ſwords, and ſlings, and for the moſt part axes. They afterwards took the city Aſca, which was abandon'd by the King. Then they came to Anthrulla, which they ſoon took, and fortified with a garriſon; and having furniſh'd themſelves with corn and fruits of palm-trees, they marched to Marſyabus a city of the Rhamanites, who were under Ilaſarus. They beſieged this city for ſix days, but were obliged to leave it for want of water. Ælius found by the priſoners whom he had taken, that he was but two days journey from the country which produces ſpices. But he ſpent ſix months in the journey thro' the fault of his guides. He found out their treachery too late, but when he diſcovered it, he return'd another way, and came in nine encampments to Anagrana, where there was a battle fought; and in his eleventh encampment to the Seven Wells (7). He march'd then thro' a peaceable country to the town of Chaalla, and afterwards to that of Malotha, ſituated upon a river; and ſo thro' deſerts, which had very little water, to the town of Nera, which is under Obida, and lies by the ſea. In his return he performed the whole journey in ſixty days, which he had been ſix months in performing before. From hence he tranſported his army in eleven days to Myos-hormos, and thence to Coptus, and ſo to Alexandria, with the beſt of his troops; for the reſt periſhed thro' hunger, fatigue, diſeaſes, and the difficulty of the journey; whereas ſeven only were killed in battle. This expedition made ſome diſcovery in thoſe countries, tho' not very conſiderable. The blame of all theſe misfortunes was juſtly imputed to Syllæus, who was puniſhed at Rome for it; for being convicted of other crimes beſides this treachery, he was beheaded. The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to find here an account of an expedition little known, and which very probably has never been tranſlated into our language.

(7) Ἑπτὰ φρέατα.

[E] Moreri has committed ſeveral errors in theſe ſhort articles.] 1. He ſays, that Ælius Stylo wrote two books De Ratione Vocabulorum. He quotes no authority for this. II. He ſays that Ælius Serenianus was couſin to the Emperor Alexander Severus, and one of the moſt learned men of his time. He quotes Lampridius for this aſſertion; whoſe words are very different from ſuch a ſenſe; Catilius Severus cognatus ejus vir omnium doctiſſimus, Ælius Serenianus omnium vir ſanctiſſimus, &c. (8). i. e. "Among his "other Counſellors were Catilius Severus his couſin, "the moſt learned man of his time, and Ælius Se"renianus a perſon of the moſt exemplary charac"ter." Here Moreri confounds Catilius Severus and Ælius Serenianus, and applies what Lampridius ſays of the former to the latter. III. He ſays, that Ælius Succeſſus was ſurnamed Pertinax, becauſe he could not be perſuaded to leave off his trade in wood; whereas it is plain from Julius Capitolinus, that this name was given by him on that account to his ſon, who was afterwards Emperor upon the death of Commodus. IV. He ſays, that Flavius Vopiſcus has given us in the Life of Aurelian a letter of Ælius Xifidius to Valerian the Emperor; whereas it is evident, that this letter was written by that Emperor to Ælius. T.

(8) Lamprid. in Vitâ Alex. Severi, c. 68.

ÆMILIUS (ANTHONY) Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the Univerſity of Utrecht, was born on the 20th of December 1589, at Aix la Chapelle, whither his father had fled on account of his being a Proteſtant [A]. He went thro' his firſt ſtudies in his own country, and in the country of Juliers under John Kunius, and afterwards at Dort under Adrian Marcellus, and the famous Gerard John Voſſius. When he had gone through the Claſſes, he went to Leyden, and attended principally the Lectures of Baudius. He afterwards viſited the Univerſities of foreign countries, and ſpent four years in thoſe travels. He lodged at Heidelberg with David Pareus, and conſulted the Palatine Library at his leiſure. At Saumur, he was particularly known to Mr. du Pleſſis-Mornai, who procured him as many books as he deſired. At his return to his own country he ſucceeded Voſſius, as Rector of the College at Dort. He was then in his 26th year. Three or four years afterwards (a) he removed to Utrecht, to exerciſe a like function there. He diſcharged this office ſome years, and then quitted it, I know not for what reaſon, and reſumed it at the end of four years (b) with the addition of a more honourable office, that of Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the Illuſtrious School. This School was ſoon after raiſed to an Univerſity: Ælimius continued Profeſſor there till his death, and gained a great eſteem both for his learning and eloquence. They had a great

(a) In 1619.
(b) In 1634.

[A] His father had fled to Aix la Chapelle, on account of his being a Proteſtant.] His name was John Meles (1): In his youth he was a Merchant at Antwerp; afterwards at Rome, and after that wherever he dwelt. He was born a Catholic, but having obſerved at Rome, that many entertained one another in the time of divine ſervice with their love adventures, he began to ſuſpect his religion, and examined it more cloſely: he grew every day more and more out of conceit with it, and ſecretly embraced the Reformed Religion. At laſt, that he might have an opportunity to profeſs it openly he quitted Liege, and went to ſettle at Aix la Chapelle, from whence he retired into the dutchy of Juliers, when the Emperor commanded the church and ſchool of the Proteſtants at Aix la Chapelle to be ſhut up. At laſt he fled to Dort (2).

(1) His ſon Anthony latiniſed this name very honourably, turning it into that of a moſt illuſtrious Roman family, the Gens Æmilia.

(2) Extracted from the funeral Oration of Anthony Æmilius.

great desire to get him to Leyden, to fill the Greek Professor's chair, which was vacant by the call of Vossius to Amsterdam. He stopped however at Utrecht; but to promote this resolution, the Curators of the University of Utrecht augmented his salary, without which, as was acknowledged in his funeral oration (c), he would infallibly have changed his situation. The principal subject of his Lectures for above twenty six years which he continued in his office, were taken out of the Annals of Tacitus. He died the tenth of November 1660 (d). His attachment to the new Philosophy was not mentioned in his funeral oration. That would have renewed the memory of his intimacy with Des Cartes [B]. He published in 1651 a Collection of Latin Orations and Poems.

(c) Haud dubiè secutura fuerat alia (vocatio) priori pinguior, secutura dico, sed longo intervallo in locum Heinsii emeriti, nisi Pallas Ultrajectina huic conatui injecisset securim auctо stipendio Æmiliano sub decessum Schotani Juris-consulti ad prensatores Batavos.

(d) Extracted from his Funeral Oration, pronounced by Daniel Berckringerus the 21st of Nov. 1660. The Diarium of the Sieur Witte mistakes in placing his death in the year 1661.

[B] He was intimate with Des Cartes.] Æmilius highly extolled Des Cartes in his funeral Oration for Reneri, who had publickly taught the opinions of that Philosopher in the university of Utrecht. In which he followed his own inclination and the desire of the chief Magistrate of Utrecht, who sent him expres orders, to commend Des Cartes and the new Philosophy in the funeral Oration of Mr. Reneri (3). The author of the Elogium sent his manuscript Oration to Des Cartes with a letter full of respect. He received such an answer as became these honourable advances, and thence began their intimacy. This passed in 1639. He had no ocasion to be a Nicodemus, a concealed Disciple propter metum Judæorum, for the storm against Regius had not yet begun: so that this is no proof of Æmilius's courage; but here follows one: he not only refused having any hand in the proceedings of the university of Utrecht in 1642 against Des Cartes and Regius his follower, but he formed also an opposition to the judgment that was given (4).

(3) Baillet, Vie de des Cartes, tom. 2. p. 22.

(4) Ibid. p. 755.

ÆMILIUS (PAULUS) was a native of Verona. The reputation he had acquired in Italy, made Stephen Poncher Bishop of Paris, advise King Lewis the XIIth to prevail with him to write the History, in Latin, of the Kings of France (a). For this purpose he was invited to Paris, where a Canonry in the Cathedral Church was given him. He withdrew to the college of Navarre, in order to compose this work (b), and followed it very close; but though he spent many years at it, he yet had not an opportunity of finishing the tenth book (c), which was to include the beginning of the reign of Charles the Eighth. Æmilius was very nice and difficult with regard to his own writings [A], and had always some correction or other to make. Although I have read what upwards of twenty writers say of him, I yet don't find that one of them tells us, at what time he came to Paris; how he was employed in Italy; which is the first edition of his History, and whether it preceded his death. He died in 1529 [B], and was buried in the Cathedral at Paris. Lipsius was mightily pleased with his History of France, and it is generally looked upon as well written [C]; but, on the other side, it is

(a) See the note [F].

(b) Launoius, Hist. Gymnasii Navarræ, p. 13.

(c) Vide the remark [F].

[A] He was very nice and difficult with regard to his own writings.] Erasmus imputes the same fault to him, that was objected to the Painter who thought he never had finish'd his pieces (1). Huic vitio affinis fuit vir eximiè doctus Paulus Æmilius Veronensis, qui sibi nunquam satisfaciebat, sed quoties recognoscebat sua, mutabat pleraque: diceres non opus correctum sed aliud; idque subinde faciebat. Quæ res in causa fuit, ut citius elephanti pariant quàm ille quicquam edere posset. Nam historiam quam edidit, plusquam triginta annis habuit præ manibus. Et suspicor huc adactum ut evulgaret (2). i. e. "That "very learned Man Paulus Æmilius of Verona "gave pretty much into this fault; for he was never satisfied with himself, but whenever he revised his own compositions, he made so many "alterations, that one would not look upon it as a "piece that had been corrected, but a quite different "one; and this he used to do very often. This made "him so slow, that elephants could bring forth sooner "than he could compose. For he employed above 30 "years in writing the History he published. And I "believe he was compelled to give it to the world." We shall examine hereunder, whether he really employed thirty years in composing the History of France, as Erasmus and other authors assert.

(1) This was Protogenes. Manum de tabula tollere nesciebat. i. e. "He did not "know when to "take off his "pencil." In this Apelles boasted himself his superior. See Erasmus, Apopht. lib. 6. p. m. 524.

(2) Idem, ibid.

[B] He died in 1529.] This I find in his History of France, printed at Basil anno 1601, in folio, under some Latin verses where he speaks of his condition. According to Bucholcer (3) and Vossius (4), he died the fifth of July, 1529. Spondanus fixes it to the fifth of May, 1519 (5), but is mistaken. I shall cite Erasmus hereunder, who, in a book, the epistle dedicatory whereof is dated anno 1528, mentions Paulus Æmilius as living. Here follows a pretty strong proof. Father du Breul (6) assures, that the epitaph of Paulus Æmilius, engraved on a flat stone, in the North window of the church of Notre Dame, or Our Lady, at Paris, is as follows: Paulus Æmilius Veronensis, hujus Ecclesiæ Canonicus, qui præter eximiam vitæ sanctitatem, quanta quoque doctrina præstiterit index atque testis erit Historia de rebus gestis Francorum, posteris ab eodem edita. Obiit anno Domini 1529, die quinta mensis Maii. i. e. "Paulus Æmilius of Ve- "rona, a Canon of this church, who, besides the great "sanctity of his life, was very conspicuous for his "learning, of which his History of France, written "for the information of posterity, is a proof. He "died the fifth of May, in the year of our Lord "1529." This would be look'd upon as a sufficient proof, even by such as had not been upon the spot, did Printers never mistake in their accounts of public inscriptions; but they so often alter figures, that there is no trusting them. We have an example of this in the subject we are now writing upon; for Mr. B, in his Description of the city of Paris, gives us the same epitaph of Paulus Æmilius, and puts Judex instead of Index; and 1526 instead of 1529 (7). Note that he assures us, that the place where this author was buried is not exactly known, and that his epitaph was visible not many years since; a proof that it is now obliterated.

(3) Bucholc. in Judice Chronol. p. m. 518.

(4) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 675.

(5) Spond. Ann. Eccl. ad ann. 1488, num. 5. pag. 189. edit. Lugdun. 1678 and cites Gall. Christ. in Præf. Paris. num. 103.

(6) Du Breul, Antiquitez des Paris, liv. 1. p. m. 14.

(7) Page 182. Vol. 2. Hague edition 1685.

[C] Justus Lipsius was mightily pleased with his History of France, which is generally said to be well written.] It is divided into ten books, and extends from Pharamond to the fifth year of Charles the VIIIth, that is, to 1488. The tenth book was found among his papers in a pretty confused condition, so that the editor was obliged to collect a great number of papers full of rasures, before it could be published in the manner we now see it. The person who undertook this task was a relation of the author, whose name we shall see in the following Latin words. Ac libros quidem novem perfecit: decimum morte præventus reliquit imperfectum. Sed eum propinquus illius, Daniel Zavarisius Veronensis ex schedis dispersis, multaque litura obductis collegit, ac digessit ita uti nunc legitur (8). i. e. "He compleated nine books, "but left the tenth imperfect, being prevented by "death. But his relation Daniel Zavarisio of Ve- "rona collected it and gave it the form we now see, "from his scattered papers, in which were a great "number of rasures." Michael Vascosan tells us, that the edition which he dedicates to Francis I, deserves ſerves a more favourable reception, ſince he had annex'd to it the tenth book, which he had lately received from Daneſio (9). He had juſt before ſaid, that he gave a more beautiful and more correct edition of that hiſtory, Elegantius à nobis excuſum (opus) & caſtigatum. His epiſtle dedicatory is dated from Paris, the fifth of May 1539, whence we may naturally conclude, that there was an edition of this work, containing but nine books, before the year 1539. I expreſs my ſelf with this caution, becauſe I know that the word elegantius is not neceſſarily a comparative. Here follows a circumſtance which might induce one to think that the author died before his firſt edition was publiſhed. It is aſſured in the abovementioned Epiſtle Dedicatory, that he would have dedicated his Hiſtory to Francis I, had he not been prevented by death. Paulus ipſe ſi viveret, tuæ majeſtati, cujus auſpiciis cæptum opus fere abſolvit, conſecraret. Quare quoniam morte præventus id non potuit, vicariam illi operam in hac re præſtabo (10). This might make us doubt what Eraſmus aſſerts, viz. that Paulus Æmilius was forc'd, in ſome manner, to print his Hiſtory of France againſt his will. Suſpicor huc adactum ut evulgaret (11). He expreſſes himſelf in this manner in a work the Dedication of which is dated Febr. 26. 1531, whence we may conclude, that the firſt edition of Paulus Æmilius's work was publiſhed before that year; however as it may be objected to me, that poſſibly Eraſmus might not know exactly the circumſtances of that edition, and that he did not reflect attentively neither on the date in which it appeared, nor that of the hiſtorian's death; we therefore ought not to conclude from his words, that the author publiſhed his own work himſelf. But I ſhall now preſent ſome ſtronger arguments to thoſe who ſtart theſe objections, and ſhow that Eraſmus was acquainted with the qualities and ſtyle of this Hiſtory of France before Paulus Æmilius died. This I prove from the words of Ciceronianus quoted hereunder (12). It will perhaps be anſwered that he had read it in manuſcript; but I can ſcarce think that in this place he would have made uſe of an example that was not public. I am therefore very apt to think, that Paulus Æmilius had publiſh'd ſomething, and we have even ſeen that according to his epitaph, he himſelf publiſhed his Hiſtory of France. By a letter dated in 1516, we find he at laſt had put to the preſs his Hiſtory of France, in the compoſition of which he had employed upwards of twenty years, which the letter-writer ſuppoſes muſt therefore be a perfect piece. Ex oratore veſtro cognovi Paulum Æmilium tandem evulgare rerum Gallicarum hiſtoriam. Non enim poterit non eſſe abſolutiſſimum opus quod à viro non minus docto quam diligenti plus annis viginti ſit elaboratum (13). Theſe are Eraſmus's words, which we find were told him by a French Embaſſador. But what follows will put the matter quite out of diſpute, for a letter written from Paris informs me that there is in the King of France's Library, An edition containing the firſt four books of Paulus Æmilius, printed at Paris without a date; but it was certainly before the year 1520, and in the beginning of the reign of Francis I, this copy having been preſented to him before he wore the cloſe crown. Let us point out an error in Eraſmus. 'Tis falſe to aſſert that Paulus Æmilius had employed upwards of twenty years in writing this Hiſtory. He was invited into France, in order to compoſe this work by Lewis XII; now the reign of this Prince began but in 1498; and had he ſent for this author immediately after his acceſſion to the throne, Paulus Æmilius could not have employed above eighteen years at moſt in writing his Hiſtory of France, at the time when Eraſmus wrote the letter abovecited. Thoſe who declare that this hiſtorian employed thirty years in writing his work, muſt ſuppoſe that he came into France the firſt year of Lewis the 12th's reign, otherwiſe their calculation would not be exact, ſince he died in 1519. Spondanus (14) was very much in the wrong to ſuppoſe the three things following; firſt, that Lewis the XIIth prevailed upon Æmilius to come into France; ſecondly, that he ſpent above thirty years in writing a Hiſtory; and thirdly, that he died in 1519. In caſe the firſt and third of theſe circumſtances were true, the ſecond would be very falſe; for it would be ridiculous to ſuppoſe that Paulus Æmilius devoted ten years to this Hiſtory, before Lewis the XIIth engaged him to write it. We are to obſerve that it has bore ſeveral impreſſions. The edition I make uſe of is that of Paris in folio, printed by Vaſcoſan in 1550. This edition had been preceded by thoſe of 1539 and 1544, and was followed by thoſe of 1555 in 8vo, and of 1566, folio, all printed by Vaſcoſan abovementioned. Du Cheſne (15) cites the edition of 1576, ex officina Vaſcoſani. With his leave, this does not do him much honour; for an author of his claſs, in a work which he entitles Bibliotheque des Auteurs qui ont eſcript l'Hiſtoire & Topographie de France, ought to take notice of the various editions, and thoſe which were firſt made expreſly. I have already ſpoke of the edition of Baſil, in 1601, fol. I ſhall now take ſome notice of the French verſions. Simon de Monthiers Counſellor of the Parliament of Roan, tranſlated the two firſt books into French, and theſe were printed at Paris, in quarto, for Vaſcoſan, 1556 (16). John Regnart a Gentleman of Anjou, Seigneur (Lord) de la Mictiere, tranſlated the firſt five books, which were printed at Paris by Claude Micard, folio (17). He alſo tranſlated the five laſt books, if we are to credit the Bookſellers who publiſhed the entire edition of Paulus Æmilius in French. I have the Paris edition of 1598, folio (18).

(8) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 674.

Here follows the judgment of Lipſius (19), which is very much to the honour of our author, tho' it be intermixed with ſome ſatyrical touches: Paulus Æmilius, ut rem dicam, pæne unus inter novos, veram & veterem Hiſtoriæ viam vidit, eamque firmo pede calcavit. Genus ſcribendi ejus doctum, nervoſum, preſſum; ad ſubtilitatem & argutias inclinans, & relinquens, deſigenſque aliquid in animo ſerii lectoris. Sententias & dicta ſæpe miſcet, paria antiquis. Rerum ipſarum ſedulus ſcrutator, ſeverus judex: nec legi noſtro ævo, qui magis liber ab affectu. Dedecus ævi eſt, quòd minus illi placeat, quaſi pauci ſint qui capiant hæc bona. In tantis tamen virtutibus etiam hæ labeculæ. Quòd ſtilum parum nectit, & ſpargit dividitque eum in minuta quædam membra. Hoc cùm in omni ſerioſâ oratione parum congruum, tum in Annalibus minimè (20), quorum eſt, ut ille ait, tarda quædam & iners ſcriptura (21). Deinde, quòd inæqualis. Alibi nimium anxius & caſtigatus, ideoque ſubobſcurus; alibi (ſed rarè uter) laxus & ſolutus. Vetuſtatis etiam neſcio quid affectat in nominibus hominum, locorum, urbium immutandis, & in veterem formam redigendis: ſæpe eruditè, interdum vanè; ſed, ut ego judico, ſemper indecorè. Quorſum Charterius Gallorum Cancellarius, Quadrigarius mihi ſit? Ille ipſe Cancellarius, dicatur Præfectus, Præfectus Juris? Et ubique Rex Tarraconenſis, Caſtulonenſis, Dux Geldubenſis: qui nobis & majoribus fuerunt, Arragoniæ, Caſtellæ, Geldriæ? Talia infinita ſunt audacter & ambitioſè innovata, & cum fraude pariter ac cruce lectoris. In his, & paucis aliis, ſi refingere leviter eum nobis & fas: (audeo dicere) virum daremus ſupra omnem hanc novitiam, & ad priſcam laudem. "Paulus Æmilius was almoſt the only Modern "who diſcovered the true and ancient way of writ- "ing Hiſtory, and followed it very cloſely. His "manner of writing is learned, nervous and cloſe, "inclining to points and conceits, and ſtriking "ſtrongly the mind of a ſerious reader. He often "intermixes maxims and ſayings equal to thoſe "of the ancients. A careful examiner and ſevere "judge of his own writings; nor have I met with "an author of our time who is leſs prepoſſeſſed. It is a ſhame to our age, that the people of "it are not pleaſed with him, whence one would "conclude that few are capable of underſtanding "theſe excellent things. However, there are a few "blemiſhes among theſe perfections; for his ſtyle is "unconnected, and his periods vaſtly ſhort. This "circumſtance which is in no manner ſuitable to ſeri- "ous ſubjects, is much leſs ſo to Annals, the ſtyle "of which, according to Tacitus, ſhould be ſlow "and diffuſed. He is alſo unequal. Sometimes he "is too ſtudied and correct, and by that means a "little obſcure: at other times, (this however but "ſeldom) looſe and negligent. He affects I know "not what air of antiquity in the names of men, "of places, of cities, which he changes and would "reduce to the ancient form, often learnedly, ſome- "times vainly; and, in my opinion, always unbe- "comingly. Why ſhould Chartier (the Chancellor of "France) be called Quadrigarius * ? and Cancella- "rius, (the Chancellor) be call'd Præfectus Juris? "and every where Rex Tarraconenſis, Caſtulonenſis, "Dux

(9) Eo etiam nomine gratior eſſe debet quod acceſſit liber decimus ad eos nuper ex Italia miſſus à Petro Daneſio; Michael Vaſcoſanus; Epiſt. Dedicat. Note that there is not any ſubſtantive in what goes before to which we can refer the word gratior.

(10) Michael Vaſcoſanus, Epiſt. Dedic. Hiſt. P. Æmilii.

(11) Eraſmus, in Apoph. lib. 6. p. 524.

(12) In the remark [F], citation (33).

(13) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 16. lib. 1. p. 60, 61.

(14) Spondan. Annal. Eccleſiaſt. ad ann. 1488. num. 5.

(15) Du Cheſne Biblioth. des Auteurs qui ont écrit l'Hiſtoire de France. i. e. "(Bibliotheque "of the Au- "thors who have "writ the Hiſ- "tory of France) p. 60. edit. of 1618.

(16) Du Verdier & la Croix du Maine.

(17) Ibid.

(18) For Robert Fouet. The Dedication to Henry III. is ſubſcribed Frederic Morel. It is not dated, but I know that the edition of this Frederic Morel was of Paris in 1581, folio.

(19) Lipſius Not. ad L. Librum Politicorum, cap. 9. p. m. 217. tom. 4. Operum edit. Veſal. 1675. In Moreri Juſtus Lipſius (Not. in lib. 1. Polit.) is citèd.

(20) La Popeliniere, who has copied this judgment of Lipſius, did not well underſtand this paſſage: That which is found improper, ſays he, Book 8. of L'Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, p. 439, in all narrations of a grave and ſerious kind, is allowed in Annals, which, as Tacitus ſays, are written in an undelicate, heavy manner.

(21) Tacit. de Cauſis corrupt. Eloq. cap. 22.

* A Carman.

is cenſured for ſeveral things [D], and a great many Frenchmen look upon it as a paltry piece. He has been unjuſtly animadverted upon for not taking notice of the holy vial at Rheims [E]. A French writer has diſcovered ſome diſguſt, that the court ſhould make a foreigner Hiſtoriographer, in prejudice of all the French; but all he ſays on this head are ſo many falſhoods [F]. We are not to omit, that Paulus Æmilius led a very

" Dux Geldubenſis, when we and our predeceſſors " us'd to ſay, King of Arragon, of Caſtile, Duke of " Geldres. A numberleſs multitude of ſuch phra- " ſes as theſe are boldly and oſtentatiouſly intro- " duced to the great trouble and prejudice of " the reader. But were I allowed to retouch him a " little, I will be ſo bold as to ſay, that he then " would be equal to the ancients." It is to be obſerved, that among other applauſes which Lipſius beſtows on Paulus Æmilius, he commends him for examining things thoroughly, and for being free from prejudice. But neither La Popeliniere nor Boeclerus allow this. Beſides ſeveral other faults, ſays the former (21), which ſome obſerve in this author's ſtyle, which Lipſius only examines; we ſhall ſhew elſewhere the little credit which ought to be given to his writings. Here follows the judgment of Boeclerus: Paulus Æmilius, cui de ſcriptoribus Gallicis, plurimùm creditur, ſæpe hiſtoriam confundit, ſæpe non ex rerum fide, ſed ex impetu calami interpolat, fingit multa, ut animo concepit, non commemorat ut memoriis publicis ea debere potuit. Non parùm adulari Pontificiæ curiæ doctus (22). i. e. " Paulus Æmilius " to whom great credit is given among the writers " of the French nation, frequently conſounds Hiſ- " tory; has often no regard to truth, but ſets down " any thing in the hurry of his writing; in- " vents a great many things, and does not relate " them with the veracity due to public writings; " and does not a little flatter the Papal Court." Could we rely on the encomiums which bookſellers make on the authors they print, we ſhould entertain a high idea of Paulus Æmilius's merit, for here follows what we read in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his work (23): Quo in negotio ſit verſatus eſt vir eloquentiſſimus, ut non ſolum recentiores omnes, qui eandem materiam tractârunt, ſuperaverit, ſed etiam veterum hiſtoricorum permultos qui populi Romani res geſtas ſcripſerunt, longo intervallo poſt ſe reliquerit. Etenim ſi vel rerum geſtarum fidem vel dicendi genus ſtudioſe velis expendere, nihil per Deos immortales hoc quidem genere ſcribendi abſolutius inveniri poſſit. Res geſtas liberè quidem, ſine ulla tamen aut ſimultatis aut gratiæ ſuſpicione narrat. Ordinem temporum ita diligenter obſervat, ut hoc nomine Livio ſit præferendus, quòd ſemper ſibi conſtet, nec uſquam pugnantia loquatur; quod plerumque in illo deprehendere licet. Regiones porro & loca quum res poſtulat ita deſcribit ut illa oculis luſtrare videaris. Ad hæc, conſilia deinde acta, poſtremò eventus ita ſuo ordine inferuntur, ut lector etiam parùm attentus turbari nullo modo poſſit. Genus dicendi fuſum atque tractum, & cum lenitate quadam æquabili profluens (24), ita ut eum Livio aliquanto magis compoſitum & perſpicuum ſentire poſſis. i. e. " In which this moſt elegant wri- " ter is ſo well verſed, that he not only ſurpaſſes all " the moderns who have written on the ſame ſub- " ject, but even very much excels a great num- " ber of the ancient Roman Hiſtorians. For if " you will diligently conſider the truth of his narra- " tions or his diction, by the immortal Gods, nothing " will be found more perfect in this ſpecies of writ- " ing. He relates facts with freedom, but without " the leaſt air of ſecret hatred or prejudice. He is " ſo careful in chronology, that on this head he is " preferable to Livy, for Æmilius is always con- " ſiſtent with himſelf, and never relates contra- " dictory particulars, which the former generally " does. Beſides, he deſcribes wherever it is neceſ- " ſary, the ſeveral places and countries, in ſo lively " a manner, that we fancy they are before our eyes. " To this we ſhall add, that the ſeveral enterprizes, " and laſtly the events are related with ſo much order " and method, that the reader who beſtows ever ſo " little attention on them, cannot be in any manner " perplexed. His ſtyle is diffuſe and flowing with a " certain eaſy evenneſs; ſo that he is a little clearer, " and may be ſooner underſtood than Livy.

[D] But then he is cenſured for ſeveral things.] This the reader will ſee from a paſſage of Sorel. " Paulus Æmilius has this encomium beſtowed upon " him, that he was the firſt who applied the ancient " rules in writing of our Hiſtory. It is ſaid that his " ſtyle is grave and nervous, and ſometimes acute " and ſubtil, but every where learned and ſententi- " ous. This is the judgment of thoſe who admire " beautiful Latin. To this we ſhall anſwer, that if " we are deſirous of uſing this author as a claſſical " one, in order to learn propriety of ſpeech by him, " there is ſome reaſon to value him upon that ac- " count; but then, there is as much reaſon to " ſtudy the Roman Hiſtorians who ought to under- " ſtand their own tongue much better. We are not " to fancy that we are bound to have a greater " eſteem for his Hiſtory becauſe it is written in beau- " tiful Latin; the natives of France ſhould under- " ſtand their Hiſtory better than he does; and we " don't find that he has been careful in his reſearches " into it. That which makes his work more copi- " ous and diffuſive is, the forged harangues and other " pieces. Such particulars as relate to truth of Hi- " ſtory are vaſtly conciſe, and in an obſcure and " perplex'd manner. We are not better ſatisfied be- " cauſe his oratorical pieces are imitated from thoſe " of the Greeks and Romans; all are not in their " proper places, becauſe the hiſtorian in ſeveral " makes Barbarians to ſpeak in a learned and eloquent " manner, which is ſeen almoſt univerſally (25). To " give one remarkable inſtance, tho' our moſt authen- " tic hiſtorians declare, that Hauier or Hanier the " Counſellor, who ſpoke an invective in preſence of " King Lewis Hutin, againſt Enguerrand de Marig- " ny, came off very wretchedly, and ſaid a great " many filly things; yet Paulus Æmilius who changes " even his name, calling him Annalis, makes him " ſpeak with an affected eloquence, nothing like " what is related of him. He alſo makes this En- " guerrand pronounce a defence, tho' it is ſaid on " the contrary that he was not allowed to ſpeak; ſo " that what the hiſtorian writ on this occaſion was " only to exerciſe his pen. This diverts the reader, " but it is not a means to inform him of the " truth (26)." Du Haillan has cenſured Paulus Æmilius upon another account, for he finds him too prolix on foreign matters, and too ſhort on his principal ſubject. He has written, ſays he, elegantly and in pure Latin, the Hiſtory of France (27), but is too conciſe on the affairs of France, and more diffuſive than is neceſſary on the holy wars, and on the ſchiſms of the church, and on the affairs of Italy.

[E] He is unjuſtly accuſed of being ſilent on the holy vial of Rheims.] Claude du Verdier looks upon this ſilence as malicious. Pauli Æmilii Veronenſis, ſays he (28), malignum ſilentium non filebo, qui multorum non meminit quæ ad Gallorum gloriam pertinerent. Nec ea ignoraſſe dici poteſt, quæ nullus ante eum præteriit, ut oleum illud ad unctionem Regum cœlitus demiſſum, & lilia ſimiliter: quibus ſi fidem non adhibuit, eam ſaltem hominum mentibus opinionem infitam eſſe dicere oportuit. i. e. " I ſhall not, ſays he, " paſs over Paulus Æmilius of Verona's malicious ſi- " lence, who omitted many things that relate to the " glory of the French nation. Nor can it be ſaid he " was ignorant of thoſe things which none were ſi- " lent upon before himſelf, ſuch as that oil which " was ſent from heaven for the anointing of our " Monarchs, and alſo the lilies. But in caſe he " had not credited theſe things, he ought to have " declared that it was the opinion of mankind." " Voſſius approves this ſilence (29).

[F] A French writer diſcovered ſome uneaſineſs, that the Court made a foreigner their Hiſtoriographer, preferable to all the French. Whatever he advances on this head is falſe.] The paſſage I am going to quote is pretty long, but I am certain it will not tire thoſe who love an exact detail of circumſtances. By this means they will know the thoughts of the author whom I ſhall cenſure in this place (30): " King

(21) Popeliniere, Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, p. 440.

(22) Joh. Henric. Boecler. in Præfat. Ser. German. apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. Author. p. m. 384.

(23) Michael Vaſcoſanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Hiſtoriæ Pauli Æmilii. Frederic Morel, in his Dedication to Henry III. of his French verſion of this Hiſtory, copied moſt of the elogiums which are given to the author in Vaſcoſan's Dedication.

(24) This is very different from Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. 139. p. 182, who ſays that Paulus Æmilius's ſtyle was laconic.

(25) Compare with this the remark [L] of the article ABDERAMA, and that of VALDES JAMES.

(26) Sorel, Bibliotheq. Françoiſe, in chap. 8. of the Guide de l'Hiſtoire de France, pag. m. 370.

(27) Du Haillan, in the Preface to his Hiſtoire de France.

(28) Claud. Verderius, in Auctor. Cenſione, p. 88. apud Pope Blount Cenſ. cel. Autorum, p. 385.

(29) Voſſius de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 675.

(30) La Popeliniere, Book I. of the Hiſtoire nouvelle des François, p. 371, & ſeq. See alſo Hiſt. des Hiſtoires, Book VIII.

a very exemplary life, and that his morals were as pure as his diction [G]. Some notice

" King Lewis the XIIth, altho' a good Prince, " and juſtly call'd the father of his people, nevertheleſs having little regard for the honour of his " ſubjects, or ill adviſed, or not mindful enough of " either of thoſe circumſtances; not condeſcending " to awake or excite any of his ſubjects to ſupply " the want of French Hiſtorians, (as tho' there had " not been men of abilities enough in France) bought " and cauſed to come into France by the perſuaſions " of Biſhop Poncher and others, Paulus Æmilius of " Verona in Lombardy. Perſuaded by his Counſellors, as favourable in that as ſeveral others who " have followed them to this day; that an Italian " could much better heighten (but rather ſtifle) the " honour to which his own ſubjects were dead, " than any of the French writers. A deſign as lightly followed and practis'd, nay confirmed by Francis " I. his ſucceſſor, who, by ſmall favours, increas'd " the general liberality of Poncher (31), with a pre- " bend in our Lady of Paris, which he conferred on " the native of Verona abovementioned. Not con- " ſidering the prejudice he did to ſo many fine ge- " nius's whom he had awak'd and well ſharpned, in " order to employ themſelves in this buſineſs as " well as in others. And eſpecially brother Robert Gaguin a Monk of the convent of the Mathu- " rins in Paris, who had already given ſo beautiful " a beginning of the Hiſtory of France in Latin, that " had he been as ſtrongly animated by the royal pre- " eminencies as the Italian, France would perhaps, " from that time, have been freed, in the mind of " foreigners, from ſuch an ignominy. But the poor " Monk not having (thro' narrowneſs of circum- " ſtances) wings ſtrong enough to fly, and diſplay " his graces beyond the cloiſter of his convent; his " mind thus bound down and a priſoner as it were, " was forc'd to ſhew that the graces how great ſoe- " ver they may be, immediately wither, and cannot " ſhine without they be fed by ſuch things as natu- " rally nouriſh the heat, and make it blaze out. " Theſe two genteel genius's, who were both well- " affected to the Government, ſtrove, under theſe " two Princes, to rival one another in their endea- " vours to give the greateſt teſtimony and devotion " to that edifice, the Hiſtory of France: which was " written by them in the ſame tongue, in the ſame " city, and from the ſame ſubjects and materials, " but not under the ſame royal auſpices; and both " left us the inheritance of their noble labours. But " Paulus Æmilius drew up his Hiſtory with ſo much " care, eloquence and truth; that the French having " yet not ſeen any thing ſo laudable, received it as " the beſt Hiſtory of France that was ever writ. " This work, to ſay the truth, has ſince ſerved as a " foundation and lively ſpring, from whence all the " ſurvivers have drawn, and made to flow, all thoſe " little rivulets, with which they thought to quench " the thirſt of their inflamed cotemporaries. Ga- " guin Prior of the Trinity, otherwiſe called the " Mathurins, did not ſhew himſelf leſs liberal of " his time, his pains, and his endeavours than the " other. But whether he found himſelf as unpro- " vided with the graces of nature, as of the favour " of his Sovereign and others, (his compoſitions be- " ing inferior in the beauty of the incidents, in or- " der, in eloquence and the weight of the ſubjects;) " the only advantage he gained over the Lombard " abovemention'd, was, that his narration was found " more ſimple and authentic; and his endeavours to " ſearch into a great number of curious particulars, " greater than thoſe of Paulus Æmilius, which the " little affection he had for our country made him " deſpiſe."

(31) Biſhop Poncher of Touraine was a Mecænas to Paulus Æmilius, and was chiefly inſtrumental in getting him from Italy, in order to his writing the Hiſtory of France in Latin. Moreover, finding his circumſtances in France not conſiderable enough for him to be able to purſue ſo laborious a work, he therefore gave him a Prebend in the church of Notre-Dame at Paris, the revenue of which enabled him to defray the greateſt part of the expences of his Hiſtory. ibid. pag. 343, 344.

There are three inexcuſable falſities in this diſcourſe. Firſt, Gaguin was not a Frenchman as la Popeliniere ſuppoſes, but a Flemming, and almoſt as much a foreigner as Paulus Æmilius; conſequently, the contraſt between the favours which were ſhewn to this Lombard, and the neglect of this pretended Frenchman, is ridiculous. Secondly, Gaguin had been dead thirteen years (32), when Francis I. ſucceeded to the crown. How then can he preſume to complain, that the liberality of this Monarch to the Italian was of great prejudice to Gaguin? How dares he repreſent theſe two hiſtorians as two rivals, who diſpute during a very long time for the palm? The one died three years after the acceſſion of King Lewis the XIIth to the throne, and the other was prevailed upon by that Monarch to come to Paris, where he lived till the fifteenth year of Francis the firſt's reign. I am to obſerve farther, that if we compare the favours and liberalities which the Court of France indulged Gaguin, with thoſe which Paulus Æmilius received, it will be found, that the ſervices of the pretended Frenchman met with a greater reward than thoſe of the Lombard. Finally, I ſay it is abſurd to aſſert, that had a conſiderable penſion been ſettled on Gaguin, he would have compiled a better Hiſtory than Paulus Æmilius. Had he been allowed an annual penſion of ten thouſand livres, he would never have been equal to his competitor. Gaguin had ſo little taſte for, and knowledge of antiquity, and wrote ſuch poor Latin, that to praiſe him juſtly, it will be ſufficient to affirm that he is not ſo barbarous as the Monks were at that time. Robertus Gaguinus non ita pridem habitus eſt magni nominis, dictione tamen quam ſcriptis venditilior. Verum ſuo ſeculo, nunc vix inter Latinè loquentes reciperetur (33). i. e. " Robert Ga- " guin was not long ſince had in great reputation, " and more valuable for his diction than for his " matter. In his own age he was look'd upon a " writer of pure Latin, but his ſtyle is now conſi- " der'd as barbarous." This is the character Eraſmus gives of him, which indeed he juſtly deſerves. But Paulus Æmilius was a quite different man, and Lewis XII. is very unjuſtly blamed for having preferr'd him to his ſubjects. There was not one man in all France at that time (34) maſter of ſo beautiful and juſt a Latin ſtyle, or underſtood ſo well the laws of Hiſtory. But when I ſay this, I don't pretend to equal him to Saluſt, Livy and other writers of their eminence.

(33) Eraſmus, in Ciceroniano, pag. m. 73.

(34) I ſpeak of the firſt years of Lewis XIIth's reign.

Quique alter haberis
Et Titus, & Criſpus, noſtræ unus conditor ingens Hiſtoriæ Æmili (35).

Engliſh'd.

" Æmilius, who haſt juſtly got the fame
" Of equalling a Livy or a Saluſt;
" Thou only mighty builder of our ſtory.

(35) Rodolphus Botereius, in Lutetia, apud du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, Book I. p. m. 14.

We muſt take notice of another miſtake of la Popeliniere. He tells us that Lewis the XIIth prevailed upon Paulus Æmilius to leave Verona, and come to France (36), which is not true, this author being at Rome when he was invited into France. This we may infer from the Latin verſes prefixed to his Hiſtory, where he ſpeaks of his family and condition, as alſo from the Latin verſes prefixed to the French tranſlation of this Hiſtory, ſubſcribed Fed. M. F.

(36) La Popeliniere, Hiſt. des Hiſtoires, p. 437.

[G] His life was as chaſte as his diction.] We will again cite Michael Vaſcoſan: Atque hoc etiam nomine præſtantius eſſe debet hoc opus quòd non ingenium ſolum Francorum Regibus ſuppeditatum eſt, ut Cyro à Xenophonte, ſed etiam authoritas ſpectatiſſimi atque in primis probati viri. Non enim magis in eo fuit admiranda eruditio excellens, cum pari eloquentia, quam perpetua vitæ integritas atque ſanctimonia. i. e. " This perfect work ought to be had in greater " eſteem upon this account, viz. that it not only " makes the Kings of France ſpeak with genius and " learning, in the ſame manner as Xenophon does " Cyrus, but alſo as the author of it was a man of " the higheſt merit. For he was no leſs to be ad- " mired for his piety and integrity than for his ex- " cellent erudition and eloquence." This is confirmed by his epitaph quoted above (37). But in caſe the reader deſires a ſtill more authentic teſtimony, let him read what follows: Pauli Æmilii & reconditam eruditionem, & diligentiam, & VITÆ SANCTITATEM, & ſummam in hiſtoria fidem exoſculor. Tullianam dictionem nec affectavit nec habet (38). i. e. " I revere the profound erudition, aſſiduity, SANC- " TITY OF LIFE, and great fidelity of Paulus Æmi- " lius. He neither affected, nor employed Tully's " ſtyle and manner of writing." Theſe are Eraſmus's words, which I extracted from a book, the Epiſtle Dedicatory of which is dated the 14th of February 1528: and it is to be obſerved, that Eraſmus ſpeaks in this place of Paulus Æmilius as of an author ſtill living.

(37) In the remark [B].

(38) Eraſmus, in Ciceroniano, p. m. 72.

(32) He died in 1501.

tice muſt be taken of a work which Julius Scaliger aſcribes to him [H], and the mighty buſtle that Scioppius made on that account.

[H] Some mention muſt be made of a work which has been aſcribed to him by Scaliger &c.] Julius Scaliger boaſted his having ſeen a book containing the Hiſtory of the family della Scala, and which was tranſlated into beautiful Latin by Paulus Æmilius. Nondum hæc nomina, quæ Comitum atque Marchionum circumferuntur, exorta erant: & Scaligerorum florebat imperium. Vultis annales noſtros aſſeramus; quos rudes, atque barbaros (ut tunc ea ferebat ætas) vir bonus atque eloquens Paulus Æmilius pulcherrimis Latinitatis donavit monumentis (39). i. e. "Thoſe "titles of Count and Marquiſs, that are now ſo com- "mon, were not then known, nor did the authority of "the Scaligers then flouriſh. Would you have me "aſſert our annals, which being rude and barbarous, "(as was the complexion of thoſe times) were drawn "up in the moſt beautiful Latin by Paulus Æmilius, "that worthy man and eloquent writer." Joſeph Scaliger relates this more at large in a letter written by him, in 1504, on the antiquity of his family. Injuria temporum, ſays he (40), malevolentia hoſtium, imperitia ſcriptorum, eos cuniculos in generis noſtri memoria egerunt, ut de totius nominis Scaligeri ruina metuendum eſſet, niſi præſto fuiſſet eloquentiſſimus vir, & antiquarum originum vindex Paulus Æmilius Veronenſis, qui nactus in Norico acta & annales proſapiæ noſtræ vetuſtiſſimos, pingui ſtilo, ut ipſe ait, conceptos, edolavit eos, & Latine loqui docuit. Ex eo libro parens meus ea excerpſit, quæ ad noſtri generis claritatem præcipue pertinere viſa ſunt. Cætera per otium deſcribere non licuit. Quod utinam feciſſet, & nobis edendi laborem reliquiſſet. i. e. "By the wild "havock of time, the malice of enemies and the "ignorance of writers, a great number of memoirs "relating to our family were loſt, ſo that the name "of Scaliger would probably have been extinct, "had it not been for Paulus Æmilius of Verona, "that moſt eloquent writer and preſerver of antiqui- "ties, who having found in Bavaria very ancient "Annals of our family, written, as he himſelf tells "us, in a courſe ſtyle, he poliſh'd and tranſlated "them into Latin. From this book my father ex- "tracted ſuch particulars as ſeemed to reflect the "greateſt honour on our family. He had not lei- "ſure to go through with the reſt, which I wiſh "however he could have done, and had left me the "labour of publiſhing it." He alſo ſpeaks of it in the firſt edition of his Commentary on Catullus, in 1576, and in the ſecond anno 1600; but in ſuch a manner as, with regard to certain circumſtances, does not agree with what I have cited of his letter De vetuſtate & ſplendore gentis Scaligeræ, i. e. "Of the "antiquity and ſplendor of the Scaliger family." Scioppius inſulted him in the moſt cruel terms upon account of theſe little variations; and aſſerted farther, that whatever the two Scaligers advanced relating to this work of Paulus Æmilius was all impoſture. Among other reaſons he employed theſe, viz. that no mention was made either of the place where it was pretended this manuſcript was found, nor the name of the perſon who poſſeſſed it; and that ſuch authors as had ſearched with the greateſt care the Bavarian Libraries had never met with thoſe Annals (41). Ut ſum curioſulus, ſays he (42), libet de Paulo Æmilio nonnulla exquirere. Primum, eſt ne veriſimile in Norico nunquam fuiſſe, & Germanicum ſermonem, eumque vetuſtiſſimum intellexiſſe? & quo in angulo Bavariæ iſtos Scaligerorum annales invenit, qui ſummam Aventini, Hundii, Lazii, & ipſorum Scaligerorum Bavarorum diligentiam effugerint? Potuitne fieri, ut illuſtris vir Marcus Velſerus reip. Auguſtanæ præfectus, ſingulare illud ætatis noſtræ ornamentum, ne ſeriniſſimi quidem Bavariæ Principis auctoritate ſubnixus eoſdem illos annales aliunde non erueret? Et fuitne quiſquam, qui de hoc Æmilii libro (tu quatuor libros fuiſſe in Catullum ſcribis) vel tenuiſſimam unquam auditionem acceperit? i. e. "Being "a little curious, I have thought proper to make ſome "enquiries about Paulus Æmilius. Firſt, is it likely "that Æmilius was ever in Bavaria, and underſtood "the oldeſt German language? And in what corner "of Bavaria did he find thoſe annals of the Scaliger "family, when they had eſcaped the utmoſt diligence "of Aventinus, Hundius, Lazius, and even of the "Bavarian Scaligers themſelves? Was it poſſible that "the illuſtrious Marcus Velſerus, Governor of the city "of Augsburgh, that ſingular ornament of the age, "could not have diſcovered thoſe Annals in ſome "place or other? Has any man once heard the leaſt "thing (you ſay that there were four books of Ca- "tullus) of that book of Æmilius?" To this Joſeph Scaliger replied, that a great many books were ſtill unknown; ſo that no one ought to conclude that Paulus Æmilius's had never exiſted becauſe it was not to be found (43). He proved Scioppius guilty of an untruth; for Julius Scaliger had not declared that Paulus Æmilius had tranſlated this work from the German language. Ego quæro unde colligunt Julium dixiſſe eos annales lingua Norica ſcriptos? Sed Julii verſus conſulere nulla invidia eſt. Ii ſunt in libello De Regnorum Everſionibus.

Nam Paulus utrumque Æmilius monet referri
Deprompta libro, quem, ut retulit, fide vetuſta
Incude Latina igneque Noricum recoxit.
Torellius omiſerat iſta Saraina.

Et puero patet illorum Annalium librum Noricum ideo dici à Julio, quod in Norico compoſitus, & ibi ab Æmilio inventus, non utique quod lingua Norica ſcriptus eſſet. Quem magis idoneum verborum Scaligeri interpretem dare poſſumus, quam ipſi Julium Scaligerum (45)? i. e. "I ask, whence do they infer that Julius "ſaid, that thoſe Annals were written in the Bava- "rian tongue? But it may not be improper to con- "ſult the verſes of Julius. We find them in the "little book Of the ſubverſion of kingdoms.

"For Paul Æmilius ſays that both are mention'd:
"Extracted from the book, which, he relates,
"Was by him poliſh'd, (juſtly) from the Latin,
"Writ in Bavaria: Theſe had been omitted
"By Torellus Saraîna.

"Now it is plain to a child, that Julius called that "book of Annals, Bavarian, becauſe it was wrote "in Bavaria, and found in that country by Æmi- "lius, not that it was writ in the Bavarian language. "What better interpreter can we give of Scaliger's "words than Julius Scaliger himſelf?" Thereupon Joſeph Scaliger quotes his father's words, which we introduced at the beginning of this remark (46). Scioppius did not deny but he was miſtaken in this; but aſſerted that this was not a conſiderable article in their diſpute (47); and pretended that he was not able to anſwer his other obſervations. I ſhall conclude with the following remark: Paulus Æmilius was one of the heroes of Julius Scaliger, who complemented him with a little Poem conjointly with Torellus Saraina, and who inſerted this Poem in a work entitled Heroes (48).

(39) Jul. Cæſ. Scaliger. Orat. in Luctu Audeti Cæſaris filii, p. m. 74, 75.

(40) Joſeph. Scaliger. in Epiſtola de vetuſtate & ſplendore Gentis Scaligeræ, p. 8, 9.

(41) Scioppius, in Scaligero Hypobolimæo, folio 40 verſe.

(42) Idem, ibid.

(43) Joſeph. Scaliger. confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 389, 390.

(44) Ibid. p. 386, 387.

(45) Joſeph. Scaliger, Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 386, 387.

(46) Citation above (39).

(47) Breviter concedo tibi, verba patris tui, quibus Æmilium Annales Noricos Latinos ſciſſe dicit, non rectè à Scioppio intellecta fuiſſe tametſi id adhuc controverſi juris eſt) ſed nego id attuliſſe Scioppium quaſi de quo tecum litigare vellet. Oporinus Grubinius, Amphot. Sciop. p. 271. i. e. "I grant "you that your "father's words, "by which he "ſays that Æ- "milius tranſ- "lated into "Latin the Ba- "varian An- "nals, were not "rightly under- "ſtood by Sci- "oppius (which "however may "ſtill admit of "diſpute) but I "deny that Sci- "oppius intro- "duced them, "as tho' they "were the ſub- "ject he deſign- "ed to contend "about.

(48) See Scaliger's Latin Poems, pag. 321. edit. 1591.

ÆNEAS TACTICUS is one of the moſt antient Greek authors who have written of the Art Military [A]. Some Bibliographers (a) ſay, that the manuſcript of his book

(a) The Abridgers of Geſner.

[A] He is one of the moſt antient Greek authors who have written of the art military.] Cineas of Theſſaly, Counſellor to Pyrrhus King of Epirus, and Diſciple of Epicurus, has abridged Æneas's book concerning the Duty of a General (1). Beſides, in what we have remaining of Æneas, there is no example, but what precedes the 110th Olympiad, and if there is mention made of ſome machines, which began to be in vogue in the time of Ariſtotle, there are others not mentioned which were invented a little after Ariſtotle (2). Thus we may without temerity advance, that if it is not this ÆNEAS of Stymphalia that was book is in the Vatican Library; but probably that is to be underſtood only of a particular Treatiſe publiſhed by Caſaubon [B]. Mr. Moreri's miſtakes are of no conſequence [C].

(1) Ælianus in Tacticis, cap. 1.

(2) Caſaub. in Præfat. Æneæ de toleranda Obſidione.

was General of the Arcadians about the 103d Olympiad (3), he is not very far from that time.

(3) Xenophon, de Rebus geſtis Græcor. lib. 7. p. m. 368. Obſerve, that in the IVth book de Expedit. Cyri, pag. m. 199, he ſpeaks of another Æneas of Stymphalia, who periſhed in the expedition of the younger Cyrus about the end of the 94th Olympiad.

(4) De Studio Militari, p. m. 45.

[B] Of a particular Treatiſe publiſhed by Caſaubon.] In this book is deſcribed the manner in which a ſiege is to be maintained, and it was joined to the edition of Polybius in 1609. The Preface informs us, 1. That it is printed from a manuſcript, tranſcribed from a copy brought from Italy, and that this manuſcript is in the Library of the moſt Chriſtian King. 2. That Æneas had compoſed ſome other books. Naudæus (4) was miſtaken when he ſaid that the Commentarius Poliorceticus of Æneas is different from the Treatiſe de Toleranda Obſidione; for the title of this Treatiſe in Caſaubon's edition runs thus: Τακτικὸν τε καὶ πολιορκητικὸν ὑπόμνημα περὶ τοῦ πῶς χρὴ πολιορκούμενον ἀντέχειν. Commentarius Tacticus & Poliorceticus de toleranda Obſidione.

[C] Mr. Moreri's miſtakes are of no conſequence.] 1 He ſays, that Æneas wrote a Treatiſe on the Art Military, and that Cineas made an abridgment of this Book. This is not exact. Ælian makes uſe of the plural number, when he ſpeaks of the works of Æneas on the Art Military. Ἀινείας τε δὴ πολιόνων, καὶ στρατηγικὰ βίβλια ἱκανῶς συντεταχέναι· δὲ ἐπιτεμὼν ὁ Θέσσαλος κινέας ἐποίησε (5). "Æneas has accurately "treated of military affairs in ſeveral books, and "Cineas the Theſſalian has epitomiſed them (6)." Mr. Moreri quotes a work of Voſſius (7), wherein are theſe words of Ælian, why then did he affect to expreſs himſelf as he has done? 2. He ſays, that Geſner affirms that the work of Æneas is in manuſcript in the Vatican Library. Geſner ſays nothing of Æneas; thoſe who have abridged him ſay that Æneas's book de re Militari is in the Vatican. Caſaubon applies that to the Treatiſe de toleranda Obſidione. Obſerve that Voſſius, in the 287th page of the book de Scientiis Mathematicis, aſcribes to Geſner what I have reprehended Moreri for aſcribing to him.

(5) Ælian. Tact. cap. 1.

(6) Why then does Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. p. 287, ſay only that Cineas made an abridgment of the Tacticks of Æneas?

(7) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græc. lib. 4. cap. 11.

☞ÆNEAS GAZÆUS, a Sophiſt by profeſſion, was originally a Platonic Philoſopher, but afterwards became a Chriſtian (a). He flouriſhed about the year 487; for he aſſures us, that he ſaw the African Confeſſors, whoſe tongues were cut out by Hunneric King of the Vandals in the year 484, under the reign of the Emperor Zeno, as appears from Victor Biſhop of Utica, who wrote an account of that perſecution by the Vandals, under their Kings Genſeric and Hunneric (b). Æneas Gazæus affirms, that he heard theſe Confeſſors ſpeak very plainly and diſtinctly, after their tongues were cut out at Conſtantinople; but this miracle is very much conteſted. He wrote a Dialogue, intitled Theophraſtus, becauſe the chief perſon in it is called Theophraſtus, concerning the Immortality of the Soul and the Reſurrection of the Body [A].

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Litterar. p. 297. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720.

(b) Auberti Miræi Auctarium de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis § 109, and 110.

[A] A Dialogue, concerning the Immortality of the Soul, and the Reſurrection of the Body.] He endeavours to enliven his ſubject with ſeveral curious enquiries into the ſentiments of the Philoſophers, and many agreeable ſtories. He is of opinion, that God creates ſouls the moment he infuſes them into bodies; that though the number is fixed, it is known only to God; that the ſoul is ſenſible of nothing without the body; that man is very free in his actions; that the body ſhall be raiſed in the ſame form, which it had in this world; that the Devils aſſume the forms of the dead, in order to diſturb the living; that the relics of Martyrs have an efficacy to drive away Devils; that many miracles have been performed by the prayers of the juſt; and that perſons deceas'd have been ſeen to riſe from the dead. This Dialogue was firſt tranſlated into Latin by Ambroſius Camaldulenſis, and publiſhed at Baſil in 1516 (1). It was afterwards publiſhed in Greek among other pieces at Baſil in 1560, with a Latin tranſlation by Wolfius; and at Leipſic in 1658, with a tranſlation and notes by Barthius, in 4°, with Zachary of Mitilene, another Chriſtian Philoſopher who was later than Æneas Gazæus (2). It is printed likewiſe in the fifth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, publiſhed at Cologne in 1618 (3). T.

(1) Cave and Aubertus Miræus, ubi ſupra.

(2) Du Pin, Nouvelle Bib. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 4. p. 280. edit. de Mons, 1691.

(3) Aub. Miræus, ubi ſupra.

☞ÆNEAS SYLVIUS, known afterwards by the name of Pius II. was of the noble family of the Piccolomini, and born in the year 1405 at Corſigny [A] in the territory of Sienna, where his father lived in exile. His father's name was Sylvius Piccolomini, and his mother's Victoria Forteguerra. He learned Grammar in the town where he was born, but the circumſtances of his family were then ſo mean, that he was obliged to ſubmit to all low employments of a country life. In the year 1423 by the aſſiſtance of his friends he was enabled to go to the Univerſity of Sienna, where he applied himſelf to polite literature, and heard lectures upon the Poets and Orators, and in ſhort time publiſhed ſeveral Poems both in the Latin and Tuſcan languages (a). He afterwards turned his ſtudies to the Civil Law. Being now qualified for buſineſs he left Sienna, upon the breaking out of a war in his own country, and went in the year 1431 with Cardinal Dominic Capranica to the council of Baſil as Secretary to him; in which poſt he likewiſe ſerved Cardinal Albergoti, who ſent him to Scotland [B]. Upon his return he was made Secretary to the council of Baſil, and defended it in the moſt vigorous manner againſt the authority of the Popes both by his ſpeeches and writings, particularly in a Dialogue and Epiſtles, which he wrote to the Rector and Univerſity

(a) Append. ad Cave, Hiſt. Litter. p. 114. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

[A] Born in the year 1405 at Corſigni.] Mr. Wharton (1) and Oudin (2) call the place in Latin Corſinianum, and Mr. Fleury (3) Corſigny. Mr. Du Pin (4) ſays, that he was born at Pienza; but this is very conſiſtent with what the abovementioned writers, as well as Platina, aſſert; for when Æneas Sylvius was raiſed to the Popedom, in order to honour the place of his birth, which was called before Corſigni or Corſignana, he made it an epiſcopal city, and called it Pienza from the name Pius which he aſſumed, when he became Pope. When his mother was with child of him, ſhe dreamt, that ſhe was brought to bed of an infant, who had a miter upon his head; and as it was the cuſtom of degrading Prieſts by placing a miter made of paper upon their heads, ſhe was apprehenſive, leſt her ſon ſhould prove the diſgrace of the family; but the event ſhewed the contrary (5). We have many ſtories in antiquity of the events of the children's fortune correſponding with ſome remarkable dream of the mothers; but what credit is to be paid to ſuch relations, or how far ſuch a correſpondence may be accidental, let every one determine as he thinks proper.

(1) Idem, p. 114. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(2) Comm. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 3. Col. 2643. edit. Lipſ. 1722.

(3) Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 23. l. 3. p. 52. edit. Bruxelles 1726.

(4) Nouvelle Biblioth. tom. 12. p. 98. edit. Paris 1702.

(5) Platina in Vita Pii II. and Fleury ubi ſupra.

University of Cologne (b). He was likewiſe made by that council Clerk of the Ceremonies, Abbreviator and one of the Duodecemviri, or Twelve Men, which was an office of importance there. He preſided very often among the Collators of Benefices. He was employed in ſeveral embaſſies, once to Trent, twice to Conſtance, once to Francfort, twice to Savoy, and three times to Straſburg, where he had an affair with a Lady, which he gave his father an account of in a letter to him (c) [C]. About the year 1437, when the ſchiſm between Eugenius and the council of Baſil was carried to a great height, and the Pope proceeded to excommunicate and deprive his oppoſers, while ſome perſons ſlipt away out of fear, and others openly went over to him. Æneas declared that he would conſtantly adhere to the council; for, ſays he (d), ſince I had nothing, which I could be deprived of, I thought my ſelf under an obligation of continuing firm; leſt by abandoning that ſide, which ſeemed to me the moſt juſt, I ſhould endanger the ſalvation of my ſoul. In the year 1439 he was engaged in the ſervice of Pope Felix; and being ſoon after ſent Embaſſador to the Emperor Frederic, he was crowned by him with the poetic laurel, and ranked among his friends. In the year 1442 he was ſent for from Baſil by the ſame Emperor to his court, and made Protonotary or Secretary

(b) Oudin. Comment. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 3. Sect. 15. Col. 2643. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.

(c) Lib. 1. Epiſt. 15.

(d) Nos, cum nihil haberemus, quod nobis auferri poſſet, perſeverandum putavimus; ne partem, quæ verior nobis apparebat, relinquentes, detrimentum animæ faceremus. Bulla Retract.

[B] Who ſent him to Scotland.] The deſign of ſending him thither was to mediate a peace between the Engliſh and Scots. While he was there a fatal tragedy happened. On the 20th of February 1436, King James I. of Scotland was aſſaſſinated in the night by means of a conſpiracy form'd againſt him by Walter Earl of Athol his uncle, who wanted to ſeize the kingdom for himſelf. The Queen received two wounds by interpoſing between the aſſaſſins and the King her husband, whom they diſpatched with twenty eight wounds. Æneas Sylvius uſed all his endeavours to excite the Scots to puniſh the murderers of their King with the utmoſt ſecurity. They were immediately tried, and the Earl, who was the author of this conſpiracy, was publickly put to the torture for three days together. He had an iron crown red-hot plac'd upon his head, while they ridiculed him with the title of King of Traitors; till at laſt he expir'd in the midſt of theſe torments (6).

(6) Hector Boet. l. 7. Buch. l. 10, 11. Comment. Pii II, lib. 1. Fleury, lib. 107. c. 22.

[C] An affair with a Lady, which he gave his father an account of in a letter to him.] Mr. Wharton in his Appendix to Dr. Cave's Hiſtoria Literaria (7), obſerves, that he was ſo far from lamenting this crime, that he even boaſted of it in his letter to his father. We ſhall give that letter at length, which it muſt be owned is written with an air of the utmoſt gaiety. "ÆNÆAS SYLVIUS THE POET TO HIS "FATHER SYLVIUS. You write to me, that you "are doubtful, whether you ought to rejoice or to "be ſorry, becauſe God has given me a ſon. For "my own part I ſee reaſon for joy, but none for "ſorrow. For what greater pleaſure is there in life, "than to beget another like one's ſelf, to extend "one's own blood, and to leave a perſon, who "may ſurvive you? What is more agreeable than to "ſee one's ſons ſons? To me it is the higheſt ſatisfaction, that my ſeed has propagated, and that I "have produced ſomething before I die, which may "ſurvive me; and I return thanks to God, who has "form'd the fœtus into a male, that the little boy "may divert you and my mother, and afford you "that comfort and aſſiſtance, which it was my duty "to do. If my birth was any pleaſure to you, why "ſhould not the birth of my ſon be ſo likewiſe? "Will not the ſight of the little infant give you "ſome ſatisfaction, when you ſhall ſee my image in "his countenance? Will it not be agreeable to you, "to have him hang about your neck, and ſhew his "little fondneſſes for you? But you ſay that you are "ſorry for my crime, becauſe I have begot this child "in an unlawful way. I cannot imagine, Sir, what "opinion you have form'd of me. It is certain "that you, who partake your ſelf of fleſh and blood, "did not beget me of a rigid inſenſible conſtitution. "You are conſcious to your ſelf what a man of gallantry you was. For my part, I am neither an eunuch nor impotent; nor an hypocrite, in chooſing "to ſeem good rather than really be ſo. I frankly "own my fault, becauſe I am neither more holy than "King David, nor wiſer than Solomon. This is a "crime of a very ancient ſtanding, and I cannot tell "who is exempt from it. This plague is very extenſive, (if it be a plague to uſe one's natural "powers); ſo that I cannot ſee why this appetite "ſhould be ſo much condemned, ſince nature, "which does nothing amiſs, has implanted it in "all creatures, in order to preſerve the ſpecies. "But you ſeem to ſay, that there are certain limits, "within which this is lawful; and that this appetite "ſhould never be indulged beyond the juſt boundaries of marriage. This is very true; and yet even "in the married-ſtate there are frequently crimes "committed. There is a certain rule and meaſure "for eating, and drinking, and ſpeaking; but who "obſerves them? Who is ſo righteous, as not to fall "ſeven times a day? Let the hypocrite ſpeak, and "declare himſelf to be conſcious of no ſin; I know "that there is no merit in me, and only depend upon God's goodneſs for mercy, who knows, "that we are liable to fall, and to be hurried away "by irregular pleaſures. He will never ſhut up to "me the fountain of pardon, which is open to all. "But I have ſaid ſufficient of this point. And ſince "you ask my reaſons, why I think this child my "own, leſt you ſhould maintain another man's inſtead of mine, I will give you a ſhort account "of the whole affair. It is not two years ſince I "was Embaſſador at Strasburgh. While I was there "at leiſure for ſeveral days, a Lady who came from "England, and had beauty and youth about her, "lodged in the ſame houſe with me. She being "very well skilled in the Italian tongue, addreſs'd "me in the Tuſcan Dialect; which was ſo much "the more agreeable to me as it was very uncommon in that country. I was charm'd with her "wit and gaiety, and immediately recollected, that "Cleopatra had engaged the affections of Anthony, "as well as Julius Cæſar, by the elegance of her "converſation. I ſaid to myſelf, Who will blame "me, inconſiderable as I am, for doing what the "greateſt Men have not thought beneath them. I "ſometimes thought upon the example of Moſes, "ſometimes that of Ariſtotle, and ſometimes that of "Chriſtians themſelves. In ſhort, pleaſure overcame "me, I grew fond of the Lady, and addreſſed her "in the ſofteſt terms. But ſhe reſiſted all my applications, as firmly as the rock repells the waves of "the ſea, and for three days ſhe kept me in ſuſpence. "She had a daughter five years old, who was recommended to our Landlord by Milinthus the father; "and the Lady was fearful leſt our Landlord ſhould "perceive ſomething of the affair, and ſhould turn "the child out of doors becauſe ſhe might follow "her mother's example. The night came on, and ſhe "was to go away the next day; ſo that I, apprehenſive leſt I ſhould loſe my prey, deſired her not "to bolt her door at night, and told her I would "come to her at midnight. She denied me, and "gave me no manner of hopes. I urged her, but "ſhe ſtill perſiſted in her denial. She went to bed. "I reſolved with my ſelf to ſee whether ſhe had "done as I had deſired her. I recollected the ſtory "of Zima the Florentine, and imagin'd, that perhaps "ſhe might follow the example of his miſtreſs. Upon this I determined to try. When I found every "thing ſilent in the houſe, I went to her chamber. "The door was ſhut, but not bolted. I opened it, and "went in, and obtained the Lady's favour, and "from hence came this ſon. The mother's name "is Elizabeth. From the Ides of February to the "Ides of November there is juſt the number of "months, which is the uſual term from a woman's "firſt

(7) P. 114. An. 1458.

tary of the Empire, and raiſed to the Senatorial Order. He could not yet be induced to condemn the council of Baſil, nor go over abſolutely to Eugenius's party, but continued neuter. However, when the Emperor Frederic began by degrees to favour Eugenius, and eſpouſe his intereſts, Æneas likewiſe changed his opinion gradually. He acted afterwards in the Emperor's name in the Diet of Nuremberg, where they were conſulting about methods to put an end to the Schiſm, and was ſent Embaſſador to Eugenius [D], ſo that at laſt, upon the perſuaſion of Thomas Sarzanus, the Apoſtolical Legate in Germany, he ſubmitted to Eugenius entirely; and about the end of the year 1446, or the beginning of 1447 he was ſent by Frederic to Rome, where he acknowledged Eugenius's authority, and promiſed obedience to him in the name of the German nation. After Eugenius's death, he was choſen by the Cardinals to preſide in the Conclave till another Pope was elected. He was made Biſhop of Targeſtum by Pope Nicholas, and went again into Germany, where he was made Counſellor to the Emperor, and managed the moſt important affairs of the Empire (e). Four years after, being made Archbiſhop of Sienna, he attended Frederic to Rome in the year 1452, when the latter went thither to receive the Imperial crown. Upon his return Æneas was

(e) Append. ad Cave, ubi ſupra.

" firſt pregnancy to the birth. She told me this, " when ſhe was afterwards at Baſil. And tho' I had " procured her favour not by gifts, but by the ut- " moſt ſollicitation and courtſhip, I imagined ſhe " ſaid this with a deſign to get money from me, " and did not believe her. But ſince I ſee ſhe af- " firms this, now when ſhe can have no hopes of " obtaining any thing of me, and the circumſtances " of the name and time agree, I believe the child is " mine; and I deſire you to take him, and bring " him up till he is able to come under my care and " inſtruction; for you have no reaſon to ſuppoſe " that a rich Lady would tell a falſity in the caſe of " her ſon."

[D] Sent Embaſſador to Eugenius.] The deſign of his embaſſy was to engage the Pope to conſent to the calling of a Council, and by that means to put an end to the ſchiſm. However he could obtain nothing of the Pope, who would by no means agree to the Council, which, he ſaid, he conſidered as a means rather of diſturbing and dividing the Church, than of reſtoring peace to it. Sylvius had taken an effectual method to gain a favourable audience of the Pope, for he deſired him very ſubmiſſively to excuſe him for what he had ſaid, or done, or written againſt him in favour of the Council of Baſil. The reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee the ſpeech, which he made upon that occaſion to Eugenius, as it is related by John Gobelin his Secretary, in his Commentaries of the Life of Pius II, if that work is not of Æneas Sylvius's own writing, as is juſtly ſuſpected by learned Men. " Moſt holy Father, ſays he, before I " declare to you the Emperor's commiſſion, give me " leave to ſay one word concerning my ſelf. I do " not queſtion but you have heard a great many " things, which are not to my advantage. They " ought not to have been mentioned to you; but I " muſt confeſs, that my accuſers have reported no- " thing but what is true. I own, I have ſaid, and " done, and written at Baſil many things againſt " your intereſts. It is impoſſible to deny it. Yet " all this has been done with a deſign, not to in- " jure you, but to ſerve the Church. I have been " in an error, without queſtion: but I have been " in juſt the ſame circumſtances with many great " Men, as particularly with Julian Cardinal of St. " Angelo, with Nicholas Archbiſhop of Palermo; " with Lewis du Pont (Pontanus), the Secretary of " your holy See; Men, who are eſteemed the great- " eſt Luminaries in the Law, and Doctors of the " truth; to omit mentioning the univerſities and " colleges, which were generally againſt you. Who " would not have erred with perſons of their cha- " racter and merit? It is true, that when I diſco- " vered the error of thoſe at Baſil, I did not at firſt " go over to you, as the greateſt part did. But be- " ing afraid to fall from one error to another, and " by avoiding Charybdis, as the proverb expreſſes it, " to run upon Scylla, I joined my ſelf after a long " deliberation and conflict within my ſelf, to thoſe, " who thought proper to continue in a ſtate of neu- " trality. I lived three years at the Emperor's court " in this ſituation of mind, where having the op- " portunity of hearing conſtantly the diſputes be- " tween thoſe of Baſil and your Legates, I was con- " vinced that the truth was on your ſide. It was " upon this motive, that when the Emperor thought " fit to ſend me to your clemency, I accepted the " opportunity with the utmoſt ſatisfaction, in hopes, " that I ſhould be ſo happy as to gain your favour " again. I throw my ſelf therefore at your feet; " and ſince I ſinned out of ignorance, I entreat " you to give me your pardon. After which I " ſhall open to you the Emperor's intentions (8)."

(8) Raynald. Contin. Annal. Baronii 1445. N. 25.

This was the prelude to the famous retractation, which Æneas Sylvius made afterwards. The Pope pardoned every thing that was paſt, and in a ſhort time made him his Secretary, without obliging him to quit the ſame poſt, which he had with the Emperor (9).

(9) Fleury, tom. 22 l. 109. cap. 107. pag. 447, 448.

He was ſent a ſecond time by the Emperor on an embaſſy to Eugenius; the occaſion of which was as follows: That Pope having depoſed Thierry and James Archbiſhops and Electors of Cologne and Treves, becauſe they had openly declared for Felix and the Council of Baſil, and having given the former See to Adolphus of Cleves, and the latter to John Biſhop of Cambray, the Electors of the Empire being ſhock'd at ſuch an act of violence againſt their collegues, and againſt the privileges of the Empire, call'd together a Diet at Francfort to conſult upon that affair and other points, which concern'd the liberties of Germany. It was reſolved there amongſt them, that if Eugenius would not declare the depoſition of thoſe Prelates null and void, and remove the taxes which that nation was loaded with by the Court of Rome, and acknowledge the ſuperiority of Councils, as it had been determined at Conſtance, the two Archbiſhops ſhould adhere to the ſentence of depoſition, which had been given againſt that Pope at Baſil. They ſent Deputies therefore to the Emperor and to ſix of his Counſellors, to inform them of their reſolution, and to deſire his Imperial Majeſty to join with them, and to ſend to the Pope to acquaint him with their agremeent. He refuſed to engage in their league, conſidering it as a rebellion; but he promiſed to ſend to Eugenius to deſire him to revoke the ſentence of depoſition, and to treat the Electors in a gentler manner. Æneas Sylvius was again choſe for this Embaſſy. He was ordered to repreſent to the Pope, that " if he would reſtore " the Archbiſhops of Cologne and Treves to their " dignities, the neutrality ſhould be put an end to " in Germany, and every one would declare for him; " but if he ſhould perſiſt in maintaining the ſen- " tence, which he had paſſed, it was to be feared " that the Schiſm would continue a long time, and " that Felix's authority would be acknowledged as " the Electors had reſolved in a particular treaty a- " mong themſelves." Æneas Sylvius diſcharged this commiſſion very faithfully, and Eugenius promiſed to ſatisfy the Emperor and the Princes, and to anſwer in every point their good intentions for the peace of the Church. However it was not abſolutely in his power to do all this. Adolphus of Cleves, elected by him Archbiſhop of Cologne, was nephew to the Duke of Burgundy, and John Biſhop of Cambray elected Archbiſhop of Treves was that Duke's natural brother. So that he was obliged to procure the Duke's conſent to remove them from the dignities, which he had conferred upon them at his ſollicitation. However the Duke agreed to it, and the Pope reſtored the Prelates, whom he had depoſed (10).

(10) Fleury, tom. 22. p. 457, 458. and Lenfant, Hiſt. du Concile du Baſle, lib. 21. c. 54.

was made Legate of Bohemia and Auſtria. About the year 1456, being ſent by the Emperor into Italy to treat with Pope Callixtus III. concerning a war with the Turks, he was made a Cardinal by him; and after his death, in the year 1458, he was elected Pope [E] on the 19th of Auguſt by the name of Pius II, and crowned on the third of September. There were great hopes conceived of him, on account of his vaſt learning, and the promiſes which he had made, that he would take ſome meaſure to reform the church; but he abſolutely diſappointed thoſe expectations (f), for he retracted all that he had written in defence of the council of Baſil [F]. He ſuppreſſed

(f) Ibid.

[E] He was elected Pope.] There were ſeveral remarkable circumſtances, that happened in the conclave, before he was elected. On the third day, it was found that the Cardinals of Boulogna and Sienne, (which laſt was Æneas Sylvius) had moſt voices: the reſt had not above three. William Cardinal of Roan had not one, either becauſe he was not at all reſpected, or thought incapable of that dignity. However the latter was reſolved to uſe his utmoſt to gain the Papacy, and being more apprehenſive of Æneas Sylvius than of any other, he went to every one of the Cardinals, and ask'd what they intended by endeavouring to raiſe him to the Popedom? "Don't you "ſee, ſays he, that he is poor and gouty? Can he "bear the weight of ſuch an important office? How "do we know, whether his affection for Germany, "which he is but lately come from, will not induce "him to remove the See of St. Peter thither? "Can it be ſaid, that he has the leaſt tincture of "Polite Learning and the Canon-Law? Is a Poet, "as he is, a proper perſon to govern the Church? "He will be for governing it according to the laws "of the Pagans." He then proceeded to declaim againſt the Cardinal of Boulogna. In ſhort he drew over eleven Cardinals to his intereſt. Upon this the Cardinal of Boulogna went to Æneas Sylvius, and adviſed him to give his vote for the Cardinal of Roan, as he propoſed to do himſelf, in order to avoid his reſentment, when he ſhould become Pope. But the other replied, that for his own part he would not give his vote to a man, whom he thought ſo unworthy of that ſacred character. That he deſpiſed the Cardinal of Roan's enmity as well as his favour. "As for poverty, ſays he, it is not difficult to ſup"port it, when one is uſed to it. I have lived poor, "and ſhall die poor: He can never prevent me "from enjoying the converſation of the Muſes, "which is the greateſt conſolation to me imaginable "in misfortune. Beſides I cannot think that God "will permit his ſpouſe the Church to have a Head "ſo unworthy of her, and that a man convicted of "ſimony ſhould become his Vicegerent upon earth. "He will not ſuffer this palace, which has been the "reſidence of ſo many holy Popes, to be defiled "with an ambitious mortal, who has no regard to "any thing but temporal honours and advantages. "It is God, who gives the Popedom, and not men: "he will deſtroy theſe unjuſt caballings; to morrow "it will appear, that it is he, who makes Popes: "If you are really a Chriſtian, you'll never give "your vote to a man ſo unworthy this important "character." Theſe words had ſo great an effect upon the Cardinal of Boulogna, that he immediately altered his opinion, and promiſed not to give his vote to the Cardinal of Roan. The next day Æneas Sylvius went to the Cardinal of Pavia, the Vice-Chancellor, who had engaged his vote to the Cardinal of Roan, for fear of loſing his office of Vice-Chancellor. He expoſtulated with him upon it ſo pathetically, that the latter promiſed to abandon the Cardinal of Roan's intereſt. In ſhort, when they came to a ſcrutiny, Æneas Sylvius was choſen Pope; upon which Cardinal Beſſarion addreſſed to the new Pope, in order to excuſe himſelf and the others, who had been of the Cardinal of Roan's party, in the following terms: "Holy Father, we "are all poſſeſſed with the moſt exquiſite joy "at your exaltation; and it is eaſy to perceive from "the choice, which has been made of you, that it "is the Holy Ghoſt, who preſides in every conclave, "and conducts the ſentiments of the Cardinals ac"cording to the deſign, which he propoſes in the "government of his Church. If at firſt we had "different thoughts, it was merely from the appre"henſion, that you could not be able to ſupport "the fatigues which attend this exalted ſtation, your "health being ſo very precarious, and ſo often inter"rupted with the gout. It ſeemed to us, that in "the dangers, which the Church is threatned with "during the war, which is going to be carried on "with the Infidels, it was neceſſary to elect into "the place, which you are now to fill, a man in the "vigour of life, and one who was active and able "to bear the inconveniencies of long voyages. "Your infirmities were the only reaſon, that pre"vented us giving you our votes; but ſince God "has diſpoſed things contrary to our views, he will "give your Holineſs all the neceſſary ſtrength to exe"cute the duties of this function; and as we have "erred only out of ignorance, we ſhall endeavour "by our faithfulneſs and readineſs to ſerve you, to "atone for the fault, which we have committed in "preferring the Cardinal of Roan to you." The new Pope replied to this in the manner following. "You have judged more favourably of my perſon "than I did, ſince you have found no other defect "in me than my want of health and the gout. I "know my ſelf unworthy of the rank, which I have "been raiſed to, and I can aſſure you, that I ſhould "have refuſed it, if I had not been afraid to con"demn the judgment of thoſe who gave me their "votes, and to draw down upon me the anger of "heaven, which has cauſed two thirds of the ſacred "College to declare for me. Though I ſhall ſub"mit to the divine call, yet I cannot but approve "of their conduct, who named the Cardinal of "Roan, ſince after they had followed in that point "the ſecret dictates of their conſcience, they not"withſtanding readily confirmed my election, when "they conſider'd it as a work of the Holy Ghoſt. "I ſhall treat every one of you as my brethren, "ſince you have all done your duty, tho' in a diffe"rent way (11)."

(11) See Fleury, P. 41, &c. tom. 23.

[F] He retracted all that he had written in defence of the Council of Baſil.] This he did in a bull dated the 26th of April 1463, which is publiſh'd in Father Labbe's Collection of Councils (12). It will not be unentertaining to ſee in what manner he apologizes for his former conduct, and how much his ſentiments were altered by his preſent ſituation. He excuſes himſelf for having written thoſe acts of the Council when he was young, and incapable of forming a right judgment of things. He owns, that he had committed an error in writing that work; and he deſires the Univerſity of Cologne, to whom he addreſſed his bull, not to regard what he had ſaid in favour of the Council of Baſil, but to condemn Æneas Sylvius, and to follow the ſentiments of Pius II. "We are "men, ſays he, and we have err'd as men; we don't "deny, but that many things, which we have ſaid "or written, may juſtly be condemn'd. We have "been ſeduced like Paul, and perſecuted the Church "of God thro' ignorance. We now follow St. Au"ſtin's example, who having ſuffer'd ſeveral erro"neous ſentiments to eſcape him in his writings, "retracted them. We do juſt the ſame thing; we "ingenuouſly confeſs our ignorance, being appre"henſive leſt what we have written in our youth "ſhould occaſion ſome error, which may prejudice "the holy See. For if it is ſuitable to any perſon's "character, to maintain the eminence and glory of "the firſt throne of the Church, it is certainly ſo to "our's, whom the merciful God out of pure good"neſs has raiſed to the dignity of Vice-gerent of "Chriſt without any merit on our part. For all "theſe reaſons we exhort you, and adviſe you in "the Lord, not to pay any regard to thoſe writings, "which injure in any manner the authority of the "Apoſtolic See, and which aſſert opinions which "the holy Roman Church does not receive. If

(12) Tom. 13. P. 1407.

preſſed the war which Piccinus was raiſing in Umbria, and recovered Aſſiſi and Nucera. He ordered a convention of Kings and Princes at Mantua, and was preſent at it himſelf, where they formed reſolutions for a war againſt the Turks. Upon his return to Rome he went to Viterbo, and expelled ſeveral tyrants from the territories of the Eccleſiaſtical State. He confirmed Ferdinand in the kingdom of Naples, and ſent Cardinal Urſini thither to crown him King. He excommunicated Sigiſmund Duke of Auſtria, becauſe he had impriſoned the Cardinal of Cuſa, and Sigiſmund Malateſta, for refuſing to pay the hundredths to the church of Rome. He made a treaty with the King of Hungary, and commanded Pogebrac King of Bohemia to be cited before him. He deprived the Archbiſhop of Mentz of his dignity. He built a great many magnificent ſtructures at Rome, and other places. The Patriarchs of the Eaſt ſent Embaſſadors to him [G], and he received others from Peloponneſus [H]. He ſent an Embaſſy to Lewis XI. King of France, in order to perſuade him to aboliſh the Pragmatic Sanction, who readily agreed to it (g). In the latter part of his Pontificate he made great preparations againſt the Turks, whoſe power grew every day more formidable to Europe; for which purpoſe he called upon the ſeveral Kings and Princes for their aſſiſtance; and having raiſed a conſiderable army of Croiſſes and others, he went to Ancona, in order to ſee them embarked, where he was ſeized with a fever, and died the 14th of Auguſt 1464, in the 59th year of his age. We ſhall mention ſome of the circumſtances of his death [I]. He enjoyed the See of Rome ſix years, eleven months, and twenty ſeven days (b). His body was carried to Rome, and interred in the Vatican. Spondanus tells us (i), that he was inferior to none in learning, eloquence, dexterity and prudence, and ſo fond of writing, that though he was perpetually troubled with the gout, and engaged in a variety of buſineſs, he could not refrain from it. Platina (k) gives us a ſaying of his, which ſhews, that he had no opinion of the celibacy of the Clergy. He uſed to remark, that if there were any good reaſons for reſtraining them from marrying, there were much better for permitting them to marry. The Cardinal of Pavia, in a ſpeech which he made to his collegues concerning the choice of a ſucceſſor, gives this elogium of Pius II, that he was a Pope, who had all the virtues in his character; and that he had deſerved the utmoſt commendation by his zeal for religion, his integrity of manners, his ſolid judgment, and profound learning. However, he was blamed for not being generous enough to the learned men of his age; which Platina obſerves can only

(g) Gobelin. Comment. Pii II. l. 7. Æn. Sylv. Epiſt. 387.

(b) Oudin, ubi ſupra.

(i) Annales Eccleſ. ad ann. 1438, § 9. 13.

(k) Pag. 311. Col. 2.

" If you find any thing contrary to this in our dia- " logues or letters, or in any other of our works, " deſpiſe ſuch notions, reject them, follow what " we maintain now; believe what I aſſert now I " am in years, rather than what I ſaid when I was " young; regard a Pope rather than a private man; " in ſhort reject Æneas Sylvius, and receive Pius II. " Nec privatum hominem pluris facite quam ſummum " Pontificem; Æneam rejicite, Pium accipite. That " family name was given me by my parents at my " birth; but this Chriſtian name we aſſumed, when " we were raiſed to the Apoſtolical character. Il- " lud Gentile nomen parentes indidere naſcenti; hoc " Chriſtianum in Apoſtolatu ſuſcepimus." And becauſe it might be objected, that his dignity was the only reaſon of his changing his opinion, he anſwers that by giving a ſhort account of his life and actions, and relating the hiſtory of the Council of Baſil, which he went to with Cardinal Capranica in 1431, when he was very young, as he ſaid, and without experience, like a bird juſt out of its neſt.

[G] The Patriarchs of the Eaſt ſent Embaſſadors to him.] This happened while he was at Sienna in the year 1460. The chief of this embaſſy was the Archdeacon of Auſtria, whoſe name was Moſes, a man well vers'd in the Greek and Syriac languages, and of a diſtinguiſh'd character. He appeared before the Pope in the name of the Patriarchs of Antioch, Alexandria and Jeruſalem, and told him that the enemy, who ſows tares, having prevented them till then from receiving the decree of the Council of Florence concerning the union of the Greek Church with the Latin, God had at laſt inſpired them with a reſolution of ſubmitting to it; that it had been ſolemnly agreed to in an aſſembly call'd together for that purpoſe, and that for the future they would all unanimouſly ſubmit to the Pope as Vicegerent of Jeſus Chriſt. The Pope commended the Patriarchs for their obedience, and ordered Moſes's ſpeech to be tranſlated into Latin, and placed among the Archives of the Roman Church (13).

(13) Fleury, tom. 23. pag. 118, 119.

[H] He received others from Peloponneſus.] A few days after the former Embaſſadors from the Eaſt, came others from a city in Peloponneſus ſituated upon a mountain near the ſea, which was called Monobaſſe, or Monembaiſſe, one of the three ancient Epidaurus's. The deſign of their embaſſy was to deſire the Pope to receive them and their city under his protection. They repreſented to him, that they were unwilling to ſurrender to Mahomet II, as Demetrius Paleologus their Lord had done; that Thomas his brother, whom they inclined to obey, not finding himſelf able to defend them from the oppreſſion of the Turks, had adviſed them to acknowledge the Pope for their Sovereign, and that they were now come to offer their obedience to him. The Pope received them very readily in the name of the Church of Rome, and ſent them a Governor with ſtore of proviſions (14).

(14) Phranz. lib. 3. cap. 24. Comment. Pii II. lib. 3.

[I] We ſhall mention ſome circumſtances of his death.] When he found himſelf near his end, he ſent for the Cardinals to him, and ſpoke to them for two hours, exhorting them to conſider only real merit in the choice of his ſucceſſor, and eſpecially to purſue the deſign of the war againſt the Turks. Having then ask'd pardon of them, he gave them his indulgences, and deſired to receive the laſt Sacraments. But here a very perplexing circumſtance happen'd. As he had before received Extreme Unction at Baſil, when he was ſeized with the plague, Laurence Roverella Biſhop of Ferrara, an eminent Divine, maintained that he could not receive it a ſecond time. It is true, there was ſuch an opinion among ſome Divines ſince the twelfth Century; tho' it had but few followers. The Pope diſputed this point with him, and thought himſelf not obliged to ſubmit to his opinion; ſo that he received Extreme Unction and the Euchariſt, and died ſoon after (15). Olearius tells us (16), that he regretted at his death three things; 1. that he had written a book intitled, Hiſtoria de duobus Amantibus, Eurialo videlicet & Lucretia, i. e. " The Hiſtory of two Lovers, Eurialus and " Lucretia;" 2. becauſe he had canonized Catherine of Sienna, who had been miſtreſs to a Pope; and 3. becauſe he had excited the Chriſtians to a war againſt the Turks. This he ſays he learned from a manuſcript Chronicle of Sileſia. But what regard is to be paid to ſuch an authority, let the reader judge; it is certain that the laſt particular, that is, his regret for exciting the Chriſtians to a war againſt the Turks is directly contrary to what is affirmed by other writers, as we have ſeen above.

(15) Fleury, tom. 23. p. 196, 197.

(16) Bibliotb. Scriptor. Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 98. edit. Jenæ in 4°. 1710.

only be vindicated in him, by conſidering the prodigious expence of the three wars which he was engaged in. The Cardinal of Pavia likewiſe excuſes him in another point, which he had been reproached for, and that is, his reſiding ſo little at Rome, and travelling more than was conſiſtent with the character of a Pope. It is ſaid, that he was ſenſible that all his great preparations againſt the Turks would prove ineffectual; but being apprehenſive of the raillery, which he ſhould be expoſed to, if he abſolutely quitted his deſign, he had reſolved to ſail no further than Brunduſium, and to winter there, and then to return to Rome; after which he would never think of the war again. And that he might not be accuſed of having engaged in it too precipitately and raſhly, it is added, that he propoſed to caſt the blame of the ill ſucceſs upon the Princes, who had neglected to ſecond him; but death prevented all perplexities of that kind (l). His Secretary, John Gobelin, publiſhed an Hiſtory of his Life, which is ſuppoſed by the beſt critics, to have been written by this Pope himſelf. It was printed at Rome in 4*to* in 1584 and 1589, and at Francfort in folio in 1614. We have an edition of Æneas Sylvius's works printed at Baſil in folio in 1551 (m). He wrote before he was raiſed to the Popedom Commentariorum de Geſtis Concilii Baſilienſis Libri II. i. e. Two Books of Memoirs of what paſt in the Council of Baſil, printed in Orthuinus Gratius's Faſciculus Rerum expetendarum at Cologne in 1535. This piece was dedicated by Gratius to John Helmand, a grandſon of Helmand, who was preſent at that council, and whom Gratius tells us he had ſeen when he was a very old man (n). It was printed ſeparately at Baſil in 1577, in 8vo (o). He wrote likewiſe De Ortu, Regione, ac Geſtis Bohemorum, i. e. An Hiſtory of the Origin, Country and Actions of the Bohemians, which he continued to the year 1458. It was printed at Rome in 1475 in fol. at Baſil in 1532 and 1575. Hanov. 1602 in fol. Salingiaci 1528. Ambergæ 1593 4to, (p). His other works ſhall be mentioned in a Note hereunder [K].

(l) See Fleury, Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 23. l. 112. pag. 197. edit. Bruxelles 1726.

(m) Id. ibid.

(n) Voſſius de Hiſtor. Latin. l. 3. c. 7.

(o) Cave Append.

(p) Ibid.

ÆRODIUS

[K] His other works ſhall be mentioned in a note hereunder.] Bulla Retractionum omnium ab eo olim contra Eugenium Papam in Concilio Baſilienſi geſtorum (17). i. e. "A Bull retracting all that he had done "againſt Pope Eugenius in the Council of Baſil." This is extant in the Body of Councils (18). De Coronatione Fælicis V. Pontificis maximi liber. i. e. "A Book concerning the Coronation of Pope Felix "V." Abbreviationem Flavii Blondi Hiſtoriarum ab inclinatione Imperii uſque ad tempora Joannis XXIII Papæ Libri viginti (19). i. e. "An abridgment of "Flavius Blondius's Decades of Hiſtories from the "decline of the Empire to the time of Pope John "XXIII, in twenty books." This was printed with Blondus at Venice in 1484, and ſeparately at Baſil in 1533. Coſmographiæ, ſeu Hiſtoriarum de Mundo univerſo Liber primus, in quo de Aſiâ minori agit (20). i. e. "The firſt Book of Coſmography, or the Hiſto-"ry of the World, in which he treats of leſſer Aſia." Printed at Paris in 1534, in 8vo, and at Cologne in 1573. Europa, ſeu Coſmographiæ Liber ſecundus. i. e. "Europe, or the ſecond Book of Coſmogra-"phy;" in which he comprehends ſeveral hiſtories of his own times. Printed at Paris in 8vo, 1543; at Cologne in 8vo, 1573; and in Freher's SCRIPT. GERMAN. Hanov. 1602. Tom. II. p. 37 (21). In Antonii Panormitæ Poetæ de dictis & factis memorabilibus Alphonſi Aragonum Regis libros IV, Commentaria. i. e. "Notes upon Anthony Panormitanus's "four Books concerning the remarkable ſayings and "actions of Alphonſus King of Arragon." Hanov. 1611, 4to; at Wittemberg 1585, 4to; with the Commentaries of Jacobus Spiegelius; and at Roſtoch, 1590, 4to, by the care of David Chytræus (22). In Triumphum Alphonſi Regis (23). i. e. "Upon the "Triumph of King Alphonſus." In Alphonſum Aragoniæ Regem Oratio (24). i. e. "An Oration "upon Alphonſus King of Arragon." A Volume of letters, containing 432 in number, many of which are treatiſes upon different ſubjects, and ſome of them upon Queſtions of Divinity or Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline. The 103d letter is, The Reſolution of a threefold Problem; the 108th, A Dream concerning fortune; the 111th, Of the Praiſes of Poetry; the 114th, The Hiſtory of Euryalus and Lucretia, who were in love with each other; this was publiſh'd ſeparately at Louvain in 4to, in 1479; the 130th is, A Dialogue againſt the Taborites and Bohemians concerning the Communion under one kind, written in the year 1451; the 131ſt is, An Oration concerning the Deſtruction of Conſtantinople, and carrying on a war againſt the Turks; the 162d is concerning the Deſtruction of the univerſal Church; the 165th is, A Deſcription of the City of Vienna. The 166th is, Of the Miſeries of Courtiers; the 187th is, Of his own Actions; the 188th, Of the Duties of a Pope and his Officers; the 369th, An Excuſe againſt the complaints of the German Nation; the 395th, A Retractation of his book concerning the two Lovers; the 396th, Of the Chriſtian Faith addreſs'd to Mahomet King of the Turks, and of the Vanity of the Mahometan Sect; the 397th, 398th, and 399th are Diſcourſes upon the War againſt the Turks; the 310th is, A Treatiſe concerning the dreadful event of the loves of Guiſcard and Sigiſmunda, daughter of Tancred Prince of Salerno, tranſlated by him out of the Italian into Latin. We have this ſtory beautifully told in Mr. Dryden's Fables. The 311th is concerning the Revenge, which Lucretia, the mirror of Roman chaſtity, took of her ſelf on account of the violence, which her modeſty had ſuffer'd. All theſe Epiſtles were publiſh'd together at Nuremberg in 1481, at Louvain in 1483, and at Lyons in 1497. He wrote likewiſe, In Salvatoris noſtri Paſſionem Carmen Sapphicum. i. e. "A Sapphic Ode upon the Paſſion of our Savi-"our." De Liberorum Educatione ad Ladiſlaum Hungariæ & Bohemiæ Regem. i. e. "Concerning the "Education of Children to Ladiſlaus King of Hun-"gary and Bohemia." De Grammatica ad eundem. i. e. "Of Grammar to the ſame King." De Arte Rhetoricâ & Epiſtolarum Partibus ad Archiepiſcopum Trevirenſem. i. e. "Of Rhetoric and the Parts of "Epiſtles to the Archbiſhop of Treves." Deſcriptio de ritu, ſitu, moribus, & conditione Germaniæ ad Antonium S. Chryſogoni Cardinalem. i. e. "A Deſcrip-"tion of the cuſtoms, ſituation, manners, and ſtate "of Germany, to Anthony Cardinal of St. Chryſo-"gonus." Theſe laſt pieces were printed at Baſil in fol. in 1571 (25). Tractatus de ortu & autoritate imperii Romani ad Fredericum Imperatorem. i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning the Riſe and Authority of "the Roman Empire, dedicated to the Emperor "Frederic." This is publiſh'd in Melchior Goldaſt's Monarchy (26). Reſponſio ad Orationem Oratorum Galliæ in Conventu Mantuano. i. e. An An-"ſwer to the Speech of the French Embaſſadors in "the Council of Mantua." This is publiſhed in Dacherius's Spicilegium (27), and in the Body of Councils (28). Alia ad eoſdem Reſponſio ſive Oratio. i. e. "Another Anſwer or Speech to the ſame Embaſſa-"dors." This is printed in the Body of Councils (29). Bulla contra Appellationes à Sede Apoſtolicâ ad Concilium; & Decreta II. de Bello Turcis inferendo. i. e. "A Bull againſt Appeals from the Apoſtolical "See; and two Decrees concerning carrying on a "war againſt the Turks;" publiſh'd in the ſame Body of Councils (30). Ilias contra Venerios ex Homero, at London 1509, with a Preface in praiſe of Homer. De pravis Mulieribus. i. e. "Of bad "Women," at Strasburg 1507. Conſtitutiones Eccleſiaſticæ

(17) Append. ad Cave, ubi ſupra.

(18) Tom. 13. p. 1407.

(19) Append. ad Cave, ubi ſupra.

(20) Cave, Append.

(21) Idem.

(22) Idem.

(23) Idem.

(24) Idem.

(25) Idem.

(26) Tom. 2. p. 1558.

(27) Tom. 8.

(28) Tom. 13. p. 1775.

(29) Tom. 13. p. 1765.

(30) Ibid. pag. 1801.

ÆRODIUS, a Civilian of the ſixteenth Century. See AYRAULT.

cleſiaſticæ variæ. i. e. "Various Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions," publiſh'd in a Collection at Rome in 1579. Sermo primus dum eſſet Paſtor factus, ad populum. i. e. "His firſt Sermon to the people, when he was made a Paſtor," in manuſcript, in Bibliothecâ Auguſtanâ. Ludovicus Jacob à S. Carolo gives an account of thoſe works of his, which are not yet publiſhed (31). Hieronymus Occalus, Catalanus, John Falinus, and Balbus Epiſcopus, quoted by Father L'abbe (32), informs us, that he wrote A Dialogue againſt the pretended donation of the Emperor Conſtantine. Thus far we have been partly obliged to Mr. Henry Wharton, who wrote the Appendix to Dr. Cave's Hiſtoria Litteraria, for an account of Æneas Sylvius's works. But he has omitted ſome, which we ſhall endeavour to ſupply. He wrote beſides the abovementioned Hiſtoria Rerum Friderici III. Imperatoris, in which he deſigned not only to give an account of that Emperor's actions, but likewiſe of the moſt remarkable affairs, which paſt in Europe at that time; but he never finiſh'd this work, and it was carried down no farther than the troubles of Hungary. The learned Mr. John Henry Boeclerus undertook the publiſhing this work from a correct manuſcript, and illuſtrating it with notes; and deſigned to ſubjoin it to an Univerſal Hiſtory written by himſelf; but he was prevented by death. But the deſign was reſumed by Kulpiſius, who publiſh'd this work with a ſpecimen of Boeclerus's Notes, and ſeveral Diploma's and Documenta, collected for the moſt part by Boeclerus; with a long Preface by the editor, who ſubjoined to the whole ſeveral ſcarce writers, that were proper for illuſtrating the affairs of Germany. This book was printed at Strasburg in 1685, fol. Oudin obſerves upon this work of Æneas Sylvius, that ſome reſerve is to be uſed in reading it, ſince the author owed all his fortune to the Emperor Frederic III, whoſe Hiſtory he then wrote (33). Judicent autem cordati, quam fidem debeant Æneæ Sylvio de Rebus Friderici III. agenti, à quo fortunam omnem habuit. Peter Lambecius tells us (34), that in the Imperial Library at Vienna there is The Hiſtory of Auſtria by Æneas Sylvius, but imperfect, in two manuſcripts, written with his own hand, but full of alterations, as is common in imperfect works. Sign. Lud. Antonio Muratori has likewiſe publiſh'd in the ſecond volume of Anecdota (35), which he found in the Ambroſian Library at Milan, An Oration pronounced at Vienna in defence of the authority of the Pope in the year 1452; to which the editor has ſubjoined a Diſſertation, in which he gives a ſhort account of the author, and endeavours from that Oration to confute Maimbourg, who had affirmed, that Sylvius had declared before he was raiſed to the Popedom, that a Pope was ſubject to a general Council. He has likewiſe mentioned thoſe writings of Æneas Silvius which were never printed, and which he propoſed himſelf to publiſh ſoon from the manuſcripts. We have lately had a book printed with the following title. Cl. V. Æn. Sylvii, qui poſtea ſummus Pontifex Pii II. Nomen obtinuit, Hiſtoria Gothorum, palmaria Gentis Monumenta complectens: quæ in hanc diem nunquam fuit edita, & inter ejus ſcripta nuſquam reperta. Cum luculenta præfatione Jo. Car. Neweni, Colon. Cæſ. Aul. Poet. Laur. Francofurt, & Lipſiæ, 1730. i. e. "The Hiſtory of the Goths by "Æn. Sylvius, &c. never before printed, nor any "where found amongſt his writings, with an am"ple Preface by Jo. Car. Newen, &c. in 4° p. 40. Neither the editor nor the author of the Preface mention how they procured this Hiſtory. The Dedication as well as Preface, run wholly upon commending Hiſtory in general; and this in particular, ſuppoſed to be Æneas Sylvius's, whom the editor calls lucentiſſimus luculentiſſimuſque Scriptor: But this work, whether by Æneas Sylvius, or not, is only an abridgment of Jornandes's Hiſtory of the Goths; which is confeſſed by a later edition of the ſame work in folio, publiſh'd by one Raym. Duellius, who has ſubjoined it to another work, intitled, Chorographia Auſtriæ Willelmi Lazii (36). The author of this Abridgment advances nothing of his own, but only brings into a narrow compaſs what is related by Jornandes more at length.

T.

(31) Biblioth. Pontif. p. 187.

(32) Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 228.

(33) Comment. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 3. Col. 2645.

(34) Commentar. Biblioth. Vind. tom. 2. p. 4, 7, 463 and 972.

(35) Printed at Milan in 1699, in 4°.

(36) See Hiſtoria Litteraria, Vol. 1. Art. 27. p. 274.

☞ÆSCHINES, a Socratic Philoſopher, was the ſon of Charinus a ſauſage-maker, or as other writers aſſert, of Lyſanias (a). He was even from his childhood a perſon of great application and induſtry, ſo that he never left Socrates's company; which occaſioned the latter to ſay of him, that the ſauſage-maker's ſon was the only perſon who knew how to pay a due regard to him. Idomeneus, according to Diogenes Laertius, affirmed, that it was he, and not Crito, who adviſed Socrates to make his eſcape out of the priſon; but that Plato aſcribed this particular to Crito, becauſe Æſchines was of Ariſtippus's party. It is ſaid, that he was obliged by poverty to go to Sicily to Dionyſius the Tyrant, where he met with contempt from Plato [A], but was highly commended by Ariſtippus; and having ſhewn the Dialogues which he wrote, he was very handſomly rewarded. Upon his return to Athens he would not venture to profeſs Philoſophy, becauſe Plato and Ariſtippus were in ſuch high eſteem there; but he ſet up a ſchool there, in order to maintain himſelf. He afterwards wrote Orations to be ſpoken in the Courts of Juſtice, in defence of thoſe who were injured. Laertius tells us, that Polycritus Mendæus affirmed in his firſt book of the Hiſtory of Dionyſius,

(a) See Diog. Laertius in Vita Æſchinis, & Photii Biblioth. Cod. lxi; Suidas and Philoſtrat. in Vitâ Apollonii, l. 1. c. 35.

[A] Where he met with contempt from Plato.] We are informed of this by Diogenes Laertius in his Life of Æſchines; and he repeats the ſame in his Life of Plato; where he tells us, that Plato had a conteſt with Æſchines, and aſcribed the converſation, which Idomeneus ſays Æſchines held with Socrates in priſon, to Crito; and that he never mentioned him in any of his works except in his book Of the Immortality of the Soul, and the Defence of Socrates, and even there in a very ſlight manner. But wherever Laertius got theſe particulars, they are plainly inconſiſtent with a paſſage in Plutarch, in his Book concerning the difference between a Friend and a Flatterer, where that author introduces Plato recommending Æſchines to Dionyſius (1). The paſſage is as follows. "Plato addreſſed himſelf to Dionyſius in "this manner: If you knew, Dionyſius, that a man "was come to Sicily with an hoſtile deſign againſt you, "but wanted an opportunity of executing it, would "you ſuffer him to go away with impunity? By no "means, ſaid Dionyſius; for we ought not only to "reſent and puniſh the actions, but even the intentions "of our enemies. If therefore, replied Plato, a "perſon ſhould come hither out of friendſhip to you, "and deſire to do you a kindneſs; and you ſhould not "give him a proper opportunity to do it, does he de"ſerve to be ungratefully neglected? Upon this Dio"nyſius, inquiring who the perſon was, Plato an"ſwered, It is Æſchines, a man, who of all Socra"tes's friends is moſt eminent for his integrity and "virtue, and who is qualified to inſtruct and reform "thoſe whom he converſes with. He has taken a "long voyage at ſea, in order to talk with you in a "philoſophical way; and yet he is entirely neglected. "This touched Dionyſius ſo ſenſibly, that he imme"diately took Plato by the hand, and embraced him, "and treated Æſchines in the moſt friendly and ho"nourable manner." This paſſage is very agreeable to Plato's character and diſpoſition, and is therefore rather to be credited than Diogenes Laertius's ſuggeſtions to the contrary.

(1) See Iſ. Caſaubon. ad Menagii Not. in Diog. Laert. Vit. Æſchin.

Dionyſius, that he lived with that Tyrant till he was depoſed, upon Dion's coming to Syracuſa; and that Carcinus the comic writer was with him. There was likewiſe an Epiſtle of Æſchines to Dionyſius extant. Phrynicus in Photius (b) ranks him amongſt the beſt Orators, and repreſents his Orations as the ſtandard of the pure Attic Style. Hermogenes has alſo paſt the ſame judgment upon him [B]. Laertius tells us, that he was very well ſkilled in Oratory, as appeared from his apology for Phæax the General, and for Dion, and that he imitated Gorgius Leontinus. Lyſias wrote an Oration againſt him, which he intitled, Concerning Calumny. Ariſtippus ſuſpected Æſchines's Dialogues; for when the latter read them to him at Megara, he aſked him with a tone of raillery, Where did you get them, you plagiary [C]? Menedemus Eretrienſis likewiſe accuſed him for having aſſumed to himſelf thoſe Dialogues, which were actually written by Socrates, and which he received from Xanthippa (c). Suidas ſays, that he wrote the following Dialogues, intitled Miltiades, Callias, Rhinon, Aſpaſia, Axiochus, Telauges, Alcibiades, and thoſe which are called Acephali, Phædon, Polyænus, Eryxias, Concerning Virtue, Eraſiſtratus, Scythici. We have three Dialogues of Æſchines ſtill extant. I. Concerning Virtue, whether it can be taught. II. Eryxias or Eraſiſtratus, concerning Riches, whether they are good. III. Axiochus, Concerning Death, whether it is to be feared. Theſe Dialogues were tranſlated into Latin by Rodolphus Agricola, Sebaſtian Corradus and John Serranus; but their verſions, as Mr. Le Clerc has obſerved (d), are too remote from the author's words, and very often from his meaning. This conſideration induced the latter to undertake a new tranſlation, which he publiſhed in 1711 in 8vo, with Notes, and ſubjoined to it ſeveral Diſſertations, which he intitled Silvæ Philologicæ; in the ſecond chapter of which he examines very accurately the doctrine of Æſchines's firſt Dialogue. He has added likewiſe a fragment of another Dialogue De Moribus Conjugum, i. e. "Concerning the Behaviour of married Perſons [D], extracted from Cicero (e). There is a fine paſſage in the third Dialogue concerning the immortality of the ſoul [E]. Philoſtratus in his Epiſtles to Julia Auguſta ſays,

(b) Ubi ſupra.

(c) Diog. Laert. & Photius, Cod. clviii. and Athen. Deipnoſ. lib. 13. pag. 611. and Heſychius Illuſtris de Vitâ Philoſophorum.

(d) In præfatione edit. ſuæ Dialog. Æſchinis.

(e) De Invent. l. 1. c. 31.

[B] Hermogenes has paſt the ſame judgment upon him.] He tells us (2), that Æſchines made uſe of the utmoſt ſimplicity of ſtyle, but much oftner of the greateſt purity and perſpicuity. He is more ſubtle, ſays Hermogenes, in Diction, than Xenophon. He introduces a great many ſentences, and thoſe of the moſt weighty kind; but very ſeldom any ornaments or alluſions from fables and fabulous writers. But as much as Xenophon was ſuperior to Plato in the ſimplicity of his manner of writing, ſo much was Æſchines ſuperior to Xenophon in ſubtlety. Beſides, he is much purer, and with all his ſimplicity very accurate, and even more ſo than Xenophon himſelf.

(2) De formis Orationis, lib. 2. cap. 12.

[C] He asked him with a tone of raillery, where did you get them, you plagiary?] Phrynicus in Photius (3) tells us, ſome writers aſcribe Æſchines's ſeven Dialogues to Socrates. Mr. Le Clerc in his Notes upon Laertius's Life of our Philoſopher (4), obſerves upon this occaſion, that we have reaſon to congratulate ourſelves, if we can ſuppoſe theſe Dialogues to have been of Socrates's own compoſition. On the other hand, it muſt undoubtedly have been the moſt exquiſite ſatisfaction imaginable to Æſchines, to find that his Dialogues were eſteemed ſo exactly agreeable to the genius and manner of Socrates, that they were commonly aſcribed to him. However, we may juſtly think our ſelves happy, that we have ſome of the remains either of Socrates, or of Æſchines, who ſo faithfully copied that excellent Philoſopher's doctrine, as is acknowledged by Ariſtides (5), who ſays, that he wrote what Socrates ſaid, or what was very like it; whereas Plato indulged his own fancy, and publiſhed a great many things under Socrates's name, which it is certain he never ſaid.

(3) Cod. clviii. p. 327. edit. Rhotomagi 1653.

(4) Pag. 4.

(5) Orat. Platon. pag. 367. edit. Canter.

[D] Dialogue de Moribus Conjugum, i. e. Concerning the behaviour of married perſons.] Cicero has given this as an inſtance of the uſe of Induction, which is a manner of arguing, by which we gain the aſſent of the perſon whom we diſpute with, by propoſing to him things, which are evident; and by this aſſent of his we prove another point, which was before doubtful, by means of the ſimilitude which there is between the two caſes. Socrates, in this Dialogue of Æſchines, gives an account of the method which Aſpaſia took, in order to perſuade Xenophon and his wife to obſerve the reciprocal duties of a married ſtate in the beſt manner. The perſons in the Dialogue are Aſpaſia, Xenophon, and his wife, whom Mr. Le Clerc (6) ſuppoſes from a paſſage in Laertius (7) to have been named Phileſia. "Tell

(6) Not. in Æſchin. Dial. iv. p. 122.

(7) In Vita Xenophont. § 52.

"me, Phileſia, ſays Aſpaſia, whether, if your neighbour had a piece of gold of more value than your own, you would not chooſe it before your own? Yes, anſwered Phileſia. If ſhe had a gown, or any of the female ornaments better than your's, would not you chooſe them rather than your own? Yes, anſwered ſhe. But, ſays Aſpaſia, if ſhe had an husband of more merit than your own, would not you chooſe the former? Upon this Phileſia bluſhed. Aſpaſia then addreſſed herſelf to Xenophon. If your neighbour, Xenophon, had an horſe better than your own, would not you chooſe him preferably to your own? Yes, anſwered he. If he had an eſtate or farm of more value than your own, which would you chooſe? The former, anſwered he, that is, that which is more of value. But if his wife was better than your own, would not you chooſe your neighbour's? Here Xenophon was ſilent upon this queſtion. Aſpaſia therefore proceeded thus: Since both of you then have refuſed to anſwer me in that point only, which I wanted you to ſatisfy me in, I will tell you myſelf what you both think: for you, Phileſia, would have the beſt of husbands, and you, Xenophon, the beſt of wives. And therefore if you don't endeavour that there be not a better husband and wife in the world than your ſelves, you will always be wiſhing for that which you ſhall think beſt; you, Xenophon, will wiſh you might be married to the beſt of wives, and Phileſia, that ſhe might have the beſt of huſbands." Quare niſi hoc perfeceritis, ut neque vir melior, neque fœmina lectior in terris ſit; profecto id ſemper quod optimum putabitis eſſe, multo maximè requiretis; ut & tu maritus ſis quam optimæ, & hæc quam optimo viro nupta ſit.

[E] A fine paſſage in the third Dialogue concerning the Immortality of the Soul.] The interlocutors of this Dialogue are Socrates, Clinias and Axiochus. Clinias had brought Socrates to his father Axiochus, who was ſick, and apprehenſive of death, in order to ſupport him againſt the fears of it. Socrates diſcourſes with him in a very ſtrong and convincing manner by a variety of arguments, and then proceeds as follows (8). "Beſides, there are many and very noble things which are ſaid concerning the immortality of the ſoul. For the human nature could not have raiſed itſelf to ſo high a pitch in executing the greateſt affairs, ſo as to deſpiſe even the ſtrength of brute creatures, though ſuperior to our own, to paſs over ſeas, build cities, and found commonwealths, contemplate the heavens, view says, that he wrote an Oration concerning Thargelia, and that he imitated Gorgias (g) in it, which is agreeable to what we obſerved above from Laertius. Menage tells us, that Athenæus mentions a Dialogue of Æſchines, which he intitled Πολιτικὸς; but Mr. Le Clerc (b) obſerves, that he cannot find any ſuch paſſage in Athenæus. There were eight eminent men of this name among the ancients: I. The Philoſopher, whom we are ſpeaking of. II. The Author of an Art of Rhetoric. III. The Orator who was contemporary with Demoſthenes. IV. An Arcadian. V. A Mitylenean, who was called Rhetoromaſtix

(8) Æſchin. Dialog. 3 de Morte, p. 166, & ſeq. edit. J. Clerici 1711.

"the

(g) Γοργιάζων.

(b) Not. in Laertii Vitam Æſchinis, p. 8.

" the revolutions of the Stars, the courſes of the " Sun and Moon, their riſings and ſettings, their " eclipſes and immediate reſtoration to their for- " mer ſtate, the equinoxes and double returns " of the Sun [or the two Solſtices,] the ſigni- " fications of the Pleiades concerning winter and " ſummer, the winds and deſcents of ſhowers, " and the unſeaſonable ſtorms and whirl-winds; " and to foretell for ever by certain rules what " ſhall happen to the world; this, I ſay, the " ſoul could never do, unleſs it was really poſ- " ſeſs'd of a divine Spirit, by which it gains the " knowledge of ſo many great things. And there- " fore, Axiochus, you will not be changed to a " ſtate of death or annihilation, but of immortality; " nor will your delights be taken from you, but " you will enjoy them more perfectly; nor will " your pleaſures have any tincture of this mortal " body, but be free from every kind of pain. When " you are diſengaged from this priſon, you will be " tranſlated thither, where there is no labour, nor " ſorrow, nor old age. You will enjoy a ſtate of " tranquillity and freedom from evil, a ſtate perpe- " tually ſerene and eaſy; and you'll then be ena- " bled to contemplate nature, and ſtudy Philoſophy, " not for the ſake of the multitude and the public, " but out of regard to the pure and genuine truth. " Axioch. You have drawn me over, Socrates, to " your opinion by your diſcourſe; I am now no " longer fearful of death, but ambitious of it and " impatient for it; ſo that I ſhall ſay ſomething very " noble and excellent, in imitation of the Rhetoricians. " My mind is tranſported into ſublime thoughts, " and I run the eternal and divine circle; I have " diſengaged my ſelf from my former weakneſs, " and am become a new man. Socrates: But if " you will give your attention to another diſcourſe, " which I had from Gobryas (9) the Magus, I will " relate the ſtory. He told me at the time, that " Xerxes paſſed over to Europe, that his Grandfa- " ther, who was of the ſame name with himſelf, be- " ing ſent to Delos, in order to ſecure the iſland, " in which the two Deities were born, learn'd there " from certain books of braſs, which Opis and Eca- " ergus had brought from the Hyperboreans, that " the ſoul after it is freed from the body, goes into " an inviſible place beneath the earth, in which Pluto " has his kingdom not the leaſt inferior to Jupiter's " palace; for as the earth poſſeſſes the middle region " of the world, and the pole is of a ſpherical form, " the celeſtial Gods have claimed the upper hemiſ- " phere, and the infernal Gods the lower. Some of " whom are brothers, and others brothers ſons. " The porch of life, which leads to Pluto's palace, " is fortified with iron bolts and bars. But when a " perſon has opened this, he goes on to the river " Acheron, and then to Cocytus; which muſt be " paſs'd in a ferry-boat, in order to go to Minos " and Rhadamanthus, in the place, which is called " the Plain of Truth (10). Here the Judges ſit, " examining every one who comes, what kind of " life he has led, and after what manner he has act- " ed in the body; and it is impoſſible for any of " them to return a falſe anſwer. Whoever therefore " have followed the impulſes of their good genius " in this life, they are ordered to dwell in the ſeats " of the good and pious. Here the ſeaſons produce " all the various kinds of fruits in the moſt plenti- " ful manner; here the fountains flow with the moſt " limpid ſtreams, the meadows ſmile with all the " variety of beautiful flowers; here are the ſchools " of Philoſophers, the theatres of Poets, the moſt " elegant conſorts of muſic and dancing, and the " richeſt banquets of fruits, which the earth ſponta- " neouſly affords; in ſhort, here are all the bliſsful " ſcenes of immortal happineſs, and undiſturbed " eaſe and tranquillity. Here are none of the in- " clemencies of the ſeaſons, neither too intenſe " cold, nor immoderate heat, but the air is always " temper'd with gentle beams of the Sun. Thoſe " who are initiated have a right to the principal " ſeats here, and they perform the ſacred purifica- " tions. Why then ſhould not you be the firſt " partaker of this honour, when you are of the " ſame origin and family with the Gods? It is ſaid, " that Hercules and Bacchus were initiated here be- " fore they deſcended to the Infernal regions, and " that the reſolution with which they went thither, " was inſpired into them by the Goddeſs Eleuſinia. " But whoever have led a vicious life, are hurried " away by the Furies thro' Tartarus into Erebus " and Chaos: there is the ſeat of the impious, " the pitchers of Danaus's daughters, which are ne- " ver filled, the everlaſting thirſt of Tantalus, and " Tityus with his bowels ever conſuming, Siſyphus " rolling up the ſtone, which can never reach the " top of the mountain,

His labour ſtill revolving on itſelf.

" There are thoſe criminals who are ſurrounded by " ſerpents, which perpetually lick them, and are al- " ways burning with the Furies torches, and tortur'd " with all the various forms of puniſhment to all " eternity. Theſe things I heard from Gobryas; " you, Axiochus, may paſs your own judgment of " them; for I only know from the principles of " reaſon this to be a certain truth, that the ſoul is " immortal. And when it is removed from this " world, it is freed from pain and ſorrow. Whe- " ther therefore you are placed above or below, " you muſt be happy, ſince you have lived virtu- " ouſly. Axiochus: I am aſhamed, Socrates, to " ſay any thing to you; for I am now ſo far from " fearing death, that I long for it, ſuch an effect " has this divine diſcourſe had upon me. I now " deſpiſe life, ſince I ſhall be tranſlated to an hap- " pier ſituation. I ſhall now ſilently revolve in my mind " what has been ſaid; but do you, Socrates, viſit " me again in the afternoon. Socrates: I will " gratify your requeſt; but for the preſent I ſhall re- " turn to my walk in the Cynoſarges (11), from " whence I was ſent for hither." Cicero ſeems to have borrowed a great deal from this Dialogue of Æſchines in his Tuſculan Queſtions (12), and in his book De Finibus (13), and in a Fragment of his Treatiſe De Philoſophia, quoted by St. Auſtin (14). We may obſerve, that Socrates does not ſeem to lay any ſtreſs upon the credit of theſe fables, which he learned from Gobryas, but only made uſe of them in order to mitigate the uneaſineſs of his friend's mind. He thought it was ſufficient for him to believe the immortality of the ſoul, without any regard to the particular circumſtances of the other life, of which they had then no certainty. And we find the following remarkable paſſage in Plato's Phædo (15), where Socrates having advanced a great many things concerning the ſtate of ſouls after death, concludes thus: " But that theſe things are juſt in the ſame " manner as I have repreſented them, it does not be- " come a man of judgment abſolutely to affirm. " However I cannot but think it very conſiſtent " with reaſon to aſſert, that theſe or ſuch like will " be the circumſtances of our ſouls, and their pecu- " liar reſidence in a future ſtate, ſince it is plain the " ſoul is immortal; and that whoever thinks thus, " has the greateſt reaſon to make the trial." Τὸ μὲν οὖν ταῦτα διαχρίσασθαι οὕτως ἔχειν, ὡς ἐγὼ διελήλυθα, οὐ πρέπει τοῦ ἔχοντι ἀνδρί, ὅτι μέντοι ἢ ταῦτ' ἐστιν, ἢ ταῦτ' ἄλλα περὶ τὰς ψυχὰς ἡμῶν καὶ τὰς οἰκήσεις, ἐπείπερ ἀθάνατόν γε ἡ ψυχὴ φαίνεται οὖσα, τοῦτο καὶ πρέπειν ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ καὶ ἄξιον κινδυνεύσαι οἰομένῳ οὕτως ἔχειν.

T.

(9) Perhaps this is the ſame with Gobryes, who is ſaid by Ariſtotle to have been a Syrian Magus, and to have foretold to Socrates, that he ſhould die a violent death. See Laertius, l. 2. 42.

(10) Πεδίον ἀληθείας.

(11) A place near Athens.

(12) Lib. 1, 28.

(13) Lib. 5. cap. 19.

(14) De Trinitate, lib. 4. c. 2. See Le Clerc's Notes upon Æſchines's 3d Dialogue, p. 108 and 111.

(15) § 46.

Rhetoromaſtix. VI. A Neapolitan, who was an Academic Philoſopher, and ſcholar and minion to Melanthius of Rhodes. VII. A Mileſian, who wrote concerning the Adminiſtration of a Commonwealth. VIII. A Statuary (i).

(i) See Diogenes Laertius in Vita Æſchines.

ÆSCHYLUS the tragick Poet was of Athens [A]. There are a thouſand diſputes about the year of his birth [B]; but we may know for a certainty at what time he flouriſhed, ſeeing it is known (a) that he ſignalized his bravery at the battle of Marathon (b), at that of Salamis and at that of Platæa. He told the publick himſelf that he ſet about writing Tragedies by the order of Bacchus [C]. Some ſay that he never laboured at them but when he had drank liberally [D]; they mean perhaps that he gave himſelf up in ſuch a manner to the exceſſive tranſports of his imagination, that he wrote more like a man that had drank too much, than one of ſolid ſenſe. The character of his genius is admirably repreſented by Mr. le Fevre of Saumur (c). This Poet was not in reality the inventor of Tragedy; but he made ſeveral alterations in it [E], which brought him ſo near perfection, that he deſerves greater praiſes than thoſe who

(a) Scholiaſtes, in Vita Æſchyli.
(b) In the 2d year of the 72d Olympiad.

(c) In his Vie des Poëtes Grecs. See alſo Mr. Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, tom. 1. pag. 148, &c.

(1) Saturnal. l. 5. cap. 19.

[A] He was of Athens.] Macrobius (1) who has made him a Sicilian is miſtaken; and it cannot be ſaid that he ſpoke of another Æſchylus; for he ſpeaks of him that wrote a Tragedy intitled Ætna. Now it is certain that he who compoſed this Tragedy is not different from him that was overcome by Sophocles, and out of ſpite baniſhed himſelf from Athens his own country, and retired to Hiero King of Syracuſa. Hiero was at that time building the city of Ætna, which was the reaſon that Æſchylus gave that name to his Tragedy (2). The learned Giraldi had not erred as he has, if he had conſidered this circumſtance. He pretends (3) that the Æſchylus of Macrobius was a Sicilian, and a different perſon from him whoſe Tragedies are remaining. He queſtions alſo whether Athenæus has not ſpoken of this Sicilian Æſchylus, when he ſays (4) that Æſchylus made uſe of Sicilian phraſes. I do not know what theſe words mean, Fuit Cyrenæus (Æſchylus) familiaris Callimachi. Athenæus lib. viii. They are in the Variorum Edition of Valerius Maximus, in the notes upon the twelfth chapter of the ninth book. They are aſcribed to Colerus.

(2) Scholiaſtes, in Vita Æſchyli.
(3) In Dialogis de Poët. Græc.
(4) Athen. lib. 9.

[B] There are a thouſand diſputes about the year of his birth.] The life of Æſchylus compoſed by his Scholiaſt places his birth in the 40th Olympiad, and mentions his giving proofs of his valour at the battle of Salamis. Theſe two facts are incompatible; for this battle was fought in the laſt year of the 74th Olympiad (5). Could Æſchylus perform the duty of a good ſoldier, when he was about 140 years old? There is no diſpute amongſt the criticks whether the number 40 crept into this life of Æſchylus by the ignorance of the copyiſts: every body allows it; but it is diſputed what other number ought to be ſubſtituted for it. Caſaubon (6) ſubſtitutes 63; Samuel Petit (7) 65; Meurſius (8) 70. This laſt opinion cannot be ſupported, for Æſchylus ſignalized himſelf at Marathon the ſecond year of the 72d Olympiad, according to the author of his life. Voſſius corrects it as Meurſius does, and to get clear of the objection, ſuppoſes that the Scholiaſt has not pointed out the birth, but the flouriſhing of Æſchylus (9). But this is wrong; for the Scholiaſt made uſe of the word γεγονὼς. Stanley relying on the Arundelian marbles places the birth of this Poet in the 4th year of the 63d Olympiad. According to theſe marbles, Æſchylus died at the age of 69 years, when Callias was Archon, that is, in the firſt year of the 80th Olympiad. The conſequence which Stanley (10) has drawn from this principle is juſt. Barnes in his Life of Euripides regulates himſelf by the ſame marbles, with regard to the birth of Æſchylus.

(5) According to others, the 1ſt of the 75th Olympiad; a difference which might ariſe from the laſt months of one Olympiad and the firſt of the next anſwering to the ſame year of the Romans.
(6) De Satyrica Poëſi, lib. 1. cap. 5. apud Stanleium Not. in Æſchyl. p. 702, 703.
(7) Miſcellan. lib. 3. cap. 14. apud eundem, ibid.
(8) De Archont. apud eundem, p. 704.
(9) Voſſius, de Poët. Græc. pag. 25.
(10) Not. in Æſchyl. p. 704.

[C] He ſays himſelf that he ſet about writing Tragedies by the order of Bacchus.] When he was a little boy he was ſent into the country to look after the vineyards. He dreamed one night that Bacchus commanded him to write Tragedies: as ſoon as it was day he endeavoured to obey the Divinity, and found that his endeavour met with good ſucceſs, and no difficulty. Ἔφη δὲ Αἰσχύλῳ μειράκιον ὄντι καθεύδειν ἐν ἀγρῷ φυλάσσειν σταφυλάς, καὶ οἱ Διόνυσον ἐπιστάντα κελεῦσαι τραγῳδίαν ποιεῖν· ὡς δὲ ἦν ἡμέρα (πειθόμενος γὰρ ἐθέλειν) ῥᾳδίως ἤδη ποιοῦντος ποιεῖν (11).

(11) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 19.

[D] Some ſay that he never laboured at them but when he had drank liberally.] This is obſerved by Chameleon in his book of the Life of Æſchylus. Μεθύων δὲ ἐποίει τὰς τραγῳδίας Αἰσχύλος, ὡς φησὶ Χαμαιλέων (12). Hence he came to be reproached with making his Tragedies as he ought, but not knowing what he did. Sophocles was the author of it: Σοφοκλῆς οὖν ὀνειδίζων αὐτῷ ὅτι εἰ καὶ τὰ δέοντα ποιεῖ, ἀλλ' οὐκ εἰδώς γε (13). He was very happy in arriving at the height of perfection blindly and by accident, which ſo many others know not how to effect with all their ſtudy. He was reproached with another fault, that of being the firſt who introduced drunken perſons into a dramatic piece, as if he would have juſtified his own faults by imputing them to the Heroes of his Tragedies (14). Chameleon is not the only teſtimony we can quote; Calliſthenes had ſaid the ſame thing. Οὐ γὰρ ὡς τὸν Αἰσχύλον ὁ Καλλισθένης ἔφη τι λέγων, τὰς τραγῳδίας ἐν οἴνῳ γράφειν, ἐξεφρωδῆσαι καὶ ἀναθερμαίνεσθαι τὴν ψυχήν. That is, "Not as Calliſthe-" nes ſaid of Æſchylus, that he wrote his Tragedies " when he was heated and enraged with wine (15)." Plutarch relates the ſame thing, and pretends that all the pieces of Æſchylus, not excepting that which paſſes for an enthuſiaſm of the God Mars (16), were the effects of an inſpiration of Bacchus (17). To avoid all equivocation, I muſt declare, that by this inſpiration of Bacchus I mean a real drunkenneſs without a metaphor, and not ſuch tranſports as thoſe which Horace ſpeaks of in the xixth Ode of the ſecond book, and in the xxvth of the third, where he evidently ſpeaks of the enthuſiaſm of the God of Poetry. See Mr. Dacier's Commentary. You will find there, that Bacchus and Apollo were but the ſame God.

(12) Athenæus, lib. 1. p. 22. and lib. 10. p. 428.
(13) Idem, ibid.
(14) Athenæus, lib. x. p. 428.
(15) Lucian. in Demoſthenis Encomio Oper. tom. 2. p. m. 924.
(16) It is intitled Ἑπτὰ ἐπὶ Θήβαις, i. e. Seven againſt Thebes.
(17) Plut. Sympoſ. lib. 7. Quæſt. 10. pag. m. 715. Stanley, Not. in Æſchyl. p. 701, has reſtored this paſſage very ingeniouſly; he would have it read μέγιστον Ἄρεως, inſtead of μίστιν Ἄρεως.

[E] He made ſeveral alterations in Tragedy.] Horace has not taken notice of them all:

Ignotum tragicæ genus inveniſſe Camœnæ
Dicitur, & plauſtris vexiſſe poëmata Theſpis
Quæ canerent agerentque peruncti fæcibus ora
Poſt hunc perſonæ pallæque repertor honeſtæ
Æſchylus, & modicis inſtravit pulpita tignis
Et docuit magnumque loqui nitique cothurno (18).

(18) Horat. de Arte Poëtica, ver. 275.

" When Theſpis firſt expos'd the tragic Muſe,
" Rude were the Actors, and a cart the ſcene,
" Where ghaſtly faces ſtain'd with lees of wine,
" Frighted the children, and amus'd the crowd;
" This Æſchylus (with indignation) ſaw,
" And built a ſtage, found out a decent dreſs,
" Brought vizards in (a civiller diſguiſe)
" And taught men how to ſpeak, and how to act.
Lord Roſcommon.

Mr. Dacier's note is as follows: " It is not ſo eaſy " to invent as to add to the inventions of others. " The alterations which Theſpis had already made " in Tragedy, gave Æſchylus an opportunity of " making new ones and more conſiderable. He gave " his Actors a mask; for perſona in this place ſig- " nifies a mask, and not a perſon; he dreſſed them " with long robes, and gave them the buskin; in- " ſtead of a cart he built a ſtage a little elevated, and " entirely changed their ſtyle which became grave " and ſerious, whereas before it was ludicrous, λίξις " γελοῖα; but I am ſurprized that Horace ſhould ſay " nothing of ſome more important alterations which " Ariſtotle aſcribes to Æſchylus; for he ſays in his Poe- " ticks, that he added an Actor to Theſpis, that he " diminiſhed the ſinging of the Chorus, and that he " invented who went before him. His conduct with regard to religion was not always prudent, which drew him into difficulties that had like to have been fatal to him [F]. The mortification of seeing that his pieces were less pleasing to the Athenians than those of Sophocles, who was much younger than he [G], obliged him to leave his country, and retire

" invented a first part, προταγωνιςὴν λόγον. These " were worth being taken notice of (19)." There is an innovation ascribed to Æschylus which was not very agreeable to the impetuosity of his poetic rage. The ancients gave him the praise of having been the first that removed murders and shocking sights from the eyes of the spectators (20). It is he then that first practised the rule, of not staining the stage with blood. Mr. Dacier pretends that those who find this rule was not observed in the Tragedies of Æschylus, are mistaken. As to what he says after Aristotle, that Æschylus diminished the Chorus, I shall add a word or two. A sad accident was the occasion of this reformation. In the Tragedy of the Eumenides (a piece of Æschylus's) the Chorus being composed of fifty persons appearing on the stage with frightful habits (21) so affrighted the spectators that the women with child miscarried, and the children fell into fits. This occasioned a law to be made to reduce the Chorus to fifteen persons (22). Philostratus (23) has spoken very advantageously of the reformation of the theatre, invented and brought to perfection by Æschylus. The decorations, the machines, the tombs, the altars, the phantoms, the furies, the trumpets, which appeared upon the theatre were the invention of this Poet (24).

(19) Dacier sur Horace, tom. 10. p. 290, of the Holland edition.

(20) Dacier, ibid. p. 214, upon these words of Horace, Nec coram populo natos Medea trucidet, &c. de Arte Poetic. ver. 185.
That is,
" Medæa must
" not draw her
" murthering
" knife,
" And spill her
" childrens blood
" upon the stage.
Ld Roscommon.

(21) Æschylus was the first that put serpents upon the head of the Furies, instead of hair.

(22) See the Scholiast upon Aristophanes in Equit. and Julius Pollux, lib. 4. cap. 15. apud Stanleium, pag. 702, 707.

(23) Philostrat. in Vita Apolloni, lib. 6. cap. 6.

(24) Vita Æschyli Editioni Robortelli præfixa, apud Stanleium, p. 702.

[F] His conduct with regard to religion was not always prudent, which drew him into difficulties that had like to have been fatal to him.] They had condemned him as an impious person on account of a Play, and were just going to stone him, when his brother Amynias turning up his sleeve shewed the people that he had lost a hand in the service of the Republic. Amynias had been thus maimed at the battle of Salamis, where he had signalized himself above all the Athenians (25). The Judges reflecting on his valour, and on the friendship which he shewed for his brother, favoured Æschylus and declared him innocent. It is thus that Ælian relates the story (26). I have read somewhere (27) that he had been stoned upon the stage, if he had not retreated behind an altar of Bacchus, and that he was afterwards brought before the Judges because he had given a stroke in one of his Tragedies upon the mysteries of Ceres. Plato is very reasonable when he prescribes that no Tragedies should be acted, wherein the Gods are ill treated as they are in some verses that he relates. He also forbids Masters to make use of such books for the instruction of their Scholars (28). The verses which I mention are Æschylus's; in which he rallies the Gods terribly: he introduces Thetis speaking much after this manner. On the day of my nuptials Apollo sung a hymn wherein he assured me I should have a son who should live a long time without any distemper, his praises and the fine hopes he gave me filled me with joy. I thought he would be a true Prophet, and yet it is he himself that has slain my son. There are none that take a greater swing in libertine maxims than those who write for the stage; for if you call them to account, they can answer that they only put such speeches as probability requires in the mouths of profane persons, or such as are displeased with their fortune. It is very certain that the author of a Tragedy ought not to be supposed to believe all the sentiments that he delivers; but there are some affectations that discover what may be imputed to him, and be it as it will, one may justly forbid the stage some pieces, whether the author expresses his own sentiments or not. Cirano Bergerac uttered some impieties in his Agrippina, which caused it to be forbid (29).

(25) See Diodorus Siculus, l. 11. cap. 27.

(26) Var. Hist. lib. 5. cap. 19.

(27) Apud Bentleium, Not. ad Malalæ Chronicon, p. 14.

(28) Plato, de Repub. lib. 2. sub finem.

(29) See the Guerre des Auteurs, par Gueret, p. m. 155.

[G] His pieces were less pleasing to the Athenians, than those of Sophocles, who was much younger than he.] This is a disgrace to which the most famous authors are subject. There are some who raise themselves in such a manner above their rivals, that the voice of the Public confers the Supremacy upon them in the science which they have cultivated. One reigns in dramatic pieces, another in romances, &c. but alas this Monarchy is not always for life. A new Sun arises, which by degrees attracts all the suffrages; and so the great Author, who had worn the crown several years, sees himself degraded by a young man. This stabs him in a hundred places, and it is but a poor consolation, to complain of the ill taste or injustice of the Public, and to appeal to posterity (30). The Poet who gives so good a representation of the disadvantages of a long life (31), should not have forgotten that it exposes the authors of the first rank to this sad disgrace. They must die as soon as their glory is arrived at its height, and not give time to a new Star to overtake them in their celestial course (32). Be that as it will, it is pretended that the triumph of Sophocles over Æschylus was attended with a surprising distinction. The dispute had been appointed to honour a great solemnity which was celebrated at that time (33). Cimon, who was the principal Actor at this festival, named the Judges, one out of each tribe, and it was the first time that Sophocles appeared as a Dramatic Poet. What a blow was this for Æschylus, to see himself, a veteran full of glory, and exalted with many poetical triumphs, overcome by a first attempt! This was the cause of his abandoning his native soil. Νικήσαντος δὲ τοῦ Σοφοκλέους, λέγεται τὸν Αἰσχύλον περιπαθῆ γενόμενον καὶ βαρέως ἐνεγκόντα, χρόνον οὐ πολὺν Ἀθήνησι διαγαγεῖν, εἶτ' οἴχεσθαι δι' ὀργὴν εἰς Σικελίαν, ὅπου καὶ τελευτήσας περὶ Γέλαν τέθαπται (34). i. e. " It is reported " that, when Sophocles had gained the victory, Æ- " schylus was so vexed and disturbed in mind, that " he did not stay long at Athens, but went in a rage " to Sicily, where he died and was buried near Gela." This the Scholiast relates; he adds, it is true, that others will have it to be Simonides, and not Sophocles that triumphed over Æschylus. The dispute between Simonides and Æschylus was not about Tragedy, but about Elegy. There Simonides was in his strength, and Æschylus in his weakness. Such a gigantic imagination as that of Æschylus, such a turn of thought as his, his affectation of extravagant sublimity, were not proper for Elegy (35). It is observed that he never represented women in love in his Tragedies; he would have given but an ill representation of that passion: but when he was to represent a woman transported with fury, he was incomparable (36). However it must be confessed that the subject of this Elegy was to the advantage of Æschylus; for it was to be composed in honour of those who had lost their lives at the battle of Marathon: now he was greatly interested in that battle, seeing he had given proofs of his courage therein, and preferred this glory to that which he had acquired by his Poems: see the following note. I shall observe by the way, that every body has not understood Suidas, where he says that Æschylus retired into Sicily, because the seats were broken down during the representation of one of his Tragedies. Some have taken that literally, without considering that in this sense that accident did a great deal of honour to Æschylus; it would have been a sign that his pieces drew such a crowd of spectators, that the seats unable to bear them broke under them. We must take the thing as Scaliger understood it; that Æschylus's piece was despised and rejected. Eamdem forsan occasionem innuit Suidas, qui Æschylum in Siciliam demigrasse refert, quod dum fabulam exhibuerit ruerent subsellia διὰ τὸ πιεῖν τὰς ἰκρία ἐκδιδικυμένης ἀυτοὺ, subsellia frangere dicebatur; qui ut comici loquuntur non stetit, sed excidit, hoc est, non placuit, sicut à viro doctissimo Josepho Scaligero jamdiu monitum est Auson. Lect. Nec me movet quod alii aliter Juvenalis verba fregit subsellia versu, sint interpretati (37). " Perhaps Suidas alludes to the same acci- " dent, when he relates that Æschylus removed to A- " thens, because whilst his play was acting the seats " broke down. He was said amongst the Comedians, " to break down the seats, whose piece could not " stand, but fell to the ground, that is, did not " please; as was long ago observed by the learned " Joseph Scaliger. Nor does it affect me at all, that " others have given a different interpretation to those " words of Juvenal, fregit subsellia versu."

(30) Æschylus did thus, when he sunk. I consecrate my pieces, says he, to time, Athen. lib. 8. pag. 374.

(31) Juvenal, Sat. x. ver. 190, & seq.

(32) Hæc data pœna diu viventibus, idem, ibid. ver. 243. i. e. " This is the " punishment of " long livers.

(33) It was the discovery and the translation of the bones of Theseus. Plut. in Cimone, p. 483.

(34) Plut. ib. F.

(35) See M. Le Fevre, in his Life of Æschylus.

(36) Fœminam amantem nunquam exhibuit, sicut ab Aristophane in Ranis observatum est: at in exprimendâ insania usque ad stuporem simul & commiserationem eliciendum, qui Cassandræ orationem in Agamemnone legerit, nemo unquam superatum agnoscet. Stanleius, p. 706. The passage of Aristophanes in Ranis, is in the 2d Scene of the 4th Act, pag. m. 243.

(37) Stanleius, p. 707.

(d) Scholiaſtes, in Vita Æſchyli.

retire to Hiero King of Syracuſe (d). This is not without difficulty [H]. He lived but three years after his arrival in Sicily. The inhabitants of Gela erected a monument for him with a fine inſcription [I]. The Athenians gave a public teſtimony of the very particular eſteem they had for his Tragedies [K]. We have but ſeven of them

[H] This is not without difficulty.] I have ſaid already, that according to the Arundelian Marbles, we muſt place the birth of Æſchylus in the laſt year of the 63d Olympiad, and his death in the firſt year of the eighty firſt. Now, according to Diodorus Siculus (38), we muſt place the death of King Hiero in the ſecond year of the ſeventy eighth Olympiad; thus it cannot be true, as ſo many affirm, that Æſchylus retired to King Hiero, and died three years afterwards. He ſurvived this Prince about twelve years. I queſtion if one might not ſuppoſe that he retired into Sicily twice, and that the authors who ſpeak of him do not diſtinguiſh theſe two voyages It is agreed that the victory which Sophocles obtained over him, obliged him to go to the court of Hiero. Sophocles was then beginning to enter the liſts, and might be twenty eight years of age. This diſpute falls upon the laſt years of the ſeventy ſeventh Olympiad. Hiero died three years after, more or leſs. It is probable that Æſchylus, on the loſs of ſo good a patron, quitted Sicily, and returned into his own country, whence other diſcontents obliged him to depart again ſome years afterwards. What better retreat could he chooſe than Sicily, where, without doubt, he had left ſome friends, when he departed thence the firſt time? Obſerve that they were the inhabitants of Gela, who built him a ſepulchre (39). If Hiero had been alive, would not he have been deſirous to aſſume the honour of this monument? And it is probable that he would have erected it in Catanea, his favourite city, to which he gave the name of Ætna (40). And here is a new difficulty. It was at the beginning of the ſeventy ſixth Olympiad (41) that Hiero would have the name and the inhabitants of Catanea changed, and was in haſte to finiſh the eſtabliſhment of this new city. Now authors ſay, that when Æſchylus retired to the court of Hiero, he found him engaged in building the city of Ætna, and that he wrote a Poem on this new city. Therefore he did not retire out of pique becauſe of the triumph of Sophocles; for this young Poet did not vanquiſh him till after the middle of the ſeventy ſeventh Olympiad (42). Of all the parts of antient hiſtory, that which relates to the learned is beyond all contradiction the moſt confuſed and the moſt inacceſſible to the exact computations of a Chronologer.

(38) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 66.

(39) See the Note [I].

(40) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 11. cap. 49.

(41) Ibidem.

(42) Anno tertio Olympiad is ſeptuageſimæ ſeptimæ. Samuel Petitus, Miſcell. lib. 3. cap. 18. p. 173.

[I] The inhabitants of Gela erected a monument for him with a fine inſcription.] The words of the Scholiaſt who has written the life of Æſchylus are as follows. Ἀποθανόντα δὲ Γελῶοι πολυτελῶς ἐν τοῖς δημοσίοις μνήμασι θάψαντες, ἐτίμησαν μεγαλοπρεπῶς ἐπιγεάψαντες οὕτως:

Αἰχύλον Εὐφορίωνος Ἀθηναῖον τόδε κεύθει,
Μνῆμα καταφθίμενον πυροφόροιο Γέλας.
Ἀλκὴν δὲ εὐδόκιμον Μαραθώνιον ἄλσος ἂν εἴποι
Καὶ βαθυλαιτήεις Μῆδος ἐπισάμενος.

" When he was dead the inhabitants of Gela buried
" him magnificently among their publick monuments,
" and honoured him greatly with the following in-
" ſcription:

" This tomb Athenian Æſchylus contains
" Euphorion's ſon, in Gela's fertile plains.
" His courage Marathonian fields proclaim,
" And Medes unwilling tell the Hero's fame.

Pauſanias leaves us no room to queſtion that Æſchylus himſelf was the author of this epitaph. I ſhall tranſcribe his words, becauſe Romulus Amaſeus did not underſtand them. Φροιῆσαι δὲ Ἀθηναίους ἐπὶ τῇ νίκῃ ταύτῃ μάλιστα εἰκάζω· καὶ δὴ καὶ Αἰχύλος, ὡς οἱ τοῦ βίου προσεδοκᾶτο ἡ τελευτὴ, τῶν μὲν ἄλλων ἐμνημόνευσεν οὐδενὸς δόξης ἐς τοσοῦτον ἦκων ἐπὶ ποιήσει, καὶ πρὸ Ἀρτεμισίου καὶ ἐν Σαλαμῖνι ναυμαχήσας· ὁ δὲ, τό τε ὄνομα προτιθεὶς, καὶ τὴν πόλιν ἔγραψεν, καὶ ὡς τῆς ἀνδρείας μάρτυρας ἴσχοι τὸ Μαραθώνιον ἄλσος καὶ Μήδων τοὺς ἐς αὐτὸ ἀποβάντας. Nullam autem fuiſſe victoriam qua ſint magis Athenienſes, gloriati, quàm ea quam ex Marathonia pugna ſunt adepti, hinc præcipue ut credam adducor; quod Æſchylus, cum propè jam eſſet ut è vita decederet, qui de ſeipſo antè prorſus conticuerat, vir tanta in poëſi nominis celebritate, cujuſque virtus, navalibus prœliis ante ad Artemiſium & Salaminem enituerat, de Marathonia pugna cùm ſuum carmen ederet, in ipſa operis fronte ſuum & patriæ nomen inſcripſit: Marathonium enim ſaltum, & Perſas qui illuc deſcenderant, ſuæ teſtes virtutis citat (43). That is, " I am perſuaded that the A" thenians never gloried in any victory more, than
" in that which they gained at Marathon, chief" ly for this reaſon; that Æſchylus, when he was " near his end, though he had till that time been
" altogether ſilent with regard to himſelf, being a
" man ſo famous in Poeſy, and whoſe valour had
" before ſhone forth in the ſea-fights at Artemiſium
" and Salamis, when he publiſhed his Poem on the " battle of Marathon, inſcribed his own and his " country's name in the very front of his work: for
" he appeals to the plain of Marathon, and the Per-
" ſians who were then preſent, as witneſſes of his
" valour." The tranſlator ſeems here to have made three miſtakes. I. When he ſaid that Æſchylus had never ſpoken of himſelf before. II. When he preſuppoſed that this Poet ſignalized himſelf in the ſea-fights of Artamiſium and Salamis, before he fought at Marathon. III. When he imagined that Æſchylus put what Pauſanias ſpeaks of at the beginning of a Poem compoſed on the battle of Marathon. This is not the thought of the Greek author: he intended to prove that the victory at Marathon was that in which the Athenians gloried the moſt; and to that end, he alledges, that Æſchylus perceiving his death to approach laid every thing elſe aſide, and contented himſelf with writing his own name and that of his country, and appealing to Marathon and the Medes who there loſt their lives, as witneſſes of his valour. However, he gained himſelf a great name by his Poems, and was really at the fights of Artemiſium and Salamis. When one compares the words of Pauſanias with the epitaph of Æſchylus, one cannot queſtion his having the epitaph in view. But if any one will obſtinately doubt of this Poet's being the author of the inſcription, which the inhabitants of Gela engraved on his ſepulchre, let him look in Athenæus (44), who obſerves that Æſchylus, having acquired a very great reputation by his verſes, did not however ſelect this part of his glory for the ſubject of his epitaph, chooſing rather to mention that which he had acquired by his valour (45). For proof of this, Athenæus cites the two laſt verſes of the epitaph quoted above.

(43) Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 13.

(44) Ἀισχύλος τοσαύτην δόξαν ἴσχων διὰ τὴν ποιητικὴν, ὅμως ἔστιν ἐπὶ τῷ τάφῳ ἐπιγραφῆναι ἀξιοῖ μᾶλλον τὴν ἀνδρείαν, σεμνύσας ἀλκὴν δ' αὐτὸν εἶπεν, &c. Athen. lib. 14. p. 627.

(45) Alcæus had the ſame taſte, ſee hereafter citation (36) of the article ARCHILOCHUS.

[K] The Athenians gave a public teſtimony of the eſteem they had for his Tragedies.] They made a public decree that his Tragedies ſhould be played after his death, and he was the only one, whoſe pieces were honoured in ſuch a manner (46). Hence he has been introduced boaſting that his Poetry did not die with him, as it did with Euripides (47). Philoſtratus in the ſixth chapter of the ſixth book of the Life of Apollonius obſerves that the Athenians conſider'd Æſchylus as the father of Tragedy, and he ſeems alſo to inform us, that they invoked him after his death in the feaſts of Bacchus. Ἐκάλουν δὲ ἔτι τεθνεῶτα ἐς Διονύσια. Rhinuccinus tranſlates it, In Dionyſii feſtis etiam mortuum invocant; i. e. " They invoke him
" even after his death in the feaſt of Bacchus." Morel has tranſlated it convocant. Vigonere has tranſlated it ayans encore accouſtumé de l'invoquer ès jeux & feſtes de Dionyſius, that is, " having been ſtill ac-
" cuſtomed to invoke him in the plays and feaſts of " Dionyſius." But without doubt he meant nothing elſe than that they invited him to theſe feaſts, in as much as they had ordered by a public decree his Tragedies to be acted there, whence he carried away new triumphs. Conſult Voſſius in the 30th page of his Treatiſe of the Greek Poets. Quintilian leſſens this honour a little, for he contents himſelf with ſaying they ſuf-

(46) Scholiaſtes Ariſtophanis, apud Stanleium, pag. 707.

(47) Ariſtophanes, in Ranis.

them remaining, though he compoſed a great number of them. The beſt edition of Æſchylus is that of London 1663 [L]. See in Moreri the manner in which this unhappy Poet is ſaid to have been killed. It was by an eagle's letting fall a tortoiſe upon his head [M]. I forgot to ſay that Salmaſius, being diſcouraged by the difficulties he met with in Æſchylus, has declared, that this Poet is more obſcure than the holy Scriptures [N]. Mr. Moreri has made a conſiderable number of miſtakes [O].

ÆSOP,

fered at Athens the Tragedies of Æſchylus to contend for the prize after they had been corrected; and adds that ſeveral of thoſe who had corrected them obtain'd it. Of this number were Euphorion and Bion the ſons of Æſchylus (48). The Scholiaſt who has written the Life of Æſchylus, gives another form to the decree of the Athenians: he pretends they ordered that all thoſe who play'd the Tragedies of Æſchylus ſhould obtain a Chorus (49). He ſays alſo, that the Tragic Poets had a cuſtom of going to the tomb of Æſchylus, to do honour to his memory, and that they there played their pieces. Once again, Quintilian was not a man framed for relating theſe little ſtories; for he degrades this Poet from the rank that others give him. Some (50) place him above Sophocles and Euripides, and others, without deciding who has the preference, ſay that each of theſe three Poets excelled in certain things (51). But hear Quintilian's opinion: Tragœdias primus in lucem Æſchylus protulit, ſublimis & gravis, & grandiloquus ſæpe uſque ad vitium: ſed rudis in pleriſque & incompoſitus, propter quod correctas ejus fabulas in certamen deferre poſterioribus Poëtis Athenienſes permiſere; ſuntque eo modo multi coronati. Sed longè clarius illuſtraverunt hoc opus Sophocles atque Euripides: quorum in diſpari dicendi via uter ſit Poëta melior, inter plurimos quæritur (52). i. e. "Æſchylus was the firſt that publiſhed Tragedies; his ſtyle is grave and ſublime, and frequently lofty even to a fault: but generally harſh and incorrect; wherefore the Athenians gave the later Poets leave to correct his Plays when they contended for the crown, by which means many obtained it. But Sophocles and Euripides ſhone much brighter; and many make a doubt which of them is to be accounted the beſt Poet." Menedemus the Philoſopher always allowed Æſchylus the firſt rank. See his life in Diogenes Laërtius, Book II. Sect. 133.

(48) Vide Voſſium, de Poët. Græcis, p. 30.

(49) Τὸν βυλόμενον διδάσκειν τὰ Αἰσχύλε χορὸν λαμβάνειν (others read) χρυσὸν Gold.

(50) Ariſtophanes, in Ranis.

(51) Plutarchus apud Stanleium, and Phrynichus apud Photium, citante eodem Stanleio, p. 701, 702.

(52) Quintilian, lib. x. cap. 1.

[L] The beſt edition of Æſchylus is that of London (53).] Thomas Stanley publiſhed it in 1663, in folio. He added a Latin Tranſlation and a learned Commentary of his own, the Notes of the ancient Scholiaſt, the Fragments of the loſt pieces, the various Readings of the manuſcripts, and the obſervations of ſome learned Critics who have commented upon this Poet. The order of the preceding editions is as follows: The firſt was, that of Aldus Manutius at Venice in 1518: it contained only ſix Tragedies (54). Turnebus reprinted them at Paris in 1552, with Variæ Lectiones. The ſame year Franciſcus Robortellus publiſhed the ſeven Tragedies of Æſchylus at Venice, with his Conjectures and thoſe of Michael Sophiani, and with as many Scholia, as he was able to collect by conſulting the old Copies. Five years afterwards Henry Stephens printed an edition that ſurpaſſed thoſe which went before it. It contained the Agamemnon entire, which till then had appeared mutilated. The text of Æſchylus was corrected in ſeveral places, the ſame was done by the Scholia, and they were alſo enlarged. This was the work of Petrus Victorius. To theſe were added the Obſervations of Henry Stephens. At laſt Gulielmus Canterus publiſhed a new edition at Antwerp in 1580, in which he corrected an infinite number of faults, and diſpoſed each verſe in its proper order, which had not been done before. The Latin verſion which Oporinus publiſhed for Joannes Sauromannus is good for nothing (55). Thoſe who hereafter ſhall engage in the perfecting of the Hiſtorical Dictionaries, ought not to forget the Hiſtory of the Editions.

(53) See the Journal des Savans, for the 2d of March 1665.

(54) That which is intitled Choëphoræ is wanting in it.

(55) Taken from the Preface of Thomas Stanley.

[M] He was killed by a tortoiſe, &c.] Valerius Maximus (56), whom Mr. Moreri quotes, is not the only one that ſays this: Suidas declares it in two places (57): The Scholiaſt upon Æſchylus affirms it alſo (58). Pliny had ſaid it before them (59), and with this circumſtance, that Æſchylus was gone into the open fields, to avoid the fulfilling of a prediction which threatned him with the fall of ſomething that day. Ingenium eſt ei (aquilæ) teſtudines raptas frangere è ſublimi jaciendo, quæ ſors interemit Poetam Æſchylum prædictam fatis (ut ferunt) ejus diei ruinam ſecura cœli fide caventem (60).

(56) Lib. 9. cap. 12.

(57) In voce Αἰσχύλος & in voce Χιλεών.

(58) In Vita Æſchyl.

(59) This does not relate to Val. Maximus.

(60) Plin. lib. 10. cap. 3. p. mihi 391.

[N] Salmaſius has declared that this Poet is more obſcure than the Holy Scriptures.] Theſe are the words of Salmaſius (61): Quis Æſchylum poſſit adfirmare Græcè nunc ſcienti magis patere explicabilem quam evangelia aut epiſtolas Apoſtolicas? Unus ejus Agamemnon obſcuritate ſuperat quantum eſt librorum ſacrorum cum ſuis Hæbraiſmis & Syriaſmis, & tota Helleniſtica ſupellectile vel farragine. "Who "that is now skilled in Greek can find Æſchylus "more intelligible than the Goſpels or the Apoſtoli-"cal Epiſtles? His Agamemnon only exceeds the "ſacred Writings with all their Hebraiſms, Syria-"ciſms, and ſtuff of Helleniſms."

(61) De Helleniſtica, p. 37. Epiſt. Dedicat.

[O] Mr. Moreri has made a conſiderable number of miſtakes.] Having ſaid that Æſchylus had diſcovered in three battles that he was no leſs a ſoldier than a man of letters; he adds, that to give a more particular proof of his courage, it will be ſufficient to ſay, that he was the brother of that famous Cynegirus, who having both his hands cut off, as he laid hold of a veſſel of the enemy, did not however give over fighting with the Barbarians. I find four miſtakes in theſe words. I. To have a very brave brother is no proof that a man is brave himſelf. II. At leaſt it is not ſo convincing a proof, that the mention of it is enough to perſuade the reader. III. At leaſt it is not a more particular proof of it, than that which is borrowed from the courage one has ſhewn on three great occaſions. IV. As for Cynegirus, we muſt abide by what Herodotus ſays of him: that he was killed after his hand had been cut off, that hand, I ſay, with which he held a veſſel of the Perſians. What the Greek authors have added to this, does not ſo much reſemble the Legends of Orlando Furioſo, and of the quatre fils Aimon. Who can believe that a man, whoſe two hands were juſt cut off, could have ſtrength enough to ſeize upon a galley only with his teeth, and to hold it? Cynegiri quoque militis Athenienſis gloria magnis ſcriptorum laudibus celebrata eſt, qui poſt prælii innumeras cædes, cum fugientes hoſtes ad naves egiſſet, onuſtam navem dextra manu tenuit, nec prius demiſit quam (manum) amitteret; tum quoque amputata dextra, navem ſiniſtra comprehendit, quam & ipſam cum amiſiſſet, ad poſtremum morſu navem detinuit. Tantam in eo virtutem fuiſſe, ut non tot cædibus fatigatus; non duabus manibus amiſſis victus; truncus ad poſtremum, veluti & rabida fera, dentibus dimicaverit (62). i. e. "The "glory of Cynegirus an Athenian Soldier is cele-"brated by authors with great praiſes, who after he "had ſlain innumerable enemies in the battle, when "he had drove others to their ſhips, held one of them "that was well mann'd with his right hand, and "did not let go his hold till he had loſt it: when "he had loſt his right hand, he ſeized the ſhip with "his left, and when he had loſt that, he held it "with his teeth. So great was his valour, that not "being wearied with ſo great a ſlaughter; not con-"quered by the loſs of both his hands, maimed as "he was, fought like a wild beaſt with his teeth." I ſhould as ſoon believe what Pliny ſays of the Remora in the firſt Chapter of the third Book. The Vth miſtake of Mr. Moreri is his ſaying that Æſchylus, after the battles of Marathon, Salamis and Platææ, devoted himſelf to the compoſing of Tragedies. He tells us (63), that he had applied himſelf to it, when he was but a little boy, and he had diſputed the prize for Tragedy with Pratinas about twenty years before the battle of Platææ (64). VI. The Scholiaſt does not place the death of this Poet under the 78th Olympiad.

(62) Juſtinus, lib. 2. cap. 9.

(63) See above, Citation (11).

(64) In the 70th Olympiad. Suidas in Πρατίνας.

ÆSOP, in Latin Æſopus, the name of ſome ancient perſons of whom I am going to ſpeak in diſtinct articles. I begin with him on whom both the order of time, and his own merit beſtow the firſt place.

ÆSOP, the firſt or the principal author of the Fables [A], was a Phrygian, and flouriſhed in the time of Solon, that is, about the fiftieth Olympiad (a). His life, as Planudes has given it, is ſo well known, even to little children, that this alone might determine me not to give any extracts of it. But another reaſon determines me to have no regard to this work; namely, that it is agreed on by all judges to be a romance [B], and that the groſs abſurdities in it render it unworthy of all credit. I ſhall

(a) See the Note [C].

[A] He was the firſt or principal author of the fables.] I would not ſay that Æſop was the inventor of them, for Quintilian is not of that opinion. Illæ quoque fabulæ, ſays he (1), quæ etiamſi originem non ab Æſopo acceperunt (nam videtur eorum primus autor Heſiodus) nomine tamen Æſopi maxime celebrantur, ducere animos ſolent, præcipue ruſticorum & imperitorum, qui & ſimplicius quæ ficta ſunt, audiunt, & capti voluptate, facile iis quibus delectantur conſentiunt. That is, "Thoſe Fables alſo, which, "though they were not originally invented by "Æſop, (for Heſiod ſeems to have been the firſt "author of them) are yet very much celebrated un- "der the name of Æſop, draw the attention chiefly "of the rude and ignorant, who more eaſily at- "tend to fictions, and being caught by pleaſure "ſoon give their aſſent to what delights them." I ſhould rather aſcribe therefore the glory of the invention to Heſiod; but without doubt he left the thing very imperfect. Æſop improved it ſo happily, that he is eſteemed as the true author of this ſort of productions.

(1) Quint. Inſtitut. Orator. l. 5. c. 11. p. m. 241.

Æſopus auctor quam materiam reperit,
Hanc ego polivi verſibus ſenariis.

"If any thoughts in theſe Iambics ſhine,
"Th' invention's Æſop's, and the verſe is mine."

It is thus that Phœdrus begins his fables. Avienus makes the ſame obſervation in the Preface to his (2). Priſcian makes uſe of the word inventor with reſpect to Æſop; but he corrects himſelf preſently, and reduces the affair to the proper terms: Uſi ſunt ea, (fabula) ſays he, vetuſtiſſimi quoque autores, Heſiodus, Archilochus, Plautus, Horatius. Nominantur autem ab inventoribus fabularum aliæ Æſopiæ, aliæ Cypriæ, aliæ Lybicæ, aliæ Sybariticæ, omnes autem communiter Æſopiæ; quoniam in conventibus frequenter ſolebat Æſopus fabulis uti. That is, "The moſt an- "cient authors, Heſiod, Archilochus, Plautus, Ho- "race wrote in this way. Some fables are by the "inventors of them called Æſopian, others Cyprian, "others Libyan, others Sybaritic, but all in general "commonly Æſopian; becauſe Æſop often made "uſe of fables in aſſemblies." This is not exact; for if Heſiod, who is more ancient than Æſop, made uſe of fable, it follows that Æſop was not the inventor of them. Of the four ſorts of fable, of which Priſcian ſpeaks; three of them have the name of a country and not of their inventor. In fine, if all theſe four ſorts are called in common Æſopiæ, becauſe Æſop uſually ſpoke in Fables, why was it ſaid a few lines before, that the Fables, which were called Æſopiæ, were ſo named on account of their inventor? Aphthonius has fallen into moſt of theſe errors, Καλεῖται δ, ſays he (3), Συβαριτικὸς, καὶ Κίλιξ, καὶ Κύπριος παρὰ τὰς εὑρούσας μεταθεῖς τὰ ὀνόματα, νικᾷ δ μᾶλλον Αἴσωπος λέγεσθαι τῷ τὸν Αἴσωπον ἄριστα πάντων συγγράψαι τὰς μυθούς. That is, "It is "called Sybaritica, and Cilix, and Cypria, the names "being taken from the inventors. But becauſe Æ- "ſop has excelled all others in the writing of fables, "they have obtained the name of Æſopiæ." Macrobius makes a remark, not foreign to our preſent purpoſe. He diſtinguiſhes between fabula and fabuloſa narratio; he would have a Fable to be a relation abſolutely falſe, and a fabulous narration to be a number of fictions built upon a foundation of truth. This is the nature of Epic poems and Romances, Macrobius gives the fictions of Æſop as an example of Fable, and the relations of Heſiod, the rituals or books of religion as an example of fabulous narration. In quibuſdam & argumentum ex ficto locatur, & per mendacia ipſe relationis ordo contexitur, ut ſunt illæ Æſopiæ fabulæ elegantia fictionis illuſtres. At in aliis argumentum quidem fundatur veri ſoliditate: ſed hæc ipſa veritas per quædam compoſita & ficta profertur, & hoc jam vocatur fabuloſa narratio, non fabula, ut ſunt Ceremoniarum ſacra, ut Heſiodi & Orphei quæ de Deorum progenie actuve narrantur (4). That is, "In ſome the very argument is taken from a fiction, "and the order of the narration is woven together "with untruths, as the Fables of Æſop, which are "famous for the elegance of their fiction. But in "others the argument is founded on the ſolidity of "truth; but this very truth is delivered in ſome "compoſitions and fictions, and this is called a fa- "bulous Narration, not a Fable, as the ſacred Books "of Ceremonies, and thoſe of Heſiod and Orpheus "about the genealogy and acts of the Gods." Freinſhemius did not perfectly comprehend Macrobius's thought, when he made uſe of it to explain the paſſage of Priſcian, where it is ſaid that Heſiod, Archilochus, &c. brought Fables into uſe. Freinſhemius gives an admonition upon this; that there is a great difference between the Fables of Heſiod, and thoſe of Æſop: thoſe of Heſiod are fabulous Narrations, thoſe of Æſop are properly a Fable (5). He takes this diſtinction in the ſenſe of Macrobius, and quotes him: this is miſtaking the point; for when Quintilian and Priſcian and others ſay, that Heſiod uſed Fables; they mean that he makes uſe of the fictions of the Apologue: they never thought of the fabulous Narrations which he ſung on the birth and actions of the Gods (6). Thus the Fables of Heſiod now in queſtion, and thoſe of Æſop are of the ſame nature.

(4) Macrobius, in Somn. Scipion. lib. 1. cap. 2.

(5) Freinſhem. in Notis ad Fabulas Phædri, init.

(6) Conſider theſe words of Mr. Menage in Laert. lib. 1. num. 72. Dictus eſt Æſopus λογοποιὸς, non quod primus muta loqui docuerit, nam ante eum Heſiodus hoc fecerat in ſermone Luſciniæ ad Accipitrem ſed quia præcipue hoc ſcribendi genus ſectatus eſt. i. e. "Æſop was "called λογο- "ποιὸς, not be- "cauſe he firſt "taught dumb "creatures to "ſpeak, for He- "ſiod had done "this before, in "the nightin- "gale's ſpeech "to the hawk, "but becauſe he "chiefly follow- "ed that way "of writing.

[B] It is agreed on by all judges that his life by Planudes is a romance.] It is not without reaſon that in the Dutch edition of Moreri, the reader is informed, that Planudes has not given the Hiſtory of Æſop, but a rhapſody of lies and abſurdities. Mr. de la Fontaine was not ignorant of the judgment which the public form'd of this Life of Æſop: I ſee hardly any body, ſays he (7), who does not look upon that which Planudes has left us as fabulous. He has followed it however, and has even ſaid, that he has found at the end but little certainty in the Criticiſm on the work of Planudes. It is partly founded, continues he, upon what paſſes between Xanthus and Æſop: where we find too many fooleries. He anſwers, that ſuch things happen to every wiſe man. But if this anſwer appeared very ſolid to him, why has he retrenched from the work of Planudes, every thing that ſeemed to him too childiſh; or not over decent? Thus Mr. de la Fontaine approves a criticiſm in Deed which he had oppoſed in words. This is not the only thing in which we may criticiſe upon him; for we may affirm to him, that the hiſtorical falſhoods, Lycerus King of Babylon, contemporary with Nectenabo King of Ægypt, and ſuch marks of ignorance, are the chief cauſe of our rejecting the Life of Æſop. Mr. de la Fontaine has not retrenched that for this reaſon: As Planudes, ſays he (8), lived in an age wherein the memory of Æſop's adventures could not yet be extinguiſhed, I thought he knew by tradition what he has left us. If Planudes had lived two hundred years after Æſop, his knowledge derived from tradition muſt have been at that time very uncertain. A cautious man would hardly believe the traditions of two Centuries concerning the life of a perſon: he would ask whether the facts related were put in writing when they were recent; and if he ſhould be anſwered no, but that the memory of them has been preſerved by oral tradition from father to ſon, he knows Scepticiſm to be the prudent part. The reaſon is much ſtronger for rejecting the

(7) La Fontaine, Preface des Fables choiſies.

(8) Ibid.

(2) Hujus materiæ ducem nobis Æſopum noveris qui reſponſo Delphici Apollinis monitus ridicula orſus eſt ut legenda firmaret. i. e. "You know "Æſop is our "leader in this "ſubject, who "being admo- "niſhed by the "Oracle of Del- "phi, wrote in "a ludicrous "way, to ſtrike "the more.

(3) In Præexercitamentis.

ſhall refer therefore to Mr. Moreri thoſe who deſire an article extracted from Planudes, and ſpeak here only of ſuch things as come from good hands (b). Plutarch affirms (c), I. That Crœſus ſent Æſop [C] to Periander the Tyrant of Corinth, and to the Oracle of Delphi. II. That Socrates found no other expedient to obey the God of Dreams, without injuring his profeſſion, than to turn the Fables of Æſop into verſe (d) [D]. III. That Æſop and Solon were together at the court of Crœſus King of Lydia (e). IV. That (b) That is, borrowed from ancient authors.

(c) In Convivio ſapientium, pag. 150.

(d) De audiendis Poëtis, p. 16.

(e) In Vita Solonis, p. 94.

the relations of Planudes, if they come only by tradition, ſeeing he did not come into the world, till about eighteen Centuries after Æſop. Had Mr. de la Fontaine been aware of this, would he have ſaid that Planudes lived in an age wherein the memory of Æſop's adventures could not yet be extinguiſhed? Somebody has ſaid very well, that as to the things which regard the Patriarchs and Prophets, the Jews of the ſixth Century deſerve credit no more than thoſe of the ſeventeenth; I ſpeak of the Jews who quote only oral traditions. We may ſay the ſame thing of Æſop. He was known with no more certainty by tradition to the Greek Monks of the thirteenth or fourteenth Century, than to thoſe of the preſent.

I had forgot the groſs ignorance of Planudes in point of Chronology. He did not know that Æſop lived a long time before Euripides: He has introduced Æſop quoting two or three verſes of Euripides, and even naming him. We may conclude from thence that all the harſh things that Æſop ſaid to his maſter's wife the firſt time he ſaw her, are the invention of Planudes; and if he forged this firſt converſation, he might as well forge more. He ſuppoſes that Xanthus the Philoſopher having bought Æſop, was ſcolded at by his wife becauſe of the prodigious uglineſs of his ſlave, and that Æſop ſaid to this woman, You, Madam, would have had the Philoſopher have bought you a young, handſome, luſty fellow, to ſee you naked in the bath, and play with you at a game, fatal to your husband's honour. O Euripides, thy mouth was a golden one, ſince theſe words came out of it (9). He recited ſome verſes of Euripides againſt women. Is it not true that Planudes, having a mind to disburthen himſelf of a common place that loaded his head, has made Æſop ſpeak thus without any judgment? I have read in Mr. Menage (10) that this error in Chronology has been taken notice of by Meziriac and F. Vavaſſeur. As to the laſt, ſince I have his book de Ludicra Dictione, I can verify the quotation of Mr. Menage. It is very juſt; for theſe are the words of the Jeſuit (11). Quale autem Balzaci, putas quod Æſopo primum in herilem domum ingreſſo, cumque hero (12) colloquenti ſententiolam affingit Euripidis adverſus mulieres, atque ipſum etiam Euripidem appellari nomine facit qui octoginta (13) minimum annis natus eſt poſtquam Æſopus vivere deſiit? i. e. "What do you think of his "making Æſop at his firſt coming into his maſter's "houſe, and diſcourſing with his miſtreſs, to uſe a "ſaying of Euripides againſt women, and to men"tion the very name of Euripides who was born at "leaſt eighty years after the death of Æſop?" But as for the life of Æſop by the learned Meziriac, I have never been able to find it. I know it only by theſe words of Mr. Pelliſſon, in his catalogue of Meziriac's works (14); The true life of Æſop in French, I ſay the true one, becauſe that of Planudes is accounted fabulous by the learned. See the Note [O].

[C] Plutarch affirms that Crœſus ſent Æſop.] I think it probable that Æſop was at the court of Crœſus, though I have read in Sethus Calviſius, that he flouriſhed in the third year of the forty ſixth Olympiad; that he died in the fourth year of the fifty third, and that Crœſus aſcended the throne in the ſecond year of the fifty fourth. I do not regard Calviſius's quoting Suidas, I rely more upon Plutarch, who obſerves in ſeveral places that Æſop appeared at the court of Crœſus, and that he travelled for the ſervice of this Prince. Mademoiſelle de Scuderi (15) might therefore ſuppoſe him to be at this court with Solon, and ſeveral other great perſonages; ſhe might, I ſay, ſuppoſe this without laying hold on the privilege of Anachroniſms, of which the authors of Romances are no leſs in poſſeſſion than the Poets. She has made Æſop ſupport his character very well, whoſe ingenious fables, ſays ſhe, conceal ſo ſolid and ſerious a moral, under natural and diverting inventions. I am afraid that Mr. de la Fontaine has not been ſo exact in an Hiſtorical Work, as Mademoiſelle de Scuderi in a Romance. He places (16) the birth of Æſop about the fifty ſeventh Olympiad; now it appears that Crœſus loſt both his kingdom and liberty in the fifty eighth Olympiad: where then ſhall we place what paſſed between Crœſus and Æſop, according to Mr. de la Fontaine himſelf? I have ſaid that I preferred Plutarch's authority to that of Suidas, and I do not repent it, for there is nothing but incompatible confuſions in Suidas. On one ſide he ſays the inhabitants of Delphi threw Æſop from a precipice in the fifty fourth Olympiad, and on the other, that Æſop compoſed two books about the middle of the fortieth Olympiad concerning his adventures at Delphi. He adds, that Æſop lived with Crœſus (17), and had a ſhare in the friendſhip of that Prince. Scaliger pretends (18) that the laſt of theſe two paſſages refutes the other: His reaſon is, that a man who writes the Hiſtory of what befel him at Delphi, could not have been thrown from a precipice at that place. But this does not prove that Suidas was miſtaken in the firſt paſſage: Æſop might go to Delphi more than once, and the Hiſtory of his Adventures might relate only to his firſt journey. To refute Suidas it ſhould be ſaid, I. That a man of Æſop's condition could not have been of any conſequence when he was very young, that he muſt therefore have been at leaſt 30 years old, when in the 40th Olympiad he wrote the Hiſtory of his Voyage to Delphi, and that he muſt conſequently have been eighty ſix years of age when the people of Delphi threw him from a precipice in the fifty fourth Olympiad. Now it is abſurd to make him ſo old. II. If Æſop had been important enough to publiſh his adventures at Delphi in the fiftieth Olympiad, he could not live till the reign of Crœſus. Thus the authority of Suidas is nothing in this article. That of Euſebius is ſtronger. He places the death of Æſop in the fourth year of the fifty fourth Olympiad.

[D] Socrates found no other expedient to obey the God of Dreams, than to turn the Fables of Æſop into verſe.] To ſee this particular in its juſt extent, we muſt have recourſe to Plato, who tells us that Socrates was often admoniſhed in his dreams to apply himſelf to the exerciſes of the Muſes (19). He took this for ſo many exhortations to continue in what he was about: he thought Philoſophy was the grand and real buſineſs of the Muſes. But when he ſaw himſelf condemned to death, he thought that Poetry perhaps might be the exerciſe commanded him in his dreams. So to play the ſureſt game (20) he determined to obey the order of the God of Dreams, by interpreting it according to the uſual ſenſe of the words; and ſitting down to Poetry, began with a Poem in honour of the God (21) whoſe feaſt was at that time celebrating. Afterwards conſidering that to be a Poet (which he was not) he muſt publiſh ſome Fables, he turned ſome of Æſop's Apologues into verſe, ſuch as firſt occurred to his memory (22). Socrates gave this

(15) See the 4th Part of the Grand Cyrus.

(16) In the Eſprit of Æſop.

(17) Διήτριψε παρὰ Κροίσῳ εἰς λόγους.

(18) Animadverſ. in Euſeb. num. 1453, pag. 92, 93.

(19) Μουσικὴν ποίει καὶ ἐργάζου. Plato in Phædone, p. m. 46. C. that is, "Make "and exerciſe "Muſick." It appears by what follows that μουσικὴ is to be taken in this place for Poeſy, the art over which the Muſes preſide.

(20) Ἀσφαλέστερον γὰρ εἶναι μὴ ἀπιέναι πρὶν ἀφοσιώσασθαι ποιήματα ἀποθέμενον τῷ ἐνυπνίῳ. "For I thought "it would be "the ſafeſt way, "not to leave "the world "before I had "compoſed the "Poems com"manded in my "dreams. Plato ibid.

(21) It was Apollo.

(22) Plato, in Phædone, p. 46. C.

(9) Σύ, ὦ θέοπομπε, ἐβάλε τὸν φιλόσοφον ὠνήσασθαί σοι δοῦλον νέον, ἐυσωματοῦντα, σφριγῶντα, ἵν' ἐδὺς γυμνή σε καὶ τῷ βαλανείῳ θιασῶσθαι καὶ σοι προσπαίζει τὰ εἰς αἰσχυνὴν τῷ φιλοσόφῳ; Εὐριπίδη, χρυσοῦς ἐγὼ σε φημὶ τὸ στόμα τοιαῦτα λέγων. Planudes, in Vita Æſopi, p. m. 25.

(10) In Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 72.

(11) Vavaſſ. de Ludicra Dictione, p. 19.

(12) It ſhould have been hera.

(13) This does not agree with the words of the Extract of Æſop's Fables publiſhed by Mr. Leſtrange: Entrè autres le P. Vavaſſeur fait remarque qu'on fait citer Euripide par Eſope qui vivoit près de deux-cens ans avant Euripide l'Anachroniſme eſt un peu violent. Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans. Decembre 1692, p. 153. *[There is a miſtake here in quoting the words of Sir Roger Leſtrange: They are in the Preface, and again in the fourth chapter of his Life of Æſop, edit. in fol. London 1692. The words of the Preface are, "Vavaſor the Jeſuit, in a Tract of his, De Ludicra Dictione, takes notice of ſome groſs miſtakes "[in Planudes]. He tells us of his going into Egypt in the days of King Nectenabo; which Nectenabo came not into the world till well nigh two "hundred years after him. And ſo he makes him greet his miſtreſs upon his firſt entrance into his maſter's houſe, with a bitter ſentence againſt wo"men out of Euripides (as he pretends) when yet Æſop had been dead a matter of fourſcore years before t'other was born." His words in the Life of Æſop, are as follows; "Vavaſor the Jeſuit, in his De Ludicra Dictione, takes notice of a blunder here in the Chronology of the ſtory. For Æſop "was murdered at leaſt fourſcore years before Euripides was born." Perhaps either Mr. Bayle, or the Author of the Hiſt. des Ouvr. des Savans by a great overſight, quoted what Sir Roger ſays in the Preface of Nectenabo, inſtead of what he ſays of Euripides.] CRIT. REM.

(14) Hiſtoire de l'Academie Françoiſe, pag. m. 262.

IV. That thoſe of Delphi having put Æſop to death [E] cruelly and unjuſtly, and finding themſelves expoſed to ſeveral calamities on account of this injuſtice, made a public declaration that they were ready to make ſatisfaction to the memory of Æſop (f). V. That having treated thereupon with a native of Samos they were delivered from the evil that afflicted them. We may eaſily diſcover from the converſation of Æſop and Solon, that if the firſt ſpoke like a Courtier, the laſt ſpoke like a true Philoſopher [F]. Notwithſtanding this it muſt be allowed that Æſop's Lectures againſt the faults of men were the fulleſt of good ſenſe and wit that can be imagined [G]. Thoſe who have ſaid that his Apologues are the moſt uſeful of all the fables of this anſwer on the day of his death to Cebes, as a reaſon for his making Poems in priſon. Cebes it ſeems had asked him the reaſon of this new conduct. Plutarch explains to us the medium that Socrates found to reconcile the characters of Poet and Philoſopher together. It was to chuſe ſuch a ſubject for the Fables as contained the moſt ſolid truths, and excellent rules of morality: Ὅθεν ὁ Σωκράτης ἐκ πόνων ἐνυπνίων ποιητικῆς ἀψάμενος, αὐτὸς μὲν, ἅτε δὴ γεγονὼς ἀληθείας ἀγωνιστὴς τὸν ἅπαντα βίον, οὐ πιθανὸς ἦν οὐδ' ἐυφυὴς ψευδῶν δημιουργός. τὸς δὲ Αἰσώπου τοῖς ἔπεσι μύθους εἰσήμοιζεν, ὡς ποίησιν οὐκ οὖσαν ἢ ψεύδος μὴ πρόσοιζι (23). That is, "Socrates being prompted to write Poeſy by "ſome dreams, he who had all his life time been a zealous contender for truth, was not at all formed to give "a probability to fiction. So he took the Fables of "Æſop for his ſubject: not eſteeming that as Poe"try, which was not fiction." Mr. de la Fontaine, the happieſt man in France at giving a turn to a ſtory, did not think himſelf obliged to follow Plato's narration ſervilely. It may be judged by the following remarks, whether the turn he has given to this be ſo happy as one might expect from ſuch a pen.

(f) De ſera Numinis Vindicta, p. 556, 557.

(23) Plutarchus, de Audiendis Poëtis, p. 16. C.

1. The beginning and ending of Mr. de la Fontaine's narration do not ſeem to be made one for the other (24). The Fables aſcribed to Æſop had hardly been publiſhed when Socrates thought fit to cloath them in the livery of the Muſes. This is his beginning; but ſee how he concludes: he employed his laſt moments, in turning them into verſe. The beginning prepares us for ſeeing ſome great impatience in Socrates; and the concluſion informs us that he waited till the hour of his death: and as he lived ſeventy years, it is eaſy to find that he was in no great hurry; for it cannot be ſaid that the Fables of Æſop did not appear till towards the latter part of the life of Socrates: they appeared during the life of the author, and there were about a hundred years between the death of Æſop and the birth of Socrates. Judge now whether it can be ſaid, that theſe Fables had hardly been publiſh'd, when Socrates thought fit to turn them into verſe. II. Mr. de la Fontaine has carried on the thread of his narration in ſuch a manner, that one cannot tell by it whether Socrates tranſlated Æſop's Fables on the very day of his death, or ſome days before, and that it ſeems to make the former moſt probable of the two; and yet the former is falſe. III. The author advances that the dream return'd after the condemnation of Socrates; and yet Socrates does not ſay this to Cebes. IV. The author ſuppoſes that Socrates was admoniſhed by a dream to apply himſelf to Muſic, and that he was uneaſy about the ſenſe of ſuch a dream, on account of the inutility of Muſic with regard to morality. But it is plain from Plato's account, that Socrates never imagined that the God of Dreams required him to ſing and play upon inſtruments. This Philoſopher always ſuppoſed that even in the literal ſenſe his dreams exhorted him to Poeſy.

(24) La Fontaine, Preface des Fables choiſies.

[E] Thoſe of Delphi having put Æſop to death.] His ſtory is in Plutarch (25). He relates that Æſop came to Delphi, with a great quantity of gold and ſilver, being ordered by Crœſus to offer a great ſacrifice to Apollo, and to give a conſiderable ſum to each inhabitant. The quarrel which aroſe between the Delphians and him, was the occaſion (after his ſending away the ſacrifice) of his ſending back the money to Crœſus; for he thought that thoſe for whom this Prince deſigned it, had rendred themſelves unworthy of it. The inhabitants of Delphi contrived an accuſation of ſacrilege againſt him, and pretending they had convicted him, caſt him down from the top of a rock. God being incenſed at this action, chaſtiſed them with plague and famine: inſomuch that to gain a ceſſation of theſe ſcourges, they ſignified in all the aſſemblies of Greece, that if any one ſhould come for the honour of Æſop, to demand that his death ſhould be avenged, they would give him ſatisfaction. In the third generation there preſented himſelf a native of Samos (26), who was no otherwiſe related to Æſop, than as he was deſcended from perſons who had bought that Fabuliſt at Samos. The Delphians gave this man ſatisfaction, and thereby delivered themſelves from the diſeaſes and famine that tormented them (27).

(25) Plut. de Sera Numinis Vindicta, pag. 556, 557.

(26) His name was Idmon according to Plutarch, and Iadmon, according to Herodotus, book II. chap. cxxxiv. who ſays, he was grandſon to that Iadmon, to whom Æſop was a ſlave at the ſame time with Rhodope the Courteſan.

(27) Καὶ τότε τινὰς δίκας δοῦναι τοὺς ὁσίους Δελφοὺς τῶν κακῶν ἀπαλλάγησαν. Plut. de Sera Numinis Vindicta, p. 557. A. i. e. "The "Delphians "having expiated this crime "were deliver'd "from their afflictions.

[F] If Æſop ſpake as a Courtier, Solon ſpake like a true Philoſopher.] Solon abated nothing of his rigid maxims before Crœſus: he ſpake to him of the vanity of human grandeur in the ſame tone of voice, as if he had been to comfort a poor ſick man; and ſhewed no manner of complaiſance to the prejudices of that Monarch, who was infatuated with the thought that riches are the ſource of happineſs. This behaviour gave ſuch offence to Crœſus, that he ſent Solon back without any mark of eſteem. Æſop, who had been ſent for by this Prince, found himſelf much honoured at his Court: he was grieved at Solon's diſgrace, and ſpeaking to him as a friend, You ſee, Solon, ſays he, we muſt either not come near Kings, or elſe we muſt entertain them with things that are very agreeable to them. That is not the caſe, anſwered Solon, we muſt either ſay nothing at all to them, or ſay only what is good (28). It cannot be denied but this admonition of Æſop ſhews him to have been acquainted with a court, and with great men: but Solon's anſwer is the true teſt of thoſe Divines that direct the conſcience of Princes.

(28) Ὁ δὲ λεγόμενος Αἴσωπος ἐντύχαι γάρ φησι Σάρδεσι γηγονὼς μετέπεμπτος ὑπὸ κρύσου, καὶ τιμαόμενος) ἠξίου Σόλωνα, μυθήμασί τυχόντι φιλανθρωπίας, καὶ προτρέπων αὐτὸν Ὦ Σόλων (ἔφη) τοῖς βασιλεῦσι δεῖ ὡς ἥδιστα ὁμιλεῖν καὶ ὁ Σόλων Μὰ Δί' (ἔφην) ἀλλ' ὡς ἥκιστα ἤ ὡς ἄριστα. Plut. in Solone, p. 94. That is, "But Æſop, "he that writ "the Fables "(being then at "Sardis, upon "Crœſus's invitation and "very much eſteemed) was "concerned that "Solon was ſo "meanly treated, and gave "him this advice: Solon, "let your viſits "to Kings be as "ſeldom, or as "pleaſant as "you can: and "Solon replied, "No in truth, "but rather let "them be as "ſeldom, or as "profitable as "you can.

[G] Æſop's lectures againſt the faults of men were the fulleſt of good ſenſe and wit that can be imagined.] Can any inventions be more happy, than the images which Æſop made uſe of, to inſtruct mankind? they are exceedingly fit for children, and no leſs proper for grown perſons: They have all that is neceſſary to perfect a precept, I mean the mixture of the uſeful with the agreeable (29). Aulus Gellius expreſſes this very well in the 29 Chapter of the 2d Book of his Noctes Atticæ. Æſopus ille è Phrygia fabulator haud immeritò ſapiens exiſtimatus eſt; quum quæ utilia monitu ſuaſuque erant, non ſeverè, non imperiosè præcepit & cenſuit, ut philoſophis mos eſt, ſed feſtivos delectabileſque apologos commentus, res ſalubriter ac proſpicienter animadverſas, in mentes animoſque hominum cùm audiendi quadam illecebra induit. That is, "Æſop the Phrygian fabuliſt "was not without reaſon eſteemed to be wiſe, ſince "he did not, after the manner of the Philoſophers, "ſeverely and imperiouſly command ſuch things as "were fit to be adviſed and perſuaded, but feigning "diverting and entertaining Apologues, he inſinuates "good and wholſome advice into the minds of "men, with a kind of willing attention." At all times theſe have been made to ſucceed the home-ſpun ſtories of nurſes. Æſopi fabellas quæ fabulis nutricularum proximè ſuccedunt narrare ſermone puro, & nihil ſe ſupra modum extollente, deinde eamdem gracilitatem ſtylo exigere condiſcant (30). That is, "Let them learn to tell the Fables of Æſop "which ſucceed the ſtories of the nurſery, in a "pure and eaſy ſtyle, and afterwards endeavour to "write in the ſame familiar manner." They have never fallen into contempt. Our age, notwithſtanding its pride and delicacy, eſteems and admires them, and ſhews them in a hundred different ſhapes. The inimitable la Fontaine has procured them in our time a great deal of honour and glory; and great commendations are given to the reflexions of an Engliſh Wit, Sir Roger L'Eſtrange, on theſe very Fables. See what Mr. de Beauval ſays of him in his Journal for the month of December 1692.

(29) Omne tulit punctum qui miſcuit utile dulci, Lectorem delectando pariterque monendo. Horat. de Art. Poët. ver. 343. "But he that "joins inſtructions with delight; "Profit with "pleaſure, carries all the "votes.

(30) Quintil. Inſtit. lib. i. cap. 9.

of Antiquity [H], knew how to form a good judgment of things. His anſwer to Chilo is wonderful [I]. It is not probable that the Fables which bear his name at preſent are the ſame that he wrote; the ſubject and the thought are his for the moſt part, but the words are another's [K]. If all the Fables of the Poets had been like theſe, there would [H] His Apologues are the moſt uſeful of all the Fables of Antiquity.] Plato has made this judgment of them; for having baniſhed Homer from his Commonwealth, he has given Æſop a very honourable place in it. He wiſhes that children were to ſuck theſe Fables with their milk; he recommends them to nurſes to teach them, for one cannot accuſtom them too ſoon to wiſdom and virtue. I borrow theſe words from Mr. de la Fontaine's Preface. He has reaſon to ſpeak as he does; for tho' Plato did not name any Fabuliſt, whoſe inventions he would have children taught, it is enough that he ſays there are ſome Fables to be rejected, and others to be retained, and that he reckons among thoſe to be rejected ſuch as repreſent the Gods as Authors of many culpable actions. Of this kind, continues he, are the Fables of Homer and Heſiod: We may infer from thence that he has reckoned the Fables of Æſop among thoſe which are to be retained: but ſee in what manner he recommends thoſe of this claſs (31): τοὺς ϗ ἐγκριθέντας (μύθους) πείσομεν τὰς τροφούς τε καὶ μητέρας λέγειν τοῖς παισὶ καὶ πλάττειν τὰς ψυχὰς αὐτῶν τοῖς μύθοις πολὺ μᾶλλον ἢ τὰ σώματα ταῖς χερσίν. " As for thoſe Fables of which we have ap- " proved, we ſhall take care to have them told " children by their nurſes and mothers, that their " minds may be better formed by Fables, than their " bodies are by their hands." Apollonius of Tyana is more explicit than Plato on the preference of the Fables of Æſop. They are more proper, ſays he, (32) than all other Fables to inſpire us with wiſdom; for thoſe of the Poets do but corrupt the ears of the hearers: they repreſent the infamous amours of the Gods, their inceſts, their quarrels and a hundred other crimes; and ſhew us parents eating up their children. Thoſe who find ſuch things related by the Poets as real facts, learn to love women, riches and power; to believe they do not ſin in ſatisfying the moſt irregular appetites, ſeeing they do but imitate the Gods. Æſop, not content with rejecting Fables of this nature, in favour of wiſdom, has invented a new method. Apollonius, continuing his parellel, ſhews by ſeveral other reaſons how much the Fables of Æſop ſurpaſs thoſe of the Poets; after which he tells a ſtory that he had learnt of his mother in his infancy. Æſop, it ſeems, being a Shepherd and feeding his flock near a temple of Mercury, often beſought this God with ardent vows, to grant him the poſſeſſion of wiſdom. He had a great number of competitors. But what was the event? They all entered the Temple of Mercury, with their hands full of rich offerings. Æſop being poor was the only one that made no precious offering; he preſented only a little milk and honey, and a few flowers that were not ſo much as tied up together (33). When Mercury came to make a diſtribution of wiſdom, he had regard to the price of the offerings: he gave, according to this proportion, Philoſophy to one, Rhetorick to another, Aſtronomy to a third, and Poetry to a fourth. He did not remember Æſop till after he had finiſhed his diſtribution; and at the ſame time recollecting a Fable which the Hours had told him when he was at nurſe, he beſtowed on Æſop the gift of inventing Apologues, which was the only one remaining in wiſdom's apartment. A Hypercritic now might build upon this ſtory of Philoſtratus and fall upon Mr. de la Fontaine on account of the following paſſage. I do not know how it comes to paſs that the Ancients have not made theſe very Fables deſcend from heaven, and that they have not aſſigned them a God to have the direction of them, as well as Poeſy and Eloquence (34). One might have remembred this paſſage of Philoſtratus, and yet have ſpoken in the ſame manner with Mr. de la Fontaine; for there never was a well eſtabliſhed tradition in true Antiquity concerning the celeſtial origin of the Apologue. I ſhall avoid quoting Strabo; for tho' his Apology for Fables comprehends the Fictions of Æſop, it is certainly deſigned principally to juſtify thoſe of Homer. It is a ſtrange ſort of Apology, ſeeing Strabo ingenuouſly owns that it was neceſſary for Legiſlators and Republicks to adopt the Fables of the Poets, in order to imprint the ſentiments of Religion in the minds of the people: for do not imagine, ſays he, that women, and the lower rank of people, can be led to faith, and piety by philoſophical diſcourſes; there is need of ſuperſtition for that, and ſuperſtition cannot be formed without Fables. It was neceſſary therefore to invent Fables, to be made uſe of as ſpectres and phantoms to frighten the ignorant. Philoſophy is but for few people: Fables are a general good, and fill the theatres. Οὐ γὰρ ὄχλον τε γυναικῶν, ϗ παντὸς χυδαίου πλήθους ἐπαγαγεῖν λόγῳ δυνατὸν φιλοσόφῳ, ϗ προκαλίσασθαι πρὸς ἐυσέβειαν, ϗ ὁσιότητα ϗ πίστιν, ἀλλὰ δεῖ ϗ διὰ δεισιδαιμονιάς· τοῦτο δ' οὐκ ἄνευ μυθοποιΐας, ϗ τερατείας. Κεραυνὸς γὰρ, καὶ ἀιγὶς ϗ τρίαινα, ϗ λαμπάδες, ϗ ὀφάκοῦλες, ϗ θυρσύλογκα τῶν Θεῶν ὅπλα μύθοι, ϗ πᾶσα θεολογία ἀρχαϊκὴ. Ταῦτα δ' ἀπεδέξαντο οἱ τὰς πολιτείας κατασκευάσαντες μορμολύκεια τινὰς πρὸς τοὺς ληπτοφρενας . . . Αὕτη μὲν οὖν πρὸς ὀλίγους, ἡ ϑ ποιητικὴ δημωφελεστέρα, ϗ θέατρα πληροῦν δυναμένη (35).

(31) Plato de Republica, lib. 2. p. m. 604. B.

(32) See Philoſtratus in the Life of Apollonius, book 5. chap. 5.

Whether the ancients have aſcribed a celeſtial origin to the Apologue.

(33) He had not been at the pains to make them up into a noſegay: Would it be right, ſaid he to Mercury, for me to neglect my flock, whilſt I ſpend my time in making noſegays? Philoſtratus, Life of Apollo, book 5. chap. 5.

(34) La Fontaine, Preface des Fables choiſies.

(35) Strabo, l. 1. pag. 13.

[I] His anſwer to Chilo is wonderful.] Chilo one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece was an old man in the 52 Olympiad (36), when Æſop was in the flower of his age. It is not well known when and where Chilo, having asked Æſop what was Jupiter's employment, received this anſwer, He abaſes the high, and exalts the low (37). This anſwer without doubt is an epitome of human life. Take the Hiſtory by which end you pleaſe, and follow the progreſs of it from the beginning to the end, you will ſee examples every where of the alternative that Æſop intended to ſignify. The world is a true game at See-ſaw; one goes up and another goes down in it. In this game we may admire the depths of a wiſe Providence, and the activity of our paſſions. A man becomes rich, his children being exalted with wealth grow full of vanity, are prodigal and ruin themſelves. Their children having nothing to depend on but their own induſtry, labour night and day to grow rich, and ſo raiſe themſelves. A Kingdom acquires a very great power, it grows full of pride, and treats its neighbours with contempt: every one is afraid of being conquered; and to eſcape the danger, they enter into ſuch formidable leagues, that they pull down the Prince who before was ſo much exalted. This rule has its exceptions, for there are families and ſtates which preſerve their elevation a long time. The Roman Commonwealth, that extirpated ſo many Sovereignties, augmented it ſelf by little and little for ſome centuries. The Pagans were ſo fully perſuaded that heaven made it its buſineſs to pull down the lofty, that they imagined there were Gods in whom the proſperity of men cauſed a violent jealouſy. The very Philoſophers who denied Providence acknowledged there is ſome hidden thing that affects to overturn grandeur (38). If man was not an indocible animal, would not his pride have been corrected, after ſo many proofs of Æſop's maxim repeated in each country and age? Two thouſand years hence, if the world continues ſo long, theſe continual repetitions of up and down will have gained nothing upon the heart of man. To what purpoſe then is it repeated ſo often and ſo inceſſantly? We muſt lay our finger on our mouth and humbly adore the wiſdom of the Conductor of this univerſe, and at the ſame time acknowledge the infinite corruption of our nature, and its ſervitude under the yoke of mechanical impreſſions, an inveterate diſeaſe that yields only to the miraculous operations of Grace. If one knew the whole extent of this ſervitude, and the particular laws of the union of the ſoul and body, one might make a whole book on the cauſes of the reciprocation contained in Æſop's anſwer; a book, I ſay, that might be intitled, De centro oſcillationis moralis, wherein one might reaſon upon principles almoſt as neceſſary as thoſe of Mr. Huygens, and other Philoſophers, who have treated De centro oſcillationis, or of the vibrations of Pendulums.

(36) Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 72. in Chilone.

(37) Φασὶ δ' αὐτὸν καὶ Αἰσώπῳ πυθέσθαι, ὁ Ζεὺς τί ἴση ποιῶν, τὸν δὲ φάναι, τὰ μὲν ὑψηλὰ ταπεινῶν, τὰ δὲ ταπεινὰ ὑψῶν. Idem, ibid. num. 69. See Mr. Drelincourt's Index Achilleus, num. 377.

THE WORLD is a game at See-ſaw.

(38) Uſque adeo res humanas vis abdita quædam Obterit, & pulcros faſces, ſævaſque ſecures Proculcare ac ludibrio ſibi habere videtur. Lucretius, lib. 5. ver. 1223.

" And hence we
" fancy unſeen
" pow'rs in
" things,
" Whoſe force
" and will ſuch
" ſtrange confuſion brings,
" And ſpurns
" and overthrows
" our greateſt
" Kings.
Creech.

[K] The ſubject and the thought of theſe Fables are his for the moſt part, but the words are another's.] would have been no neceſſity for Strabo to have undertaken their apology [L]. It is difficult to comprehend why Seneca lays it down for certain, that the Romans had not in his time attempted that ſort of compoſition [M]. The Athenians erected a ſtatue to Æſop (g). Some are of opinion that it is he who became ſo famous among the Oriental ther's.] I mean Planudes's. This is the opinion of a very good critic. Veriſimile ac prope certum videtur, ſays he (39), Planudem partim auribus accepiſſe à majoribus natu commenta Æſopica, partim legendo diverſis ex auctoribus mutuatum: quædam etiam inveniſſe per ſe & concinnaſſe ad arbitrium ſuum: etiam ἐπιμύθιον & appendiculam illam explicatricem fabulæ ſubjeciſſe plerumque ex ſuo ſenſu: omnia porro verbis complexum fuiſſe propriis & ſuis. That is, "It is "probable and almoſt certain, that Planudes partly "received the Fables of Æſop by oral tradition, "and partly borrowed them from the reading of "various authors: and that he alſo invented ſome "of them himſelf, and turned them according to "his own mind: that he alſo added the ἐπιμύθιον "that little explicatory appendix chiefly accord-"ing to his own ſenſe: in fine, that he delivered "the whole in his own words and expreſſions." He confirms his conjecture by the conformity of the ſtyle that is obſerved between the Life of Æſop and the Fables. Now no body is ignorant that Planudes is the author of this Life. It is obſervable, that Henry Stephens, in his Theſaurus Linguæ Græcæ, has never quoted Æſop's Fables (40); which ſhews that he took them for the work of a modern Greek. It will not perhaps be amiſs to bring in this place ſome other proofs of Francis Vavaſſeur's opinion. This learned Jeſuit obſerves (41), that there is mention made in one of Æſop's Fables, of the Piræus, which was not built till the 76th Olympiad; for till then Phaleron was the Athenian port: the Phaleron therefore and not the Piræus ſhould have been mentioned by Æſop, who died (42) long before Themiſtocles, cauſed the Piræus to be made. In the explication of one of Æſop's Fables are theſe words of St. James (43), God reſiſteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble. Ὁ μῦθος δηλοῖ, ὅτι Κύριος ὑπερηφάνοις ἀντιτάσσεται, ταπεινοῖς δὲ δίδωσι χάριν. That is, "The Fable declares that the Lord reſiſts the proud, "but gives grace to the humble." We may conclude from thence that it was Planudes that compoſed this Fable, or at leaſt added this explication to it. If it was not Planudes, it was ſome other Chriſtian, or at leaſt a Jew (44). It is to no purpoſe to ſay that there are certain common notions that may as well come from the pen of a Phrygian, as from that of Solomon or Planudes; for beſides its being very ſeldom that chance furniſhes exactly the ſame words, and the ſame order of letters to two different perſons to expreſs the ſame thought, it is certain that Æſop would never have put the word Κύριος (the Lord) in his maxim. This word is never uſed by way of excellence for God, except in the Septuagint verſion, and in authors that imitate them (45).

(g) Phædrus, Fable x. lib. 2.

(39) Franciſcus Vavaſſor, de Ludicra Dictione, p. 21.

(40) Father Vavaſſeur, de Ludicra Dictione, makes this remark.

(41) Ibidem, pag. 19.

(42) In the 54th Olympiad, according to F. Vavaſſeur, ibid. See above, the Note [C].

(43) Epiſt. cap. 4. verſ. 6.

(44) The ſame ſentence is in the 3d chap. of the Proverbs of Solomon.

(45) See Father Vavaſſeur, p. 19, 20. and the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Dec. 1684. Art. I. towards the end.

F. Vavaſſeur is not the firſt that took Planudes for the author of the Fables of Æſop, as we have them at preſent. Nevelet, who publiſhed in 1610 a Collection of the Fabuliſts, declared himſelf of this opinion. Ex manuſcriptis illis quos habui ne unicus quidem vulgatas jam habuit Æſopi fabulas quas à Planude, ut Æſopi vita eſt, ſcriptas exiſtimo (46). That is, "Of thoſe manuſcripts which I had, not "ſo much as one had the common Fables of Æſop, "which I take to be written by Planudes, as the Life of Æſop is." The manuſcripts he ſpeaks of were in the Library of Heidelberg, and had furniſhed him with about an hundred and thirty ſix Fables, which he added to thoſe of Æſop that had been printed before. If he added theſe hundred and thirty ſix Fables to thoſe of Æſop, it was not that he thought him the author of them; for he acknowledges that he does not know to whom to aſcribe them, and that they ſeem to belong to ſeveral authors. He aſcribes to ſome Monks thoſe wherein the monaſtic life is ſpoken of with commendation (47). Father Vavaſſeur (48) obſerves, that there are an hundred and fifty Fables in the Compilation of Æſop by Planudes, and that there are wanting three (49) which antiquity aſcribed to Æſop. Nevelet's Compilation contains two hundred ninety ſix Fables of Æſop.

(46) Iſaacus Nicolaus Neveletus in Præfatione.

(47) Idem, ibid.

(48) De Ludicra Dictione, p. 16.

(49) Lucian, in Philotimo, ſpeaks of one. Aulus Gellius, lib. 2. cap. 29. ſpeaks of another. Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 10. cap. 5. ſpeaks of another. But this laſt does not ſeem to have been an Apologue.

Note that the obſervations concerning Κύριος has need of correction. Father Vavaſſeur pretends that it is peculiar to the Septuagint to uſe this word to expreſs God, and therefore that Æſop would not have uſed it in that ſenſe. Adde quod horum Interpretum proprium fuit pro יהוה Κύριον hic, ut ubique vertunt, uſurpare: quod Æſopum facere non convenit, ſed τὸν Θεὸν appellare, ſeu τὸ Θεῖον (50); I believe he is in the right with regard to Æſop, but I give up my opinion in the firſt edition of this work. I know now that a Heathen writer, who lived after the Apoſtles, has given the name Κύριος to God, and has even joined it with ἐλέησον, as it is done in the Liturgies of the Church. Arrian is the author I mean, and theſe are his words: Νῦν ὄρνιθάριον τρέμοντες τὸ ὀρνιθάριον κρατοῦμεν καὶ τὸν Θεὸν ἐπικαλούμενοι δεόμεθα αὐτοῦ, Κύριε ἐλέησον ἐπίτρεψόν μοι ἐξελθεῖν (51). i. e. "But now trembling we hold the little "bird, and calling upon God we beſeech him ſay-"ing, have mercy on me, O Lord, and grant that "I may eſcape." We muſt not forget that in the ſame chapter he obſerves that thoſe who went to conſult a ſoothſayer, gave him the name of Κύριος; let us quote the paſſage: Διὰ τοῦτο κολακεύομεν τοὺς Μάντεις· κληρονομήσω Κύριε τὸν πατέρα; ἴδωμεν, ἐπικυσώμεθα. καὶ Κύριε, ὡς ἡ τύχη θέλει; ἐὰν εἴπῃ κληρονομήσεις. ὡς παρ' αὐτῆς τὴν κληρονομίαν εἰληφότες, εὐχαριστοῦμεν αὐτῷ. That is, "For this reaſon we flatter the ſooth-"ſayers: O Lord, ſhall I inherit after my father? let "us ſee, let us conſult the victims. Yes Lord; "what is the will of fortune? and when he has "ſaid you ſhall inherit, we thank him, as if we "had received the inheritance from him." Arrian very juſtly laughs at this practice.

(50) Vavaſſor, de Ludicra Dictione, p. 20.

(51) Arrianus in Epicteto, lib. 2. cap. 7. p. m. 85. Mr. du Rondel pointed out this paſſage to me.

[L] If all the Fables of the Poets had been like his, there would have been no neceſſity for Strabo to have undertaken their Apology.] We have ſeen above (52) what this Apology is. The author of it forgot the principal point. It is that which Plato and Apollonius Tyaneus touched upon, when they ſaid that thoſe, who ſee the Gods commit all ſorts of crimes, are induced to believe that there is no harm in doing as much (53). What could Strabo anſwer to ſuch an objection? The skill of Rhetoric might perhaps carry him ſo far as to pretend not to know that there was ſuch an objection againſt the Fables of the Poets.

(52) In the Note [H].

(53) See the note [H] quotation (32), and the Penſées ſur les Cometes, p. 559.

[M] Seneca lays it down for certain, that the Romans had not in his time attempted that ſort of compoſition.] Theſe are Seneca's words: Non audeo te uſque eo producere, ut fabellas quoque & Æſopeos logos, intentatum Romanis ingeniis opus, ſolita tibi venuſtate connectas (54). That is, "I dare not go ſo "far, as to perſuade you to read the Fables of Æſop, "a kind of work unattempted by the Roman Wits." When Seneca ſaid thus, were not the Fables of Phædrus, an incomparable work, ſeen at Rome? Lipſius anſwers to this queſtion, that Phædrus was not a Roman, and that Seneca ſpake only of the Romans, Romanis ingeniis. I can hardly believe that ſo able a man as Lipſius could ſatisfy himſelf with ſuch a weak reaſon. Did not the Comedies of Terence, who was born in Africa, paſs for the production of a Roman author? Why ſhould not the Fables of Phædrus, who was born in Thrace, and enfranchiſed by an Emperor, have the ſame fortune? It is certain that Seneca oppoſes the Latin tongue to the Greek; and means that there were at that time none but Greek Books on the ſubject of the Apologues. Shall we ſay that Phædrus did not publiſh his Fables himſelf, and that therefore they might be only a private manuſcript in the time of Seneca? This is neither probable nor compatible with all the preambles of that author. It muſt be ſaid then that Seneca had forgotten that there was ſuch a book in the world as the Fables of Phædrus. As able men as Seneca have been ſubject to like miſtakes in theſe latter ages.

(54) Seneca, de Conſol. ad Polybium, cap. 27.

Oriental nations under the name of Locman. He is reckoned in the number of those who have been restored to life [N].

Since the first edition of this work, I have read the Life of Æsop composed by Meziriac. I shall give some extracts of it [O].

[N] He is reckoned in the number of those who have been restored to life.] Ptolemy the son of Hephæstion spake perhaps more largely of it; but at present we know no more than these two lines: Ὡς Αἴσωπος ἀναιρεθεὶς ὑπὸ Δελφῶν ἀνεβίωσε· καὶ στρατεύσας τοῖς Ἕλλησι περὶ Θερμοπύλας (55). That is, "How Æsop who had been killed by the Delphi- "ans, came to life again, and fought with the Greeks "at Thermophylæ." If I am not mistaken, it was the title of a chapter of which Photius has preserved some extracts, and it is not unlike a chapter of the Chronicle of the ancient Worthies. Scaliger (56), having quoted the Greek words just now recited, cries out very justly, Nugæ Græculorum, i. e. "The "idle tales of the Greeks;" but I do not understand what he said before he quoted them, Nugatur Græculus Alexander apud Photium 252. i. e. "Alexander the Greek trifles in Photius." He seems to mean some Alexander that had made a collection of extraordinary things (57). But besides, that Photius places him numero 189, he does not tell us that this author spake of Æsop. If we may believe an author of the sixteenth Century, Plato the Comic Poet had spoken of this resurrection (58). Or rather, if we may believe Suidas (59).

(55) Photius, in Biblioth. num. 190. p. 489.

(56) Scalig. animadv. in Eusebium, num. 1453 pag. 93.

(57) Θαυμασίων συναγωγή. Photius, num. 189. p. 468. A collection of wonders.

(58) Porro ex Græcis sunt qui Æsopum hunc revixisse fabulentur, quod Comicus, item Plato significavit. Cæl. Rhodiginus, lib. 15. cap. 26. p. m. 824. That is, "Amongst the "Greeks there "are some that "tell a tale of "his rising again, "which Plato "the Comic Po- "et has signi- "fied."

(59) In Ἀναβιῶναι, see a Note thereupon by Francis Portus, which contains a passage of the Scholiast of Aristophanes.

[O] The Life of Æsop composed by Meziriac. I shall give some extracts of it.] It is a little Book printed at Bourg-en-Bresse, in 1632. It contains only forty pages in 16. It is become exceeding scarce. Mr. Simon de Valhebert (60), Librarian to the Abbé Bignon was so kind as to send me a copy of it. This is what I extract from it. It is more probable that Æsop was born at Cotiæum a town of Phrygia, than that he was born at Sardis, or in the Island of Samos, or at Mesembria in Thrace. The first master that he served was one Zemarchus, or Demarchus surnamed Carasius, a native and inhabitant of Athens (61). Thus it is probable that it was there he learned the purity of the Greek tongue, as in its spring, and acquired the knowledge of moral Philosophy which was then in esteem ... in process of time he was sold to Xanthus a native of the Isle of Samos, and afterwards to Idmon or Iadmon the Philosopher, who was a Samian also, and who enfranchised him (62). After he had recovered his liberty, he soon acquired a great reputation amongst the Greeks; so that the report of his singular wisdom having reached the ears of Crœsus, he sent to enquire after him, and having conceived an affection for him, he obliged him by his favours to engage himself in his service to the end of his life. He travelled through Greece, whether for his own pleasure, or for the private affairs of Crœsus, is uncertain, and passing by Athens (63), soon after Pisistratus had usurped the sovereign power there, and had abolished the popular state; and seeing that the Athenians bore the yoke very impatiently, he told them the Fable of the Frogs that asked a King of Jupiter. Afterwards he met the seven Wise Men (64) in the city of Corinth at the Tyrant Periander's (65). Some (66) relate that, in order to shew that the life of man is full of miseries, and that one pleasure is attended with a thousand pains, Æsop used to say that when Prometheus took the clay to form man, he did not temper it with water, but with tears. This is an Authority that confirms the opinion of Xenophanes, that evil surpasses good.

(60) See Mr. Menage's Epistle Dedicatory to his Origines de la Langue Françoise, edit. in fol. 1694.

(61) Meziriac, ex Aphthonio.

(62) Idem, ex Schol. Aristoph. in Aves, Herodoto, & Plutarcho.

(63) Idem, ex Phædro.

(64) Meziriac had said before that Æsop met with them at the court of Crœsus.

(65) Idem, ex Plutarcho.

(66) Idem, ex Themistio.

I pass over some other particulars collected by Meziriac, they may be found in the notes on this Article. He concludes his little book with these words, "If it be granted that this (67) is a genuine "work of Æsop, it must be confessed that we have "no writing so ancient as this except the books of "Moses, and some others of the old Testament." With due respect to the memory of this learned man, I shall say he has concluded with a horrid blunder, for who does not know that the Poems of Homer and those of Hesiod preceded all that Æsop could produce? Does he not confess himself (68) that the honour of the invention of Fables is due to the Poet Hesiod? whence then comes it that a few pages afterwards he makes Æsop prior to Hesiod? Distractions of the mind.

(67) Namely, the Fables that appear under his name.

(68) Idem, ex Quintiliano.

Note that M. Menage (69) falsly imputes to him the having refuted the chronological blunder of Planudes with regard to the citation of Euripides.

(69) See the Note [B] citation (10).

ÆSOP, the author of an Elogy on Mithridates, was Reader to this Prince. He wrote also a piece upon Helen (a), in which he related a thing that has intirely the air of a fable [A]. Mr. Moreri's article of this Æsop is full of falshood [B].

(a) Suidas, in Αἴσωπος.

[A] He related a thing that had entirely the air of a Fable.] He said there is found, in a fish called Pan, a stone which the rays of the sun will set on fire, and that it is called Asterites; and that good philters are made of it. We learn this from Suidas. Æsop probably spake of this philter, because to excuse Helen, he feigned that Paris did not carry her off till he had made her fall in love with him by extraordinary means.

[B] Mr. Moreri's article is full of blunders.] I. He says in the first place that Æsop a Greek Historian wrote the History of Alexander the Great in Letters. Thus Moreri has translated these Latin words of Vossius, Vitam Alexandri Magni Literis prodidit (1). He imagined no doubt that this Æsop was a follower of Alexander, and that he sent news of the army to his friends, and that the collection of his Letters was afterwards a History of this Conqueror. II. Moreri adds, that he is different (he speaks of the Epistolary Historian) from him, whom Diogenes Laertius mentions in the Life of Chilo. A man that knew that Diogenes Laertius spake of Æsop the Phrygian, would not have spoken as Moreri has done; for besides that, this Æsop was characterised by the wonderful talent he had for the Apologue, it must be known that Moreri had just given a long article concerning Æsop the Phrygian. He believed therefore that the persons named Æsop, of whom he speaks in the following Article, differ from Æsop the Phrygian; it is then incontestable that he was ignorant that the Æsop mention'd in the Life of Chilo is he who acquired so great a name by his Fables. We may reckon this for a second blunder. The IIId consists in his having said that Æsop the author of the Elogy of Mithridates was a friend of Pompey. He quotes Suidas and Vossius; not that he consulted the first of these two authors, for he found the quotation in the latter and that sufficed him. But see whence his mistake arose; he had read the following words in Vossius (2); Pompeii familiari (3) ac Mithridatici belli scriptori subdatur Mithridatis Anagnostes Æsopus, cui Mithridatis encomium nomen peperit. i. e. "To the friend of "Pompey and writer of the Mithridatic War must be "subjoined Æsop, Mithridates's reader, who got a "reputation by his encomium on Mithridates." He thought this meant that Æsop was the friend of Pompey. Such a deal of pains did he take to examine attentively what he copied.

(1) Voss. de Histor. Græc. pag. 316.

(2) Voss. de Hist. Græc. pag. 528, 529.

(3) He means Theophanes the Historian, whom he had just mentioned.

ÆSOP, a Greek writer of a romantic History of Alexander the Great. It is not known in what time he lived: his work has been translated into Latin by one Julius Valerius, who is not much better known than Æsop. The manuscript of this version has been in the hands of Francis Juret (a), and Gaspar Barthius. This last ascribes the

(a) See his Notes upon the 54th Letter of the book de Symmach. edit. 1601.

the whole work to a Monk: I ſhall relate [A] what both Barthius and Freinſhemius have ſaid of him.

[A] I ſhall relate what both Barthius and Freinſhemius have ſaid of him.] Here follows what we find in the liſt that the learned Freinſhemius has given us of all the authors of the Hiſtory of Alexander (1). JULIUS VALERIUS Latinam fecit Hiſtoriam fabuloſam de Alexandro, quæ ab aliis Æſopo, ab aliis Calliſthæni adſcripta fuit. Unde fabulas ſuas certatim hauſerunt Antoninus, Vincentius, Urſpergenſis, alii. Precium videbatur adſcribere hoc loco judicium C. Barthii ex 2, 10. adverſariorum. Talia multa in non inerudito Monacho ſunt, qui vitam Alexandri magni prodigioſis mendaciis farctam edidit ante aliquam multa ſecula: quæ fabula tantum olim fidei habuit, ut à prudentibus etiam ſcriptoribus ſit teſtimonio citata, qualis ſane ante plus quam quatuor ſecula fuit in Anglia Silveſter Giraldus, qui non dubitavit ejus callionis auctoritate uti. An ea egregia hiſtoria edita unquam ſit neſcio, nos in charta ſcriptum habemus, ſed tanti vix æſtimamus, ut in Bibliothecam recipiamus. Eſt idem auctor quem Æſopum vocat, & interpretatum à Julio Valerio Franciſcus Juretus ad Symmachi lib. 1. Epiſt. 54. Editione quidem priore. Ego vero neque de auctore neque de interprete credo Romani Græcive hominis eſſe, maxima enim in eo Græci ſermonis ignorantia, nec ulla Romani notitia eſt. Hactenus Barthius. Typis excuſa eſt Germanice, anno 1486. Argentorati. Citatur & Salmaſio ad Solinum, pag. 1025. vetus ſcriptor qui res Alexandri fabuloſe compoſuit. That is, " JULIUS VALERIUS wrote a fabu- " lous Latin Hiſtory of Alexander, which is aſcribed " by ſome to Æſop, by others to Calliſthenes. " Hence Antoninus, Vincentius, Urſpargenſis and " others, have drawn their Fables. It may not be " amiſs to quote in this place the judgment of Bar- " thius in his Adverſaria. There are many ſuch " things in the learned Monk, who ſome ages ago " put out a Life of Alexander the Great, ſtuffed with " monſtrous lies; which Fable had ſo much credit " formerly, that it is quoted as a teſtimony even by " good writers; as above four Centuries ago was " Silveſter Giraldus in England, who made no dif- " ficulty to uſe the authority of that Recluſe. Whe- " ther that extraordinary Hiſtory was ever publiſhed, " I know not, I have it in manuſcript, but do not " think it worthy of a place in my Library. It is " the ſame author that Franciſcus Juretus mentions " under the name of Æſop, and ſays, that he was " tranſlated by Julius Valerius. For my part, I do " not take either the author or the tranſlator to " have been a Grecian or a Roman, for he ſhews " the greateſt ignorance of Greek, and no know- " ledge at all of Latin. Thus far Barthius. It was " printed in German, in 1486, at Strasburg. He " is quoted alſo by Salmaſius under the name of " the old author who wrote a fabulous Hiſtory of " Alexander." It is very probable that this Romance was formed in the barbarous ages; and as every thing was good to ſuch fine criticks as Vincent de Beauvais, it is no wonder that this wretched book ſhould be in ſuch eſteem.

(1) It is prefixed to his Commentary on Quintus Curtius.

ÆSOP (CLODIUS) a celebrated Comedian, flouriſhed at Rome in the ſeventh Century. He and Roſcius were the beſt actors that ever appeared among the ancient Romans; Æſop in Tragedy and Roſcius in Comedy. Cicero put himſelf under their diſcipline to perfect his action (a). Æſop lived in a very expenſive manner. An entertainment of his is much ſpoken of, wherein he ſerved up an earthen diſh that coſt him above eight hundred pounds [A]. This diſh was filled with birds that had learned either to ſing or ſpeak, and each of which coſt almoſt fifty pounds. Æſop's ſon was no leſs luxurious than his father. He did not content himſelf with entertaining his gueſts with the moſt coſtly ſinging birds, but diſſolved pearls alſo for them to drink. Some

(a) Plutarch in Cicer. Vita, pag. 863.

[A] An entertainment of his is much ſpoken of.] We find this Hiſtory in Pliny: his words according to F. Hardouïn's edition, are as follow: Maxime inſignis eſt in hac memoria Clodii Æſopi tragici hiſtrionis patina Seſtertia centum taxata: in qua poſuit aves cantu aliquo aut humano ſermone vocales Seſtertia ſex ſingulas coëmptas: nulla alia inductus ſuavitate niſi ut in his imitationem hominis manderet, ne quæſtus quidem ſuos re veritus illos opimos & voce meritos (1). That is, " But above all others Æſop the Tragedian's " diſh is moſt famous, which was valued at a hun- " dred Seſtertia *, in which were ſinging and talk- " ing birds, that coſt ſix Seſtertia † each: having no " other inducement to this extravagance, than the " humour of eating the imitators of the human " voice, not conſidering the great gain he had " made himſelf by his voice." Father Hardouïn has corrected this paſſage (2), by putting a hundred thouſand Seſtertii ‡, which according to him are worth ten thouſand livres of French money . So much for the price of the diſh: as for that of the birds, he has put ſix thouſand Seſtertii ††, that is, two hundred French crowns . As for the hundred thouſand Seſtertii, he confirms his correction by a paſſage of Pliny, and another of Tertullian; for Pliny ſpeaks thus in the twelfth Chapter of the thirty fifth Book. Nos cum unam Æſopi tragœdiarum hiſtrionis in natura avium diceremus ſeſtertiis centum ſtetiſſe non dubito indignatos legentes. That is, " As " for one diſh of Æſop the Tragedian, which " coſt a hundred thouſand Seſtertii §, I do not " doubt but that it ſtirred up the indignation " of my readers, where I am ſpeaking of birds." As for Tertullian (3) he ſays Æſop's diſh coſt centum millium. Pliny ſeems to have had too great a mind to be witty, and his thought was falſe. Æſop, ſays he, found no other delight in theſe birds, but the thought that he eat in them a copy of mankind, and at the ſame time paid no reſpect to that immenſe gain which he had made by his voice. Pliny's alluſion is eaſy to comprehend. He propoſes to reproach Æſop for not having regard enough for his own ſimilitude: Æſop in his quality of Actor was but a copyer of a man; his voice was only the imitation of that of other men, and he had acquired immenſe ſums by means of ſuch imitation: he ſhould not therefore have been laviſh in deſtroying thoſe birds which like himſelf copied mankind. It will be granted me that this is refining too much. But when Pliny adds that the extravagancies of the father exceeded thoſe of the ſon, becauſe it is a greater fault to eat the tongues of men, than to eat the moſt excellent productions of nature (4), does he not manifeſtly diſcover the falſeneſs of his thought? Does not he ſhew that he ill explains Æſop's meaning? The great delight that this Actor found in this ſort of birds proceeded from the greatneſs of the expence. He did not make a diſh of them becauſe they could ſpeak (this motive was only by accident) but becauſe they could not be bought but at an extraordinary price. If there had been any birds that could not ſpeak, and yet were more ſcarce and dear than theſe, he would have furniſhed his diſh with them with more pleaſure. Do but read what follows: O miſerabiles quorum palatum niſi ad pretioſos cibos non excitatur. Pretioſos autem non eximiis ſapor aut aliqua faucium dulcedo, ſed vanitas & difficultas parandi facit (5). That is, " Unhappy " thoſe whoſe appetite cannot be raiſed without " the moſt precious meats; which at the ſame time " are not precious on account of the delicacy of " their taſte, but out of vanity and on account of " the difficulty of procuring them." Petronius has finely touched this vanity in his Ales phaſiacis petita Colchis, &c.

(1) Plin. lib. x. cap. 51. pag. m. 443.

[* Or a hundred thouſand Seſtertii.]

[† Or ſix thouſand Seſtertii.]

(2) See the corrections of the xth Book, num. 62, 63.

‡ The common editions have it Sexcentis H. S. ſix hundred Seſtertia.]

[ l. 808. 4. 2. Sterling.]

[†† The common editions have it, numinis ſex, ſix Seſtertii.]

[ l. 48. 8. 9. Sterling.]

[§ Some editions have it ſix hundred thouſand Seſtertii.]

(3) De Pallio, p. m. 32. See Salmaſius's Commentaries thereupon, you will find there the corrections of Father Hardouin.

(4) Non ſit tamen, ut verum fatear, facile inter duos judicium turpitudinis: niſi quod minus eſt ſummas rerum naturæ opes quam hominum linguas cænaſſe, Plin. lib. 10. cap. 51. i. e. " To confeſs the " truth, it is no " eaſy matter to " decide which is " the moſt guilty " of the two: " only it ſeems " ſomething leſs " to ſup upon the " greateſt riches " of nature, than " upon the " tongues of men.

(5) Seneca Conſol. ad Helviam, cap. 9.

Some ſpeak of this, as if he had made a common practice of it [B]; but others hint that he treated with pearls but once [C]. Horace ſpeaks only of one pearl of great value [D], which Æſop's ſon diſſolved in vinegar and drank. Æſop, notwithſtanding his great expences, died worth above a hundred and ſixty thouſand Pounds (b). It is ſaid that he was ſo tranſported on the ſtage, and ſo wonderfully taken with his part, that he was in an extaſy; and that one day he killed a man in theſe tranſports [E]. Moreri

(b) Æſopum ex pari arte ducenties Seſtertium reliquiſſe filio conſtat. Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 10. Ducenties Seſtertium, according to Gaſſendus in Abaco Seſtertiorum, are 1,861,111 livres and ſome ſols. [According to Dr. Arbuthnot's Tables, Ducenties Seſtertium makes l. 161,538. 6. 8 Sterling.]

[B] He diſſolved pearls for his gueſts to drink. Some ſpeak of this, as if he had made a common practice of it.] Valerius Maximus ſpeaks of it in that light. Huic (6) nimirum magis Æſopus tragœdus, ſays he (7), in adoptionem dare filium ſuum, quam bonorum ſuorum hæredem relinquere debuit non ſolum perditæ, ſed etiam furioſæ luxuriæ juvenem: quem conſtat cantu commendabiles aviculas immanibus emptas prætiis in cœna pro ficedulis ponere, acetoque liquatos magnæ ſummæ uniones potionibus aſpergere SOLITUM, ampliſſimum patrimonium tanquam amaram aliquam ſarcinam quam celerrimè abjicere cupientem. That is, "Æſop the Tragedian truly had better "have given him his ſon to be adopted, than "have left his eſtate to a young man of abandoned "and furious luxury, who could buy fine ſinging "birds at an exorbitant price and bring them to table "for Beccaficos, and was accuſtomed to diſſolve "pearls in vinegar and give them to drink, as if he had "a mind to throw off his very great patrimony, "like a heavy burthen." I think I am not miſtaken when I affirm that there are two things confounded in this paſſage, which ought to have been diſtinguiſhed. Æſop's ſon ſhould not be charged with the expence in diſſolved pearls, and that in ſinging birds: the latter ſhould be placed to the father's account, and the former to the ſon's. Pliny and Tertullian ſhall be my authorities: they diſtinguiſh between the luxury of the father and that of the ſon: they accuſe the father of having expended great ſums upon making a diſh, and filling it with ſinging and talking birds; but they ſay nothing of his diſſolving pearls to drink. It is to the ſon they aſcribe this prodigality and not the other. See Pliny in the place that I have quoted (8); you will find that he adds to the words above related, Dignus prorſus filio à quo devoratas diximus margaritas. That is, "Altogether worthy of ſuch a ſon, "by whom we have ſaid that pearls were ſwallow-"ed." We ſhall ſee in the following note the paſſage to which he refers his readers. But this is what Tertullian has ſaid: Qua (gula) Æſopus hiſtrio ex avibus ejuſdem pretioſitatis ut canoris & loquacibus, quibuſque centum millium patinam confiſcavit. Filius ejus poſt tale pulpamentum potuit ſumptuoſius eſurire: margaritas namque vel ipſo nomine pretioſas debauſit, credo, ne mendicius patre cœnaſſet (9). That is, "Æſop the Actor ſpent a hundred thouſand pieces "on a diſh of ſinging and talking birds. But his "ſon was more extravagant in eating than he, for "he drank up pearls of an extravagant price, for "fear, I ſuppoſe, of eating more meanly than his "father."

(6) That is, to Caius Sergius Orata, whoſe extraordinary gluttony he had juſt been repreſenting.

(7) Val. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 1. num. 2.

(8) Lib. 10. cap. 51. pag. 443.

(9) Tertullianus, de Pallio, p. m. 56.

[C] Others ſay that he treated with pearls but once.] Weigh the words well which I ſhall ſubjoin; you will find I am perſuaded, that they prove that Æſop's ſon fell into this exceſs only on a particular day when he was treating his friends. Conſider principally the compariſon that Pliny has made between the ſon of this Player and Cleopatra, and you will find that he did not ſuppoſe this debauch to have been repeated; for if it had, he would have been much to blame not to ſay ſo; the advantage which he would give Æſop over Cleopatra would have been much more obvious. Non ferent tamen hanc palmam (Antonius & Cleopatra) ſpoliabunturque etiam luxuriæ gloria. Prior id fecerat Romæ in unionibus magnæ taxationis Clodius Tragœdi Æſopi filius, relictus ab eo in amplis opibus hæres, ne triumviratu ſuo nimis ſuperbiat Antonius, pene hiſtrioni comparatus, & quidam nulla ſponſione ad hoc producto, quo magis regium fiat: ſed ut experiretur in gloria palati, quid ſaperent margaritæ: atque ut mire placuere, ne ſolus hoc ſciret, ſingulos uniones convivis quoque abſorbendos dedit (10). That is, "And yet they (Anthony and Cleopatra) "ſhall not carry the prize, but ſhall loſe the glory of "being at the head of luxury. For before their time "Clodius the ſon of Æſop the Tragedian being left "heir to his immenſe wealth, did the ſame at "Rome with pearls of great price, ſo that Antho-"ny has no reaſon to be proud of his Triumvirate, "ſeeing a man that was little better than a ſtage-"player could vie with him, who had not laid any "wager, but after a more royal manner did it mere-"ly for the glory of knowing how pearls taſted; "and when he found them to be very delicate, "not being willing to be alone in his pleaſure, "he entertained every one of his gueſts alſo with "a pearl."

(10) Plin. lib. 9. cap. 35.

[D] Horace ſpeaks only of one pearl of great value.] Let us repreſent two men, one of which ſwallows a pearl in the preſence of his gueſts, and the other does not content himſelf with that, but gives every one of them a pearl alſo to ſwallow, we ſhall find a conſiderable difference between theſe two entertainments: the leaſt will appear much more ſumptuous than the firſt, all other things being equal. Wherefore, if Æſop's ſon did what Pliny aſcribes to him, it is certain that his feaſt was a great deal more remarkable, than if he had been the only one that ſwallowed a pearl. I go farther, and ſay that the principal ſingularity of this feaſt, and what ſhould make it moſt memorable, is that every one of the gueſts drank a diſſolved pearl. Whence then comes it that Horace ſays nothing of this remarkable and principal ſingularity? It is certain that if Pliny had forgotten it, he would have ſhewn that of two remarkable things he did not know how to pick out that which was moſt ſo, and that he had neglected his advantages; for, when he was to ſhew that a mere citizen of Rome, ſon of a Comedian had outdone Cleopatra, he had paſſed over in ſilence what principally raiſed the action of the Citizen above that of a great Queen. The ſame objection may be made to Horace; his reaſoning would have been much ſtronger, if he had ſaid of Æſop's ſon all that Pliny has ſaid of him. Why then did he forget it? Of two very remarkable facts why ſhould he make choice of the leaſt? why ſhould he neglect the advantages of his proof and of his morality? It will be anſwered perhaps, that he knew no more of the prodigality of this Comedian's ſon, than what he ſays of it. But this is admitting a great difficulty. How is it poſſible that this man's feaſt ſhould come to Horace's knowledge only by the leaſt remarkable part of it; a very ſingular one, I confeſs, if it be conſidered in it ſelf, but nothing near ſo ſingular, if compared with the other? Let us ſee however the words of this Poet:

Filius Æſopi detractam ex aure Metellæ
(Scilicet ut decies ſolidum exſorberet) aceto
Diluit inſignem baccam: qui ſanior, ac ſi
Illud idem in rapidum flumen jaceretve cloacam (11)?

(11) Horat. Sat. 3. l. 2. ver. 239.

"A coſtly gem from his Metella's ear,
"Æſop's looſe ſon diſſolv'd in vinegar,
"And drank it down, and then profuſely laugh'd,
"To think he drank a Province at a draught.
"Was't not as mad as to have thrown the gem
"Into a common ſhore, or muddy ſtream?
Creech.

An old Scholiaſt on Horace ſays this Metella was Æſop's ſon's wife. Others (12) ſay, that ſhe was not his wife, but that ſhe granted him favours, and made him a preſent of that pearl which was worth twenty five thouſand crowns. They add that ſhe might very well be Q. Cæcilius Metellus's ſiſter, who was married to L. Lucullus. We ſhall examine this in another place (13).

(12) Mr. Dacier on this paſſage of Horace, tom. 7. p. m. 301.

(13) In the Article of METELLA, Note [A.]

[E] One day he killed a man in theſe tranſports.] The thing very well deſerves to be related. Let us ſee what Plutarch ſays of it: Τὸν δ' Αἴσωπον τοῦτον ἱστοροῦσιν ὑποκρινόμενον ἐν θεάτρῳ τὸν περὶ τῆς τιμωρίας τῆ θυίστῃ βουλευόμενον Ἀτρέα, τῶν ὑπηρετῶν τινος ἄφρω παραδραμόντος Moreri has committed here a round number of groſs faults [F].

(14) Plutarch, in Cicer. Vita, p. 863.

(15) Honoris cauſa in ſcenam rediarant ii quos ego honoris cauſâ de ſcena deceſſiſſe arbitrabar deliciæ vero tuæ noſter Æſopus ejuſmodi fuit ut ei deſinere per omnes homines liceret. Is jurare cum cœpiſſet, vox eum defecit in illo loco, ſi ſciens fallo, Cicero Epiſt. 1. lib. 7. ad Famil.

(16) See the foregoing citation.

(17) Idem, Epiſt. 2. lib. 1. ad Quintum fratrem.

(18) Hiſtriones non inter turpes habitos Cicero teſtimonio eſt quem nullus ignorat Roſcio & Æſopo hiſtrionibus tam familiariter uſum ut res rationeſque earum ſua ſollertia tueretur, quod cum aliis multis tum ex epiſtolis quoque ejus declaratur. Macrob. Saturn. lib. 2 cap. 10. i. e. "Cicero is a teſtimony that "Actors were "not reputed in- "famous, whom "every body "knows to have "been ſo inti- "mate with "Roſcius and "Æſop, the ac- "tors, that he "defended their "cauſes with his "utmoſt art, as "appears from "his Epiſtles and "many other "places.

(19) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 10. num. 2.

(20) See the Note [A].

θραμὸ'ντος ἔξω τῶν ἑαυτῷ λογισμῶν διὰ τὸ πάθος ὄντα τῷ σκήπτρῳ παταξαι καὶ ἀπλεῖν (14). That is, "They "report of this Æſop, that whilſt he was repreſenting on the ſtage Atreus deliberating in what manner he ſhould revenge himſelf on Thyeſtes, he "was ſo tranſported beyond himſelf, in the heat of "action, that with his truncheon he ſmote one of "his ſervants haſtily croſſing the ſtage, and laid him "dead upon the place."

[F] Moreri has committed here a round number of groſs faults.] I. It is falſe that Æſop the Comedian was a Tragic Poet. II. He was in a declining age (15) when Pompey's Theatre was dedicated in the year of Rome 698. A good Chronologer therefore would not have placed him about the 700th year of Rome. III. The authors quoted by Mr. Moreri do not ſay that Æſop was Cicero's friend. If this friendſhip is to be ſpoken of, other authors are to be quoted; and for want of quoting them one deſerves in ſome reſpect the character of a liar. Cicero himſelf ſhould be quoted: I have quoted the place already wherein he ſtyles him noſter Æſopus (16), and informs us of a very particular accident; Æſop being quite worn out, and having a mind to appear in the magnificent Plays which Pompey exhibited to the people at the dedication of his Theatre, offended all the ſpectators, and quite loſt his ſpeech when he came to repeat that part of the oath, wherein the penalties were expreſſed that were voluntarily to be undergone if there was any fraud in the oath. In another letter Cicero deſires his brother Quintus to get information concerning a ſlave that had run away from Æſop. Æſopi tragedi noſtri familiaris Lucinius ſervus tibi notus aufugit (17). Macrobius alſo is one that might have been quoted on this occaſion (18). IV. What Moreri ſays, that Æſop often accompanied Cicero when he went to hear the Orations of Hortenſius, as Valerius Maximus obſerves, is a notorious falſhood. It was Charles Stephens that led Moreri out of the way here: he advances the ſame fact, and quotes Valerius Maximus, who ſays only that Roſcius and Æſop went to hear Hortenſius (19). Moreri gives a wrong repreſentation of what Pliny has ſaid of the luxury of Æſop. He did not know that we muſt read centum ſeſtertium inſtead of ſexcentum ſeſtertium (20). Was he not aſtoniſhed at the prodigious ſum to which he made the price of one diſh amount? And if the ten thouſand livres to which that price amounts according to Father Hardouin's calculation, ſuppoſing we are to read centum, is ſomething incredible, how monſtrous will it be if we are to retain the reading ſexcentum, and to ſay that each great ſeſterce was worth twenty five crowns? Muſt not Moreri in conſequence of this inevitably admit that Æſop's earthen diſh coſt forty five thouſand livres? Beſides what he calls the great ſeſterce is the ſame thing with a thouſand ſeſterces. Now I find according to the moſt exact authors that a thouſand ſeſterces are worth a great deal more than twenty five crowns. According to Gaſſendus they are worth ninety three livres, one ſou, one denier &c. According to Father Hardouin, they are worth a hundred livres. Thus Moreri is miſtaken on every ſide. VI. It is not true that Æſop's diſh was filled with birds tongues; for it was filled with the birds themſelves. One might ſay Moreri had a mind to confound this with the luxury of Vitellius (21), and that he took the one for the other. VII. Pliny does not ſay theſe tongues were bought for ſix crowns a piece. He ſays in the good editions that each bird coſt ſix thouſand ſeſterces, that is, ſix hundred livres according to Father Hardouin's calculation; and in the common editions that each bird coſt ſix ſeſterces, nummis ſex. One cannot imagine any thing more comical than the tranſlation which Moreri has given of theſe Latin words. He took the Nummus of Pliny for a French crown, and it was but a Seſtertius, that is about two ſols of our money: whence it appears, that this common reading imputes two abſurdities to Pliny; for thus he would ſay that the beſt ſinging and talking birds coſt but about twelve ſous a piece; and that Æſop in buying this ſort of birds had committed a notorious act of luxury and prodigality. VIII. No body has ſaid, not even Valerius Maximus, that Æſop's ſon put powder of pearl in all his drink. This is mounting a thouſand degrees above honeſt Valerius Maximus, who had been a little too hyperbolical himſelf, when he ſpoke of it as a common practice of this prodigal ſon. IX. It is very ſurpriſing to pretend, as Moreri does, that the pearls that were taken out of the ears of a miſtreſs, ſhould furniſh a ſufficient quantity of powder to be put in all his drink. X. And what is yet more aſtoniſhing, he depends on the teſtimony of Horace, and even quotes the verſes where this Poet ſays expreſly that Æſop's ſon diſſolved a pearl in vinegar and drank it. Therefore it was only a momentary buſineſs which according to Horace was not repeated. XI. Horace did not obſerve that Metella was Æſop's ſon's miſtreſs. XII. To conclude, he ſhould not have quoted the 30th book of Pliny, but the 10th.

(21) In hac (patina) ſcarorum jecinora, phaſianorum & pavonum cerebella LINGUAS phœnicopterum, murænarum, lacteſ à Parthia uſque fretoque Hiſpanico per navarchos ac triremes petitarum, commiſcuit, Sueton. in Vitellio, cap. 13. That is, "In "this diſh he "mixed the li- "vers of Scari, "the brains of "pheaſants and "peacocks, the "TONGUES "of phœnicop- "ters, and lam- "preys bellies "brought as far "as from Par- "thia and the "Streights of "Gibraltar, by "commanders of "gallies.

☞AETIUS was born at Amida [A], a town of Meſopotamia. There is a great diſagreement among the authors, who have written on the Hiſtory of Phyſick, about the time when our Aëtius lived [B]. Caſtellanus (a) is evidently miſtaken, who makes him to have enlarged Paulus Ægineta. Mercklin follows Caſtellanus, and ſays expreſly he was later than Paulus Ægineta (b). This cannot be, for this laſt author mentions Alexander Trallianus, and Alexander mentions Aëtius. He ſtudied at Alexandria, and in ſeveral places of his works agrees with the pharmacy of the Egyptians. His Tetrabiblos, as it is called, is a collection from the writings of thoſe Phyſicians, who went before him, chiefly from Galen; but contains nevertheleſs ſome new things, for which we are intirely indebted to this author. Dr. Freind ſeems to cenſure Mr. Le Clerc unjuſtly, in ſome particulars relating to Aëtius [C].

(a) In hoc (Aëtio) habemus Galenum contractum, Oribaſium explicatum Paulum Æginetam ampliatum, Caſtellan. de Vitis Med. Illuſtr.

(b) Ætate poſterior Paulo Ægin. Merck. Linden. renovat. p. 17.

☞AETIUS

[A] He was born at Amida.] Ptolemy calls this town Ammæa: it was ſeated on the river Tygris. It was beſieged and taken by the Perſians, who ſlew all the Romans they found in it. Conſtantine the Great reſtored it.

[B] There is a great diſagreement among the authors — about the time when our Aëtius lived.] M. le Clerc (1) places him, with Oribaſius, Alexander Trallianus and Paulus Ægineta in the fourth Century. Some place him in the year of Chriſt 350, others in 437, and others in 455, to which laſt opinion Merklin (2) ſeems to ſubſcribe. But Dr. Freind will have him to be much later. He tells us (3) it is plain, even from his own books, that he did not write till the very end of the fifth, or the beginning of the ſixth Century: for he refers not only to St. Cyril, Archbiſhop of Alexandria, who died in 444; but to Petrus Archiater, who was Phyſician to Theodoric, and therefore muſt have lived ſtill later.

(1) Le Clerc, Eſſai d'un Plan pour ſervir à la Continuation de l'Hiſtoire de la Medicina, pag. 766.

(2) Linden. renovat. p. 18.

(3) Freind, Hiſt. of Phyſick, part 1. pag. 4.

[C] Dr. Freind ſeems to cenſure Mr. le Clerc unjuſtly in ſome particulars relating to Aëtius.] I. He tells us (4) that Mr. le Clerc beſtows no more than three pages upon all theſe four authors (5); and thinks this a ſufficient reaſon to give for it, that they were Compilers. I do not find any reaſon aſſigned by Mr. le Clerc, for beſtowing no more than three pages on them: neither does he ſeem to ſlight them on account of their being Compilers. On the contrary he treats them with great reſpect, and acknowledges

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 10.

(5) Namely, Oribaſius, Aëtius, Alexander Trallianus & Paulus Ægineta.

☞AETIUS (FLAVIUS) a famous General was born in Mœsia (a) and lived in the fifth Century: His father's name was Gaudentius, and his mother was of a noble and rich family in Italy. From his childhood he bore arms under his father, who was ſo brave a warrior, that from a private ſoldier he was by degrees advanced to the poſt of General of the horſe (b). Aëtius having firſt ſerved in the Prætorian Guards, was afterwards raiſed to command armies in chief, and by his prudence and wiſe conduct he gained a great reputation (c). About the year 423 he was ſent by the Emperor Honorius at the head of a powerful army againſt the Franks, who had entered the country of the Gauls; Aëtius routed them, and forced them to return into Germany whence they came; but they ſoon invaded Gaul again with ſo numerous an army, that Aëtius being terrified by their number fled into Spain. This exaſperated Honorius againſt him to ſuch a degree, that he deprived him of the Generalſhip and inveſted Caſtinus with it, hoping that this man, who was of a noble and ancient family, would be able to withſtand the enemy. But the Emperor was diſappointed in his expectation; for the very name of the Franks ſtruck this General with ſuch a fright, that he could not maintain his ground againſt them; Honorius took this ſo much to heart, that it is thought it was the occaſion of his death (d). After the death of Honorius John Secretary of the Empire invaded the ſovereign power, and made himſelf maſter of Ravenna, being ſupported by Caſtinus General of the horſe. And Aëtius to maintain John in his uſurpation entered Italy with an army of about ſixty thouſand Huns *, but upon his arrival he found that John had already been vanquiſhed and ſlain [A] by the troops of Valentinian, who ſucceeded Honorius in the Imperial throne. However he engaged in battle againſt Aſpar Valentinian's General, in which a great number fell on both ſides. But

(a) The ancient Mœſia (ſuperior and inferior) upper and lower Mœſia, contained thoſe Provinces, which are now called Servia and Bulgaria.

(b) Ad Magiſterii Equitum culmen evectus eſt. Gregor. Turon. Hiſt. Francor. lib. 2. ap. Du Cheſne, Hiſt. Franc. Scriptor. cœtan. t. 1. p. 277.

(c) Gregor. Turon. ibid.

(d) German. Chron. lib. 4. ap. Piſterium, Rer. German. Scriptor. t. 2. p. 642.

* A. C. 425.

knowledges that we are highly obliged to them. But did they compile ſo, continues the Doctor, as to have nothing at all new, and what we may call their own in theſe very voluminous works? Far otherwiſe. For tho' I muſt confeſs, that there are not a great many things in them, in proportion to the bulk of their books, but ſuch as may be found in Galen and others, and yet ſome there are too, in regard to the real improvement of the art it ſelf; however as to what concerns the hiſtorical part of it, ſurely a great deal of matter may be pick'd out of theſe writers, fit to entertain our curioſity at leaſt, if not to inform our judgment. This is not very different from what Mr. le Clerc himſelf had ſaid. Les quatre auteurs, je veux dire Oribaſſe, Aëtius, Alexander de Tralles, & Paul d'Egine renferment toute l'ancienne Medecine Grecque, & en font, pour ainſi dire, la clôture. On y peut donc chercher, outre la plus grande partie de ce qui eſt déja dans livres des Médecins precedent diverſes choſes qui ne s'y trouvent plus, & que le tems nous a ravies, ſans compter ce que ces derniers auteurs peuvent avoir fourni du leur (6). That is, "Theſe four authors "comprehend the whole ancient Greek Phyſic. "One may find in them, not only the greateſt "part of what was before to be met with in the "books of Phyſicians, but alſo ſeveral things which "are not now to be met with in thoſe ancient "writers, thro' the injury of time, not to mention "what they themſelves may have furniſhed of their "own." II. Dr. Freind obſerves, that Mr. le Clerc ſays, theſe two (7) furniſh us with every thing which is eſſential to Theory or Practice, particularly in Anatomy and Surgery. But I muſt obſerve, ſays he, that Aëtius in his long work entirely omits Anatomy, and the uſe of the parts; and what is purely chirurgical in him, is ſcattered confuſedly here and there, and is imperfect as well as immethodical in compariſon of what we find upon the ſame ſubject in Paulus (8). Oribaſius has ſcarce any thing in all his three different works, which now remain, relating to Surgery, as far as it concerns manual operation (9). Mr. le Clerc never ſaid that each of theſe authors furniſhed us with all that is eſſential in Anatomy and Surgery. He ſaid that both of them together did ſo. And Dr. Freind himſelf allows that Oribaſius has deſcribed all the parts then known of the human body, and aſſigned the proper office to each of them: and that he gives us the firſt deſcription of the ſalivary glands, which is either omitted by Galen, or is loſt together with ſome other of Galen's works (10). He allows alſo that Aëtius was a practitioner in Surgery himſelf, and gives ſome little account of almoſt every operation: and particularly, that he is fuller in caſes of the eyes, than Celſus is (11). And afterwards he tells us, that whoever carefully looks into Ætius and Paulus, will be convinced, that a great many improvements have been made in Surgery, which are not recited in Galen, or any where elſe (12). Thus if Oribaſius excelled in Anatomy, and Aëtius in Surgery, Mr. le Clerc might juſtly ſay that theſe two authors contain every thing that is valuable in thoſe two branches of Phyſic.

(6) Le Clerc, Eſſai d'un Plan. p. 767.

(7) That is, Oribaſius and Aëtius.

(8) Freind, Hiſt. of Phyſick, pag. 11, 12.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 13.

(10) Ibid. p. 12, 13.

(11) Ibid. p. 14.

(12) Ibid. pag. 301.

[A] John had already been vanquiſhed and ſlain.] The overthrow of this uſurper is related with different circumſtances by Socrates (1) and Philoſtorgius (2). According to the former it was not without a miracle that John was defeated. This Tyrant, as he is called, having invaded the Throne, ſent Embaſſadors to the Emperor Theodoſius, being in hopes that he would admit him partner in the Empire. But Theodoſius having treated the Embaſſadors with contempt, ſent them into baniſhment, according to Philoſtorgius, or, according to Socrates, only impriſoned them; he ſent Ardaburius and Aſpar his ſon againſt the Tyrant. Ardaburius firſt went to Salona a city in Dalmatia, thence he went by ſea to Aquileia, where he met with a very unlucky accident, as he then thought, but which by the event proved very happy; for a great ſtorm ariſing Ardaburius fell into the hands of the Tyrant, who hereupon conceived great hopes, that Theodoſius would no longer refuſe to acknowledge him for a lawful Emperor, in order to releaſe his beloved General. And indeed Theodoſius hearing this misfortune was very ſollicitous, leſt Ardaburius ſhould be killed by the Uſurper. And Aſpar the General's ſon was alſo in a great perplexity, and did not know what reſolution he ſhould take; when an Angel of God in the habit of a ſhepherd appeared to him and to his army, and guided them thro' a marſh to Ravenna, where the Tyrant then was, and where he kept Ardaburius priſoner. No body had ever yet paſſed thro' that marſh, which was naturally impaſſable; but God made it for them as firm as the dry land. So that Aſpar and his army came to Ravenna, and finding the gates open, (the Tyrant not ſuſpecting they could come that way) they entered into the city and took John a priſoner. Thus Socrates relates this incident; aſcribing to a miracle the taking of Ravenna together with John the Uſurper. But Philoſtorgius tells us, that Ardaburius and Aſpar taking Placidia and Valentinian with them, went thro' Pannonia and Illyricum, and made themſelves maſters of Salona by force of arms. Then the father and ſon parted. Ardaburius going to attack the Tyrant by ſea, whilſt Aſpar was to attack him by land; this laſt made ſuch haſte with the Cavalry, that he ſurprized the city of Aquileia, and took it without any trouble; there he left Placidia and Valentinian, till he could know what turn the affairs of the Tyrant would take. But Ardaburius meeting with a violent ſtorm fell with two galleys into the hands of the Uſurper, who deſiring to enter into an alliance with

(1) Lib. 7. cap. 23. p. 371. edit. Reading 1720.

(2) Lib. 12. n. 15. p. 550.

But Aëtius to ingratiate himſelf into the Emperor's favour [B], diſperſed money among his barbarians, and thus prevailed over them to lay down their arms, and to return peaceably into their own country; for which ſervice the Emperor not only pardoned him for having ſided with the Uſurper, but alſo raiſed him to the dignity of a Count (e). Aëtius had ſoon an opportunity of ſhewing his loyalty and gratitude to the Emperor; for the Franks having again entered Gaul, and made themſelves maſters of part of the country, Aëtius fell upon them, ſlew a great number of them, and retook all that part of the country which lies near the Rhine, and in which the Franks intended to ſettle (f). For this ſervice he was the next year made General of the horſe, and created a Patrician (g). In the year 433 (h) he was Conſul with Flavius Valerius; and when the year of his Conſulſhip was expired he was deprived of his poſt of General of the horſe, and Bonifacius, who had revolted ſome years before from the Emperor and retired into Africa, was recalled by the Emperor and made General. Aëtius bearing this impatiently [C], engaged in a battle againſt Bonifacius, but had the misfortune to loſe the victory; however, Bonifacius died in little time of a wound he had received in the engagement (i). Aëtius then retired to his eſtate, where he lived a private life; but his enemies coming to aſſault him in his retirement he fled into Dalmatia, whence he went through Pannonia to the Huns, and by their friendſhip and ſupport he made his peace with the Emperor, and was reſtored to his poſt of General of the Horſe, and to all his former power and authority (k); this happened in the year 436 (l.) After that he gained ſeveral victories over the Burgundians, the Franks, and the Goths, and one particularly over the famous Attila, who called himſelf the Scourge of God. Aëtius made it appear on this occaſion that his prudence and wiſdom were not inferior to his bravery and courage. Attila fearing leſt the Romans ſhould join with the Viſigoths againſt him, wrote to Valentinian that he intended only to attack the Viſigoths, and to theſe he wrote that his army was deſigned only againſt the Romans; but this artifice did not impoſe upon Aëtius, who immediately after he was acquainted with Attila's march, wrote to Theodoric King of the Goths, deſiring him to join with the Romans againſt the Huns; he alſo entered into an alliance with the Franks, the Sarmatians, the Burgundians, the Saxons, and ſeveral other Celtic and German nations; and having formed a numerous army, he marched againſt Attila; they engaged in battle, which laſted from nine of the clock till night. Aëtius gained the day (m); it is ſaid that an hundred and eighty thouſand men were killed in this battle (n), which happened A. C. 453, in the plains of Champagne (o). But if we are to judge of the victory which Aëtius gained, by what Attila did afterwards, it will appear that this King of the Huns was very far from being entirely defeated; for the next year he entered Italy, and laid waſte, plundered, and burnt almoſt all the cities in that country (p): But this was owing to Aëtius's too great cautiouſneſs, or perhaps to his ambition. He was afraid leſt if Attila ſhould be entirely defeated, the Goths ſhould become too powerful for the Romans; his intention was to weaken both the Huns and the Goths, but not to deſtroy either nation. To compaſs his deſign and to diſſuade Thoriſmodus (whoſe father Theodoric King of the Goths had been killed in the aforementioned battle) from purſuing Attila, he repreſented to him, that whilſt he was abſent from his father's kingdom, it was to be feared that one of his brothers would uſurp the crown, that therefore he could not but adviſe him to return home with his army, and to take poſſeſſion of the crown, which by his father's death was devolved upon him (q). This incident is by another author

(e) Philoſtorgius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 12. num. 14. & Hermanni Contracti Chron. ad ann. 425. Ap. Piſtorium, T. 1. P. 1. pag. 157.

(f) Hermanni Contr. Chron. ad an. 428. and Mariani Scoti Chron. ad an. 429. ap. Piſtor. ibid. p 157 and 605.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) According to Marianus Scotus, or in 432. according to Petavius, Rat. Temp. P. 2. p. 114.

(i) Idatii Chron. ap. Du Cheſne, ubi ſupra, pag. 188. and Proſperi aquit. Chron. ap. eund. p. 199, and 205. Paulus Diacon. lib. 14. p. m. 360.

(k) Proſper. ibid.

(l) Sigebertus Gemblacenſis Chronogr ap. Piſtorium, T. 1. P. 1. pag. 710.

(m) Gotefridi Viterbienſis Chron. Patre 16. ap. Piſtor. T. 2. p. 279, 280. Paulus Diaconus, lib. 15.

(n) Paulus Diac. ibid. Sigebert. Gembl. ap. Piſtor. T. 1. P. 11. p. 716.

(o) Thus Papirius Maſſo explains the Campi Catalaunici; Hiſt. Calamit. Galliæ. ap. Du Cheſne, T. 1. p. 104.

(p) Sigebert. ap. Piſtor. T. 1. P. 2. p. 717. Proſper in Chron. ap du Cheſne, T. 1. p. 208. Paulus Diacon. lib. 15.

(q) Paulus Diaconus, ibid. Gotefridi Viterbienſis Chron. ap. Piſtor. T. 2. p. 280. where Aëtius is called Eutius.

with Theodoſius treated his priſoner very kindly; ſo that Ardaburius enjoying great liberty began to tamper with the Tyrant's chief Officers, who were already very much inclined to forſake him; in the mean time he wrote to his ſon ſpeedily to advance with the horſe, not doubting but he ſhould gain a compleat victory over the enemy; Aſpar obeyed, he engaged the Uſurper's army, who being betrayed by his Officers was ſoon taken priſoner and carried to Aquileia, where Placidia and Valentinian then reſided, as we have ſaid. We don't doubt but this account of Philoſtorgius will appear much more probable to all rational readers, than the miraculous narration of Socrates. Of all the authors (3) we could conſult he is the only one that mentions this pretended apparition of an Angel. Philoſtorgius adds, that John having firſt had his right hand cut off, was afterwards beheaded, having ſwayed the ſupreme power a year and a half.

(3) Vide Hermanni Contracti Chron. p. 157. Marian. Scot. Chr. utrumque ap. Piſtorium, T. 1. P. 1. Papir. Maſſo, Hiſt. Calam. Gall. pag. 98. Proſper. Aquit. p. 199, and 204. utrumque ap. Du Cheſne, Hiſt. Franc. Scriptor. coætanei. T. 1.

[B] Aëtius to ingratiate himſelf into the Emperor's favour &c.] Moreri and his Dutch tranſlators David van Hoogſtraaten, Matthew Brouërius van Nidec, and Luïcius are guilty of a groſs error when they tell us that upon the death of Honorius, Aëtius declared for Valentinian, and that for this reaſon the Emperor took him into his ſervice; whereas it is plain by the teſtimony of the authors we have quoted, that Aëtius at firſt ſupported the Uſurper, nay that he engaged againſt the Emperor's General: and Paulus Diaconus (the Deacon) ſays expreſly (4) that the Emperor "pardoned Aëtius, becauſe the Huns, "which he had conducted to John, were by his "care returned into their own country." *Data Ætio * venia, eo quod Hunni, quos per ipſum Joannes acceperat, ejus ſtudio remeaſſent ad propria.*

(4) Lib. 14.

* Thus Paulus writes Aëtius's name.

[C] Aëtius bearing this (Bonifacius's promotion) impatiently.] The envy and hatred between theſe two Generals was of a long ſtanding; and had already been very fatal to the Empire. For about two years after Honorius's death Bonifacius finding he was obliged to yield to Aëtius, took this affront ſo much to heart that he reſolved to be revenged at the expence of the Commonwealth. To compaſs his deſign he went into Spain, and excited the Vandals there to go over into Africa, and to make themſelves maſters of that country; which they did accordingly (5), with Bonifacius at their head; who for ſeveral years maintained himſelf againſt the Emperor Valentinian. But in the year 434 Bonifacius returned into Italy, and was made General of the horſe (6), as we have ſaid above. But the authors, from whom we have theſe particulars, don't tell us how Bonifacius made his peace with the Emperor Valentinian, nor for what reaſon he was recalled; it is probable the Emperor began then to ſuſpect Aëtius, and to be afraid of the great power and credit he enjoyed.

(5) Sigebertus Gemblocenſis in Chronog. ap. Piſtorium. T. 1. P. 2. p. 692 and 708.

(6) Paulus Diaconus, lib. 14. and Proſperi Aquitani Chron. ap. Du Cheſne, T. 1. p. 204, 205.

author related with ſome other circumſtances as we ſhall ſee in the Remark [D]. Aëtius after his great victories, and particularly that over Attila, returning to Rome, was received with great ſhoutings and acclamations of the people. This raiſed the jealouſy of the Emperor Valentinian, who was afraid leſt Aëtius, now at the height of glory, ſhould attempt to invade the crown. The Emperor and the General had ſworn to one another a perpetual friendſhip; they had agreed to marry one of the Emperor's daughters to a ſon of Aëtius; but one day, when Aëtius preſſed the concluſion of that match, the Emperor killed him with his own hand [E], prompted to it, as is thought, by one Honorius, an Eunuch, who had a great power over Valentinian's mind, and bore a ſecret hatred to Aëtius (r). This famous man was of a middling ſtature, but well made and of a manly countenance. He was a good horſeman, a dexterous archer, and indefatigable ſoldier; he was ſtill more conſpicuous and famous for the qualities of his mind than for thoſe of his body. He was perfectly ſkilled in the arts of peace and war; free from avarice and from the leaſt covetouſneſs; brave and generous; he bore injuries without reſentment; conſtant in his reſolutions, which he took after mature deliberation, he could not eaſily be diſſuaded from them; nor did he ever hearken to the malicious inſinuations of courtiers even againſt the worſt of his enemies (s). This is the character which Gregory of Tours gives this General; if we can blame any thing in him, it is his ambition which was the reaſon why he could not bear with Bonifacius his rival; and it was alſo probable that it was that ſame ambition which hindered him from purſuing Attila after the victory he had gained over him: he was perhaps afraid, that in caſe the war was ended, he would loſe all the power and authority he enjoyed. This is often the caſe of great Generals, who are ſeldom regarded in time of

(r) Proſper in Chron. Gregor. Turon. lib. 2. ap. Du Cheſne, T. 1. pag. 200. 208, and 277. Marianus Scotus, Sigebertus, Gemblac. German. Chron. ap. Piſtor. t. 1. p. 610. 718. and T. 2. p. 645.

(s) Gregor. Turon. ap. Du Cheſne, T. 1. p. 277.

[D] This incident is by another author related with ſome other circumſtances.] This author is Idacius, who tells us, that when Thoriſmodus Theodoric's ſon had found that his father had been killed in the battle, he reſolved to revenge his death, and with his Goths purſued the enemy, and fought them during three days; Aëtius, who did not like that the Huns ſhould be entirely defeated, went in the night time to Attila, and ſpoke to him after this manner: "I wiſh that by thy valour and conduct "this country could be freed from the perfidious "Goths; but this cannot be done at preſent; thou "haſt fought as yet only with the leaſt part of their "troops; Theodoric Theoriſmodus's brother advan-"ces with a vaſt multitude of the braveſt and ſtrong-"eſt Goths. Thou wilt never be able to withſtand "them; and would to God, that thou could'ſt eſ-"cape their fury." Aëtius alſo gave Attila ten thouſand crowns to oblige him to withdraw with his Huns into Pannonia. After this Aëtius went to Thoriſmodus, and told him the like ſtory, aſſuring him that Attila had received that ſame night a large ſupply of troops from Pannonia: He added that he had been inform'd Theodoric had uſurped the crown, or was at leaſt upon the point of aſcending the throne; that it was therefore proper, Thoriſmodus ſhould immediately return into his own country to ſecure the crown to himſelf: Thoriſmodus gave alſo ten thouſand crowns to Aëtius, that he might favour the retreat of the Goths (7). Papirius Maſſo very rightly obſerves upon this that it is not probable ſo great a General as Aëtius was, ſhould leave his army and truſt himſelf in the hands of his enemy. This far from being commendable, would be look'd upon as the higheſt imprudence, or rather the greateſt folly imaginable: tho' it is not impoſſible, but Aëtius might have ſent ſome body to Attila, in order to impoſe upon him. We muſt obſerve here, that Papirius Maſſo ſuppoſes in his remarks upon the paſſage he quotes from Idacius, that Aëtius gave ten thouſand crowns to Attila, to engage him to return into Pannonia; whereas in the very paſſage quoted by Maſſo, we find theſe words, Attila dedit Aëtio decem millia ſolidorum, ut pro ſuo ingenio Pannoniam repedaret; i. e. "Attila "gave Aëtius 10000 crowns, that he might in the beſt "manner he could return into Pannonia." But this makes an abſurd ſenſe; therefore I ſhould think that the words Attila and Aëtius are miſplaced: tho' there is ſome difficulty in ſuppoſing that Aëtius offered money to Attila at the ſame time that he pretended to give him a friendly advice; this offer could not but make Attila ſuſpect the cheat: how this difficulty can be removed I don't know, and this makes me think the whole ſtory is falſe. For the reſt Maſſo ſuppoſes the ten thouſand crowns are meant of gold crowns, otherwiſe, ſays he, the offer would have been too trifling to oblige Attila to retire into his own country.

(7) Idacius citat. a Pap Maſſ. ap. Du Cheſne, ubi ſupra, p. 105, 106.

[E] The Emperor killed him with his own hand.] The occaſion of it is related by Procopius (8) as follows: There was a Senator called Petronius Maximus (Grandſon to Maximus, who had been defeated by Theodoſius); he had a very beautiful but very virtuous wife. The Emperor fell in love with her; but finding that neither by his courtſhip and preſents, nor by his promiſes and threatnings he could prevail upon her to yield to his wiſhes, he reſolved to have her by force. To compaſs this baſe deſign, having played one day with Maximus, and won from him more money than he had by him, he took his ring for a pledge: he then ſent a meſſage to Maximus's ſpouſe, as tho' the Empreſs deſired immediately to ſpeak with her, and to give credit to this ſham ſtory the meſſenger ſhewed her Maximus's ring as a token that he came by his order. This Lady ſeeing her husband's ring did not ſcruple to go to the palace; and being arrived there they that favoured the Emperor's deſign conducted her into a ſecret apartment where the Emperor ſoon met her, and violently took from her what ſhe valued more than her life. The ring which had been ſent to her made her believe that her husband was privy to this treaſon, ſo that being returned home ſhe upbraided him with the infamy he had drawn both upon himſelf and upon her by promoting her diſhonour. Maximus ſurprized at this told her what artifice the Emperor had made uſe of to compaſs his baſe deſign; from that moment they both reſolved to be revenged; and Maximus intended to kill the Emperor and to invade the throne. But finding this was impracticable as long as Aëtius lived, he determined to deſtroy him alſo, and that by the very hands of the Emperor, that by this means the Emperor might make himſelf odious to all his ſoldiers, who greatly loved and eſteemed Aëtius. Maximus to perform his reſolution addreſſed Heraclius the Eunuch, firſt Lord of the Bedchamber to the Emperor, and told him, that he himſelf had heard Aëtius talk after ſuch a manner as ſhewed that he would ſoon uſurp the Crown, if he was not early prevented. Heraclius did not fail to acquaint the Emperor immediately with this; and as a baſe and wicked heart is always diſtruſtful, Valentinian gave credit to this calumny, and reſolved the death of Aëtius; and as he was reflecting upon this he asked one of his Courtiers, whether the death of Aëtius could be of any ſervice to the ſtate. The Courtier anſwered, "If your Majeſty was to kill him, you would cut "off your right arm with the left." But this wiſe anſwer could not deter Valentinian from his baſe reſolution; and one day as he was ſurrounded with his guards, he commanded them to kill Aëtius. Others ſay he killed him with his own hand (9).

(8) De Bello Vandal. lib. 1. p. 15. edit. Grotii Amſt. anno 1655.

(9) See the quotation [r].

of peace, when they are obliged to lead a private life. Aëtius had been three times Conſul, firſt A. D. 432 or 433, with Flavius Valerius; 2dly, in 437, with Sigiſwoltus; 3dly, in 446. with Q. Aurelius Symmachus (t).

(t) See Petav. Rat. Temp. tom. 2. p. 114, 115.

AFER (DOMITIUS) a famous Orator under Tiberius, and the three ſucceeding Emperors was born at Nîmes (a). A little after his Prætorſhip, not being yet raiſed according to his wiſhes, and having a ſtrong propenſion to riſe, let the methods be what they would, he turned informer againſt Claudia Pulchra, couſin of Agrippina (b). He gained this cauſe, and by that means was ranked among the principal Orators, and won the eſteem of Tiberius, who bore a mortal hatred to Agrippina [A]. The applauſes which this Emperor beſtowed on his eloquence, made Afer very fond of the profeſſion; ſo that he was very ſeldom without ſome accuſation or defence, whereby he became more eminent for his eloquence than for his probity; till at laſt his reputation for the former ſunk, by his continuing to plead, after age had weakened the faculties of his mind (c) [B]. Claudia Pulchra was impeached, an. 779 of Rome; and the year following, Quintilius Varus her ſon was impeached by the ſame Orator and by Publius Dolabella (d). No one was ſurprized that Afer, as he had been poor for many years, and had not well huſbanded the monies he gained by the former impeachment, ſhould return to his former practice; but it was a matter of univerſal ſurpriſe, to ſee a relation of Varus, of ſo illuſtrious a family as that of Publius Dolabella, aſſociated with this informer. Afer died under Nero, the year of Rome 812 (e); and it is ſaid that he died at table of exceſſive eating (f). Quintilian, who in his youth cultivated his friendſhip very aſſiduouſly [C], makes frequent mention of him (g). He tells (a) Euſeb. Chronic. num. 2060.

(b) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 52.

(c) Niſi quod ætas extrema multum etiam eloquentiæ detrahit, dum ſeſſa mente retinet ſilentii impatientiam. That is, "But old age had "at length weakened the force "of hiseloquence, "tho' he ſtill "expreſſed great "impatience under his incapacity." id. ib. Vide in the remark [C] the paſſage of chap. 2. book 12 of Quintilian.

(d) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 66.

(e) Idem, lib. 14. chap. 19.

(f) Euſeb. Chronic. num. 2060.

(g) Quintil. lib. 5. cap. 7. and lib. 6. cap. 3. See alſo Plin. Epiſt 14. lib. 2. & ibi Catanæum, p. 121.

[A] Tiberius, who bore a mortal hatred to Agrippina.] This Princeſs was ſo far from ſuſpecting, that the Emperor had occaſioned the proſecution againſt her, that ſhe did not diſcover the leaſt reſentment againſt Domitius upon that account. The latter meeting her one day in the ſtreets, turned away: when ſhe, imagining that ſhame had made him do this, after having cauſed him to be called back, ſhe bid him not be afraid; ſaying that it was not he, but Agamemnon, had been the cauſe of all this. Θάρσει Δομίτιε· σὲ γὰρ σύ μοι τόταν αἴτιον εἶ, ἀλλ' Ἀγαμέμνων (1). This ſhews ſhe had read the Iliad.

(1) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 59. ad an. 792. p. 752.

[B] By his continuing to plead, after age had weakened the faculties of his mind.] This is but too common an infirmity; for very few have the art of withdrawing ſeaſonably from affairs, and can ſay with Horace,

Eſt mihi purgatam crebro qui perſonet aurem;
Solve ſeneſcentem mature ſanus equum, ne
Peccet ad extremum ridendus, & ilia ducat (2).

(2) Hor. Epiſt. 1. lib. 1.

" There ſounds, methinks, ſtill thro' my well-
" purg'd ear
" A little voice, fond Horace have a care,
" And whilſt 'tis well releaſe thy aged horſe,
" Leſt, when he runs but with unequal force,
" And ſtretches hard to win, he breaks his wind,
" And laugh'd at, diſtanc'd, baſely lags behind.
Creech.

Poets and Orators ought particularly to be careful of withdrawing in time, becauſe they have more need of a ſtrong and a copious imagination, than other writers; notwithſtanding which, they are but too apt to amuſe themſelves in compoſing, till they are almoſt worn out with age. They ſeem to imagine, that the public is ſentenced to drink all their pretended nectar, to the very lees. But as Legiſlators anciently preſcribed certain limits to the age for marrying (for they prohibited wedlock to women of fifty, and men of ſixty (3); ſuppoſing, that after a certain age, ſuch perſons ſhould not think of procreating children, as their faculties muſt be either weakned or extinct) in like manner, authors ſhould ſet bounds to the compoſing of books; this being a kind of generation, that every ſeaſon of life is not fit for. Horace's compariſon put me in mind of a precept of Virgil, which veteran Poets ought to apply to themſelves.

(3) Quid eſt quare apud poëtas ſalaciſſimus Jupiter deſierit Liberos tollere? Utrum ſexagenarius factus eſt, & illi lex Papia fibulam impoſuit? Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 16. Capiti Papiæ Poppeæ legis à Tiberio Cæſare, quaſi ſexagenarii generare non poſſent, addito abrogavit. Sueton. in Claud. cap. 23. & ibi Commentatores. i. e. " For what " reaſon do the " Poets declare " that the luſtful " Jupiter gets " children no " longer? Is he " threeſcore, and " has the Pappi- " an law ſhut up " his generative " faculties? " Lactant. Book " 1. chap. 16. " He abrogated " the clauſe ad- " ded to the law " Papia Poppæa, " by Tiberius, " by which men " of threeſcore " were forbid to " get children. See Suetonius's Life of Claudius.

(4) Virgil. Georg. lib. 3. ver. 95.

Hanc quoque, ubi aut morbo gravis, aut jam ſegnior annis
Deficit, abde domo, nec turpi ignoſce ſenectæ.
Frigidus in Venerem ſenior, fruſtraque laborem
Ingratum trahit; &, ſi quando ad prælia ventum eſt,
Ut quondam in ſtipulis magnus ſine viribus ignis,
Incaſſum furit (4).

" But worn with years, when dire diſeaſes come,
" Then hide not his ignoble age at home.
" For when his blood to youthful ſpirits move,
" He languiſhes, and labours in his love,
" In vain he burns, like haſty ſtubble fires,
" And in himſelf his former ſelf requires.
Dryden.

Antiquated Poets, I ſay, ought to improve from this leſſon, and not attempt to climb Parnaſſus hill, when they reſemble that horſe whom Pliny mentions after Ariſtotle; Generat mas ad annos triginti tres. Opunte & ad quadraginta duraſſe tradunt adjutum modo in attollenda priore parte corporis (5). i. e. " The male " generates till he is thirty three years old. At " Opus, 'tis ſaid, that he generates till forty, only " having the fore-part of his body lifted up." For then they draw a ſhade over their former glory, like our Domitius Afer. See what we ſhall mention in the article JOHN DAURAT. Some employ their Muſe on divine ſubjects, when ſhe is upon the decline; but the productions on theſe occaſions are generally flat and inſipid (6). I ſay, generally; for we have excellent works on all kinds of ſubjects, written by perſons in advanced years.

(5) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 42.

(6) See Baillet, Jugement ſur les Poëtes. tom. 3. p. 246. See alſo what he ſays of ſuch pieces as are written by old people, tom. 1. of Jug. des Savans, p. 389.

[C] Quintilian cultivated his friendſhip very aſſiduouſly.] Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman, in their Dictionaries; Glandorp in page 306 of his Onomaſticon, and ſeveral other authors, obſerve that Quintilian informs us of this circumſtance in his fifth book, Confitetur ſenem Domitium ſibi adoleſcentulo cultum: but they all declare, that he takes notice of Domitius's authority being greatly leſſened, ſed priore autoritate multum imminuta; but I don't find theſe words in this part of Quintilian. Sufficiebant, ſays he (7), alioqui libri duo à Domitio Afro in hanc rem compoſiti, quem adoleſcentulus ſenem colui, ut non lecta mihi tantum ea, ſed pleraque ex ipſo ſint cognita. i. e. " Otherwiſe the two books of Domitius " Afer written upon this ſubject would ſuffice; for " I was a follower of that old man in my youth; " ſo that I not only read thoſe particulars, but learnt " the greateſt part of them from his own mouth." The xith chapt. of book xii of Quintilian ought to have been cited; for it is there we are informed of the fall of Domitius's authority; and we find the confirmation, as it were, of the precept which the author had before laid down, with regard to the withdrawing of Orators, when age incapacitates them from maintaining their former glory. Non quia prodeſſe unquam ſatis ſit, ſays he (8), & illa mente, atque illa facultate prædito non conveniat operis pulcherrimi quàm longiſſimum tempus; ſed quia docet hoc quoque proſpicere, ne quid pejus quam fecerit, faciat. Neque enim ſcientia modo conſtat orator, quæ augetur annis, ſed voce, laterum firmitate: quibus fractis aut imminutis ætate, ſeu valetudine; cavendum eſt, ne quid in Oratore ſummo deſideretur, ne interſiſtat fatigatus, ne quæ dicat parùm audiri tells us, that his Pleadings abounded with agreeable ſtories, and that there were public collections of his witty ſayings and repartees, ſome of which he quotes. He alſo mentions the books of this Orator, on Witneſſes. It was, once upon a time, very happy for him, that he had as great a preſence of mind, as a genius turned for flattery, otherwiſe he had been inevitably ruined; and this was, when Caligula undertook to be his opponent (b), and pleaded in perſon againſt him (i). But Domitius, inſtead of making a defence, began to repeat, with the higheſt teſtimonies of admiration, the Emperor's plea [D]; after which he fell upon his knees, and begging pardon, declared that he dreaded the eloquence of Caligula, more than he did his Imperial Power. The Emperor, upon this, not only pardoned him, but diſpoſſeſſed the Conſuls of their office, in his favour. His crime was a very ſlight one, for it was only for declaring in the inſcription of a ſtatue he had erected in honour of Caligula, that this Monarch was a ſecond time Conſul at the age of twenty ſeven, by which he intended to make his court to the Emperor. But he was quite miſtaken in his aim, for Caligula proſecuted him, upon pretence that he did it merely to reproach his youth, and his having infringed the laws (k).

(7) Quint. lib. 5. cap. 7.

(b) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 59. ad annum 792.

(i) He read his plea.

(k) Dio. lib. 59.

Afer had ſome adopted children, as we find by Pliny the Younger, who alſo acquaints us with ſome curious particulars relating to them [E]. The Abbé Faydit ſentiat, ne ſe queratur priorem. Vidi ego longè omnium, quos mihi cognoſcere contigit, ſummum Oratorem, Domitium Afrum valde ſenem, quotidie aliquid ex eâ, quam meruerat, autoritate perdentem, cùm agente illo, quem Principem fuiſſe quondam fori non erat dubium; alii (quod indignum videbatur) riderent, alii erubeſcerent, quæ occaſio illis fuit dicendi, malle eum deficere, quàm deſinere. Neque erant illa qualiacunque mala, ſed minora. Quare, ut nunquam in has ætatis veniat inſidias, receptui canet, & in portum integrâ nave perveniet. i. e "Not that it is "enough for a Perſon to have been once uſeful; or "that it is improper for a perſon who is endued with "theſe fine talents to cultivate them for a very long "time; but that it teaches him to take care not to "degenerate from his former glory. For knowledge, "which increaſes indeed with years, does not alone "form the Orator, but he muſt have lungs, and "ſtrong ſides; for if theſe are weakned or broke "by age or ſickneſs, care muſt be taken leſt the great "Orator is not found deficient in ſome things, that "he does not ſtop thro' wearineſs, that he is not "ſenſible he is not ſufficiently heard, and is not the "firſt to complain of himſelf. I my ſelf ſaw much "the greateſt Orator I ever knew, Domitius Afer "in his extreme old age, daily loſing part of the "authority he had formerly deſerved; for when he "was pleading (tho' he was well known to have "once been the greateſt man at the bar) ſome would "laugh, which however ſeem'd very indecent; "others would bluſh which gave them occaſion to "ſay, that he would rather fail through weakneſs "than deſiſt. Nor were theſe the leaſt evils. "The Orator therefore, to prevent his falling into "theſe ſnares of old age, ſhould ſound a retreat, and "bring his veſſel tight and ſound into the harbour." I don't take any notice of the great and capital omiſſions which Moreri has committed, for theſe will appear at firſt ſight, by the bare comparing his article with mine. All I ſhall obſerve, is, that he is very much miſtaken in his citations from Suetonius and Dion in Caligula; for not to mention, that it is not the cuſtom to quote Dion any otherwiſe than with reſpect to ſuch and ſuch a book; and that it is his epitomizer Xiphilinus only, who is cited with regard to ſuch and ſuch an Emperor; it is certain that Suetonius does not once ſpeak of Domitius Afer, either in the Life of Caligula, or in any part of his writings now extant. When Scaliger therefore declares in his Remarks on Euſebius's Chronicle, that St. Jerom had borrowed the particulars he gives us concerning this Orator, from Suetonius; he muſt neceſſarily mean this of ſome books, which have been loſt ſince the death of that father. Hofman gives us two Domitius Afers inſtead of one, and employs the improper citation we juſt now cenſur'd in Moreri.

[D] The Emperor's Plea.] Caligula was ſo charm'd with this piece, that when one of his freedmen, who had been very inſtrumental in calming his reſentments, was going to reproach him for having proſecuted Domitius, the Emperor anſwer'd: I ought not to ſuppreſs ſo important a ſpeech. Which is as tho' he had ſaid: How! ſhould I have employed ſo much time in this plea, and all to no purpoſe? Should I have reſigned the applauſes which my Rhetoric deſerved, rather than expoſe the Life of Domitius? There are but too many among the Great, who would look upon this as a mighty enormity; ſuch, I mean, as imagine that all things muſt be ſacrific'd to their paſſions. They who relate, that the Cardinal of Lorrain choſe to expoſe the Catholic Religion, to all the dangers of the conference at Poiſſi, rather than deprive himſelf of the glory of diſplaying his learning and erudition in it (9), were pretty well acquainted with his character.

(9) See the remark [D] of the article LORRAIN (Charles of)

[E] Some curious particulars.] Domitius Afer adopted two brothers, Domitius Tullus and Domitius Lucanus. He afterwards cauſed the poſſeſſions of their father to be confiſcated, and left them his own, but involuntarily, in ſome meaſure; for it is very probable, that had not death ſnatch'd him ſuddenly from the world, he would have revoked the will he had made in their favour. Domitius Lucanus, ſon-in-law to Curtius Mantia, made himſelf odious to his father-in-law. The former had a daughter, to whom Mantia would not bequeath any thing, but upon condition that Lucanus ſhould emancipate her; which was no ſooner done, but Domitius Tullus adopted her. This was a juggle between the two brothers; for they agreed to ſhare in each other's fortunes; by which means, as ſoon as this girl became ſubject to the paternal power, by virtue of the adoption; Domitius Lucanus ſhared in Mantia's inheritance, tho' the latter had done all that lay in his power to prevent it (10). Domitius Tullus inherited his brother's eſtate, in prejudice of the girl who was common to both. This man had fed a great number of people with the hopes of enjoying his eſtate, and by that means was careſſed, had rich preſents made him, and in ſhort, all the flattering arts were practiſed towards him, which thoſe employ who make their court to rich old men, in order to creep into their eſtates: but he deceived them all, for his adopted daughter was made his heir, and he gave ſeveral legacies to his relations only. He was particularly careful of his wife's intereſt, and left her a very large fortune. This Lady had diſhonour'd herſelf in marrying him, if we conſider the deplorable condition to which age and infirmity had reduced him. In this condition he might have loath'd her, had ſhe been his wife from the time he was flush'd with youth and vigour; but how much more diſagreeable muſt he prove, when ſhe married him at a time when he laboured under all theſe diſadvantages? However, ſhe ſubmitted with ſo much patience to all the diſtaſteful inconveniencies of his condition, and ſo tenderly ſupported his feeble, crazy life, that ſhe recovered her character with the public. This unhappy man had quite loſt the uſe of his limbs, ſo that his ſervants were forc'd to waſh and clean his teeth; whence aroſe his complaint, of being daily obliged to lick his ſlaves fingers; notwithſtanding which, he did not care to leave the world (11). Pliny, from whom we borrow

(10) Fuit fratribus illis quaſi fato datum, ut divites fierent invitiſſimis à quibus facti eſſent, That is, "It ſeemed to "to be the fate "of thoſe brothers, to be "made rich "even in ſpight "of thoſe by "whom they "were made ſo. Plin. Epiſt. 18. lib. 8.

(11) Ibid. pag. 493.

dit in his Notes upon Virgil, pag. 3, makes him of the Royal Family of the DOMITII.

borrow theſe particulars, gives us at the ſame time ſuch a variety of moral characters, that the reader cannot be diſpleaſed to read his own words. Accepit uxor amœniſſimas villas, accepit magnam pecuniam uxor optima & patientiſſima: ac tanto melius de viro merita, quanto magis eſt reprehenſa, quòd nupſit. Nam mulier natalibus clara, moribus proba, ætate declivis, diu vidua, mater olim, parum decorè ſequuta matrimonium videbatur divitis ſenis ita perditi morbo, ut eſſe tædio poſſet uxori, quam juvenis, ſanuſque duxiſſet. Quippe omnibus membris extortus & fractus tantas opes ſolis oculis obibat; ac ne in lectulo quidem, niſi ab aliis movebatur. Quinetiam, fœdum miſerandumque dictu, dentes lavandos, fricandoſque præbebat. Auditum eſt frequenter ab ipſo, quum quereretur de contumeliis debilitatis ſuæ, ſe digitos ſervorum ſuorum, quotidie lingere. Vivebat tamen, & vivere volebat, ſuſtentante maximè uxore, quæ culpam inchoati matrimonii in gloriam perſeverantiâ verterat (12). i. e. "She (his (12) Idem, ibid.
" wife) inherited the moſt beautiful country houſes,
" and a large eſtate; a wife, the moſt worthy, the
" moſt patient that ever lived, and who deſerved
" the more from her husband as ſhe had been cen-
" ſured for marrying him; for it was thought not " very decent for a Lady of illuſtrious birth, of an " unſullied reputation, advanced in years, who had
" been long a widow, and formerly a mother,
" ſhould marry a rich old man ſo worn out with
" diſeaſes, that he might have made a wife diſtaſte him,
" whom he had married in his youth and in his " health. For he was ſo diſtorted and weakened in " all his limbs, that he could enjoy his great wealth
" no otherwiſe than with his eyes, nor could he even " move in his bed unleſs he were turn'd by others: and
" what is filthy and wretched to relate, he was forc'd
" to have his teeth waſh'd and cleaned for him.
" He was often heard to ſay, in complaining of " his infirmities, that he lick'd his ſervants fingers
" every day. Yet he lived and was deſirous to live,
" ſupported chiefly by his wife, who turn'd the " fault ſhe had committed in marrying him to her
" own honour, by her perſeverance." Her virtue would undoubtedly have ſhone forth with much greater luſtre, could ſhe have foretold how long her husband's infirmities would continue. However, all things conſider'd, ſhe deſerved applauſe; for, in caſe ſhe had married him in the view of making a large fortune, at the expence only of paſſing a few months in a very diſagreeable manner, but was deceived in her hopes: ſhe yet did not diſcover the leaſt uneaſineſs at her condition; but very gracefully acted the part of a good wife. With what beauty are a number of characters drawn in this letter! What a ſtrong image have we here, of the frailty of human nature, in the perſon of this unhappy wretch, who, tho' deprived of the uſe of his limbs, is yet afraid to die! but we ſhall ſpeak elſewhere (13) of this frailty, which, in thoſe times, was much more ſhameful than in this age; because it was look'd upon as bravery in a perſon, who was oppreſt with a tedious ſickneſs, to put a period to it, by laying violent hands upon himſelf. How ſcandalous is it, on the other ſide, to hear a man who has a daughter and grand-daughter of his own, publiſh to the world, that he ſought for heirs out of his own family; and that any one who would beſiege his eſtate with the uſual forms, might take it! How ſordid a traffic was this! And what odd ſtratagems were employed! It was ſuch people as theſe, who found their account in ſuch perſons as ſued artfully for inheritances. (13) In one of the remarks of the article MECÆNAS.

——— ——— Dominus tamen & Domini Rex
Si vis tu fieri, nullus tibi parvulus aula
Luſerit Æneas, nec filia dulcior illo.
Jucundum & carum ſterilis facit uxor amicum (14). (14) Juven. Sat. 5. ver. 137, &c.

" Wou'dſt thou become his Patron and his Lord,
" Wou'dſt thou be in thy turn by him ador'd?
" No young Æneas in thy hall muſt play,
" No ſweeter daughter lead thy heart aſtray.
" Oh! how a barren wife does recommend!
" How dear, how pleaſant, is a childleſs friend.
Mr. Bowles.

But as this avarice was of the moſt groveling kind, that of the perſons it impoſed upon, was no leſs ſordid. Theſe would have been more excuſable, had they courted the favour of a man who had no children, and had not exclaimed againſt Domitius after his death. But the world laughed at their complaints, which only revealed their ſhame: the deceaſed was commended, and it was concluded that he acted very prudently and well, for ſo depraved an age. But let us again hear the agreeable Pliny: Varii totâ civitate ſermones: alii fictum, ingratum, immemorem loquuntur, ſeque ipſos, dum inſectantur illum, turpiſſimis confeſſionibus produnt, qui de illo uti de patre, avo, proavo, quaſi orbi querantur: alii contrà hoc ipſum laudibus ferunt, quòd ſit fruſtratus improbas ſpes hominum, quos ſic decipere pro moribus temporum prudentia eſt (15). i. e. " All the city were (15) Plin. ubi ſupra.
" divided in opinion. Some called him falſe, un-
" grateful and forgetful, and whilſt they accuſed
" him, they betrayed themſelves by the moſt ſhame-
" ful confeſſions, for they complained of him as " tho' they had been diſinherited by a father, a " grandfather or a great-grandfather. Others, on " the other ſide, beſtow the greateſt encomiums
" upon him for diſappointing the hopes of wic" ked men, whom, conſidering the depravity of the " times, it was prudent to deceive in the manner
" he did."

☞AFRANIA, the wife of Licinius Buccio, a Roman Senator, famous for her impudence, and pleading publickly her own cauſes in the Courts of Juſtice [A]. She was living till the ſecond Conſulſhip of Julius Cæſar [B]. Valerius Maximus has likewiſe

[A] Pleading publickly her own cauſes in the Courts of Juſtice] She was of a very contentious diſpoſition, and perpetually involving her ſelf in law-ſuits. She never would ſuffer any of the Advocates to plead her cauſe, but always appeared in perſon, and managed them herſelf. This confident behaviour of hers made her very remarkable; ſo that women of her clamorous temper were uſually ſtigmatized with her name. Valerius Maximus has expreſſed her character in very ſtrong terms, which our Ladies will excuſe me from tranſlating. Afrania——— pro ſe ſemper apud Prætorem verba fecit; non quod Advocatis deficiebatur, ſed quod impudentiâ abundabat. Itaque in uſitatis foro latratibus aſſidue tribunalia exercendo, muliebris calumniæ notiſſimum evaſit exemplum; adeo ut pro crimine improbis fœminarum moribus Afraniæ nomen objiciatur (1). (1) L. 8. c. 3. Exemp. 2.

[B] Till the ſecond Conſulſhip of Julius Cæſar.] Moreri ſays it was in the firſt Conſulſhip of Cæſar in the year of Rome 695, and before Chriſt 59. Valerius Maximus's words are theſe: Prorogavit autem Spiritum ſuum ad C. Cæſarem iterum atque P. Servilium Coſſ. i. e. " She was living till C. Cæſar
" was a SECOND time Conſul together with P. Servi-
" lius." Which ſhews Moreri to have been miſtaken. Valer. Maximus concludes his account of her with this peculiar reflection, that it is much more proper to ſet down the time when ſuch a monſter died, than when ſhe was born. Tale enim monſtrum magis quo tempore extinctum, quam quo ſit ortum, memoriæ tradendum eſt. But whatever prejudice the ancients might have againſt women's ſpeaking in public, there is a religious ſociety among us, who inſiſt upon their right of preaching equal with that of the men. Their greateſt writers, and Mr. Barclay in particular (2), will inform the reader of the arguments, with which they defend this point. (2) Apology, Theſ. 10.

T.

likewiſe given an account of two other Roman Ladies, who pleaded their own cauſes in public; but he ſpeaks of them in much gentler terms than of our Afrania.

AFRANIUS (QUINCTIANUS), a Roman Senator, who had loſt his reputation by his infamous debaucheries, engaged in the infamous conſpiracy againſt Nero, which coſt Seneca his life, the year of Rome 818. He had a perſonal reaſon to be offended at that Prince, for having written a bitter Satyr againſt him in verſe. He denied for a long time his having any hand in this conſpiracy, but confeſſed it at laſt in hopes of being pardoned, in which however he was deceived. He diſcovered more fortitude at his execution than could have been expected, conſidering the life he had led (a).

(a) Tacit. Ann. lib. 15. cap. 49, 56, 70.

☞AGAG, King of the Amalekites. The inhabitants of that country having barbarouſly attacked the Iſraelites in the deſert, after they had left Egypt, when they were abſolutely wearied out with the fatigues of their journey, and having deſtroyed thoſe, who could not follow the reſt of the army, God not only gave Joſhua a victory over them in the deſert, but he ſwore that he would put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven [A], and purſue them with war from generation to generation (a) [B]. This happened according to Uſher in the year of the world 2513, before Chriſt 1487, and before the Vulgar Æra 1491. About four hundred years after this God remembered the cruelty, which Amalek had exerciſed againſt his people, and ordered Samuel to tell Saul, that he ſhould march with his army againſt them, and entirely deſtroy that nation, and every thing which belonged to them (b) [C]. Saul therefore gave orders for gathering the people together, who were two hundred thouſand footmen, beſides ten thouſand men of Judah; and with theſe he entered into the country of the Amalekites, and deſtroyed them from Havilah to Shur, which is over againſt Egypt. But he and the people ſpared Agag their King, and reſerved him with the beſt

(a) Exod. xvii. 14 and 16. and Deut. xxv. 17.

(b) 1 Sam. xv. 1, 2, &c.

[A] That he would put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven.] This prediction was verified under Saul, who had a particular command to deſtroy this people entirely. And tho' he neglected to execute this order of God in a proper manner, yet the Amalekites were ſo weakened from that time, that they never could recover their former power and grandeur, or injure the Iſraelites; and we find no accounts of them in the latter times of the Jewiſh State. They were confounded with the Idumeans and Arabians. Philo Judæus tells us (1), that the King of the Amalekites being apprehenſive leſt the Iſraelites ſhould plunder his country, reſolved to prevent them, and marched with his army, in order to oppoſe their paſſage, with a deſign, if they ſhould reſiſt him, to attack them with all his forces. And we have a paſſage in the Vulgate Tranſlation of the book of Judith (2), which is wanting in the Greek, and in our Engliſh Verſion, wherein this army of the Amalekites is deſcribed as very formidable, conſiſting of a great number of horſe and chariots, and ſoldiers well armed, and extremely confident in their own power and bravery. Memores eſtote Moyſi ſervi Domini, qui Amalec confidentem in virtute ſuâ, & in potentiâ ſuâ, & in exercitu ſuo, & in clypeis ſuis, non ferro pugnando, ſed precibus ſanctis orando dejecit.

(1) L. 1. De Vita Moſis apud Calmet, Comment. Litteral. ſur l'Exode xvii. 14.

(2) Ch. iv. 13.

[B] Purſue them with war from generation to generation.] This is expreſſed in our Engliſh Tranſlation as follows; Becauſe the Lord hath ſworn, that the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation (3). The Hebrew Original is very obſcure; it may be render'd, Becauſe the hand upon the Throne of the Lord, the war of the Lord againſt Amalek; as if it had been ſaid, Since the hand of the Amalekites has attacked the Throne of the Lord, he will make war againſt them till he has utterly deſtroyed them. It is probable, that he calls Iſrael the Throne of God, becauſe God choſe them to rule over the Amalekites. The Septuagint tranſlate this paſſage thus; Becauſe the Lord fights with an hidden hand (in an inviſible manner) againſt Amalek throughout all generations: Ὅτι ἐν χειρὶ κρυφαίᾳ πολεμεῖ Κύριος ἐπὶ Ἀμαλὴκ ἀπὸ γενεῶν εἰς γενεάς. It is evident, that they read the text differently from what we do now. They read it כסיה ceſuiah, i. e. "hidden," inſtead of כס יה ces jah, i. e. "the Throne of the "Lord." We may likewiſe underſtand theſe words, The hand upon the Throne, and the war of the Lord ſhall be againſt Amalek, as if it had been ſaid, that God raiſes his hand upon his Throne, to make a ſolemn oath, that he will deſtroy Amalek. The Chaldee Paraphraſt has explained it thus; Moſes ſays; It has been reſolv'd or declared with an oath on the part of the terrible [God] whoſe Majeſty is ſeated upon the Throne of his glory, that war ſhall be made on the part of God againſt Amalek. Mr. le Clerc reads in the text nes, i. e. "a ſtandard," inſtead of ces, i. e. "a throne." The difference of the Hebrew letters nun and caph, is very ſmall. According to this conjecture we may explain the paſſage thus: Since Amalek has lifted up its hand againſt the ſtandard of the Lord, the hand of the Lord ſhall be lifted up againſt Amalek for ever: Quia manus contra vexillum Domini, bellum Domini in Amalec. This ſenſe is very proper, and contains an alluſion between God's threatning, and the name of the altar, which Moſes erected after the victory, and called Jehovah Niſſi, i. e. "The Lord is my Banner or Standard." Caſtalio had made the ſame remark with regard to ces, which he ſubſtituted inſtead of nes; but he has given another ſenſe to this paſſage; The Lord has taken the ſtandard in hand to deſtroy the Amalekites for ever; as a General, who marches againſt the enemy, with the ſtandard in his hand (4).

(3) Exod. xvii. 16.

(4) See Calmet in locum.

[C] Entirely deſtroy that nation, and every thing which belonged to them.] The command is very ſevere; Slay both man and woman, infant and ſuckling, ox and ſheep, camel and aſs (5). Some interpreters obſerve upon this paſſage, that the Iſraelites were obliged in point of duty to execute God's command in the ſtricteſt manner, without examination, and without pity; and that God left them only the merit of obedience. He is the ſovereign Proprietor of mens lives and fortunes; and therefore ſuch a command had nothing in it, but what was perfectly juſt (6). Mr. le Clerc tells us, that ſuch a general ſlaughter and deſtruction is to be conſidered in the ſame light as a peſtilence, which carries off the innocent with the guilty; while death is a puniſhment to the latter, whereas God can make ſufficient recompence to the former for their ſufferings in ſome other way. An infant, for inſtance, however his death may be regretted by the parent, has the greateſt reaſon to thank God, becauſe he dies in his infancy, by which means he is removed from this preſent ſcene of trouble and diſtreſs to a ſtate of happineſs. Internecio ejuſmodi quaſi peſtis quædam eſt habenda, quâ tolluntur innoxii cum noxiis; quia noxii plectuntur morte innoxiorum, quos Deus aliunde ſat magnis beneficiis cumulare poteſt. Certe nullus infans, licet parentibus multum defletus, non habebit Deo gratias, quia in infantia mortuus, hoc eſt, ereptus vitæ miſeriis fuerit, ut bearetur. But we have conſidered the objection againſt the ſevere treatment of the Canaanites by the Jews in the article of ACHAN (7).

(5) 1 Sam. xv. 3.

(6) See Calmet in locum.

(7) Note [B].

beſt of the cattle and the moſt valuable part of the ſpoil [D]. Upon this occaſion God declared to Samuel his indignation againſt Saul, becauſe he had neglected to obey his orders, and aſſured him that he repented of having made Saul King [E]. Samuel was extremely ſorry at this affair, and cried to the Lord all night. The next day he went to Saul, who was returned with his army to Gilgal, where he offered to God burnt-offerings of the ſpoils which he had taken from the Amalekites. As ſoon as Saul ſaw Samuel he addreſſed himſelf to him with a voice of exultation, and told him, that he had performed the commandment of the Lord [F]. But Samuel aſked him what meant that bleating of the ſheep, and lowing of the oxen in his ears? Saul replied, that the people had reſerved the beſt of the ſheep and oxen for a ſacrifice, and had deſtroyed the reſt. Upon this the Prophet declared to him God's reſolution to reject him, and to give his kingdom to another, on account of his diſobedience [G]. He [D] But he and the people ſpared Agag their King, and reſerved him with the beſt of the cattle, and the moſt valuable part of the ſpoil.] Whoever propoſed this, they all agreed, not to kill Agag; and it is moſt likely Saul was the chief author of this counſel. Joſephus tells us (8), that Saul ſpared him on account of his noble and beautiful perſon, not following the command of God, but his own private fancy and affection, and giving way to an unſeaſonable compaſſion, which was dangerous to him in thoſe circumſtances. Nay it was unreaſonable, continues he, to ſpare a man, who had been the author of all the calamities, which the Jews had ſuffer'd: Σάυλος ὁ αὐτῶν τ βασιλέα, καὶ τ ἡγεμόνα τῶς εἰς Ἑβραίυς κακῶν ἔσωσε. And as the people reſerved the beſt of the ſpoils, ſo they deſtroyed every thing that was vile and refuſe.. This covetouſneſs of the Jews was plainly contrary to the divine command, which obliged them to deſtroy utterly whatever was devoted by God, that it might appear, that theſe things were devoted not out of avarice, but in obedience to his orders. Otherwiſe the Jews would have been ſuppoſed to puniſh the Canaanites, not by any command from God, but merely to ſeize their poſſeſſions, when they had deſtroyed them. Alioquin Hebræi viſi fuiſſent non tam nomine Dei de Chananæis pœnas exegiſſe, quam divitias ſibi ex eorum internecione quæſiviſſe (9).

(8) Antiq. Jud. l. 6. c. 7.

(9) Le Clerc in locum.

[E] That he repented of having made Saul King.] God can neither act that which is wrong, nor take ſuch bad reſolutions, that he may afterwards repent of. He can neither change his ſentiments, nor alter his conduct from what is amiſs to that which is juſt; his knowledge is invariably the ſame, without any addition or diminution. So that to repent can never belong to God. But it often happens, that God abandons thoſe, whom he had before favoured in a particular manner, and promiſed the greateſt things to, becauſe they have rendred themſelves unworthy his regard. The change of their conduct produces a change in God's external treatment of them; and this is generally expreſſed in Scripture by the word to repent (10). Mr. le Clerc obſerves, that as men, when they repent, act the contrary of what they did before; ſo the Deity, when he begins to act differently from what he had done before, is ſaid by men to repent. Quia homines pœnitentiâ ducti contraria agunt iis, quæ antea egerant, ideo cum Deus aliter ſe gerere incipit, quam antea, eum pœnitere homines dicunt (11). Biſhop Patrick upon this paſſage remarks, that "repentance in God "imports only the will of a change, and not of "every change; but of the divine ſentence pro- "nounced, which the Scripture calls Repentance. "So Procopius Gazæus, Pœnitentia Dei eſt diſpenſa- "tionis ipſius mutatio. i. e. "God's repentance is "the change of his own diſpenſation."

(10) See Juſtin. Martyr. ad Græcos. p. 22, 23. apud Calmet.

(11) Le Clerc in locum; likewiſe his Commentary upon Geneſis vi. 6.

[F] That he had performed the commandment of the Lord.] Mr. le Clerc obſerves, that he ſaid this, becauſe he had deſtroyed all the Amalekites, who had fallen into his hands, except Agag; tho' he had ſpared him, either becauſe he did not ſufficiently underſtand the command of God, or had taken too great a liberty in interpreting it; Sive non ſatis intellexiſſet mandata Dei ſive audaciùs ea interpretaſſet. But if Saul had erred by not fully underſtanding God's command, his ignorance would certainly have extenuated his crime, and he would not have deſerved ſuch a ſevere puniſhment, as was denounced againſt him by Samuel. We muſt therefore ſuppoſe, that his diſobedience was attended with ſome circumſtances of real guilt, and not to have been the reſult of mere miſtake and ignorance. Biſhop Patrick ſuppoſes him to have been ſo inſenſible of any fault he had committed, that he boaſted of his performance.

[G] On account of his diſobedience] Samuel's expoſtulation with Saul contains a very noble and excellent ſentiment. Hath the Lord, ſays he, as great delight in burnt-offerings and ſacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than ſacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams (12). This admonition is inculcated in very ſtrong terms, by David (13), Solomon (14), and the Prophets (15). Joſephus explains this paſſage in the following manner: "The Prophet told him, that God is not pleaſ- "ed with ſacrifices, but with thoſe men, who are "good and juſt. And theſe are ſuch, as obey his "will and commands, and think nothing is well "done by them, but what they do in conformity "to God's commands; for God is not then deſpiſed, "when no ſacrifice is offered to him, but when a "man proves diſobedient to him. As for thoſe "perſons, who diſobey him, and neglect to pay "true reverence to God, and ſuch worſhip as is "alone acceptable to him, tho' they offer many coſtly ſacrifices, and bring him the moſt exquiſite "gifts of gold and ſilver, all their preſents are re- "jected by him, and he conſiders them as inſtances "of their guilt, and not of their piety. But thoſe "who obſerve and retain in mind what he declares "and commands, and chooſe death rather than vio- "late his precepts; thoſe he is pleaſed with, and "does not even require ſacrifice of them. And when- "ever they do ſacrifice, he prefers their meaneſt "offerings to thoſe of the moſt opulent of mankind "(16)." This paſſage deſerves ſome conſideration among thoſe, who are now fond of raiſing poſitive duties to an equality with, and even a ſuperiority over moral. This is an egregious inverſion of the order of nature, and a prodigious inconſiſtency with the plain deſign of Chriſtianity. Sacrifices, ſays Mr. le Clerc upon the paſſage of Scripture abovementioned, were appointed by God, but yet they were only an external rite, by which men declared that they had ſinned, and deſired pardon of their ſins, and by which they paid their vows, or returned thanks to God. Now ſuch a Rite could not be acceptable to God, unleſs it was attended with a reſolution of obeying him in all reſpects, and with a grateful mind towards him. For a man of true religion can never chooſe what parts of religion he pleaſes to obſerve, and neglect the reſt. And therefore Samuel here oppoſes obedience to ſacrifice, becauſe the people had fixed upon one part of the divine commands for their obſervance, while they omitted the precept concerning the utter ſubverſion of the Amalekites, or the devoting them to deſtruction in the manner, which God had appointed. Samuel proceeds to expoſe Saul's crime in a very ſtrong light, by aſſuring him, that Rebellion is as the ſin of witchcraft, and ſtubborneſs is as iniquity and idolatry (17). The literal tranſlation of the Hebrew is as follows; Rebellion is the ſin of Divination, and ſtubbornneſs is the Vanity and the Teraphim. Magic, idolatry, and the impious and ſuperſtitious worſhip of Teraphim were extremely hateful to the Deity. The Hebrew word Keſem is taken in general for all kinds of magic, divination, or witchcraft. The vanity means idolatry, and the vain and deluſive worſhip of the creature. The Teraphim are idols, or magical and ſuperſtitious figures. Theſe Teraphim were very probably a kind of idol, which originally belonged to the Chaldeans. The Teraphim of Laban (18), and thoſe of the King of Babylon (19), the

(12) 1 Sam. xv. 22.
(13) Pſalm l. 13, 14. li. 16, 17.
(14) Eccleſ. v. 1.
(15) Iſaiah i. 11, 12. and lxvi. 3. Jer. vii. 21, 22, &c. Hoſea vi. 6. Micah vi. 6, 7, 8. Zach. viii. 16.

(16) Antiq. Jud. lib. 6. c. 7. pag. 330. edit. Havercamp. 1726.

(17) 1 Sam. xv. 23.

(18) Gen. xxxi. 30.
(19) Ezech. xxi. 21.

He ordered Agag to be brought to him, who, when he came before Samuel, ſaid, Surely the bitterneſs of death is paſt [H]. But the latter reproached him for his former cruelty, and hewed him in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal [I]. Thus died Agag about the year of the world 2930, before Chriſt 1070, and before the Vulgar Æra 1074.

name Teraphim, which may be derived from the ſame root with Seraphim in the Hebrew, and which ſignifies Burning, Fire, and the Sun, worſhipped by the Perſians; all theſe circumſtances may confirm this conjecture: Oracles are aſcribed to Teraphim (20), but what the form of them was is unknown. Maimonides ſays (21), that the Zabians had figures of gold, which repreſented the Sun, and figures of ſilver, which repreſented the Moon; they placed them in niches, and aſcribed to them a virtue of diſcovering things future by a ſecret influence of the Stars. The greateſt part of the Rabbins confound the Teraphim with the Taliſmans and conſtellated figures. The Perſian interpreter has tranſlated Teraphim by the word Aſtrolabe, and Rabbi Moſes Nachman is of opinion, that they were a kind of clocks, which ſhewed the hours, and diſcovered what was to come to paſs. Ludovicus de Dieu thinks that they were the Dii Penates, or Houſhold Gods, who were worſhipped, in order to obtain of them the encreaſe and protection of the ſubſtance of their family. He derives Teraphim from Teraph, which in the Arabic and Ethiopian ſignifies to cauſe any thing to abound. Rachel ſtole her father Laban's Teraphim only in hopes of taking away the proſperity of the family with them; which perhaps was the reaſon of Laban's impatience to bring them back again. Pererius (22), Bonfrerius Rivet (23), and a great many other writers are of opinion the name Teraphim is frequently given to idols or figures in general, which is likewiſe very probable (24).

(20) Judges xvii. 5. and xviii. 5. and Zach. x. 2.
(21) More Nevoch. Part 3. c. 29.
(22) In Geneſ. xxxi. 19.
(23) Upon Hoſea iii. 3.
(24) Calmet in locum.

[H] Who, when he came before Samuel, ſaid, Surely the bitterneſs of death is paſt.] We are told in our Engliſh Tranſlation, that Agag came unto him delicately (25), which is agreeable to the Hebrew. The Septuagint have rendred it, Agag trembling, Ἀγὰγ τρέμων; the Vulgate, pinguiſſimus & tremens, i. e. "he was very fat and came trembling." But theſe later interpreters have tranſlated merely from conjecture; for there is nothing like this in the Hebrew, and we find by what follows, that Agag was in great hopes, that he ſhould eſcape with impunity; Surely the bitterneſs of death is paſt. But the Vulgate has rendred this in a different manner, Muſt bitter death ſeparate me from every thing? Sic̈ine ſeparat amara mors? And the Septuagint, Is it ſo, O bitter death? Εἰ οὕτω, πικρὸς ὁ θάνατος; and the Chaldee thus, What is the bitterneſs of death, my Lord?

(25) 1 Sam. xv. 32.

[I] Reproach'd him for his former cruelty, and hewed him in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal.] And Samuel ſaid, as thy ſword hath made women childleſs, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſs among women (26). This ſhews that he had been a bloody tyrant; and was now cut off, not merely for the ſins of his anceſtors four hundred years before; but for his own mercileſs cruelty (27). Samuel's zeal was ſo inflamed at the ſight of Agag, that he commanded him to be put to death by the public Executioner of juſtice, or perhaps he killed him with his own hand, as we find Gideon did to Zeba and Zalmunna (28). This does not prove that Samuel continued a Judge after Saul was anointed, but he was authoriſed perhaps to do ſo by a ſpecial commiſſion from God, or he did it in imitation of the zeal of the Levites, who deſtroyed thoſe who had worſhiped the Golden Calf (29), and of Phineas who killed Zimri and Cosbi (30). The death of Agag had been formally predicted above four hundred years before by the Prophet Balaam; according to the vulgate tranſlation of the book of Numbers (31). Tolletur propter Agag Rex ejus, & auferetur regnum illius. i. e. "His King ſhall be "taken away becauſe of Agag, and the kingdom "ſhall be removed." But the Samaritan and the Septuagint read it: His kingdom ſhall be raiſed above Gog, and his kingdom ſhall be enlarged. Some copies of the Septuagint read Og inſtead of Gog. We know the King of Baſhan's name was Og, but he was defeated and kill'd before this, and all his people ſubdued by the Jews. So that Balaam could not poſſibly mean him. The ancient Greek interpreters read, as well as the Septuagint Gog or Og. And ſome of the fathers (32) have explained this paſſage of the victory which the Son of God is to obtain over Gog and Magog, which is often underſtood of Antichriſt. St. Ambroſe (33) reads it: Attolletur regnum ejus in altum, i. e. "His kingdom ſhall be "exalted." Philo Judæus ſays to the ſame purpoſe (34); And his kingdom ſhall perpetually encreaſe, and be raiſed every day to a higher degree of glory. Καὶ ἐπιδιαμενοῦσα ἡ τοῦδε βασιλεία, καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν πρὸς ὕψος ἀρθήσεται. But, as Father Calmet obſerves, we muſt read in the Hebrew Gag, a Top, inſtead of Gog, in order to juſtify ſuch a tranſlation of that paſſage. In ſhort, Grotius is of opinion, that theſe verſions are erroneous, and that the Hebrew original is much the trueſt in this point. Sed verius quod in Hebræo legitur. T.

(26) Ibid. 33.
(27) Biſhop Patrick in locum.
(28) Judges viii. 20, 21.
(29) Exod xxxii. 27.
(30) Num. xxv. 8.
(31) C. xxiv. 7.
(32) Origen. Homil. 17. in Num. Euſeb. l. 9. Præpar. c. 3. Cyprian. l. 1. ad Quirin. Teſtim. 10.
(33) Ep. 50.
(34) L. 1. de Vita Moſis.

☞AGAPIUS, an obſcure writer, who is mentioned by none of the ancients, except Photius (a). He was a very conſiderable perſon among the Manichees. Dr. Cave is of opinion (b), that he was the ſame with that Agapius, who was a ſcholar of Manes, and wrote a book intitled Heptalogus, mentioned by Petrus Siculus (c). It may be objected to this, that Photius repreſents him as contemporary with Eunomius the Hereſiarch, and tells us that he wrote againſt him. But it is to be obſerved that Photius does not expreſly affirm this, but that it only ſeems to him, that Agapius oppoſed Eunomius's errors. But ſuppoſing Agapius did actually write againſt him, this might eaſily be done, if we allow that he was old at that time. Manes did not publiſh his notions before the year 277, and he lived long after this, and therefore about the end of that Century he might have Agapius for his ſcholar. Eunomius ſpread his hereſies under the Emperor Conſtantius: now there is no difficulty in ſuppoſing, that Agapius might be living then, nay even to the death of Conſtantius, ſince Cyril Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who lived in that Emperor's reign, affirms expreſly (d), that there was a man then living, who had ſeen Manes in perſon. Epiphanius (e) likewiſe who wrote in the year 374, aſſures us, that there were ſome perſons in his time, who had talked with Hermas the ſcholar of Manes, and told him divers particulars relating to him. This Agapius wrote a work divided in twenty three Books, beſides an hundred and two diſtinct chapters, which he dedicated to Urania, a woman of his ſect, and companion of his ſtudies (f). We ſhall give ſome account of his notions in the Note hereunder [A]. Dr. Cave (g) obſerves, that if we compare Photius's repreſentation

(a) Cod. 179. p. 402, &c. edit. Rhotomagi 1653.
(b) Hiſt. Litter. Diſſert. p. 167. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720.
(c) Hiſt. Manichæ. p. 30.
(d) Catech. VI. p. 141.
(e) Hæreſ. lxvi. num. 12.
(f) Συμφιλόσοφον.
(g) Ubi ſupra.

[A] Some account of his notions in the Note hereunder.] We find in the Abſtract, which Photius has given us of him (1), that he aſſerted, that there was an evil principle which ſubſiſted of itſelf, and was oppoſite

(1) Cod. 179.

tation of his doctrines with the form of the reception of the Manichees, which was firſt publiſhed by Cotelerius, and afterwards by Tollius, it will give a great deal of light into his ſcheme. Photius calls him a deteſtable and impious man (b).

(b) Τῷ μιαρῷ καὶ δυσσεβεῖ.

oppoſite to God from eternity. This principle he called ſometimes Nature, ſometimes Matter, Satan, the Devil, the Prince of the world, the God of this world, and by many other names. That men ſin neceſſarily and unwillingly; that the body is the worſt part; but that the ſoul is a particle of the Divine Eſſence, and of the ſame nature with God. That Chriſt was the Tree of Paradiſe; he confeſſed the Conſubſtantiality of the Trinity, and even affirmed that he revered the Body and Blood of Chriſt, and Chriſt himſelf crucified, nay even his Croſs, his Baptiſm, Burial and Reſurrection, and believed the Reſurrection of all the Dead, and a future Judgment. But theſe points he expreſſed in very artful and equivocal terms, and ſuch as he could wreſt to a ſhocking and abſurd ſenſe. He repreſented the Sun and Moon as Gods, and ſaid they were of the ſame nature with God; ſung hymns to them, and gave them all manner of worſhip and reverence. He ſaid, that the light of thoſe luminaries was not perceptible by the ſenſes, but only by the mind. He conſidered the Air likewiſe as a Deity, and ſung hymns to its honour; but the Fire and Earth he treated with contempt as baſe and inferior elements. He pretended to abſtain from eating fleſh and from marriage, on pretence that it was abominable to gratify our ſelves with them; and he refrained from wine, as he ſaid, to avoid drunkenneſs. He ſhewed the utmoſt contempt for the Old Teſtament, and for Moſes and the Prophets, and even St. John the Baptiſt, the forerunner of our Saviour. Nay he attributed all their words and actions to the evil principle which is perpetually oppoſite to God. He wreſted ſeveral paſſages in the Goſpels and St. Paul's Epiſtles in ſuch a manner, as might ſeem to ſupport his own ſcheme. He made uſe of the Acts of the Twelve Apoſtles, as they are called, and eſpecially thoſe of St. Andrew, which books were thought by the antients to have been forged by the Manichees. He favoured the opinion of the Tranſmigration of Souls; and maintained that ſome perſons, who gained the higheſt pitch of virtue, were reſolved into the Deity; others, who were ſunk the loweſt in wickedneſs, were conſigned over to darkneſs and fire; but the reſt, who had ſteered a middle courſe between virtue and vice, he aſſerted were recalled into their bodies. He cited Plato and other heathen writers, to whom he gave the ſame titles as to our Saviour, and called them Divine and Sacred. His ſtyle and manner of writing in ſome places were by no means contemptible, though in others very low and mean. He touched likewiſe upon ſeveral philoſophical principles, but then he ſhewed the utmoſt confuſion and ignorance. In ſhort, ſays Photius, he had a lively talent in depraving the truth, aud a ready expreſſion in repreſenting his objections, but he was extremely weak and ſtupid in inventing and raiſing his own ſchemes. And his work, adds the ſame author, was ſo abſurd and impious, that it could only ſhame and confound thoſe who followed him, and the Manichean doctrines.

T.

☞AGATHIAS, or as he calls himſelf in his Epigrams AGATHIUS, diſtinguiſhed by the title of Scholaſticus, was a Greek Hiſtorian, who lived in the ſixth Century under the Emperor Juſtinian. He tells us in the Preface to his Hiſtory, that he was born at Myrina, which was a Colony of the ancient Æolians in Leſſer Aſia, ſituated at the mouth of the river Pythicus. He diſtinguiſhes this city from another of the ſame name in Thrace. His father's name was Memnonius, and he himſelf was an advocate at Smyrna (a), as Suidas aſſures us; which gave occaſion to Chriſtopher Perſona to imagine that he was born at Smyrna, whereas he informs us himſelf that he was born at Myrina (b). He ſtudied the law in the ſchools appointed for that purpoſe, whence he received the name of Scholaſticus or the Advocate. He acknowledges, that in his youth he had a ſtrong inclination to Poetry, which induced him to write ſeveral ſmall Poems in Hexameter verſe, in a gay and amorous ſtyle, which he publiſhed under the title of Daphniaca. He tells us likewiſe, that he was the author of a collection of Epigrams, written by divers hands, a great part of which it is preſumed we have ſtill extant in the Greek Anthologia under his name. It is very doubtful of what religion he was [A]. He wrote an Hiſtory in five books of the reign of the Emperor Juſtinian, at the deſire of Eutychianus, Secretary of State, who was his intimate friend, and who very probably ſupplied him with a great many rare and important memoirs, for the perfecting that work. He did not begin this Hiſtory till after the death of Juſtinian, under the reign of Juſtin II. as he declares himſelf in his Preface. It begins with the twenty ſixth year of Juſtinian's reign, where Procopius ends. He commends this latter Hiſtorian extremely, though he ſometimes differs from him [B]. We

(a) Σχολαστικὸς Σμυρναῖος.

(b) See Voſſ. de Hiſt. Græc. l. 2. c. 22.

[A] It is very doubtful of what religion he was.] When he gives an account in the beginning of his Hiſtory of the French in his time, he commends them among other things for being all of them Chriſtians, and becauſe they had very juſt notions of God. But when he is giving a reaſon in his third book, why the fortreſs of Onogoris ſituated in Colchis, was called in his time St. Stephen's Fort, he tells us how this firſt Martyr of the Chriſtians was ſtoned in that place, making uſe of the word φασὶν, i. e. "as it is ſaid;" which is a ſtrong argument of his being a Pagan. It is the common opinion, and particularly that of Voſſius (1), from this paſſage and ſeveral others, that he was ſo; tho' neither he nor Procopius ever uſe any invectives againſt Chriſtianity, as moſt of the Heathen writers did in imitation of Zoſimus. This perhaps was owing to the times in which thoſe two Hiſtorians lived, which were not very favourable to the Pagan Religion, and conſequently the fear of danger might reſtrain them (2).

(1) Ubi ſupra.

(2) La Motbe le Vayer, tom. 3. p. 148. edit. Paris 1684.

[B] Tho' he ſometimes differs from him.] Many inſtances might be given of this, but we ſhall mention a very remarkable one, which regards the character of the French Nation at that time. Procopius had repreſented them as the moſt treacherous and faithleſs people in the world. But Agathias on the contrary having ſhewn, that the French were extremely polite and civil, and had made uſe of the Roman Laws in almoſt all caſes, adds, that they ought to be valued for nothing more, than for the exact juſtice, which they obſerved without exception, ſince their Kings themſelves were not exempted from the obligations of it, which was the cauſe, that this Nation lived in the utmoſt concord and harmony imaginable. Beſides juſtice is a virtue of univerſal extent, and as it contains all the other virtues in it, cannot ſubſiſt without fidelity; and therefore we may obſerve, that nothing is more oppoſite to it than failures in point of word and honour: For which reaſon Agathias could not have taken a better method to confute Procopius's imputation,

We ſhall mention ſome other circumſtances relating to his Hiſtory in the Note hereunder [C]. It was printed in Greek and Latin with Bonaventure Vulcanius's at Leyden in 1594 in 4°, and at Paris in the King's Printing-Houſe in 1660 in fol. This Hiſtorian is mentioned by Evagrius (c), who tells us, that he wrote an Hiſtory which began where Procopius ended, and was carried down to the flight of Choſroes the Younger to the Romans, and his reſtoration by Mauricius; but that this work was not then publiſhed.

(c) L. 6. c. 24.

putation, and vindicate the character of that Nation (3). However, tho' theſe two authors differ in this point, they agree in aſſerting the grandeur and independence of the Kings of France. Procopius acknowledges in the third book of the Gothic War, that of all the Kings in the world only they and the Roman Emperors had a right to have their images engraven upon their gold coin. So that even the King of Perſia, who claimed to himſelf ſuch a variety of pompous titles, durſt not attempt that privilege. Agathias likewiſe ſpeaking of King Theodebert, ſays, that he was ſo enraged to ſee the Emperor Juſtinian aſſume among other titles that of Francicus, as if he had conquered the French, and gained the right of ſuperiority over them; that upon this conſideration only he reſolved to go and ſubdue Thrace, lay ſiege to Conſtantinople, and overthrow the Roman Empire, of which that city was then the Capital. Agathias indeed calls this a raſh deſign, imagining that Theodebert would have periſhed in the expedition; but he owns, that this King had carried it to ſuch a length, that if he had not been prevented by death in hunting a wild bull, nothing could have retarded him; and it is impoſſible to ſay what might have been the event. La Mothe le Vayer adds the following reflection, when he mentions this fact; So many, ſays he, and ſo indiſputable are the proofs of the abſolute power of the French Monarchy, which never acknowledged any Superior but God; and as the honeſt old Gaul ſaid to Alexander the Great, that there is nothing but heaven above them (4). But to return to the different judgments, which Agathias has paſs'd from thoſe of Procopius, and wherein the former ſeems to have truth on his ſide, we ſhall give one inſtance from his fourth Book. He is highly diſſatisfied with Procopius not only for affirming, that Arcadius had entruſted the care and protection of his ſon Theodoſius and the Empire to Iſdigerdes King of Perſia, (which no author of credit had ever aſſerted before), but even for commending that action as very prudent, and adding, that tho' Arcadius was in other points a weak Prince, yet in this he behaved like a man of wiſdom and penetration. This, ſays Agathias, is judging of things by the event; as the vulgar generally do; but if we examine this action by ſtrict reaſon, we ſhall find that no Prince was ever guilty of a more exceptionable action than that of Arcadius. Was not this committing a lamb to the care of a wolf, to entruſt a ſon and the Empire in the hands of his greateſt enemy, out of a confidence, which tho' ſometimes excuſable among private men, can never be vindicated, when the queſtion is concerning the ſafety of a young Monarch, and the ſecurity of a crown, which was ſo much the more envied, as it wanted to be ſuperior to all others? In ſhort every thinking perſon will agree to Agathias's opinion, and conclude very juſtly with him, that tho' the event was very fortunate, yet there is more reaſon to admire the integrity of the King of Perſia, than the prudence of the Emperor (5).

(3) Id. ibid. p. 150, 151.

(4) Id. ibid. p. 152.

(5) Ibid. p. 153.

[C] Some other circumſtances relating to his Hiſtory in the note hereunder.] We have ſeveral letters and direct ſpeeches in it, as that of Narſes in the two firſt books, that of Aetes in the third, that of the Deputies of Colchos in the fourth, and that of Beliſarius in the fifth. He is not content to penetrate into the moſt ſecret tranſactions, in order to diſcover the principal cauſes of events, but he likewiſe paſſes his judgment very often; which is contrary to the manner of Xenophon and Cæſar, tho' agreeable to that of other eminent writers. His ſtyle is florid and eaſy; tho' Sigonius and Verderius are of a contrary opinion, and repreſent him as an exceeding low and unpoliſhed writer. But their judgment upon him is little regarded by the beſt Critics.

T.

AGATHO, a tragic and comic Poet [A], diſciple to Prodicus (a), and to Socrates (b). His beauty is greatly applauded in Plato's Dialogues (c), where it is alſo ſaid, that his inclinations were virtuous (d). According to ſome authors, he was a very worthy man, and kept a magnificent table (e); What might give occaſion to this laſt character was, very probably, the ſplendid entertainments he made after his firſt Tragedy had obtained the prize (f), and he had been crowned in preſence of upwards of thirty thouſand men (g), the fourth year of the ninetieth Olympiad (b). Plato ſuppoſes, that the Diſcourſes he relates on the nature of Love, in one of his books (i), were ſpoke the day after his coronation, at the ſecond feaſt Agatho gave. The compoſitions of this Poet abounded ſo much with antitheſes, that he ſaid one day to a man, who was for expunging them, You don't conſider that you tear Agatho from himſelf (k). He was the darling of Pauſanias the Ceramian, and followed him to the court of Archelaüs King of Macedon (l). He would often quarrel with him, but this was done merely, that he might taſte the exquiſite pleaſure which reconciliation gives; for ſo he declared to this Monarch, when he aſked the cauſe of their frequent jars, as Ælian informs us, chap. 21ſt, book 2d of his Varia Hiſtoria, or Various Hiſtory. I have elſewhere (m) related, what is written of the paſſion which Euripides had for Agatho.

(a) Vide inter Platonis Opera ejus Dialogum, cui titulus Protagoras, p. 220.

(b) Scholiaſtes Ariſtophanis in Ranas, Act. I. Scen. 2.

(c) Plato in Protagora, pag. 220, & in Convivio, p. 1175.

(d) Plato in Protagora, pag. 220.

(e) Ἀγαθὸς τὸν τρόπον καὶ τὴν τραπεζαν λαμπρὸς. Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. in Ranas, Act. I. Sc. 2. See alſo Suidas in Ἀγάθων.

(f) Plato in Convivio, init. pag. 1174.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 1176.

(b) See Athenæus lib. 5. p. 217. and Caſaubon on Athen. p. 379.

(i) In his Convivium.

(k) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 14. cap. 13. See alſo Athen. book 5. p. 187.

(l) Plato in Protagora, p. 220. Athen. lib. 5. p. 216. Maximus Tyrius, Sermon. x. p. 106. Ælian Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 21.

(m) In the remark [O] of the article EURIPIDES. See alſo the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes's Frogs, Act. I. Scen. 2.

[A] A tragic and comic Poet.] No one doubts his having writ Tragedies; it will be ſufficient therefore to prove that he wrote Comedies. The Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes, on Scene 2d, Act 1ſt of the Frogs, has theſe words: Οὗτος ὁ Ἀγάθων κωμῳδοποιὸς πῶ Σωκράτης διδασκάλω. i. e. "This Agatho the "comic writer, when Socrates taught." It is to be obſerv'd, that he hints at the ſame Poet, who is one of Plato's interlocutors at the feaſt; and who certainly wrote Tragedies. I ſhall alſo cite the following words of Philoſtratus; Καὶ Ἀγάθων ὁ τῆς τραγῳδίας ποιητὴς, ὃν ἡ κωμῳδία σοφὸν καὶ καλλικῆ οἶδε, πολλαχοῦ τῶν ἰαμβείων γοργιάζει (1). i. e. "Agatho "the tragic Writer, whom the comic Muſe knew to "be very wiſe and elegant, often imitates the ſtyle "of Gorgias in his Iambics." I am ſenſible that theſe words may ſignify, that he was applauded in Comedies; but they may alſo be underſtood in the following ſenſe, viz. that he ſhewed his skill and elegance in the Comedies he wrote. A learned critic conjectures, Socrates hinted at our Agatho, when he declares, that it is the buſineſs of one and the ſame perſon to write Tragedy and Comedy; and that whoever poſſeſſes the art of Tragedy, is a comic Poet alſo (2). Τῷ αὐτῷ ἀνδρὸς εἶναι κωμῳδίαν καὶ τραγῳδίαν ἐπίστασθαι ποιεῖν, καὶ τὸν τέχνῃ τραγῳδοποιὸν ἅμα καὶ κωμῳδοποιὸν εἶναι (3). I belive Voſſius (4), Moreri, Hofman &c. are miſtaken; when they tell us of one Agatho a comic Poet, different from the Agatho in queſtion.

(1) Philoſt. de Vitis Sophiſt. l. 1.

(2) Khunius in Ælian. Var. lib. 2. cap. 21. p. 104.

(3) Plato in Conviv. in fine, p. 1207.

(4) Voſſius de Poët. Græcis, p. 39, 50.

Agatho. The anſwer which the former made, is falſely related in the Hiſtorical Dictionaries [B]. The Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes ſeems to ſay, that Agatho died in the court of King Archelaus [C]; and one might ſuppoſe from the words of Ariſtophanes, that he was dead at the time when the Comedy of the Frogs was repreſented [D]; that is, the third year of the ninety third Olympiad (n). There is nothing now extant of Agatho, except a few quotations which we find in Ariſtotle, in Athenæus, &c. Theſe are beautiful ſentences enough, and confirm what has been related, concerning his great fondneſs for antitheſes [E]. I ſhall give one inſtance of this, which forms a very judicious maxim with reſpect to the deceitfulneſs of appearances [F]. Ariſtophanes (n) See Samuel. Petiti, Miſcellan l. 1. c. 14. p. 50.

[B] The anſwer which the former (Euripides) made, is falſely related in the Hiſtorical Dictionaries.] I have given it elſewhere (5) as it ought to be: and ſhall here preſent the reader with the erroneous account we have of it. Agatho Philoſophus Pythagoricus, frequens Antithetis, adhibitus quondam convivio ab Archelao Rege, cujus erat familiariſſimus, interrogatuſque ab eo, cum jam eſſet annorum 80, ſi robur adhuc ullum ſervaret? "Sane, inquit, non ſolùm Ver, ſed "Autumnus ſolet bona & proſperitatem adferre (6)." i. e. "Agatho the Pythagorean, who was fond of "antitheſes, being at an entertainment with King "Archelaus, who treated him with the utmoſt fa-"miliarity, and being ask'd by that Monarch, whe-"ther he had any vigour remaining now he was "fourſcore years old; he replied; "Surely Autumn "has its proſperity and its bleſſings as well as the "Spring." Let us enumerate the errors in this account. I. The Agatho who loved antitheſes, and was at King Archelaus's Court, was not a Pythagorean. II. He was about forty years of age, when Archelaus gave occaſion to the anſwer abovementioned (7). III. Euripides, and not Agatho made this anſwer. IV. The queſtion was about beauty, not ſtrength; and the anſwer did not any ways relate to the goods of fortune. V. It would be ridiculous to call the age of fourſcore, the Autumn of life. VI. I believe there is not any Pythagorean Philoſopher, whoſe name is Agatho. Theſe ſeveral errors of Charles Stephens, are found in the ſecond edition of Lloyd; and the pretended teſtimony of Ælian (8), is ſtill more minutely expreſſed there. This minuteneſs is prejudicial to the author; for, ſince he knew the chapter where this incident was to be found, he is more inexcuſable for having copied the ſeveral falſhoods of the Dictionary he was correcting. Hofman has copied him to a tittle; and has made this Agatho, and he who went to King Archelaus's court, different perſons. Moreri mentions likewiſe one Agatho a Pythagorean Philoſopher, who, being eighty years old, made the following anſwer to this Monarch; Autumn gives fruits and flowers as well as Spring; and afterwards ſpeaks of Agatho the tragic Poet, and Agatho the comic Writer.

(5) In the remark [O] of the article EURIPIDES.

(6) Charles Stephens under the the word AGATHO, p. 117.

(7) See the Rem. [O] in the article EURIPIDES.

(8) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 4. Lloyd under the word AGATHO.

[C] That Agatho died in the court of King Archelaus.] Ἀρχελάῳ τῷ Βασιλεῖ μέχρι τελευτῆς μετὰ ἄλλων πολλῶν συνῆν ἐν Μακεδονίᾳ (9). That is, "He conti-"nued, with ſeveral others, in Macedonia, at the "court of King Archelaus, till his death." As this may ſignify; either, till the death of Archelaus, or, till the death of Agatho, I therefore don't give theſe words as a certain proof.

(9) Scholiaſt. Ariſtophan. in Ranas. Act. I. Scen. 2.

[D] That he was dead, at the time when the Comedy of the Frogs was repreſented.] We have theſe three verſes in it.

ΗΡ. Ἀγάθων ὃ πᾶ' ϛιν; ΔΙ. ἀπολιπὼν μ' ἀποίχεται,
Ἀγαθὸς ποιητὴς, ϕ πεθεινὸς τοῖς ϕίλοις.
ΗΡ. Ποῖ γῆς ὁ τλήμων; ΔΙ. ἐς μακάρων ἑυνὰς (10).

Engliſh'd,

"Where's Agatho? He's left me, and is gone,
"(Ingenious Bard, the darling of his friends)
"Whither is the unhappy creature fled?
"To the immortal banquets.

(10) Ariſtoph. in Ranas, Act. I. Scen. 2. verſ. 83.

[E] And confirm what has been related, concerning his great fondneſs for antitheſes.] Khunius has given us three ſentences or ſayings of Agatho, by way of ſpecimen of this way of writing (11). The two firſt are cited by Ariſtotle, the laſt by Athenæus; and the ſenſe of the latter is as follows: In caſe I tell you the truth, I ſhan't pleaſe you; and if I pleaſe you, I ſhan't tell you the truth (12). Thoſe cited by Ariſtotle, ſignify the one; that the only thing impoſſible to God, is, to cauſe that not to be made, that has been made (13); and the other, that fortune loves art, and art loves fortune (14). Voſſius imagines that we owe this ſaying to Agatho the comic Writer (15), but he ſhould rather have aſcribed it to the tragic Poet, becauſe of the antitheſis that is remarkable in it: however, when I obſerve this, I don't pretend to ſay that Agatho the comic, and Agatho the tragic Poet were two different perſons. Moreri, as is uſual with him, has copied Voſſius. I am ſurprized that Khunius did not quote the following paſſage:

(11) Guſtum antithetorum Agathonis dare poſſumus. Khunius in Ælian. lib 14. cap. 13. p. 735.

(12) Athen. lib. 5. cap. 13. pag. 211.

(13) Ariſtot. Eth. Eudemior. lib. 5. cap 2. p. 182.

(14) Id. ibid. cap. 4. p. 183.

(15) Voſſius de Poëtis Græcis. p. 59.

Τὸ μὲν πάρεργον ἔργον ὡς ποιούμεθα,
Τὸ δ' ἔργον ὢν πάρεργον ἐκπονούμεθα (16).

Engliſh'd,

"We labour at an acceſſory as though it were a "principal, and we conſider a principal as though it "were but the accident."

(16) Agath. apud Athen. lib. 5. init.

[F] Which forms a very judicious maxim, with regard to the deceitfulneſs of appearances.] Agatho obſerves, that it is probable a great many improbable things will come to paſs. Εἰκὸς γίνεσθαι πολλὰ ϕ παρὰ τὸ εἰκός. Thus Voſſius quotes this ſentence, and obſerves that Ariſtotle has cited it in more places than one (17). This celebrated Philoſopher cites it as follows, in chap. 24. Book 2d of his Rhetoric.

(17) Voſſius, Inſtit. Poëtic. lib. 1. p. 16.

Τάχ' ἄν τις εἰκὸς αὐτὸ τοῦτ' εἶναι λέγοι,
Βροτοῖσι πολλὰ τυγχάνειν ἐκ εἰκότα (18).

Engliſh'd,

"Perhaps ſome one may ſay, 'tis probable, various "unlikely things may happen to mortals.

(18) Agath. ap. Ariſt. Rhetoric. lib. 2. cap. 24. p. 448.

To this maxim we may compare that of St. Bernard, Ordinatiſſimum eſt, minus interdum ordinatè fieri (19). That is, "It is agreeable to order, that ſometimes "things ſhould be done without order." Balzac has ſo diſguiſed this thought of Agatho, that he makes that an abominable falſhood, which was a beautiful maxim in the laſt mentioned author. Altho' human affairs, ſays he (20), ſometimes change their courſe, and go into a channel different from what they were wont to do; and that this only is probable, as Agatho uſed to ſay, viz. that many things happen contrary to probability; nevertheleſs, generally ſpeaking, like undertakings produce like events. The adverb only makes a moſt hideous ſenſe in that place; and if this were a typographical error (21), I ſhould wonder, that a corrector of the preſs was not ſtartled at it. For what can be more unaccountable, than to aſſert that it is never probable, a thing ſhould happen agreeable to probability? Such is the maxim in Balzac's Prince, which our Agatho is falſely ſaid to have laid down; however, the ſequel of the diſcourſe ſhews, that altho' the Poet's thought was vitiated in the printed copy, the author however had a true idea of it: and it is certain, that Balzac underſtood, as Agatho did, That it is EVEN probable, that many things improbable may come to paſs. This aphoriſm appeared ſo beautiful to Euripides, that he has repeated it five times; for, ſays Coſtar (22), he has concluded his Medea, his Alceſte, his Andromache, his Bacchanals, and his Helen with it. * "The Gods ſport with human "foreſight, and deceive equally our hopes and our "fears. They ſometimes divert events, which all men "expected would come to paſs; and by opening "paths which till then were unknown, give ſucceſs "to deſigns which in outward appearance were im-"poſſible." Seneca had made a very good uſe of this thought, to encourage thoſe who are terrified at the apparent, and very probable approaches of ill

(19) Bernardi Epiſt. 276. ad Engen. 3.

(20) Balzac in his Prince. n. 142. p. 100. edition de Rouen in 1632, 4°.

(21) Seulement inſtead of Surement. Note, that there are ſome Gaſconiſms in which Seulement (only) ſignifies meme (even). See Remarques de Vaugelus, tom. 2. p. 180.

(22) Coſtar, Suite de defence de Voiture, pag. 406.

* Πολλὰ δ' ἐλπτως κραίνουσι θεοί· καὶ τὰ δοκοῦντ' οὐκ ἐντελῆ θῆ τῶν δ' ἀδοκήτων πόρον εὗρεν θεός.

phanes cenſures him very ſeverely for his morals, in one of his Comedies (o). I believe he is not the Agatho, whom Plato the Philoſopher loved ſo tenderly [G]. It was undoubtedly a voluntary error in Budæus, when he tells us, chap. 25 of the Education of fortune. How many things, ſays he, have happened, which no one expected; how many others have never come to paſs, tho' expected univerſally? Nothing is ſo ſure and certain among the ſeveral things we fear, but it is yet more certain, that our hopes and fears are ſometimes diſappointed. But Seneca's words are ſtronger, and therefore I ſhall quote them. Veriſimile eſt aliquid futurum mali? Non ſtatim verum eſt. Quàm multa non expectata venerunt, quàm multa expectata nunquam comparuerunt? Multa interveniunt quibus vicinum periculum vel prope admotum, aut ſubſiſtat; aut deſinat, aut in alienum caput tranſeat, habet etiam mala fortuna levitatem: fortaſſe erit, fortaſſe non erit. Interim dum non eſt meliora propone, nihil tam certum eſt ex his quæ timentur, ut non certius ſit & formidata ſubſidere, & ſperata decipere (23). "Is there a probability of ſome evil "befalling you? It is not therefore immediately cer- "tain. How many unexpected things have happen- "ed? How many things that were expected have "never come to paſs? Many things intervene, by "which an approaching danger either ſtops ſhort, "or ends, or falls upon another perſon's head. "Even ill fortune has its fickleneſs: perhaps it may "come to paſs, perhaps not. In the mean time "whilſt it does not exiſt, hope that better things "will happen. Nothing is ſo certain of thoſe things "we fear, but it is more certain that thoſe things "we fear ſometimes vaniſh, and that we are de- "ceived in what we hope for." Cardinal Pallavicini has written with great rancour againſt Father Paul, for conſidering the reception of Zuinglius's doctrine by the Evangelical Cantons, as a proof, that a cauſe ſuperior to Zuinglius, had influenced on that occaſion. I ſhall wave Pallavicini's reflections, but tranſcribe what he borrows from Ariſtotle, viz. that it ſometimes happens that the moſt probable things are falſe; for if they were always ſeparated from falſhood, they conſequently would be certain, and not probable. The reader will find this maxim employed, to accuſe thoſe of raſhneſs and preſumption, who pretend to form a judgment of God's providence. Such an one is a Chriſtian and devout, he therefore is predeſtinated to ſalvation; ſuch an one is a Mahometan and a wicked wretch, he therefore is predeſtinated to damnation: both which are raſh conſequences, ſince they ſometimes deceive. This is Cardinal Pallavicini's remark, which at length is as follows: Por tanto chi aſcrire le proſperità della meglior cauſa ad una voluntà che Dio habbia di farla ſtabilmente prevalere alla rea; diſcorre con pietà probabile & ſaggia: quantunque talora s'inganni, ſecondo l'inſegnamento del Filoſofo: Che talvolta il più probabile è falſo; precioche ſe da falſità foſſe eſſente, non ſuria probabil, mà certo. E ſe baſta il poterſi ingannare accioche ogni giudicio, quantumque dubitativo della Providentia divina chiamiſi preſontuoſo; chiameraſſi preſontuoſo chiunque dall' haverlo Dio fatto naſcere frà Chriſtiani e viver divota mente, prende conghiettura che l'habbia deſtinato alla vita eterna; e'l contrario s'auviſa di chi nacque Saraceno e vive ſcelerato; eſſendo manifeſto poter ſuccedere che il primo ſi danni, e'l ſecondo ſi ſalvi (24). That is, "Neverthelefs "the perſon who aſcribes the prevalency of a better "cauſe to the will of God who makes it ſolidly "prevail over the bad one, argues with a piety "that is probable and wiſe; nevertheleſs he may "ſometimes be deceived, according to the doctrine "of the Philoſopher, viz. that ſometimes the moſt "probable is falſe, becauſe that were it exempt from "falſhood, it would not then be probable but cer- "tain. Now if the bare poſſibility of being miſ- "taken renders all judgment (however doubtful) con- "cerning Divine Providence, preſumptuous; we "muſt call it a preſumption in any one, who, be- "cauſe God cauſed a perſon to be brought forth a- "mong the Chriſtians, and he lives devoutly, con- "jectures from thence that the Almighty has predeſ- "tinated him to eternal life; and judges the con- "trary of one who is born a Mahometan and lives "wickedly, it being manifeſtly poſſible, that the "former may be damned, and the latter ſaved." Not only Phyſicians but News-mongers ought to make advantage of Agatho's maxim. A Profeſſor at Leipſic exhorts Phyſicians, in caſe they would do honour to their profeſſion, to be very cautious of their words. He adviſes them not to promiſe too much, nor frighten their patients too much, but to ſpeak always conditionally, and with a perhaps (25). All which is grounded on the abovecited maxim of Seneca. The ſame advice may be given to our Coffee-Houſe Politicians; ſuch arguers I mean, as are informed with a very ſagacious and very judicious turn of mind. Theſe ſhall happen to gueſs right on a thouſand occaſions, and ſhall, on a hundred occaſions, have no room to be ſorry for the deciſive tone of voice with which they ridiculed the hopes or threats of the Gazeteers. This emboldens them to reject, with a magiſterial air, all ſuch articles of news as are improbable, but they ſometimes are ſtruck with confuſion; for, on ſome occaſions, the event confirms the moſt impertinent and moſt extravagant pieces of news that could be publiſhed; and which they had laughed at as ſo many chimeras, or as ſo many ſteps, inconſiſtent with the wiſdom which till then was ſo conſpicuous in the counſels of a Government. This maxim contradicts itſelf, and catches ſuch Politicians as lay too great a ſtreſs upon it. It is therefore a mark of prudence in a perſon to go gently to work, and not to pronounce deciſively, upon pretence that the moſt plauſible appearances are in his favour. But then if it is not proper, even in this caſe, to act the part of a Dictator, how ſeverely do thoſe deſerve to be cenſured, who, when all the appearances are againſt them, do yet preſume to promiſe the greateſt ſucceſs, and publiſh thoſe promiſes, as though they were grounded on the Revelations?

(o) In Theſmophoriazuſis.

(23) Senec. Epiſt. 24. p. 187.

(24) Pallavicini Iſtor. del Concilio. lib. 3. cap. 8. p. 303.

(25) Biblioth. Univerſelle, tom. 14. p. 80, 81. In the Extract of Miſcellanea Curioſa Medica of Chriſtianus Langius.

[G] The Agatho whom Plato the Philoſopher loved ſo tenderly.] This Philoſopher compoſed a diſtich, which was ſo paſſionate and tender, that a Roman Poet found matter enough in it, to ſpin it out to ſeventeen verſes. The reader will give me leave to tranſcribe a whole chapter from Aulus Gellius (26). Celebrantur duo iſti Græci verſiculi, multorumque doctorum hominum memoriâ dignantur, quod ſint lepidiſſimæ & venuſtiſſimæ brevitatis. Neque adeo pauci ſunt veteres ſcriptores, qui eos Platonis eſſe Philoſophi affirmant, quibus ille adoleſcens luſerit, quum tragœdiis quoque eodem tempore faciendis præluderet.

(26) Lib. 19. cap. 11.

Τὴν ψυχὴν, Ἀγαθώνα φιλῶν, ἐπὶ χείλεσιν ἔσχον,
Ἧλθε γὰρ ἡ τλήμων ὡς διαβησομένη (27).

(27) Note that Diogenes Laertius lib. 3. num. 32, quoting theſe two Greek verſes, ſaid that Plato wrote them on Agatho. They are mentioned as follows in the Greek and Latin edition of Diogenes Laertius: Suavia dans Agathoni, animam ipſe in labra tenebam: Ægra etenim properans tanquam abitura fuit.

Hoc diſtichon amicus meus οὐκ ἄμουσος adoleſcens in pluris verſiculos licentiùs liberiùſque vertit: qui quoniam mihi quidem viſi ſunt non eſſe memoratu indigni, ſubdidi,

Dum ſemihulco ſavio
Meum puellum ſavior;
Dulcemque florem ſpiritus
Duco ex aperto tramite:
Animula ægra & ſaucia
Cucurrit ad labias mihi,
Rictumque in oris pervium
Et labra pueri mollia,
Rimata itineri tranſitus,
Ut tranſiliret nititur.
Tum ſi moræ quid pluſculæ
Fuiſſet in cœtu oſculi:
Amoris igni percita
Tranſiſſet, & me linqueret:
Et mira prorſum res foret,
Ut ad me fierem mortuus,
Ad puerum at intus viverem.

That is,

"That Greek diſtich is very much celebrated, and "many learned men honour it ſo far as to get it by "heart, as being vaſtly graceful, and beautifully con- "ciſe. Nor are there a few writers who affirm it to "be writ by Plato the Philoſopher, made by him by "way of a Prince, that Euripides, being at Archelaus's table, kiſſed a Lady who was called the Fair Agatha.

" way of amuſement in his youth, at a time when he " was preparing to write a Tragedy.

" My ſoul in kiſſing Agatho,
" Flew to my lips, its ruby neſt,
" Where the ſoft flutterer, full of woe,
" Seem'd reſolute to leave my breaſt.

" This diſtich a young friend of mine, no enemy to " the Muſes, has tranſlated with latitude; and thinking " them not unworthy of being tranſmitted to poſterity, " I ſhall therefore preſent them to the reader.

Imitated,

" Whilſt I, with lips half open kiſs
" The lovely youth, my all of bliſs,
" And draw his breath, like violets ſweet,
" Which, in high rapture, mine does meet,
" My ſick'ning ſoul would thro' my lips,
" Fain wing its way; ah now it skips!
" With tranſport fain would fly from me
" Sweetly to lodge with charming thee.
" Then, if whilſt kiſs is mix'd with kiſs,
" We ſhou'd prolong the mutual bliſs
" Struck with the thrilling dart of love,
" My ſoul wou'd haſte to thee, my dove
" Ah then! how wond'rous 'twould be found
" (The like not ſeen in earth's wide round)
" That I ſhou'd my own ſelf deſtroy,
" And animate my darling boy!

It is to be obſerved that Plato was but fourteen, when our Agatho the Poet won the prize for Tragedy (28); it is therefore not probable that he had a paſſion for this Agatho, but for one much younger.

(28) Athen. lib. 5. cap. 18. p. 217.

AGESILAUS I. King of Sparta, ſucceeded his father Doryſſus, who was the fifth King after Euriſthenes. The reign of this Ageſilaus was very long [A], and yet it hardly furniſhes an author with any thing. The Hiſtories of theſe times that are ſo remote (a) have not been preſerved. Pauſanias ſhould not have ſaid that Lycurgus gave laws to Lacedæmon [B] under this reign (b). Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman, confound this Ageſilaüs with Ageſilaüs II; for they ſay of this laſt, that he was the ſixth King of Lacedæmon.

(a) The reign of Ageſilaus begins in the year of the world 2992, according to Helvicus, 24 years after the death of Solomon.

(b) Pauſan. lib. 3. p. 82.

[A] His reign was very long.] In ſaying this, I pay more deference to Euſebius's authority than to that of Pauſanias. This laſt affirms that Doryſſus, and his ſon Ageſilaus, did but juſt appear upon the throne: Δι' ὀλίγου σφῶν τὸ ἀρχεῖον ἐπέλαβεν ἀμφοτέρους (1). That is, "They both died in a very little time;" but Euſebius makes them reign 73 years: he makes the father reign 29 years, and the ſon 44. Calviſius quotes Pauſanias for this duration: truly he makes a good choice of his vouchers.

(1) Pauſan lib. 3. p. 82.

[B] Lycurgus gave laws to Lacedæmon.] Meurſius proves in his Antiquities of Lacedæmon, that Lycurgus publiſh'd his laws in the thirtieth year of Archelaüs, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Ageſilaüs.

AGESILAUS II. King of the Lacedæmonians, was the ſon of Archidamus. He ſeems to have been ſo ambitious as to deſire to reign by the excluſion of Agis his elder brother, but however it was not perceived till after the death of Agis, that he had a mind to have the order of ſucceſſion altered for his ſake. This deſire had all the ſucceſs he could expect; for they were ſo unjuſt to Leotychides [A], the ſon of Agis, as to exclude him from the throne in favour of Ageſilaüs (a). He made amends for the irregularity of this firſt ſtep, by a great number of noble actions; and though he was little, ill-favoured and lame [B], he juſtly acquired the character of a great Warrior. He was brave,

(a) This happened, according to Calviſius, in the 3d year of the 95th Olympiad.

[A] They were ſo unjuſt to Leotychides &c.] The manner in which he was treated cannot be called any better, if we examine the reaſons throughly. Ageſilaüs did not deny, that the crown belonged to his brother's ſon according to the laws of the country; but he maintained that Leotychides was not the ſon of Agis: to prove which he made uſe of theſe two methods. He ſaid in the firſt place, that Timea, the mother of Leotychides, was ſo fond of Alcibiades, who had fled to Lacedæmon, that her husband ſuſpected the child, which ſhe had ſome time afterwards, had no other father than this Gallant. This affected Leotychides. It was he, that Timea brought into the world about that time; and it was he, that Agis never acknowledged for his ſon till he lay on his death-bed. Ageſilaüs alledged, in the ſecond place, the teſtimony of Neptune. He ſaid that Agis had been driven from his wife's bed by an earthquake, and that Timea was brought to bed of Leotychides above ten months afterwards (1). Theſe two reaſons were of no force: the maxim, Pater eſt quem nuptiæ demonſtrant, deſtroys them entirely. If every time a husband takes offence at ſeeing his wife pleaſed with the viſits and converſation of a ſtranger, the children that were born about that time were to be deprived of his ſucceſſion, what ſhould we do? Therefore, tho' what a Hiſtorian has ſaid be true, that Timea made no ſcruple of whiſpering amongſt her women that the Child's name ſhould be Alcibiades rather than Leotychides (2), it will procure no determination in law in favour of Ageſilaüs. Timea herſelf ſhould have been asked what ſhe meant by this language (3); whether ſhe ſpoke in earneſt, or in a bravado, or by way of jeſt. Much leſs could the indiſcretion of Alcibiades be alledged, if it had been true that he boaſted of having lain with Timea, not out of gallantry, but out of ambition to give Kings to Lacedæmon (4). A hundred ſuch reaſons as theſe are not ſufficient to balance that one action of Agis, who on his death bed, in the preſence of good witneſſes, acknowledged Leotychides for his ſon. Ageſilaüs's ſecond reaſon was a fooliſh one, for let Neptune be ever ſo much fancied to be the cauſe of earthquakes, how could it be proved that Agis was afraid to lie with Timea after the earthquake in queſtion? A lying in above ten months (5) after the laſt embraces of a husband, is no proof in law; the maxim Pater eſt quem nuptiæ demonſtrant, and even the determinations of the Phyſicians, diſſipate all theſe umbrages. Thus we may ſay the Lacedæmonians, a people that valued themſelves on a very ſevere morality, took away a crown, for reaſons that would be inſufficient in a well regulated Court of Juſtice, to exclude one from the ſucceſſion to an acre of land. But the misfortune of Leotychides was that Lyſander, the moſt intriguing, the moſt tricking, and the moſt factious of all men, having a credit in the city in proportion to his ability, and the victories that he had gained over his enemies, was determined to crown Ageſilaus (6). There is no fundamental law, that can hold againſt ſuch people: if you alledge the divine law, they explain it after their own manner. This is what Lyſander did, when he underſtood that a Prophet of Lacedæmon had a deſign to inforce an Oracle in favour of Leotychides, which forbid the Lacedæmonians to ſuffer a lame perſon to reign. That, ſays Lyſander, does not regard the defects of the foot; but thoſe of the blood; and this would be the caſe of Leotychides, who would make your kingdom halt; not being of the race of your Kings.

(1) Ex Plut. in Ageſilao, pag. 597. and Xenoph. de Reb. Græc. lib. 3. p. 214.

(2) Duris, apud Plutarch. in Ageſilao, p. 597.

(3) According to the maxims of law, the teſtimony of a perſon againſt her ſelf is not received.

(4) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 214.

(5) Note, that the Antients reckoned 10 months for a woman's time, Matri longa decem tulerunt faſtidia menſes. That is,
" Thy mother
" well deſerves
" that ſhort de-
" light,
" The nauſeous
" qualms of ten
" long months
" and travel to
" requite.
Dryden.
See Virgil. Ecl. 4, and 61. and La Cerda upon this place.

(6) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 597. and Xenophon de Rebus Græcis, lib. 3. pag. 214.

[B] He was little, ill-favoured and lame.] He was always the firſt to jeſt upon his own lame leg (7); which brave, vigilant and active. He never let ſlip any advantage, but improved every opportunity; he underſtood all the ſtratagems of war, and uſed to act in ſuch a manner, that he deceived his enemies, even when he told them his real intentions [C]. He did not deſire they ſhould be ignorant of the profeſſion of arms, for then he would not know ſo well how to draw them into the ſnare (b). He knew alſo how to deceive his own ſoldiers, by impoſing on them a pretended account of a triumph, when he had received ill news (c). This deſerves to be obſerved, in order to convince thoſe who think it is ſince the invention of News-papers that the public began to be impoſed upon. As ſoon as Ageſilaüs was on the throne, he adviſed the Lacedæmonians to prevent the King of Perſia, who was making great preparations for war, and to go and attack him in his own dominions (d). He was choſen for this expedition, and gained ſo many advantages over the enemy, that if the league which the Athenians and the Thebans had formed againſt Lacedæmon, had not traverſed his enterpriſes, he would have carried his victorious arms to the very heart of the Perſian Monarchy. He gave up all theſe triumphs readily, to come to the ſuccour of his country, which he happily relieved by the battle he gained over the Allies in Bœotia [D]. He won another near Corinth (e); but afterwards he had the mortification to ſee the Thebans obtain ſignal victories over the Lacedæmonians. Theſe misfortunes expoſed him to the murmurs of a great many people; but after all they did not tarniſh his glory. He had been ſick during the firſt advantages that the enemy obtained (f); and as ſoon as he was capable of acting, he put a ſtop to the victories of the Thebans, by his valour and prudence; inſomuch that it was believed, that if he had been in health at the beginning, the Lacedæmonians had met with no loſſes, and that without him all would have been loſt in the concluſion (g). It cannot be denied but that he loved war more than the intereſt of his country required (h), for if he could have lived in peace he had ſaved his country a great many loſſes, and had not engaged it in enterpriſes

(7) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 596. E.

(b) Plut. in Ageſilao, pag. 617. E.

(c) Id. p. 605. Xenophon de Rebus Græc. lib. 4. pag. 224.

(d) Cornel. Nepos, in Ageſil. Vita, cap. 2.

(g) Talem ſe imperatorem præbuit, ut eo tempore omnibus apparuerit, niſi ille fuiſſet, Spartam futuram non fuiſſe. Corn. Nep. in Ageſil. Vita. cap. 6. That is, "He ſhewed "himſelf ſuch a "General, that "it then appeared to all, "that if it had "not been for "him Sparta "would have "been no more.

(e) Ex Cornelio Nepote, ibid.

(f) Plutarch in Ageſilao, pag. 611, B.

(h) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 616. B.

which is the uſual way of other men of wit in like circumſtances. By that means, the ridicule they eſcape. Materia petulantibus, & per contumeliam urbanis detrahitur, ſi ultro illam & prior occupes. Nemo aliis riſum præbuit, qui ex ſe cepit. Vatinium hominem natum & ad riſum, & ad odium, ſcurram fuiſſe venuſtam ac dicacem, memoriæ proditum eſt. In pedes ſuos ipſe plurima dicebat, & in fauces conciſas: ſic inimicorum, quos plus habebat quam morbos, & in primis Ciceronis urbanitatem effugit (8). That is, "You deprive both the ill natured and the facetious of their jeſt, if you begin firſt your ſelf. "Nobody ever gave room to another to laugh at "him, who began of his own accord. Vatinius is "ſaid to have been a man born both for laughter "and hatred, but at the ſame time he was a pleaſant fellow and ready at a joke. He had always a "great deal to ſay upon his own feet and ugly face: "by which means he avoided the banter of his "enemies, who were more numerous than his diſeaſes, and Cicero in particular." The gaiety of Ageſilaüs, and the ſtrength with which he bore the roughneſt exerciſes, made amends for all his corporal defects (9); for otherwiſe his contemptible outſide would have been a great injury to him. Λέγεται δὲ μικρός τε γενέσθαι καὶ τὴν ὄψιν ἀνεπαφρόδιτος. That is, "He is ſaid to have been little, and of a very deſpicable aſpect." The Ephori had laid a fine upon King Archidamus his father, becauſe he had married a little woman (11); whence they concluded he would give them a diminutive race of Kings. Cornelius Nepos ſpeaks more expreſly of the deformity of Ageſilaüs, than Plutarch. Atque hic tantus vir, ſays he (12), ut naturam fautricem habuerat in tribuendis animi virtutibus, ſic maleficam nactus eſt in corpore, exiguus & claudus altero pede, quæ res etiam nonnullam afferebat deformitatem, atque ignoti faciem ejus cum intuerentur, contemnebant. "And as nature "was favourable to this great man, in giving "him the virtues of the mind, ſo was ſhe unkind in "forming his body. For he was little, and lame in "one of his feet; which added to his deformity. "And ſtrangers uſed to deſpiſe him at firſt ſight." Never was the minuit præſentia famam, i. e. "preſence diminiſhes fame," more true than with regard to him. His fame went before him into Egypt, and repreſented him there in the greateſt pomp imaginable. As ſoon as it was known that he was landed, they ran in crowds to ſee him: it is eaſy to imagine the ſurprize they were in, when they ſaw an ill-dreſſed, ſlovenly little bit of a man lying upon the graſs. They could not forbear laughing, and applying to him the fable of the mountain that brought forth a mouſe (13). Their contempt of him did not decreaſe, when they ſaw what he choſe out of the refreſhments the King ſent him (14). See below the note [G].

(8) Seneca de Conſtantia ſapientis, cap. 17, p. 892.

(9) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 596.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Corn. Nep. in Ageſil. Vita, cap. 8.

(13) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 616. See the article of TACHUS.

(14) Cornel. Nepos in Vitâ Ageſilai, cap. 8.

[C] He deceived his enemies, even when he told them his real intentions.] Becauſe they did not believe that ſo artful a General would let his deſign be known. Vidit ſi quo eſſet iter facturus palam pronunciaſſet, hoſtes non credituros aliaſque regiones occupaturos, nec dubitaturos aliud eſſe facturum ac pronunciaſſet. Itaque cum ille Sardis ſe iturum dixiſſet, Tiſſaphernes eamdem Cariam defendendam putavit (15). That is, "He ſaw if he told openly which way he "was going to march, the enemies would not "believe it, and would defend other countries "with guards, not doubting but that he would do o"therwiſe than he declared. And ſo when he had "ſaid that he would march to Sardes, Tiſſaphernes "thought at the ſame time that Caria was to be de"fended." One cannot make a juſt application here of this thought of Mr. de Wicquefort. George Downing the Engliſh Ambaſſador, had neither probity nor prudence enough, to be perſuaded that no Miniſter deceives more ſurely nor more agreeably, than he who never deceives at all; becauſe in beating the common road, thoſe who ſeek for turnings and mazes, never meet with him in their way (16). The compariſon between ſuch a Miniſter and our Ageſilaüs would be very lame; for this Lacedæmonian King, by publiſhing what he intended to do, deceived his enemies, only becauſe on other occaſions he had concealed his deſigns. A General, who has eſtabliſhed himſelf on that foot, cannot make uſe of a ſurer ſtratagem, than to ſpread a true report of his marches. That artifice is very good, becauſe it is a new turn, which the enemies are not yet aware of. See this paſſage in Xenophon: it is Cambyſes, that ſpeaks to his ſon Cyrus and compares the new ſtratagems of war with the new airs of Muſic. Καὶ σφόδρα μὲν καὶ ἐν τοῖς μουσικοῖς τὰ νέα καὶ ἀνθηρὰ ἐνδοκιμεῖ, πολὺ δὲ καὶ ἐν τοῖς πολεμικοῖς μᾶλλον τὰ καινὰ μηχανήματα ἐνδοκιμεῖ. ταῦτα γὰρ μᾶλλον καὶ ἐξαπατᾷν δύναιτ' ἂν τοὺς πολεμίους (17). i. e. "As in Muſic, what is new and florid is "moſt eſteemed, ſo in war alſo are new inventions. "For theſe are moſt capable of deceiving the ene"my." We ſhall ſay in another place (18), that there are ſome people, who by mere dint of ſimplicity eſcape being deceived.

(15) Id. ibid. cap. 3. Vide etiam Plut. in Ageſ. p. 600. F.

(16) Wicquef. Memoires des Ambaſſad. pag. 170.

(17) Xenophon, Cyropæd. lib. 1. circa fin. p. 21.

(18) In the Note [L] of the article SIMONIDES.

[D] The battle he gained over the Allies in Bœotia.] It was fought at Coronea. Xenophon, who ſerved there under King Ageſilaüs teſtifies it (19), and Plutarch alſo (20). Lambinus, in his Commentary on theſe words of Cornelius Nepos, apud Coroneam, quos omnes gravi prælio vicit, had a mind without neceſſity to correct the word Χαιρωνείαν in priſes that did not end till the power of the Lacedæmonians was extremely diminiſhed. This inſatiable thirſt after wars and battles drove him in his old age to a ſtep that was generally diſapproved (i). He was above fourſcore years old, when he undertook to lead ſome troops into Egypt, to ſupport Tachus, who had riſen againſt the Perſians. Not being quite pleaſed with this Tachus, he abandoned him, to join with the party of Nectanabus, a relation of Tachus. He performed great ſervices for this Nectanabus, after which he had a mind to return to Sparta, but he died of ſickneſs on the road, in the third year of the hundred and fourth Olympiad [E]. He was eighty four years of age, whereof he had reigned forty one (k). Moreri has committed ſome miſtakes in this place [F]. We ſhall ſee in the article of CONON, whether Cornelius Nepos and Juſtin have been faithful in the Hiſtory of Ageſilaüs. This Prince would never ſuffer any picture or ſculpture to be made for him (l), and prohibited it alſo by his will. Some have thought that he did it becauſe he was no ſtranger to his own deformity, diffidens formæ ſuæ (m). Never did any one live in a greater ſimplicity than he [G]. But he knew very well how to lodge the ſpirit, the heart and the religion of a Prince [H], under this outward ſtrictneſs, and under this philoſophical frugality. He had

(19) Xenophon, de Reb. Græc. lib. 4. p. 225.

(20) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 605.

(i) Id. ibid. C.

(k) Plut. in Ageſil. p. 617, 618. Cornel. Nepos in Ageſil.

(l) Plut. in Ageſ. circa init. See alſo Ciceron. Epiſtol. ad Famil. 12. lib. 5.

(m) Apuleius, in Apologia, p. 282.

Pluturch, and make it Κορωνίαν. Plutarch has mentioned both theſe places, without ſaying the battle was fought at the firſt. But, ſays Lambinus, could Ageſilaüs, in coming out of Phocis, advance into Bœotia as far as Chæronea, if Chæronea is in Phocis? No, without doubt; but this if is falſe, and Lambinus ſhews thereby his ignorance in Geography. See Kirkmaier's Commentary on Cornelius Nepos, pag. 722. Charles Stephens made a more groſs miſtake, when he placed Coronea in Peloponneſus. Lloyd and Hofman have followed him in this miſtake.

[E] He died on the road, in the third year of the 104*th Olympiad.*] A tempeſt having obliged him to put into harbour, he was carried into a deſart place, called the Port of Menelaus, and there he died (21). Hic cum ex Ægypto reverteretur ... veniſſetque in portum, qui Menelai vocatur, jacens inter Cyrenas & Ægyptum, in morbum implicitus deceſſit (22). It was in the third year of the 104th Olympiad, according to Calviſius, but by this we may ſee that his Calculation is faulty; for from the third year of the 95th Olympiad, being according to him the beginning of the reign of Ageſilaüs to the third year of the 104th Olympiad, there are but 36 years: and yet he makes this reign to continue 41. Let us place the beginning then with Helvicus, in the ſecond year of the 93d Olympiad, and the end in the third year of the 104th.

(21) Plut. pag. 618.

(22) Corn. Nepos in Vitâ Ageſilai, ſub fin.

[F] Moreri has committed ſome miſtakes in this place.] It is falſe, I, that Leotychides was the natural ſon of King Agis: II, That Lyſander warmly ſupported the pretenſions of Leotychides (23): III, That Ageſilaüs ever encamped before the city of Heronce, in Bœotia (24): IV, That he had a noble air, and full of majeſty (25): V, That he ſaid, that the Oracle which excluded lame perſons from the crown, ought to be underſtood of the defects of the ſoul, or elſe of birth. Theſe two laſt faults belong to the Supplement of Moreri. I ſhall not take notice of the wrong name given to the Ægyptian for whom Ageſilaüs did many ſervices: his name was not Nacte-nebon.

(23) For theſe two firſt miſtakes ſee the Note [A].

(24) I believe there never was either in Bœotia, or any where elſe, a city named Heronce.

(25) See the Note [B].

[G] Never did any one live in a greater ſimplicity than he.] There was hardly any one in his army worſe cloathed (26). After his expedition into Aſia, where he had acquired ſo high a reputation, and had gained new glory at the battle of Coronea, he lived in Sparta, juſt as a good old Lacedæmonian would have done in ancient times. He made no change, either in his cloaths, his baths, or his meals, and what perhaps was more difficult, he did not ſuffer his wife to go better cloathed than before, nor to diſtinguiſh his daughter in the proceſſions by any ornaments that ſurpaſſed thoſe of other young women. He did not repair the doors of his houſe, tho' they were ſo old and ruinous, that they ſeemed to be the ſame that Ariſtodemus had put up (27). Note that Ariſtodemus was the perſon among the Heraclides, who had the city of Sparta for his ſhare, and from whom deſcended the Kings of Lacedæmon, divided into two families, from the two ſons he left behind him. In hoc (Ageſilao) illud in primis fuit admirabile, cum maxima munera ei ab regibus & dynaſtis civitatibuſque conferrentur, nihil unquam in domum ſuam contulit, nihil de victu, nihil de veſtitu Laconum mutavit. Domo eadem fuit contentus qua Euryſthenes (28) progenitor majorum ſuorum fuerat uſus, quam qui intrarat nullum ſignum libidinis, nullum luxuriæ videre poterat: contra plurima patientiæ atque abſtinentiæ. Sic enim erat inſtructa, ut nulla in re differret à cujuſvis inopis atque privati. That is, "This is chiefly to be admired in Ageſilaüs, when very great "preſents were beſtowed on him by Kings, Governors, and Cities, he never brought any "thing into his own houſe, he changed nothing "of the diet, nothing of the apparel of the Lace-"dæmonians. He was contented with the ſame "houſe which Euryſthenes the firſt founder of his "family uſed: which whoſoever entred, he could ſee "no ſign of debauchery, none of luxury: But on the "contrary, very many of patience and abſtinence. "For it was furniſhed in ſuch a manner, that it diff-"fered in nothing from that of any poor or private "perſon." When it was known that Ageſilaüs was arrived in Ægypt, they ſent him all ſorts of proviſions: but he choſe only the moſt common, and left the perfumes, the confections, and all that was eſteemed moſt delicious to his ſervants (30). The Ægyptians, inſtead of admiring this, made a jeſt of him, and took him for a ſimpleton, that did not know what were the good things of the world. Ille præter vitulina & hujuſmodi genera obſonii, quæ præſens tempus deſiderabat, nihil accepit, unguenta, coronas, ſecundamque menſam ſervis diſtertiit, cætera referri juſſit. Quo facto eum Barbari magis etiam contempſerunt, quod eum ignorantiâ bonarum rerum illa potiſſimum ſumpſiſſe arbitrabantur (31). You will find in Plutarch, 1. That this Prince behaved in the ſame manner, when the Thracians ſent him preſents: 2. That he laughed at them when they offered him divine honours (32).

(26) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 603. C.

(27) Id. ibid. p. 606.

(28) He had better have ſaid with Plutarch, Ariſtodemus; for Ageſilaus did not deſcend from Euryſthenes, but from Procles the ſecond ſon of Ariſtodemus.

(29) Corn. Nep. in Ageſilao, pag. 616.

(30) Plut. in Ageſ. p. 616.

(31) Cornel. Nepos in Ageſ. cap. 8.

(32) Plut. in Apophth. p. 210. See alſo Athenæus, Book 14. p. 657.

[H] The heart, the ſpirit, and the religion of a Prince.] Plutarch tells us, that thoſe who governed in Lacedæmon, had no other notion of juſtice, than the benefiting and aggrandiſing the State (33). With them it was the rule and meaſure of juſtice and honour: if a thing was but uſeful to the public, it paſſed for lawful. I believe Plutarch ſpeaks the truth; but he ſhould not have confined it only to the city of Sparta. Neither Athens (34), nor Thebes had any better principles; and indeed theſe are generally the maxims of all Governments: the difference between them is only as to more or leſs; but ſome hide thoſe principles better than others. Ageſilaüs was full of this wicked maxim. Finding himſelf ſuſpected of having induced Phebidas to ſurprize the citadel of Thebes in time of peace, and by a fraud that made all Greece cry out, he repreſented to them that they ought before all things to examine whether this action was for the good of his country, and that every one ought to do of his own accord what tended to the advantage of the State (35). He obtained that Thebidas ſhould be cleared, and a garriſon ſhould be ſent into the citadel. In his Ægyptian expedition, did he not abandon Tachus, into whoſe pay he was entred, and did he not embrace the intereſt of Nectanabus, for no other reaſon, but becauſe it was of greater importance to the Lacedæmonians to ſupport the latter than the former? An action,

(33) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 617. Idem in Alcibiade.

(34) See the Note [C] of the article ARISTIDES.

(35) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 603.

had ſo great a tenderneſs for his children, that he amuſed himſelf with them at the moſt puerile diverſions [I], as riding upon a ſtick.

It will not be amiſs to remark the little regard he ſhewed for thoſe who made their glory conſiſt in breeding and managing horſes, for diſputing the prize at the Olympic Games. He had a mind to let them ſee that there was no great matter in it, and that it was an expence, and no proof of merit and virtue; and to this end he perſuaded action, which under the mask of the public good, was downright treachery, as Plutarch has obſerved. Ἀτόπου καὶ ἀλλοκότου πράγματος παρακαλύμματι τῷ συμφέροντι τῆς πατρίδος χρησάμενος. Ἐπὶ ταύτης γε τῆς προφάσεως, ἀφαιρεθείσης τὸ δικαιότατον ὄνομα τῆς πράξεως ἦν προδοσία (36). That is, "Veiling an ab- "ſurd and unworthy deed under the pretence of the "good of his country: when if the veil was taken "off the trueſt name of that action was treachery." In converſation, Ageſilaüs ſpoke of nothing but juſtice: no diſcourſes in the world were finer than his (37). Hearing ſome body ſay that a certain thing was agreeable to the great King (38), What makes him a greater King, (ſays he) than me, if he is not more juſt? This is a fine theory; but his practice did not agree with it, when the kingdom was in queſtion. I am willing to believe, that for private intereſts, he would not eaſily have run counter to his knowledge; and thence I conclude he had the ſpirit and the religion of a Prince. How many Kings and Princes are there, who are zealous for their religion, juſt and honourable in their private capacity? But when they oppoſe their enemies, all or moſt of them follow the maxims of Lacedæmon. I believe a book upon the Religion of a Prince would ſell well; and make that upon the Religion of a Phyſician be forgotten.

(36) Id. ibid. p. 617.

(37) Id. ibid. p. 608.

(38) The Greeks ſpoke thus of the King of Perſia. See the Note [A] of the article ARTABAN IV.

Two days ago a man of merit told me, that on a certain Italian Prince's asking too advantageous conditions, in a treaty of peace with a powerful Monarch, who had taken away from him the greateſt part of his dominions, this Monarch's envoy anſwered him; But what ſecurity would you have the King my Maſter take, if he gives you all that you ask? Aſſure him, replied the Prince, that I engage my word, not in quality of Prince; for then I muſt ſacrifice every thing to my own grandeur, and the glory and advantage of my dominions, according as conjunctures happen: tell him then that I engage my word, not under that quality, for that would be promiſing nothing: but as a Gentleman and a man of honour. Tho' this language does not anſwer the ideas of thoſe who have introduced into the ſtyle of the Chancery this form, we promiſe on the faith and word of a King, it is however very ſincere and very reaſonable.

Let us make two remarks more. Firſt, I diſtinguiſh between what Urban VIII believed, and what Maphæus Barberinus believed. The Religion of the Prince, as ſuch, and perſonal Religion are two different things.

2. Ageſilaüs had an extreme reſpect for his Gods: he would not ſuffer any one to rob them or profane their temples, either in Greece or amongſt the Barbarians; and he reckoned thoſe amongſt the ſacrilegious, who uſed an enemy ill that had taken refuge in a temple (39). During the march of his troops, he always went to lodge in the moſt ſacred temples; that he might have the Gods for witneſſes of the moſt ſecret of his private actions. Ἐσκήνου μὲν γὰρ ἀποδημῶν καθ' αὑτὸν ἐν τοῖς ἁγιωτάτοις ἱεροῖς. ἂν μὴ πολλοὶ καθορῶσιν ἄνθρωποι πράττοντας ἡμᾶς, τούτων θεὸς ποιούμενος ἐποπτείας καὶ μάρτυρας (40). This was his perſonal Religion, but when he conſidered himſelf as King, the good and advantage of his kingdom was his principal Divinity, to which he ſacrificed both virtue and juſtice, and all laws both divine and human. I do not know whether thoſe who quote this ſentence of Euripides,

(39) Corn. Nep. in Vita Ageſil. cap. 4.

(40) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 603.

Nam ſi violandum eſt jus, regnandi gratiâ
Violandum eſt: aliis rebus pietatem colas (41);

(41) Cicer. Officior. lib. 3. cap. 21.

"Strict juſtice may be left for regal ſway;
"In other things Religion's rules obey, underſtand the whole energy of it: we there ſee the ſpirit both of thoſe who acquire kingdoms, and of thoſe who govern States; they proceed ſometimes even to ſuperſtition. Obſerve the private conduct of Ageſilaüs: every thing is as it ſhould be, aliis rebus pietatem colas: he departs from equity, only ſo far as he is a ruler, regnandi gratiâ violandum eſt. As a man, he will tell you ſincerely, like another, amicus uſque ad aras: but, as a Prince, if he ſpeaks from his heart, he will tell you, I will obſerve the treaty of peace, ſo long as the good of my kingdom ſhall require it; and I ſhall laugh at my oath, when a maxim of State ſhall make it neceſſary to be broken. If he choſe to have the Perſians violate the truce, rather than begin to violate it himſelf, it was becauſe he hoped for ſome great advantage from this conduct of the Perſians. Multum in eo conſequi ſe dicebat, quod Tiſſaphernes perjurio ſuo & homines ſuis rebus abalienaret, & Deos ſibi iratos redderet (42). That is, "He ſaid he had gained ſome great point, by making "Tiſſaphernes alienate men from his intereſts by his "perjury, and alſo cauſe the Gods to be angry with "them."

(42) Corn. Nepos in Ageſil. cap. 2.

Our good Ageſilaüs, who thought himſelf guilty of an immorality, if he had put on a good ſuit of cloaths, or given any indulgence to his appetite, made no ſcruple to be the uſurper of a kingdom. Thus ſome Caſuiſts pronounce damnation without remiſſion to women that are a little too nice in their dreſs: they cannot bear either their ribbands or their jewels; but they not only ſuffer men to riſe and engage themſelves in a civil war; but even exhort them to it.

[I] At the moſt puerile diverſions.] One day, when he was ſurprized riding upon a ſtick, with his children, he contented himſelf with ſaying to him that had ſeen him in this poſture, Forbear talking of it till you are a father (43). One could not quote on this occaſion the following verſes of Horace,

(43) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 610. Ælianus Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 15.

Ædificare caſas, ploſtello adjungere mures,
Ludere par impar, EQUITARE IN ARUNDINE LONGA,
Si quem delectet barbatum, amentia verſet (44).

(44) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 2. v. 247.

That is,

"If any grown a man delights to raiſe
"Dirt pyes, and like a child, at puſh-pin plays;
"Yokes rats and mice unto a little plough,
"And RIDES UPON AN HOBBY-HORSE, or ſo,
"Sure he is mad." Creech.

for the Poet does not intend to ſpeak of thoſe, who out of complaiſance to their own children, may amuſe themſelves after that manner in their own houſes. La Mothe le Vayer is not exact, when he ſays King Ageſilaüs, as well as Alcibiades were caught playing amongſt little boys, and that Socrates the Philoſopher boaſted of it (45). Seneca is quoted, in the laſt chapter of the firſt Book De Tranquillitate. There are ſeveral things that fall ſhort of exactneſs. I. He ſhould have ſpecified that Ageſilaüs was playing only with his own children. II. The Treatiſe De Tranquillitate contains only one Book. III. There is nothing ſaid either of Alcibiades, or of Ageſilaüs in the chapter quoted. IV. It is not ſaid there that Socrates gloried in playing with children: it is only ſaid that he was not aſhamed of it. Cum pueris Socrates ludere non erubeſcebat. V. Valerius Maximus, and Ælian, who relate this playing of Socrates, ſay that Alcibiades ſurprized him at it. Non erubuit tunc cum interpoſita arundine cruribus ſuis cum parvulis filiolis ludens ab Alcibiade riſus eſt (46). That is, "He was not aſhamed when he was laughed at "by Alcibiades, for playing with his little children, "and riding on an hobby-horſe." Σωκράτης δὲ κατελήφθη ποτὲ ὑπὸ Ἀλκιβιάδου παίζων μετὰ Λαμπροκλέους ἔτι νηπίου (47). That is, "Socrates was ſurprized by "Alcibiades, playing with Lamprocles, whilſt he "was yet a child." But I do not remember to have read that any others ſurprized Alcibiades at ſuch an amuſement. VI. Theſe two authors obſerve that it was with his own children that Socrates play'd.

(45) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 1. pag. 217. edit. in 12°.

(46) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 8. ſub fin.

(47) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 15.

perſuaded his ſiſter to contend for the victory in thoſe games (n). This Lady having managed horſes for this exerciſe, entred the liſts, and gained the prize. She was the firſt woman who obtained that glory (o). Her name was Cyniſca. I do not believe that Dicæarchus was ignorant of this, he, who complained that he could not find what was Ageſilaüs's daughter's name [K]. He might have known it if he had done as Plutarch did [L].

(n) Plutarch in Ageſilao, pag. 606. D.

(o) Pauſan. lib. 3. pag. 88 and 96.

[K] I do not believe that Dicæarchus was ignorant of Ageſilaüs's daughter's name.] Cyniſca was not only the firſt woman that gained the prize at the Olympic horſe-races; but alſo the moſt illuſtrious of all thoſe who afterwards obtained the like victory (48). Simonides the Poet honoured her with an Epigram (49). She dedicated as a monument of her victory, ſome horſes of braſs, which were placed at the entrance of the temple of Jupiter Olympicus (50). Her picture, by Apelles, and adorned with ſeveral inſcriptions, was in the temple of Juno at Elis (51). The Lacedæmonians erected a heroic monument to her, Ἡρῷον (52). It is not probable therefore that the name of Ageſilaus's ſiſter was unknown to any Greek Hiſtorian.

(48) Pauſ. lib. 3. pag. 88.
(49) Id. ibid.
(50) Idem, lib. 5. pag. 159.
(51) Idem, lib. 6. pag. 178.
(52) Idem, lib. 3. pag. 96.

[L] He might have known the name of Ageſilaüs's daughter, if he had done as Plutarch did.] This laſt Hiſtorian informs us, that Dicæarchus was in great paſſion, becauſe neither the name of Ageſilaüs's daughter, nor of Epaminondas's mother was known. Ὁ Δικαίαρχος ἐπηγανάκλησεν (53). For my part, continues he, I have found in the Regiſters of the Lacedæmonians, that Ageſilaüs's wife's name was Cleora, and that the name of one of his daughters was Apolia, and of the other Prolyta. We have no reaſon to be offended with Dicæarchus for being angry at the negligence of the Hiſtorians: for we naturally love to know the families of great men. It is a little ſtrange, that the name of the daughters and wife of Ageſilaüs ſhould be found only in the Archives of Lacedæmon.

(53) Plutarc. in Ageſilao, p. 606.

AGESIPOLIS firſt of that name King of Lacedæmon, ſucceeded his father Pauſanias, who had taken refuge in a temple (a), as ſoon as he knew his conduct was diſapproved, in concluding a peace with the Thebans. He was left in this aſylum, and Ageſipolis was ſet on the throne, under the Guardianſhip of Ariſtodemus (b). This was in the third year of the ninety ſixth Olympiad (c). He was of age, when the Lacedæmonians took a reſolution to attack the Athenians and the Thebans both at once; but, as they judged that it would be imprudent, not to make ſure of the Argives, during that war, they began with them (d). Ageſipolis was ordered to attack them, but he was ſcrupulous of undertaking that charge, on account of their having aſked a truce of him. He was deſirous of having a caſe of conſcience of that kind cleared up by Jupiter, and ſo conſulted him in perſon, in the famous temple of Olympus. He aſked him whether the Argives offers of a truce could be rejected; and whether it might not be alledged that they were very unſeaſonable in their demand, ſince they ſuſpended ſpeaking of peace, till the troops of the Lacedæmonians were juſt upon the point of attacking them. The Oracle anſwered, that the demands of the Argives were unjuſt, and that they might religiouſly be refuſed (e). Ageſipolis, to be ſtill upon the ſurer grounds, ran immediately to Delphi, that he might know whether the ſon (f) was of the ſame opinion with the father (g) [A]? Apollo's anſwer was entirely like Jupiter's; and ſo Ageſipolis heſitated no

(a) In that of Minerva, t Tegea. Pauſan. lib. 3. p. 86.
(b) Idem, ibid.
(c) Diod. Siculus lib. 14. cap. 90.
(d) Xenoph. de Reb. Græc. lib. 4. p. 312.
(e) Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς ἐπεστήμαινεν αὐτῷ ὅσιον εἶναι μὴ δικαίως ὑπεσχημένας ἀδίκως ὑπεσχημένας, Xenoph. de Reb. Græc. lib. 4. p. 312. i. e. "The God "anſwered him, "that it was "lawful for him "to reject conditions that were "unjuſtly offered.
(f) That is, Apollo.
(g) That is, Jupiter.

[A] Whether Apollo was of the ſame opinion with Jupiter.] Let us gather a truth from hence, which however is plain enough otherwiſe: that the Pagan Religion was founded upon ideas of God as falſe as Atheiſm. I do not ſpeak of the ſentiments of the common people, nor of the errors of private perſons; but of the public worſhip, performed by the moſt eminent perſons, and ſupported by the majeſty of the State. Here is a King of Lacedæmon, who after offering ſolemn ſacrifices as preliminary to an expedition (1), and even after the favourable anſwer of the greateſt of the Gods, goes to conſult another Deity, doubting whether this anſwer would be rejected or confirmed. He muſt therefore have believed that Jupiter's deciſions were not ſuch as could always be followed with a ſafe conſcience; and he ſuppoſed, that Apollo's informations were not always conformable to thoſe of Jupiter. Was not this thinking that all the Gods, not excepting the greateſt, were limited in their knowledge, and that there was no difference between them and men, only as to more and leſs? The tot capita tot ſenſus, i. e. "ſo many men ſo "many opinions," according to this doctrine took place in heaven almoſt in the ſame proportion as on earth. They went to Jupiter juſt as one goes to a Counſel of the firſt rank, when he is going to begin a law-ſuit. The opinion of this Counſel is not a ſufficient ſecurity to prudent clients: they are glad to have the advice of ſome other Lawyers; and there are ſome who conſult the ableſt Doctors in all the Courts of the Kingdom. The Pagans did juſt the ſame thing with regard to their Oracles: they conſulted ſeveral of them upon the ſame occaſion; to ſee whether the Gods contradicted one another, and to be enabled to take their meaſures the better by comparing their anſwers. Thus their Gods were as chimerical as Spinoza's Divinity; for it is as impoſſible, that a limited nature ſhould be God, as that the world ſhould be the ſupreme Being, that governs all things by a wiſe providence. To confirm what I advance of the falſe idea that the Pagans formed of God, we may obſerve that they were not offended at the different ſucceſs of the victims. Thoſe which they offered to one Deity gave them hopes, whilſt thoſe which they offered to another gave them fears. Apollo and Diana, who were the twin children of Jupiter, ſometimes contradicted one another: the brother would reject a victim, and the ſiſter receive it. Paganiſm found nothing to ſtumble at in this: it would have been glad of more agreement in the promiſes of good; but it did not believe the Divine Nature was exempt from ignorance, caprice, or repugnancy: it acquieſced therefore in that, as in inevitable effects of the nature of things. Do not you think Cicero's objections may have opened the eyes of abundance of people. Quid quum pluribus Diis immolatur, qui tandem evenit ut litetur aliis, aliis non litetur? Quæ autem inconſtantia Deorum eſt, ut primis minentur extis, benè promittant ſecundis? Aut tanta inter eos diſſenſio, ſæpe etiam inter proximos, ut Apollinis exta bona ſint, Dianæ non bona (2). That is, "When we ſacrifice to ſeveral Gods, "how does it happen that we offer to ſome and "not to others? And what inconſtancy is it in "the Gods to threaten at the firſt and to give hopes "at the ſecond ſacrifice? Or is the diſſenſion ſo "great among them even among thoſe that are "nearly related, that Apollo ſhould promiſe good "ſucceſs and Diana the contrary?"

A modern author has made uſe of this conduct of our Ageſipolis, to ſhew, that with regard to the Oracles, the greateſt of the Heathen Gods did not preſerve or maintain his ſuperiority. The Oracles of Jupiter, ſays he (3), ſuch as thoſe of Trophonius, Dodona, and Hammon had not ſo much credit, as that of Delphi. For they never equalled it either in duration or eſteem.

(1) Ἐπεὶ ... τὰ διαβατήρια θυόμενος ἐγένετο, ἐλθὼν εἰς τὴν Ὀλυμπίας χρησόμενος. Xenoph. de Geſtis Græc. lib. 4. p. 312. That is, "When he had "offered ſacrifices for the ſucceſs of his expedition, he "went to Olympia, to conſult the Oracle.

(2) Cicero de Divinat. lib. 2.

(3) La Mothe le Vayer, Lettre cvi. tom. 11. p. 449.

no longer, and made his army march towards Argos. The Argives ſent him two Heralds to deſire peace; he anſwered them, that the Gods had not thought fit he ſhould accept of theſe offers, and ſo continued his march. There was an earthquake the firſt day he encamped in their territories; and when part of his troops took it for a ſign that they ſhould return, he removed their ſuperſtition, by obſerving that this prodigy happened after their entrance into the enemy's country; ſo he marched on, and approached the city of Argos, and beſieged it cloſely. He might have ſubdued it, if the thunder, which killed ſome of his ſoldiers, and ſome other bad preſage had not obliged him to retire (b). Let us not omit his emulation; as ſoon as he was entred into the country of the Argives, he got information how far Ageſilaus had ravaged it ſome time before; and this curioſity of his was only that he might improve upon the exploits of that Prince, whom he endeavoured to ſurpaſs, juſt as if he had been engaged with him in a match at wreſtling (i). The general peace which the Lacedæmonians procured for Greece (k), by the negotiations of Antalcidas their Ambaſſador at the court of Perſia, in the ſecond year of the ninety eighth Olympiad, was ſoon followed by the ſeparate war they declared againſt the inhabitants of Mantinea. Ageſilaus, having deſired to be excuſed from commanding the troops, Ageſipolis marched againſt the enemy. He ravaged the country of Mantinea, and in the end ſubdued the city. The expedient he made uſe of is too curious not to be related [B]. There is ſome probability, that it was in this war that Pelopidas and Epaminondas were delivered from the danger [C] to which their courage and their friendſhip expoſed them. He was ſent ſome years afterwards [D], with a good army againſt the Olynthians (l).

(b) Xenophon, de Reb. Græc. lib. 4. p. 312.

(i) Ὥσπερ πύκταθλος πάντα ἐπὶ τὸ πλέον ὑπερβάλλειν ἐπεμέλετο. Xenophon. ibid.

(k) Diod. Sic. lib. 14. cap. 111. pag. 650.

eſteem. And this is proved, beſides the agreement of moſt of the authors who have ſpoken of them, by what Xenophon relates of Ageſipolis *, who after having conſulted Jupiter Olympius, and received his anſwer, went to Apollo at Delphi, and asked of him as of a Judge that was to give a final determination, whether he was of the ſame opinion with his father? Ariſtotle aſcribes this ſort of devout raillery to one Hegeſippus, in the ſecond Book of his Rhetoric. This paſſage furniſhes me with two obſervations; 1. That the ideas of the Gallican Church, concerning Councils and Popes, ſpeaking even ex cathedrâ, may be compared to theſe of Paganiſm, concerning the Oracles of Jupiter, and that of Delphi. The Olympian Jupiter, when he anſwered a queſtion, found a great deal of reſpect in the minds of the people, great homage was paid to his authority; but in the end, his judgment, tho' it was delivered ex cathedrâ, or rather ex tripode, was not look'd upon as above correction. This is the Pope of the Gallican Church. The Apollo of Delphi was the Judge that was to give the final determination: this is the Council. My 2d obſervation is that Ageſipolis proceeded here in good earneſt: there was no devout raillery in this action of his. As for Hegeſippus, I do not anſwer for him. He was perhaps malicious enough, to have a mind to draw the Oracles into a ſnare; in order to inſult them if they did not agree. He might have ſaid, It is a ſhame you ſhould anſwer both yes and no. Ἡγήσιππος ἐν Δελφοῖς ἐπηρώτα τὸν Θεὸν, κεχρημένος πρότερον Ὀλυμπιάσιν, εἰ αὐτῷ ταῦτα δοκεῖ ἄριστα τῷ πατρὶ, ὡς αἰσχρὸν ὂν πανταχοῦ εἰπεῖν (4). That is, "Hegeſippus "being at Delphi asked the God, after he had firſt "conſulted the Olympian Oracle, whether he was of "the ſame opinion with his father, thinking it a ſhame "for them to contradict one another." If our Ageſipolis had had an ill deſign againſt Apollo, like that wicked perſon, of whom Æſop tells the ſtory (5), he would have been caught; for the anſwer at Delphi was like that of Olympus.

* Lib. 4. Hiſtoriar.

(4) Ariſtotel. Rhetor. lib. 2. cap. 23. p. 445. B.

(5) Æſopus, Fabula 16. cujus Titulus κακοπράγμων, Malignus. It was a man that had a ſparrow in his hand, and asked the Oracle, Is what I have in my hand dead or alive? His deſign was to ſqueeze the ſparrow to death, if the Oracle anſwered, Alive, &c.

(6) Xenophon, lib. 5. p. 323.

[B] The expedient he made uſe of is too curious not to be related.] He ſtopped the courſe of the river, which paſſed thro' the midſt of the city: this cauſed an inundation, which ſo weakened the foundations of the houſes and walls, that the inhabitants were afraid of their falling; and, as they ſaw, that if any part of the wall ſhould be thrown down, their city would be carried by ſtorm, they capitulated. They obtained but very hard conditions; for they were obliged to live in the fields, being divided into four cantons, and the city was diſmantled; their Magiſtrates would have been put to death, if Ageſipolis's father had not interceded for them (6). Xenophon who relates all theſe particulars, omits one circumſtance, which Pauſanias relates. Ageſipolis turned the courſe of the river towards the walls of the city. Now the bricks of which theſe walls were built not being burnt, melted in the water, like wax in the ſun. The reaſon why the Mantineans preferred ſunburnt bricks, was that they did not break, nor ſlip out of their places, when a wall was battered. Ageſipolis was not the inventor of this ſtratagem; he only followed Cimon who had uſed it to make himſelf Maſter of the city of Eione upon the river Strymon (7).

(7) Pauſanias, lib. 8. pag. 242, 243.

[C] That Pelopidas and Epaminondas were delivered from the danger.] Plutarch relates that the Thebans ſent ſuccours to the Lacedæmonians in the expedition of Mantinea; and that when the wing wherein theſe two brave men charged gave way, they would not retreat. Pelopidas having received ſeven wounds, fell upon a heap of dead bodies. Epaminondas ran to him, and oppoſed his ſingle perſon to many, being determined to die rather than abandon his friend. And tho' he was wounded in two places, yet he defended himſelf vigorouſly, till Ageſipolis at the head of the other wing diſengaged them both (8). You will ſay, that Xenophon does not ſpeak of any battle when he relates what happened in this Mantinean war; but I ſhall anſwer, that Pauſanias obſerves, that Ageſipolis had won a battle, before he laid ſiege to the city. Ὡς ὑ ἐκράτησεν ὁ Ἀγησίπολις τῇ μάχῃ, καὶ εἰς τὸ τεῖχος κατέκλεισε τοὺς Μαντινέας (9). That is, "When Ageſipolis had overcome the Man-"tineans in battle, and had driven them within their "walls;" and I ſhall add that Xenophon himſelf obſerves that there were auxiliary troops in the Lacedæmonian army (10). Note that the incident mentioned by Plutarch was before the trick, whereby Phebidas made himſelf Maſter of the fortreſs of the Thebans (11). This Chronological Character ſuits with the expedition of Ageſipolis againſt Mantinea.

(8) Plutarchus, in Vita Pelopidæ, p. 280.

(9) Pauſan. lib. 8. p. 242.

(10) Xenophon, lib. 5. p. 323.

(11) Plut. in Pelopid. p. 280.

[D] He was ſent ſome years afterwards, &c.] I make this remark, only to cenſure Pauſanias, who relates that Ageſipolis abandoning the war of Argos with regret turned all his wrath againſt the Olynthians. Οὕτω μὲν δὴ ἐκ τῆς Ἀργολίδος ἀνέζευξεν ἄκων ἐπὶ ὃ Ὀλυνθίους ἐποιεῖτο ἄνωθεν σφαίας (12). i. e. "He moved "his camp unwillingly out of the territories of Argos, "and made war directly upon the Olynthians." Who would not believe, when he reads this, that the Olynthian expedition immediately followed that of Argos? Who would not imagine that Ageſipolis, when he went out of the country of Argos, turned to Macedon? but yet this is falſe. There were two years between theſe two expeditions. The Mantinean war, of which Pauſanias has ſaid ſomething, followed that of Argos, and was ſix years before that of Olynthus. Let us obſerve here a miſtake of Calviſius. He places the war of Argos under the 4th year of the 76th Olympiad, a little after the death of Pauſanias, King of Macedon (13). Now Ageſipolis aſcended the throne the ſame year that Pauſanias died (14); and becauſe he was a minor, he was put under the Guardianſhip of Ariſtodemus (15). Therefore, if Calviſius was exact, the war of Argos muſt fall in with the firſt year of the reign of Ageſipolis, and this war muſt have been conducted by Ariſtodemus; for it is certain, that under the minority of Ageſipolis, his Guardian was

(12) Pauſanias, lib. 2. p. 86.

(13) Sethi Calviſii, Chronol. ad ann. Mun. 3557. p. 162.

(14) Diod. Sic. lib. 14. cap. 90. pag. 637.

(15) Xenophon, de Reb. geſtis Græcor. lib 4. p. 301. Pauſan. lib. 2. p. 86.

(l) Xenoph. de Reb. Græc. lib. 5. p. 329.

ans (l). Amyntas King of Macedon, and Derdas Prince of Elimia (m), ſeconded him vigorouſly. He approached Olynthus; and not ſeeing the enemies army, with whom he was deſirous to engage, appear, he ravaged the country and made himſelf maſter of the city of Torone. But the great heats of the ſummer fatiguing him extremely, he was ſeized with a continued fever, which carried him off in ſeven days (n), in the fourteenth year of his reign (o). See my Criticiſm on Moreri [E]. Ageſilaüs was ſo far from rejoicing at this loſs, as one might have believed [F], that he wept at it, and was a long time afflicted on that account, according to Xenophon (p). Note that Ageſipolis left no poſterity (q), and that Cleombrotus, his brother and ſucceſſor, was the father of Ageſipolis II. (r), who reigned but one year (s), and whoſe apothegms were more memorable than his actions. No body ſpeaks of the latter, and we find a little collection of the former in Plutarch (t).

(p) See the Note [F].

(q) Pauſan. lib. 2. p. 86.
(r) Idem, lib. 2. p. 86.
(s) Diod. lib. 65. cap. 60.
(t) Plut. in Apoptb. p. 215.

(m) Xeneph. de Reb. Græc. lib. 5. pag. 327. ſays, Ἐλαμίας ἀρχοντα· but it is probably a fault of the Copyiſt, for Ἐλαμισίας.
(n) Id. ibid. p. 329.
(o) Diod. Sic. lib. 14. cap. 111. p. 650. and lib. 15. cap. 23. p. 674. ad ann. 1 Olymp. 100.

was put at the head of the armies, when this King happened to take the field (16). Calviſius does not fail to obſerve that Ariſtodemus went thither in the 3d year of the 96th Olympiad, becauſe of the minority of Ageſipolis (17). But here is his miſtake: he places the firſt year of his reign in the 2d year of the 96th Olympiad, and the war of Argos too ſoon after the death of Pauſanias, King of Macedon.

(16) Xenoph. de Reb. Geſtis Græcor. lib. 4. pag. 301.
(17) Calviſius, Chronol. p. 160.

[E] See my Criticiſm on Moreri.] "Ageſipolis "was taken with a burning fever, and raving con- "tinually the coolneſs of the waters of a cer- "tain temple of Bacchus, which was at Aphyte, "he got himſelf carried thither, and died on the ſe- "venth day of his fever, after having gone out of "this temple, that he might not defile it by his "death." Theſe are Moreri's words. It would be a piece of injuſtice to criticiſe the expreſſion revint toujours à la fraicheur; for it is eaſy to ſee that the Printers have put revint inſtead of rêvant (18). But we may ſay that he ought to have expreſſed himſelf thus: Recollecting the temple of Bacchus, which he had ſeen at Aphyte, he was deſirous of enjoying the ſhade and coolneſs of the clear waters of that place. He was carried thither alive, but he died without the temple, on the ſeventh day of his fever (19). In the ſecond place it is a chimerical gloſs to tell us a ſtory of his unwillingneſs to die in the temple, out of a religious reſpect for the ſanctity of the place. Has Xenophon or any other Author of good credit ſaid thus? That we may not do it at once, let us remark in this place Moreri's miſtake in the article of AGESIPOLIS II. He affirms, that this Prince, having been a hoſtage in his youth, anſwered thoſe who reproached him with it, it is becauſe Kings bear the faults of their Empire. This anſwer is as falſe, as contrary to this proverb,

(18) It is rêvant in the Holland editions.

(19) See Xenoph. book 4. p. 329, 330.

Quicquid delirant Reges, plectuntur Achivi (20).

(20) Horat. Ep. 2. lib. 1. v. 14.

That is,

"The people ſuffer when the Prince offends."

Creech.

This is the truth of the ſtory. It was ſaid to him one day, Though you are a King, you have been in hoſtage with the chief of the youth of Lacedæmon: your wives and children have not. It is becauſe it was juſt, anſwered he, thus we our ſelves ſhould bear the puniſhment of our own faults (21).

(21) Plutarch. in Apoptb. Laconic. p. 215.

[F] Ageſilaüs was ſo far from rejoicing at this loſs, as one might have believed.] Xenophon makes us believe, that there was an emulation between theſe two Princes ſufficient to produce hatred. But Plutarch repreſents them to us as very much united. He obſerves, that Ageſipolis being of a mild and modeſt temper, and meddling very little with publick affairs, ſuffered himſelf to be ſwayed by his collegue Ageſilaus (22), who knowing him to be of an amorous conſtitution, was always ſpeaking to him of beautiful boys, and encouraged him that way, and even ſerved him in it. Εἰδὼς ἔνεχον ὄντα τοῖς ἐρωτικοῖς τὸν Ἀγησίπολιν, ὥσπερ ἦν αὐτὸς, ἀεί τινος ὑπῆρχε λόγου περὶ τῶν ἐν ὥρᾳ· καὶ προῆγε τὸν νεανίσκον εἰς τοῦτο, καὶ συνήρα καὶ συνέπραττε (23). He adds, that this ſort of love was not accounted criminal at Lacedæmon. The following Greek paſſage informs us that Ageſilaüs regretted the loſs of his collegue. Ἀγησίλαος δὲ τοῦτο ἀκούσας, οὐχ' ἥ τι ἂν ᾤετο, ἐφήσθη ὡς ἀντικάλῳ, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐδάκρυσε καὶ ἐπόθησε τὴν συνουσίαν (24). That is, "When Ageſilaüs heard this he did "not rejoice over his adverſary, as ſome imagined, "but wept and lamented the loſs of his friendſhip.

(22) Plut. in Ageſilao, pag. 607. A.

(23) Plut. in Ageſilao, p. 607. A.

(24) Xenoph. de Geſt. Græc. lib. 5. p. 330.

☞AGILNOTH [A] an Engliſhman and Archbiſhop of Canterbury lived in the eleventh Century, and was very much in favour with Canute I. He was the ſon of a Nobleman called Agelmar (a). From a Dean of Canterbury he was raiſed to the Archiepiſcopal See of that City A. D. 1020 (b). Two years after he went to Rome to receive the Pallium from the Pope's hands, who entertained him very kindly, and ſhewed a great value for him (c); on his return he paſſed through Pavia, where he bought an arm of St. Auguſtin for an hundred talents of ſilver and one talent of gold; he made a preſent of this curious and valuable relick to Leofrick Earl of Coventry (d), in order to foment and encreaſe idolatry, as Bale ſays (e). Agilnoth alſo prevailed with King Canute to give him leave to have the body of St. Elphegus the Martyr (f) tranſported from London to Canterbury; on which occaſion the author, who relates this (g), makes an obſervation, in which he betrays his own weakneſs, as much as he ſhews the King's good ſenſe [B]. William of Malmſbury tells us, that though Elphegus had been dead

(a) Nobilis viri Agelmari filius, Simeon Monach. Dunelmenſ. de Geſtis Reg. Angl. In Hiſt. Anglic. Script. x. Ed. a Rog. Twyſden, tom. 1. Col. 177.
(f) Archbiſhop of Canterbury under King Ethelred. Will. Malmesb. lib. 2. c. 10. In Rer. Ang. Script. poſt Bedam, p. 62.
(g) Chron. Joan. Brompton, ap. H. A. Scrip. x. tom. 1. Col. 909.

(b) Id. ibid.
(c) Id. ibid. & in Chron. de Mailros, ap. Rer. Ang. Scriptores Veteres, tom. 1. p. 155.
(d) Henr. de Knyghton, De Event. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 3. In Hiſt. Angl. Script. x. Col. 2318.
(e) Balæus, Illuſtr. Major. Britan. Script. Summarium, fol. 71.

[A] AGILNOTH.] There are ſcarce two authors that write his name in the ſame manner. Pitſeus and Bale call him Achelnot (1). Others call him Agelnoth, Egelnoth, or Ethelnot; as may be ſeen in the authors quoted in the text of this article; but none of them call him Achelnot. There was another Agilnoth, or Agelnoth, or Ailnoth, who was Abbot of Glaſton in William the Conqueror's reign (2), and was depoſed in a Synod held at London by Lanfrank, Archbiſhop of Canterbury (3), but for what reaſon we are not informed.

(1) Pitſeus, Relat. Hiſtor. de Reb. Angl. pag. 183. Balæus, Illuſtr. M. Brit. Script. Summ. fol. 71.
(2) Anno 1067. Simeon Dunelmenſis. In Geſtis Reg. Angl. and Radulphus de Diceto, in Abbreviat. Chronic. ap. Hiſt. Angl. Script. x. tom 1. p. 197, and 482.
(3) Acta Pontif. Cantuar. Auctore Gervaſ. ibid. tom. 2. 1654.

[B] An obſervation, in which he betrays his own weakneſs, as much as he ſhews the King's good ſenſe.] The King, ſays he, always ſhewed very little regard for the Engliſh Saints, (and I ſuppoſe, for all Saints in general, meaning by Saints only their dead carcaſſes, or perhaps ſuch Saints whoſe holineſs was very dubious). He adds, It is reported that the King dining in Whitſuntide at Wilton in Wiltſhire, he happen'd to ridicule St. Editha King Edgar's daughter, ſaying that he could not believe the daughter of ſo laſcivious a tyrant ſhould be holy. Agilnoth contradicted the King, and having immediately ordered the tomb of the Saint to be opened, ſhe roſe up and looked the King in the face with a very fierce countenance; the King aſtoniſhed at this ſurprizing event fainted away, and coming again to himſelf, he was aſhamed of his raſhneſs, and rejoiced that time was granted him for repentance (4). This is what my author relates, who does not in the leaſt doubt of the truth of the ſtory. If the fact be true, it may have been ſome trick of the Monks; and the King, as he had good ſenſe enough to laugh at the mock Saints, was alſo prudent enough not to provoke the Clergy's anger, or if he had provoked it, to ſoften it again by a pretended repentance, as on this occaſion.

(4) Joan. Brompton Chronicon. ibid. tom. 1. p. 909.

dead ten years, yet his body was as uncorrupted and as freſh, as if the blood had been ſtill circulating in it, which he looks upon as a great miracle (b). Agilnoth had ſo much power over the King, that he engaged him to go to Rome, in order to obtain from the Pope the abſolution of his ſins; however, this journey of the King proved very beneficial to the nation [C]. Bale, who ſeems to be much out of humour with our Archbiſhop, charges him with having made the King acknowledge other people's children for his own, and with having obliged him to reſign his crown to a crucifix at Wincheſter, which had condemned the marriage of the Clergy, a Monk ſpeaking through it by the means of a pipe, and ſo making the King and other people believe it was the Crucifix that ſpoke (i). How much Bale, who only cites Polydore Virgil, is to be credited in this, we cannot determine; but by what we are going to relate it will appear, that Agilnoth was a very good Clergyman, and that he knew how to make uſe of the King's favour for the good of the Church (that is, of the Clergy). He prevailed with Canute to reſtore to the church of St. Mary at Glaſton all the privileges, it had formerly enjoyed. Whether the charters of theſe privileges were forged or genuine we cannot determine; but it is well known that the Monks have long ago been accuſed of forging royal charters. However that be, the King at the requeſt of Agilnoth granted to the abovementioned church that the lands belonging to it ſhould be free from all burthens and vexations, as much as thoſe of the crown, and prohibited, under ſevere penalties, all Judges and other publick officers to exerciſe any authority in the territories belonging to the Church or to the Monaſtery of Glaſton, referring all cauſes, Civil as well as Eccleſiaſtical, to the Abbot only (k). If my memory does not fail me, I have read ſomewhere, that Agilnoth had been educated in the Monaſtery of Glaſton, which may be the reaſon why he was deſirous of having the privileges of that Church and Monaſtery enlarged, or at leaſt confirmed. He alſo obliged the King to ſend money to ſeveral Churches in foreign parts (l). Whilſt he was thus promoting the intereſt of other Churches, he was not neglectful of his own; for in the year 1037 he bought for the uſe of his Monks a piece of ground called Godmoreſham, which coſt him ſeventy two marks of pure ſilver (m). He alſo ſettled Monks in the Convent of St. Edmund (n). And when he procured the miraculous body of St. Elphegus to be carried to Canterbury, we may be ſure it was with a view to enrich the Clergy and Monks of that city. It was no doubt his zeal for the Church, and the care he took to encreaſe the riches of the Clergy and Friars that gained him the ſurname of Good, which the antient authors we have quoted generally give him. He died the 30th of October in the year 1038 (o), having enjoyed the Archiepiſcopal Dignity eighteen years (p). Pitſeus, a Roman Catholic writer, beſtows a very great encomium upon him. "He was a man, ſays he, in which piety ſtrove with learning, and mild-"neſs with humility." He adds, that Agilnoth, by his precepts and good counſels, ſoftened the King's fierce and ſavage temper, and taught him to be mild and compaſſionate. The ſame author tells us, that this Prelate applied himſelf to ſacred and profane learning, and made a conſiderable progreſs in both. He wrote ſeveral books [D]. Beſides thoſe mentioned in the remark D, Bale ſays, ſome other are extant, of which the titles are unknown. Feruntur & alia, quorum tituli non manifeſtantur (q).

(b) Will. Malmſ. ubi ſupra.

(i) Balæus, ubi ſupra.

(k) Will. Mal. ubi ſupra, p. 75.

(l) Id. ibid. pag. 76.

(m) Evidentia Eccleſ. Cantuar. Ap. Hiſt. Angl. Script. x. tom. 2. Col. 2225.

(n) Actus Pontif. Cantuar. ib. Col. 1651.

(o) Pitſeus, Relat. Hiſtor. de Reb. Angl. ad ann. 1038. p. m. 183.

(p) Pitſeus, ibid. Will. Malmesb. ubi ſupra, pag. 204. Chron. de Mailros, ubi ſupra, p 155, 156. ad ann. 1020, 1038.

(q) Balæus, ubi ſupra.

[C] This journey of the King proved very beneficial to the Nation.] He obtained from the Emperor and the Pope, that Engliſh and Danes, travelling thro' their dominions to Rome either for trade or out of devotion, ſhould be free from all taxes and vexations in their journey. He alſo repreſented that his Archbiſhops could not bear the vaſt expence they were at for receiving the Pallium, which they were obliged to bring from Rome in perſon. In this alſo the Pope complied with the King's wiſhes, and ordered that for the future the Archbiſhop's expences ſhould be leſs. This Canute himſelf tells us in a Charter directed to Agilnoth (5) Archbiſhop of Canterbury and to Alfric of York (6). He alſo ſays in that Charter that he was very well pleaſed with his journey to Rome, having ſucceeded in it according to his wiſhes.

(5) Here called Ailnoth.
(6) Ap. Will. Malmſ. lib. 2. p. 74. In Rer. Angl. Script. poſt Bedam. Pitſeus, ubi ſupra.

[D] He wrote ſeveral Books.] viz. A Letter to the Earl of Coventry when he ſent him St. Auſtin's arm. A volume of Letters to ſeveral perſons. A Book in praiſe of the Virgin Mary, addreſſed to Fulbert Biſhop of Chartres. In this Letter he ſays, according to Bale, that the Virgin viſited Biſhop Fulbert, and refreſhed him with her milk when he was ſick. But let us quote Bale's words, to give the reader a notion of his manner of writing. In Libro ſuo de Mariæ Laudibus, ſomniat hic prodigiorum Patronus hanc Virginem Fulbertum Carnotenſem Epiſcopum viſitâſſe, lacteque ſuo refoviſſe ægrotum (7).

(7) Baſlæus, ubi ſupra.

AGIS, King of Lacedæmon, deſcended from Ageſilaüs II. in a right line (a), had a very unhappy end. He took it in his head to reform his kingdom, by the reſtoring of the laws of Lycurgus; but he fell under the weight of an enterpriſe, that could not but be diſagreeable to all thoſe who had great poſſeſſions, and had been ſo accuſtomed to the ſweets of a voluptuous life, that they were not able to comply with the antient diſcipline of Lacedæmon. Agis being in the flower of his age, and having a very refined deſire of glory [A], formed the deſign of this reformation, and practiſed it firſt in (a) He was five degrees removed from him. Plut. in Agide, p. 796.

[A] Having a very refined deſire of glory.] Plutarch's relation (1) tells us plainly, that Ageſiſtrata repreſented to her ſon how prejudicial his plan of reformation would be to himſelf, conſidering the great wealth ſhe poſſeſſed; but he deſired her to acquieſce in ſacrificing her riches to the glory of her ſon. For, ſays he, I ſhall never be equal with other Monarchs in riches: the Servants of the Nobles and Officers of Seleucus and Ptolemy are richer than all the Kings of Lacedæmon: but if by my temperance, and greatneſs of my ſoul, I raiſe my ſelf above the luxury of theſe Princes, and if I can introduce an equality

(1) Plutarch. in Agide, p. 798.

in his own perſon: his cloaths and his table were according to the manners of former times; which is ſo much the more to be admired, becauſe Ageſiſtrata his mother, and Archidamia his grandmother had brought him up voluptuouſly (b). When he ſounded his people's minds, he found the younger ſort oppoſed his project, leſs than thoſe who had enjoyed a relaxation of diſcipline ſeveral years. The greateſt difficulty was expected to ariſe from the women [B]. They had at that time more credit than ever, for their power is never greater than when luxury is in faſhion. Ageſilaüs's mother did not at all find her account in this reformation. She muſt have loſt her riches, which gave her a ſhare in a thouſand ſorts of intrigues; ſo ſhe oppoſed the deſign at once, and treated it as a chimera. But her brother Ageſilaüs, whom Agis had engaged in his intereſts, knew how to manage her in ſuch a manner, that ſhe promiſed to ſecond the enterpriſe. She endeavoured to gain the women; but inſtead of ſuffering themſelves to be perſuaded, they applied to Leonidas the other King of Lacedæmon, and humbly beſought him to fruſtrate the deſigns of his Collegue. Leonidas durſt not oppoſe it openly, for fear of irritating the people, to whom the reformation was agreeable, becauſe they found their account in it. He contented himſelf with countermining it by intrigues, and ſowing ſuſpicions, as if Agis had aſpired to tyranny, by pulling down the rich, and raiſing the poor. Agis did not fail to propoſe his new laws to the Senate, relating to the diſcharge of debts, and a new diviſion of the lands. Leonidas, being ſupported by the rich, oppoſed this project ſo ſtrongly, that there was one voice more againſt it than for it. He paid dear for the ſucceſs in this affair. Lyſander, one of the Ephori, who had been the grand promoter of the reformation, called him to account, alledged the celeſtial ſigns [C], and put Cleombrotus a Prince of the Royal Blood, and ſon-in-law to Leonidas, to make ſure of the Kingdom. Leonidas being frighted at this, took refuge in a temple, whither his daughter, the wife of Cleombrotus followed him. He was ſummoned; and becauſe he did not appear, he was degraded of his dignity, which was conferred on Cleombrotus. He obtained leave to retire to Tegæa. The new Ephori had Lyſander and Mandroclidas tried for innovation: theſe perſuaded the two Kings to unite and turn out theſe Ephori. The thing was brought about; but not without a great uproar in the City. Ageſilaüs, one of the Ephori, that ſucceeded thoſe who were juſt turned out, would have cauſed Leonidas to be killed on the way to Tegæa, if Agis had not ſent him a ſtrong guard. The reformation might then have been eſtabliſhed, if Ageſilaüs had not found means to elude the good intentions of the two Kings. Whilſt this was tranſacting, the Achaians asked aſſiſtance, which was given them, and Agis had the command of the troops. He acquired a good deal of reputation in this Campaign [D]. At his return, he found his affairs ſo embroiled by the ill conduct of Ageſilaüs, that it was impoſſible for him to maintain himſelf. Leonidas was recalled to Lacedæmon: Agis retired into one temple, and Cleomenes into another. The wife of the latter behaved herſelf in ſuch a manner that ſhe became the admiration of every body (c). Leonidas was contented with baniſhing his ſon-in-law; after which he applied himſelf entirely to the ruin of Agis. One of the Ephori, who had no mind to return what Agæſiſtrata had lent him, was the principal inſtrument of the misfortune of this family. Agis never went out of his ſanctuary, but to bathe. One day, as he was returning from

(b) Ευτυθραπτόμενος πλούτοις καὶ τρυφαῖς γυναικῶν τῆς τε μητρὸς Ἀγησιστράτας καὶ τῆς μάμμης Ἀρχιδαμίας, αἱ πλεῖστα χρήματα Λακεδαιμονίων ἐκέκτηντο. i. e. "Brought up amidſt the "wealth and delicacies of women, by his mother Ageſiſtrata, and his grandmother Archidamia, who were the richeſt among the Lacedæmonians. Plutarch. In Agide, P. 797.

(c) Her name was CHELONIS. See her article, equality of poſſeſſions into my kingdom, I ſhall arrive at true grandeur, and paſs for a great Prince. This is a refinement upon ſelf love. You may be ſurpaſſed in one way, do what you can, but take the quite contrary and you will have no rivals: thoſe who would eſteem you equal with others, may affirm that your merit in its kind does not give place to another's. But ſhould one dare to ſay it, if the diſpute ran upon the ſame ſort of qualities, ſome viſibly inferior, and others viſibly ſuperior, as the opulence of Agis, and that of the Kings of Syria?

[B] To ariſe from the women.] The Lacedæmonians were the beſt husbands in the world: they communicated a great deal more of the affairs of the Republic to their wives, than they communicated of the affairs of the family to their husbands (2). At the time of which we are ſpeaking, almoſt all the riches of Lacedæmon were under the petticoat; they were at the diſpoſition of the ſex, and this made the Prince's deſign prove abortive. The Ladies were afraid of loſing all at once, their riches, their pleaſures and their authority; and perhaps they were not miſtaken. But let us hear Plutarch: It was, ſays he (3), one of the greateſt obſtacles to this deſign, for the greateſt part of the money of Sparta being in the women's hands, it was their intereſt to oppoſe it, not only as depriving them of thoſe ſuperfluous trifles, in which through want of virtue they placed their chief felicity, but alſo becauſe they knew their wealth was the main ſupport of their power and credit.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Plut. ibid.

[C] The celeſtial ſigns. Every nine years the Ephori contemplated the heavens, in a night that was ſerene and without moon-light; and, if they ſaw a ſtar fall, they judged that the Kings had ſinned againſt God, and they ſuſpended them from their dignity, till ſuch time as there came an Oracle, either from Delphi or Olympus, to reinſtate them (4). Lyſander pretending to have ſeen this phænomenon, brought the King to trial, and produced witneſſes, who depoſed that Leonidas had two children by an Aſiatic woman. Now there was an ancient law, which prohibited the Heraclides (5) to have children by a foreign woman. Strange that ſuch a Government ſhould ſubſiſt ſo long, where the fortune of the Kings depended on the will of one of the Ephori, who might ſee a ſtar fall.

(4) Plutarch. in Agide, p. 800.

(5) That is, the deſcendants of Hercules, in the number of whom the Kings of Lacedæmon were.

[D] He acquired a good deal of reputation in this campaign.] Having joined Aratus General of the Achæans, near Corinth, his opinion was to give the enemy battle beyond the Iſthmus; but he ſubmitted to that of this General who thought it better not to give battle. Aratus acknowledges this himſelf in his book. One Baton of Sinope however reported, that Agis diſſuaded from giving battle, and that Aratus was determined upon it (6). Is it not very ſtrange, that an Hiſtorian ſhould relate concerning a General, what is contradicted by that ſame General's own account? Is it probable that he would relate falſhoods to his own prejudice? This boldneſs may be endured ſome months, and not without reaſon; but when that time is paſſed, we muſt not contradict the chief Actors.

(6) Plut. in Agide, p. 801.

from thence to the temple, he was ſeized by that Ephorus and carried to priſon. Then he was brought to his trial and condemned to death, and delivered to the executioner. His mother and grandmother uſed all the entreaty and importunity imaginable, that, as he was King of Lacedæmon, he might at leaſt be permitted to plead his cauſe before the people. But they were apprehenſive leſt his words would make too great an impreſſion, and therefore they ordered him to be ſtrangled that very hour. The Ephorus, who was in debt to Ageſiſtrata, permitted that Princeſs to go into the priſon; which he granted likewiſe to Agis's grandmother; but he gave orders to ſtrangle them one after another. Ageſiſtrata died in a manner that was extremely to her honour (d). The wife of Agis (e), who was a Princeſs of great fortune and prudence, and one of the fineſt Ladies in Greece, was forced away from her apartment by King Leonidas, and obliged to marry his ſon, who was then very young, and hardly fit for marriage. He reigned after his father's death, and his end was as tragical as that of Agis, whoſe deſigns he had attempted to execute. His name was Cleomenes (f). Moreri has not given a juſt account of what Agis [E] ſaid to thoſe, who were lamenting his unhappy fate. The other Dictionaries are very erroneous upon that article [F]. Meurſius was miſtaken in ſaying, that Agis reigned nine years (g); for the paſſage of Diodorus Siculus, which he quotes, relates to another Agis. He, whom we are now ſpeaking of, was executed in the 135th Olympiad. The reflections of Plutarch upon the puniſhment of this King, may be ſeen in the article AMPHARES.

(d) See the article AMPHARES.

(e) Her name was Agiatis.

(f) See Plutarch in the Life of Agis and Cleomenes.

(g) Meurſius de Regno Lacedæm. p. 87.

[E] Moreri has not given a juſt account of what Agis ſaid.] What he ſaid, when he ſaw one of the Serjeants, that attended him, weeping, was this: Do not weep for me; for ſince my perſecutors have condemned me to death in ſo flagrant and unjuſt a manner, I have greatly the advantage of them in point of merit and honeſty. But inſtead of this Moreri repreſents him as ſaying, Do not weep; for thoſe who lament for me, are much more to be pitied than I am. This is not the only error in that article. Moreri tells us very falſly, 1. That in the beginning of the reign of Agis, an Ephorus, nam'd Epitadeus, made an order that fathers might diſinherit their children: 2. That Agis rectified the terms of that decree, which in a little time filled the city with inhabitants again: 3. That the moſt conſiderable men of the city came readily into the deſign of Agis. But if we read Plutarch, we ſhall find, 1. That Epitadeus had made his decree a long time before Agis: 2. That Agis had not the good fortune to change the leaſt article of it: 3. That they were the men of wealth and ſubſtance, who oppoſed his deſign. Is this conſulting of the originals themſelves, and giving the true ſenſe of them?

(7) Plut. in Agide, p. 808.

[F] The other Dictionaries are very erroneous upon that article.] Charles Stephens confounds this Agis with another, who is more ancient; and diſtinguiſhes him from that Agis, whom the Lacedæmonians ſtrangled. Mr. Hofman has only fallen into the former of theſe two miſtakes. Mr. Lloyd corrects neither of them.

☞AGLIONBY (JOHN) an Engliſh Divine, was born of a gentile family in Cumberland. He became a ſtudent in Queen's College in Oxford in 1583, and was at laſt choſen Fellow of it; upon this he entered into holy orders, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his polite and learned ſermons. He afterwards travelled into foreign countries, and was introduced into the acquaintance of Cardinal Bellarmine, who ſhewing him the picture of Dr. William Whitaker of Cambridge, an eminent writer in the Controverſies againſt the Papiſts, which hung up in his Library, told him, that he was the moſt learned Heretic whom he ever read. After his return he was made Chaplain in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth, took the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1600, and was made Principal of St. Edmund's Hall the year following. He was about that time preſented to the Rectory of Iſlip near Oxford, and ſoon after appointed Chaplain in ordinary to King James I. He was a Maſter of all the ſeveral kinds of Literature, profoundly ſkilled in the Fathers, and School-Divinity (a). We have an excellent character of him in the Rex Platonicus ſive Muſæ Regnantes of Sir Iſaac Wake. He died at Iſlip on the ſixth of February 1609, aged forty three, and was buried in the Chancel of the Church there, with an inſcription to his memory. Mr. Wood aſſures us, that he had a very conſiderable hand in the tranſlation of the New Teſtament, appointed by King James I. in 1604 [A].

(a) Wood's Athenæ Oxonienſes, Vol. 1. Col. 354, 355. edit. 2. 1721.

[A] Had a conſiderable hand in the Tranſlation of the New Teſtament, appointed by King James I. in 1604.] The Tranſlation of the Bible was reſolved upon at the conference held at Hampton-court between the Commiſſioners for the Church and the Puritans in January 1603-4. This was undertaken in 1606. Fuller has given us (1) a liſt of the Tranſlators, which amounts to forty ſeven; but we do not find Dr. Aglionby's name among the reſt; tho' Mr. Wood tells us he had a conſiderable ſhare in the Verſion of the New Teſtament. But he mentions no authority for it. The Tranſlators of the four Goſpels, the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the Apocalypſe were, Dr. Ravis Dean of Chriſt-Church, afterwards Biſhop of London, Dr. Abbot Maſter of Univerſity-College, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. Eedas, Mr. Thompſon, Mr. Savill, Mr. Perryn, Dr. Ravens, Mr. Harmar. Theſe met at Oxford. The Tranſlators of the Epiſtles of St. Paul and the Canonical Epiſtles met at Weſtminſter, and were Dr. Barlowe of Trinity Hall in Cambridge, Dean of Cheſter, afterwards Biſhop of London, Dr. Hutchenſon, Dr. Spencer, Mr. Fenton, Mr. Rabbet, Mr. Sanderſon, Mr. Dakins. It is not improbable, that Dr. Aglionby might be one of thoſe eminent Divines in each of the Univerſities, who tho' not of the number of the Tranſlators, were aſſigned by the Vice-Chancellor, to conſult with other Heads of houſes for reviewing the whole Tranſlation. In any other view it ſeems impoſſible to account for Mr. Wood's aſſertion.

T.

(1) Church Hiſtory, book 10. See Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. Vol. 2. book 8. p. 693.

☞AGNES SOREAU or SOREL, diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Beautiful Agnes, was born at Fromenteau a Village of Touraine in the Dioceſe of Bourges, and was Lady of that place. King Charles VII. of France who knew her, when ſhe was in the Queen's ſervice, was extremely fond of her, and gave her the Caſtle of Beauté upon the Maine. Agnes very often reproached the King with his indolence; and in order to animate him to exert himſelf againſt the Engliſh, ſhe aſſured him, that an Aſtrologer had foretold her, that the greateſt King of the world ſhould honour her with his friendſhip; but ſhe found that this prediction had no relation to him, ſince he neglected to recover the dominions, which his enemies had uſurped. She told him therefore that in order to accompliſh this prophecy, ſhe muſt be obliged to go over to the King of England's court. The ſeverity of this remonſtrance touched Charles VII, in the moſt ſenſible manner; ſo that he took arms, and put himſelf in a condition of expelling the Engliſh out of his Kingdom (a). John Chartier (b) tells us, that this King's affection for Agnes was reſtrained within the bounds of modeſty and honour; but other authors inform us, that he had two daughters by her, Charlotte, who was afterwards married to Jacques de Breve, Count de Maulevrier, and Margaret, married to Oliver de Coetive, Lord of Taillebourg. She died the ninth of February 1450, at the caſtle of Menil, about a quarter of a league from Jumieges, and not at Jumieges, as ſeveral writers affirm; ſhe was then but forty years old. Her heart and bowels were buried at Jumieges, and her body was carried to the caſtle of Loches, where it was interred in the middle of the Choir of the Collegiate Church of Nôtre-Dame, under a tomb of black marble [A]. There was a report ſpread after her death that ſhe had been poiſoned [B]. King Francis I wrote an Epigram of four verſes under this Lady's picture [C].

(a) See Monſtrelet, Du Haillan, La Chronique de S. Denys ſur Charles VII. and Fleury, Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 110. tom. 22. p. 532, 533. edit. de Bruxelles 1726.

(b) Hiſt. de Charles VII.

[A] In the middle of the choir . . . under a tomb of black marble.] Her Statue is there of white marble, with two Angels holding a cuſhion upon which ſhe repoſes her head, and two lambs at her feet. She had been very liberal to this church; but after her death the Canons deſired Lewis XI. to give them leave to remove her monument from the middle of the choir to ſome other place, becauſe, as they alledged, it was very incommodious for them in performing the ceremonies of the church. They imagined that his averſion for her would continue even towards her aſhes. But he, inſtead of granting their requeſt, blamed them for it, and reproached them with ingratitude to ſo generous a Benefactreſs.

[B] That ſhe had been poiſoned.] James Cœur, who was attach'd to the intereſts of the Dauphin, who had a very great reſentment againſt this Lady, was ſuſpected of being bribed by that Prince for this purpoſe. He had been raiſed to a great degree of power and wealth from a very low condition, being the ſon of a private man at Bourges. He had applied himſelf at firſt to trade, in which he raiſed a conſiderable fortune by the extent of his genius, and his skill and addreſs in the management of affairs; ſo that he made himſelf known to the Court, which was very often at Bourges. The King ſoon diſcovered his abilities and prudence, and entruſted him with the care of his Finances; and afterwards gave him a place in his Council, and employed him in the moſt important of his affairs (1). Theſe extraordinary favours drew upon him the envy of many perſons: he was accuſed of having committed a great many frauds in the adminiſtration of the Finances; of having delivered up a Chriſtian to the Sultan of Ægypt, in order to avoid the loſs of his own merchandize; that of having poiſoned Agnes; and ſent a compleat harneſs to the Sultan of Babylon, that he might have others made from that pattern in order to equip his horſemen after the French manner. James Cœur was ſeized upon theſe accuſations, and committed to the caſtle of Luſignan in Poitou; and he was brought to trial at the ſuit of John Dauvet Attorney General of the Parliament at Paris. And tho' he cleared himſelf from every one of theſe charges, yet all his eſtate was confiſcated, he was condemned to pay 400,000 crowns to the King, and to be baniſhed to the iſle of Cyprus; where by his great capacity he found means to raiſe a very conſiderable fortune. He died there, as it is related, in a battle againſt the Infidels. A young woman, who had accuſed him of poiſoning Agnes, was afterwards found guilty of calumny, expell'd the Court and baniſhed. But he had juſtice done him after his death, and the Dauphin, when he came to the Crown under the name of Lewis XI, reſtored his ſon Geoffry Cœur to part of his father's eſtate (2).

(1) See Hiſt. de Charles VII. par Matthieu Coucy, and Fleury ubi ſupra.

(2) Fleury, ubi ſupra, p. 534.

[C] An Epigram of four verſes under this Lady's picture.] He was one day at the houſe of Artus Gouffier de Boiſſi, Count d'Eſtampes, who had been his Governor formerly, but was then Grand-Maſter of France; where he amuſed himſelf in turning over a Port-Folio, which was in Madam de Boiſſi's chamber. This Lady, who was of the family of Hangeſt, was extremely fond of painting, and had drawn in that Book the pictures of divers illuſtrious perſons, and among the reſt of Agnes Soreau. The King upon viewing theſe pictures made devices and verſes upon each of them, and wrote the following Epigram with his own hand under that of the beautiful Agnes:

Plus de louange & d'honneur tu merite
La cauſe étant de Franœ recouvrer,
Que ce que peut dedans un cloître ouvrer,
Cloſe Nonnain, ou bien devote Hermite.

"Since your deſign, fair Agnes, was to gain
"Your country's loſt dominions, you deſerve
"More commendation than the rigid Hermit,
"Or pious Nun, who ſhrowds her blooming charms
"Within the limits of a gloomy Convent."

We have theſe Verſes printed among the Poems of Melin de S. Gelais. T.

☞AGOBARD (a) Archbiſhop of Lyons, was one of the moſt celebrated and learned Prelates of the ninth Century. Dr. Cave (b) and Olearius (c) tells us he was a Frenchman; but Du Pin ſays (d), that there is no abſolute proof of this. He was born in the year 779, as Father Mabillon (e) obſerves from a ſhort martyrology, upon which Agobard ſeems to have written ſome Notes with his own hand. In the year 782 he came from Spain to France. Leidrade, Archbiſhop of Lyons, ordained him Prieſt in 804; and nine years after was appointed Coadjutor or Corepiſcopus to that Prelate (f). And the latter reſolving in 816 to retire to a monaſtery at Soiſſons in the beginning of the reign of Lewis the Debonnaire, Agobard was ſubſtituted in his room with the conſent of the Emperor, and the whole Synod of the French Biſhops (g), who approved of the choice which Leidrade had made of him for his ſucceſſor. However this ordination was objected againſt, becauſe it is contrary to the Canons, that a Biſhop ſhould

(a) He is ſometimes called Agobert, Agobald, or Agoband.
(b) Hiſtor. Liter. pag. 438. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720.
(c) Biblioth. Scriptor. Eccleſ. Vol. 1. p. 19. edit. Jenæ 1711.
(d) Nouvelle Bib. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 7. p. 140. edit. de Paris 1696.
(e) Itin. Ital. § 14. p. 68.

(f) See Du Pin, ubi ſupra, and in the Note (a).
(g) It is uncertain what Synod this was. Mr. Baluze ſuppoſes it to be that of Mentz in 813. But that Synod was held in the time of Charlemagne; whereas Leidrade did not retire and ordain Agobard till the reign of Lewis the Debonnaire. See Du Pin.

ſhould chooſe his ſucceſſor himſelf (b). However Agobard enjoyed this See quietly, till he was expelled from it by Lewis the Debonnaire, becauſe he had eſpouſed the party of his ſon Lotharius, and been one of the chief authors of depoſing him in the aſſembly of Biſhops at Compiegne in the year 833. For Lewis having ſecured himſelf againſt the injuſtice and violence which had been offered by Lotharius and the Biſhops of his party, proſecuted the latter in the council of Thionville in the year 835. Ebbo Archbiſhop of Rheims was obliged to acknowledge his fault, and to ſubmit to the ſentence of Depoſition. Agobard who had retired to Italy with the other Biſhops of his party, was ſummoned three times before the Council, and refuſing to appear, was depoſed; however no perſon was ſubſtituted in his room. His cauſe was again examined in the year 836, at an Aſſembly held at Stramiac near Lyons; but it continued ſtill undetermined, on account of the abſence of the Biſhops, whoſe ſole right it was to depoſe their brother. At laſt the ſons of Lewis the Debonnaire having made their peace with him, they found means to reſtore Agobard, who was preſent in the year 838 at an Aſſembly held at Paris by that Emperor's order; nay he even recovered the Emperor's favour, in whoſe attendance he died in Xaintonge the fifth of June 840 (i). His church honoured him with the title of Saint. He had no leſs ſhare in the affairs of the Church, than thoſe of the Empire; and he ſhewed by his writings that he was a much abler Divine than a Politician. He was a ſtrenuous defender of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline and the Canons of the Church. He was extremely tenacious of the opinions which he had once eſpouſed, and very vigorous in aſſerting and defending them (k). He was very little favourable to the worſhip of images [A]. He wrote a Treatiſe intitled, Adverſus Dogma Fælicis ad Ludovicum Imp. againſt Felix Orgelitanus, to ſhew, that Chriſt is the true and natural ſon of God, and not merely by Adoption and Grace. He wrote likewiſe ſeveral Tracts againſt the Jews [B], and other

(b) Du Pin, ſupra.

(i) Cave and Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(k) Cave, pag. 439.

[A] He was very little favourable to the worſhip of Images.] This is acknowledged by Mr. Dupin (1); who tells us, that tho' he ſeems at firſt to object only to the adoration of them, againſt which he alledges ſeveral paſſages of the Fathers; yet he afterwards maintains, that we ought not to make uſe of any viſible and external ſigns to repreſent ſpiritual objects, nor to pay them any kind of worſhip, not even that, which belongs to the Saints, whom they repreſent. He ſays that in the primitive Church the images of Chriſt and the Apoſtles were kept rather out of regard and affection to them, and to preſerve their memory, than from a principle of religion, or with a deſign to honour them. Nay he declares, that it would be very juſt and reaſonable, becauſe of the ſuperſtitions, which are occaſioned by them, to ſuppreſs them entirely, and to ſuffer none to be made uſe of. We find theſe aſſertions in his book, De Picturis & Imaginibus; which have thrown the Roman Catholic Writers into the greateſt perplexity imaginable. Papyrius Maſſo indeed owns ingeniouſly in his Preface to Agobard's Works, that in detecting the errors of the Greeks with regard to images and pictures, he has abſolutely denied, that they ought to be worſhip'd; which opinion, ſays that learned Writer, we Catholics all approve of, and follow the judgment of Gregory the Great in that point. Græcorum errores de imaginibus & picturis manifeſtè detegens, negat eos adorari debere; quam ſententiam omnes Catholici probamus, Gregoriique Magni teſtimonium de illis ſequimur. Mr. Baluze has written with greater caution in his notes upon Agobard; but he has not ventured to contradict ſo obvious a declaration againſt image-worſhip as that of Agobard; and he owns, that he wrote nothing upon that head, but what was agreeable to the general opinion of the Gallican Church at that time. However a late author of the Romiſh Church (2) has expreſly aſſerted, that Agobard allowed that a proper and religious worſhip was to be paid to images of Saints; Sanctorum imaginibus cultum aliquem & religioſum eſſe exhibendum; and this he tells us has been plainly demonſtrated againſt Mr. Daillé and other modern oppoſers of Saint-worſhip by Natalis Alexander (3). But how it is poſſible to overthrow ſuch expreſs aſſertions of Agobard to the contrary, let the impartial reader judge; ſince even the moſt learned of the Roman Catholic Writers have acknowledg'd this point to be inconteſtable.

(1) Ubi ſupra, p. 4.

(2) Fr. Ignat. Hyacinth. Ord. Fratr. præd. Hiſt. Eccleſ. tom. 3. p. 118. edit. Auguſtæ Vindelic. 1727.

(3) Diſſertat. VI. in Hiſtor. Sæcul. 9. p. 13.

[B] Several Tracts againſt the Jews.] De Inſolentiâ Judæorum ad Ludovic. Imper. i. e. "Of the Inſolence of the Jews, addreſſed to Lewis the Emperor." He complains here that the Commiſſioners, who had been ſent by him to Lyons, had taken part with the Jews againſt the Church, and made ſeveral decrees in their favour; nay had carried the matter ſo far, that they had advocated the cauſe of the Jews, and threatned ſome of the Biſhops. Agobard, who was abſent when this happened, wrote to the Commiſſioners; who paid no manner of regard to his letters. He therefore addreſſed himſelf to the Emperor, and informed him, that the Jews perſecuted him and his brethren only becauſe he had preached to the Chriſtians, that they ſhould not ſell their ſlaves to the Jews, nor ſuffer the Jews to ſell Chriſtians in Spain, nor to have Chriſtian ſervants; that they ſhould not let the Chriſtian women obſerve the Sabbath with them, nor permit them to travel on the Lord's Day; that they ſhould not eat with them in Lent, or of any thing, which they had killed, nor drink the wine, which they ſold; in ſhort that they ſhould have no familiarity or commerce with them, becauſe they blaſphemed Chriſt every day. He then deſcribes the inſolence of the Jews, when they found themſelves ſupported by the authority of the Commiſſioners. He concludes with deſiring the Emperor to regulate theſe diſorders. He join'd to this petition a letter written in his own name, and in that of Bernard, Archbiſhop of Vienne, and of another Biſhop, whoſe name was Eaef, or Taof, in which they alledge authorities from the Fathers and the Scripture, to juſtify the ſeverity, which they uſed againſt the Jews. They mention the example of St. Hilary, who would not ſalute them; and that of St. Ambroſe, who wrote, that he would ſuffer death rather than cauſe a Synagogue of the Jews, which had been burnt down by the Chriſtians to be rebuilt. To theſe Fathers they add St. Cyprian and St. Athanaſius, who were againſt the Jews. They urge next the Canons of the Councils of Spain and of Agatha, which forbid Chriſtians from eating with the Jews, and the decree of the firſt Council of Maſcon, which declares, that according to the edict of Childebert, it was not lawful for the Jews to be Judges, or Receivers of the public Monies, nor to appear in public in the holy week; and renews the prohibition againſt Chriſtians eating with them. This is confirmed by the Canons of the firſt and third Council of Orleans, and that of Laodicea, which reſtrains Chriſtians from having any correſpondence with them. They do not forget to mention the example of St. John, who went away from the bath, when he ſaw Cerinthus, who was an heretic of the Jewiſh Sect, enter it. They accuſe the Jews of thoſe times of being even more criminal than Cerinthus, of believing a corporeal God, of maintaining low and groſs conceptions of the Deity, and aſſerting that the letters of their Alphabet are eternal

other works, of which we ſhall give ſome abſtracts in a Note [C]. His manner of writing is ſimple, intelligible, and natural, but without any elevation or ornament. His books are interſperſed with a great number of quotations, and long paſſages from Scripture and the Fathers, according to the cuſtom of that time. He reaſons generally very juſtly upon the ſubjects which he treats of, and writes like a man well verſed in the Doctrines of the Fathers and the Diſcipline of the Church (l). His works were buried in nal, that the law was written many years before the creation of the world, and that there are a great many worlds and earths beſides this. They charged them likewiſe with introducing a great many Fables concerning the Old Teſtament, blaſpheming Jeſus Chriſt, publiſhing falſe and ſpurious acts of Pilate, treating the Chriſtians as idolaters, becauſe they honoured the Saints; and committing infamous actions in their Synagogue. From whence they conclude that if there is an obligation to ſeparate from Heretics, there is much greater reaſon to refrain from all converſation with the Jews; and they attempt to juſtify this by ſeveral paſſages of Scripture (4). He wrote likewiſe ſeveral other pieces relating to the Jews, as particularly, De Judaicis Superſtitionibus, i. e. "Of the Superſtitions of the Jews." Liber de Baptiſmo Judaicorum Mancipiorum, i. e. "Of the "Baptiſm of Jewiſh Slaves. Epiſtola exhortatoria ad Nibridium Epiſcopum Narbonenſem de cavendo convictu & ſocietate Judaicâ. i. e. "An exhortatory "Epiſtle to Nibridius Archbiſhop of Narbonne a- "gainſt maintaining any commerce or familiarity "with the Jews." Epiſtola ad Proceres Palatii contra præceptum impium de Baptiſmo Judaicorum Mancipiorum, i. e. "An Epiſtle to the Noblemen (5) of "the Imperial Palace againſt the impious edict con- "cerning the Baptiſm of Jewiſh ſlaves." Epiſtola ad Matfredum Procerem Palatii, i. e. "An Epiſtle to "Matfrede a Nobleman of the palace (6)."

(l) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(4) See Du Pin, ubi ſupra, pag. 142, 143.

(5) Hilduis, great Chaplain to the Prince and the Abbot Vala.

(6) Dr. Cave, ubi ſupra.

[C] Other works, which we ſhall give ſome abſtracts of in a note.] I. Liber adverſus Legem Gundobardi & impia certamina, quæ per eam geruntur, i. e. "A Diſcourſe againſt the Law of Gondebaud, "and the impious combats, which are appointed by it. This Law decreed, that the diſputes between particular men ſhould be decided by a ſingle combat, or by ſome other trial, and not by the depoſition of witneſſes. He repreſents how contrary this Law, which was made by an Arian Prince, was to the genius of the Goſpel, to the charity, which Chriſtians owe to each other, and to the peace of the ſtate and of the Church. He obſerves that this is a Law neither of Moſes nor of the Goſpel; that the Chriſtian Religion is not eſtabliſhed by ſuch kinds of combats, but by the death of thoſe, who preach it; and that the guilty very often have the advantage over the innocent in ſuch combats. He adds, that Avitus Biſhop of Vienne, who had ſeveral conferences with Gondebaud upon Religion, and had converted his ſon Sigiſmund, had diſapproved of his cuſtom. He complains that the Canons of the Church of France ſhould be ſo little regarded; and at laſt he declares, that he could wiſh that all the King's ſubjects had but one and the ſame Law; but ſince he thought it almoſt impoſſible, he deſires at leaſt that this cuſtom, which was ſo unjuſt and prejudicial to the State, ſhould be aboliſhed. II. Ad Bernardum Epiſcopum de privilegio & jure ſacerdotii, i. e. "A Diſcourſe concerning the "Privileges and Rights of the Prieſthood, addreſſed "to Bernard Biſhop of Vienne." In this piece he obſerves, that all Chriſtians being members of Chriſt, who is the High-Prieſt, are Kings and Prieſts of the Lord; that we ought not to regard a Prieſt, when he teaches a doctrine contrary to that of Chriſt. He complains of the diſorders of that age; that men of no abilities, or character, or fortune, were raiſed to the Prieſthood, and kept by Noblemen in their families, to perform the loweſt and moſt ſervile offices. He exhorts the laity to pay due reverence to the Sacraments, whoever adminiſters them; and adviſes the Biſhops to take great care not to be partakers of other mens ſins, by conferring Orders upon vicious or ignorant and inſufficient perſons. III. De Grandine & Tonitruis Liber, i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning Hail and "Thunder." This is a very judicious piece, deſigned to undeceive the people, who were poſſeſſed with abſurd notions, that ſorcerers and witches were able to raiſe ſtorms of thunder and hail by their enchantments. He ſhews at firſt, from ſeveral paſſages of Scripture, that it is a great inſtance of weakneſs and even a kind of ſacrilege to aſcribe to men what belongs only to God. He ridicules the fancy of thoſe, who imagined, that there was a region in the air, whither the corn and fruits were convey'd to, which were beaten down by the hail. He ſhews from Scripture, that it is God alone, who chaſtiſes men with theſe ſcourges; that whatever is done in the air, is the effect of his power, either by himſelf immediately, or by the Angels, or men: that he is the only Mover and Creator of the univerſe; that if theſe wicked men had it in their power to injure and deſtroy others in that manner, all their enemies would be treated ſo; that we cannot find, that men have any methods of moving the air and ſky in ſuch a manner, the nature of which elements they know nothing of; that moſt of the ſtories of that kind, when examined throughly, prove falſe, tho' there are perſons ſtupid enough to expoſe themſelves to death by confeſſing them; juſt as it happened ſome little time before, when Grimoald Duke of Benevento was accuſed of having diſperſed every where a powder, which killed all the oxen. How is it poſſible, ſays he, that there ſhould be a powder, which ſhould deſtroy only the oxen without injuring other animals? Or how could ſuch a vaſt quantity of powder be procured? Who could diſperſe it every where, in order to execute ſuch a deſign (7)? IV. Liber contra Objectiones Fredigiſi Abbatis; i. e. "An Anſwer to the Objections of Fredegiſe Abbot of "St. Martin at Tours." This Abbot had objected againſt ſome paſſages in one of Agobard's writings, which the latter found himſelf obliged to defend. The firſt expreſſion, that Fredegiſe attacked, was, that he, who is humble, and has a low opinion of himſelf, muſt believe himſelf obnoxious to error. He urged againſt this aſſertion, that Chriſt was humble, and yet it is certain he could not imagine himſelf liable to error. Agobard anſwers, that his maxim is not to be underſtood as being in the leaſt applicable to our Saviour, who diveſted himſelf of his tranſcendent dignity, and humbled himſelf voluntarily, without the leaſt abatement of his power or exemption from the poſſibility of ſinning. But he confirms his aſſertion with regard to mankind, who are univerſally ſubject to error and ſin. Fredegiſe accuſed him likewiſe of having attacked the authority of the Scripture and the Interpreters, becauſe he had remark'd, that the rules of Grammar are not always obſerved in them. Agobard anſwers to this, that this ought not to make us doubt in the leaſt of the truth of the things related in Scripture; that the Interpreters have neglected thoſe rules, in order either to accommodate themſelves to the capacity of the vulgar, or to expreſs the ſenſe of the original more fully; that we muſt not doubt of the authority of the writers, whom the Holy Ghoſt has employed in compoſing the Canonical Books, or imagine, that they ought to have written in any other manner than they have done. That next to the originals, we ought likewiſe to acknowledge the authority of the verſion of the Septuagint, and St. Jerom's tranſlation from the Hebrew, and not to deſpiſe the Latin verſions, which have been made by Catholics from the Septuagint, but that there are ſeveral Interpreters, which may juſtly be objected to and corrected, particularly thoſe famous Heretics and Half-Jews, Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus, as well as the Latin Interpreters, whom St. Jerom has complained of; in ſhort, that with reſpect to Interpreters we ought to follow St. Auſtin's rule, who leaves us a liberty of judging and rejecting every thing that we do not find to be juſt or true in their writings. He proceeds then to examine into the inſpiration of the Scriptures, and aſſerts, that it is abſurd to imagine, that the Holy Ghoſt inſpired the Prophets and Apoſtles with the expreſſions and words, which they in obſcurity for ſeveral ages, till Papirius Maſſo found a manuſcript of them by chance in a bookbinder's ſhop at Lyons, who was juſt going to cut it to pieces to bind his books with. Maſſo publiſhed this manuſcript at Paris in 1603 in 8vo (m), and the original was after his death depoſited by his brother in the King of France's Library. But Maſſo having ſuffered many errors to eſcape him in his edition, Mr. Baluze publiſhed a more correct edition at Paris in 2 Vol. in 8vo in 1666 from the ſame manuſcript; made uſe of: To prove this point, he alledges the inſtance of Moſes, who ſays, that he had an impediment in his ſpeech; and he produces the teſtimony of St. Jerom, who acknowledges, that there is a difference of ſtyle between the writings of the Prophets and the Apoſtles, ſome of whom write with greater eloquence and dignity, others leſs nobly and politely, and ſometimes the ſame writer differently in different writings. This difference cannot be aſcribed to the Holy Ghoſt, and therefore it muſt be attributed to the men; and conſequently they, and not the Holy Ghoſt, are the authors of the words and expreſſions, which they make uſe of, tho' the latter inſpired them with the matter and ſenſe, which they were to write. In anſwer to the third queſtion, he attacks the ſentiment of his adverſary, who aſſerted, that the ſoul might be ſaid to be created apart from the body; and he maintains, that we ought to believe, that it is created in the body and with the body, tho' the Philoſophers imagine the contrary, and St. Auſtin was in doubt concerning it. He replies next to a queſtion propoſed to him, Whether Truth is any thing but God; in anſwer to which he affirms, that Truth is not always taken for God himſelf, tho' we cannot doubt, but that God is Truth. In the laſt place he defends himſelf for aſſerting that juſt men under the old Law might be ſaid to have been Chriſtians, ſince they believed in Chriſt, and were anointed with the inviſible oil of his grace, as well as thoſe, who are juſt men among the Heathens (8). V. Epiſtola ad Bartholomæum Epiſcopum Narbonenſem de quorundam inluſione ſignorum. This Letter was written by Agobard in his own name and that of Hildegiſus and Florus, who were Prieſts of Lyons, to Bartholomew Biſhop of Narbonne; and he mentions in it a certain diſtemper, which ſeized perſons of a ſudden, and made them fall down upon the ground as if they were troubled with an epilepſy; nay ſome of them felt a burning, which left an incurable wound. This happened very commonly in the churches; and the people being terrified at it, uſed to give conſiderable preſents to the churches in order to preſerve themſelves from this calamity. Agobard diſapproves of this practice, and examining into the cauſe of this diſeaſe, affirms that it muſt be reſolved into the will of God, who puniſhes men thus by the miniſtry of Angels. He then mentions ſeveral inſtances of ſuch judgments taken from Scripture, in which God has executed his juſtice by Angels, and even by mere animals themſelves. He aſſerts that theſe kinds of puniſhments are not inflicted by Devils, tho' he owns that God ſometimes permits them to diſturb and injure men. He returns then to the Biſhop's queſtion, what we are to think of thoſe perſons, who come to the churches, where they have been ſeized, and bring preſents to them: he ſays, that fear occaſions them to do what they ought not, and hinders them from doing what they ought; for it would be much better, ſays he, to give alms to the poor and the ſtranger, to apply themſelves to the Prieſt to receive the unction, according to the precept of the Goſpel and the Apoſtle, to faſt, to pray, and to perform works of charity. It is true, continues he, if theſe gifts to the church were employed as they ought, it would be an act of charity; but becauſe at preſent they ſerve only to gratify the avarice of men, and not to honour God or aſſiſt the poor, it is a ſhame to give to thoſe, who are inſatiably covetous, and who only hoard it up, or ſpend it in an improper manner. VI. Epiſtola ad Lugdunenſes de Modo Regiminis Eccleſiaſtici, i. e. "An Epiſtle to "the Clergy of Lyons concerning the manner of "Eccleſiaſtical Government." This was occaſioned by a conteſt among them about the Adminiſtration of the Church. It is a pathetic addreſs to them to apply themſelves entirely to the good of the Church, and to diveſt themſelves of all irregular and ſelfiſh purſuits and deſigns. VII. De Diſpenſatione Eccleſiaſticarum Rerum Liber. He remonſtrates in this piece againſt the abuſe of ſeizing the eſtates and emoluments of the Church, which were deſigned for the ſupport of the Miniſters and the relief of the poor, and turning them to other purpoſes. Nor does he complain only of the Laity on that account, but even involves the Biſhops, and Abbots, and others of the Clergy, in the ſame condemnation, whenever they make any other uſe of the goods of the Church, than what is agreeable to the laws of it, and the doctrine of the Fathers. VIII. Liber contra Judicium Dei, ſive De Divinis Sententiis, cum breviſſimis adnotationibus, contra damnabilem opinionem putantium divini judicii veritatem igne, vel aquis, vel conflictu armorum patefieri. This Diſcourſe was deſigned to explode the common methods of trying the innocence of perſons by ſingle combat, or obliging them to hold an hot iron, or to put their fingers into hot water, and other proofs of that kind. This cuſtom he ſhews to be contrary to the Spirit of the Goſpel, to Chriſtian charity, right reaſon, and the principles of our Religion. IX. Sermo exhortatorius ad plebem de fidei veritate & totius boni inſtitutione. In this Sermon to the people he diſcourſes of the chief Articles of Faith the Trinity, the Incarnation, Redemption, Union of Chriſt with the Church, the Neceſſity of Grace in order to do well and reſiſt temptations, the Duty of bearing Evil, the Obligation of Prayer, &c. which articles he confirms from paſſages of Scripture and the Fathers. X. De Diviſione Imperii Francorum inter filios Ludovici Imperatoris flebilis Epiſtola. i. e. "A "pathetic Epiſtle concerning the Diviſion of the Em- "pire of the Franks among the ſons of Lewis the "Emperor." This was addreſſed to that Emperor in 833, when he was at war with his ſons. XI. De Comparatione utriuſque Regiminis Eccleſiaſtici & Politici, & in quibus Eccleſiæ dignitas præfulgeat Imperiorum Majeſtati, i. e. "A Compariſon between the Eccle- "ſiaſtical and Civil Government, ſhewing in what "points the dignity of the Church is ſuperior to that "of the State. This was deſigned as an anſwer to the Emperor's order, which he iſſued out to the great Men, both of the Clergy and the Laity, charging them to be ready to combat for him, the one with the ſword, and the other with their tongue. To this piece is added, XII. Epiſtola Gregorii IV. Papæ ad Epiſcopos Regni Francici, i. e. "An Epiſtle of Pope Gregory IV. to the Biſhops of France. He wrote likewiſe, XIII. Liber Apologeticus pro filiis Ludovici Pii Imperatoris adverſus patrem, i. e. "An Apology for "the ſons of the Emperor Lewis the Debonnaire "againſt their father." He endeavours to ſhew in this writing, that they had taken arms only for the good of the State, their deſign being to purge the Court of all the cabals and enormities there, and to reſtore an union and good underſtanding between them and their father, and eſpecially to put a ſtop to the public diſorders of their mother-in-law, whom they had once confined; but ſhe having gained her liberty, had inflamed their father againſt them, and was perpetually raiſing tumults and diſturbances. They charged the Emperor with breach of his oath; and raiſing troops, which ought to have been employed againſt the Barbarians; and accuſe the Queen of committing indecent actions in public, and even before the Biſhops. Agobard adds, that the intereſt of the Public requires them to endeavour after the peace of the Empire; which is impoſſible to be done without having recourſe to the ſource of theſe misfortunes, which was nothing elſe but the irregular conduct, debauchery and ambition of the Queen whom he compares to Jezabel and Dalilah; and who had ſuch an entire aſcendant over the Emperor, that ſhe had occaſioned him to commit a great many inſtances of injuſtice; for which he had been obliged to do penance, and reſign the Crown to his ſon.

(7) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, p. 144.

(m) Cave, ubi ſupra, p. 440. Mr. Du Pin p. 150. and Olearius ſays it was in 1605.

(8) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, p. 144, 145.

ſcript, and illuſtrated it with Notes. He likewiſe added to it a Treatiſe of Agobard againſt Amalarius's Book of Offices, intitled, Contra quatuor libros Amalarii Liber, which he copied from an old manuſcript of Peter Marnæſius, and collated with another manuſcript of Chifflet. This edition has been likewiſe reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum (n). Moreri has committed a few errors in this Article.

(n) Tom. 14. p. 234.

Theſe laſt words ſhew, that this book was written ſome time after the Emperor Lewis was depoſed in 833. XIV. Cartula porrecta Lothario Auguſto in Synodo Compendienſi, i. e. "A memorial addreſſed to the "Emperor Lotharius in the Synod of Compiegne." This was written in the year 833, and ſigned by him, (as was done by every one, of the other Biſhops,) and offered to Lotharius, expreſſing his approbation of the depoſing of his father Lewis. XV. Epiſtola ad Ebbonem Epiſcopum Remenſem de Spe & Timore; i. e. "An Epiſtle to Ebbo Archbiſhop of "Rheims concerning Hope and Fear." It conſiſted of a collection of paſſages of the Scriptures upon thoſe ſubjects; but we have only the Preface now remaining. XVI. De Divinâ Pſalmodiâ Liber, i. e. "Of divine "Pſalmody;" in which he defends the manner of ſinging in the church of Lyons againſt the objections, which were made to it by Amalarius the Deacon, as Mr. Baluze is of opinion. XVII. De Correctione Antiphonarii Liber. Agobard's works end with two pieces of Poetry; one is the Epitaph of Charlemagne; and the other Verſes upon the Tranſlation of the Relicks of St. Cyprian, St. Speratus, and St. Pantaleon, which were brought from Africa and Arles to Lyons (9). T.

(9) Cave, ubi ſupra.

AGREDA (a) (MARIA D') a fanatical or viſionary Nun, famous for a book, which was cenſured by the Sorbonne, lived in the ſeventeenth Century. Francis Coronel her father, and Catharine de Arena her mother, who lived at Agreda, a town of Spain, founded a Convent in their Houſe the 19th of January 1619. They were engaged in this deſign by a particular revelation. Our Maria took upon her the habit of a Nun the ſame day with her mother and ſiſter. She was profeſſed with her mother the ſecond of February 1620 (b). She was choſen Superior of the Convent in the year 1627; and during the ten firſt years of her charge, ſhe received from God and the Virgin Mary repeated commands to write the Life of the Bleſſed Virgin. She reſiſted theſe commands till the year 1637, in which ſhe began to write. But having finiſhed it, ſhe committed it to the flames, together with ſeveral other writings, which ſhe had compoſed upon other ſubjects. In that affair ſhe followed the advice of a Confeſſor, who had the care of her conſcience during the abſence of her ordinary Confeſſor. But her Superiors, and particularly her former Confeſſor reprimanded her ſeverely for it, and commanded her to write a ſecond time the Life of the Bleſſed Virgin. Beſides which ſhe received a new injunction from God and the Virgin herſelf. She began again in obedience to theſe commands the eighth of December (c) 1655. She divided her work into three parts, containing eight books, which were printed at Liſbon, Madrid, Perpignan and Antwerp. The firſt part was tranſlated from Spaniſh into French from the edition at Perpignan, by Father Croſet a Franciſcan. This tranſlation was printed at Marſeilles in the year 1696 (d). There are ſo many abſurdities in that work [A], though at the ſame time ſo well adapted to pleaſe the extravagant devotees of the bleſſed Virgin, that the Faculty of Divinity at Paris thought proper to fix a cenſure upon it [B]. This point was carried by them in ſpite of all the oppoſition

(a) She was called ſo commonly for brevity's ſake; but that was not the name of her family, but only that of the town, where the monaſtery was founded, of which ſhe was Superior.

(b) The profeſſing of her ſiſter was deferred, becauſe ſhe was not of age. See the Journal des Savans of the 16th of Jan. 1696, p. 51, 52. of the Holland edition.

(c) That is the day of the Conception of the Virgin Mary in the Kalendar.

(d) See the Journal des Savans of the 16th of Jan. 1696.

[A] There are ſo many abſurdities in that work.] We are told there, "That as ſoon as the Virgin came "into the world, the Almighty ordered the Angels "to convey that lovely Infant to the Empyrian Hea"ven; which they did ſeveral times. That God aſ"ſigned an hundred of each of the nine choirs of "Angels, that is nine hundred Angels, to wait upon "her; and that afterwards he appointed twelve "others to ſerve her in a viſible and corporeal "ſhape; and then eighteen more of the higheſt Or"der, who deſcended by Jacob's ladder to carry "meſſages from the Queen to the King. That for "the better government of this invincible Troop, "St. Michael, the Prince of the heavenly Hoſt, was "appointed their Captain. That the body of the "Bleſſed Virgin was firſt conceived on a Sabbath"day agreeably to that of the creation of the Angels. "That if the Virgin did not ſpeak as ſoon as ſhe "was born, it was not becauſe ſhe could not, but "becauſe ſhe was not willing. That before ſhe was "three years old ſhe ſwept the houſe, in which "work ſhe was aſſiſted by Angels, &c." There are a thouſand chimerical ſtories of that kind. Theſe extracts are given us by a Proteſtant Journal-Writer (1). Another Journaliſt, who is a good Catholic, aſſures us (2), that we find nothing in the firſt ſix chapters, but viſions, in which Siſter Maria de Jeſus tells us, that God diſcovered to her the myſteries of the Bleſſed Virgin, and the decrees which he made to create all things. That in the twentieth chapter (3), ſhe gives an account of what happened to the Bleſſed Virgin during the nine months, in which ſhe was in the womb of St. Anne; that ſhe proceeds then to the birth of the Virgin, the name which was given her, the Angels who had charge over her, the employments of the firſt eighteen months of her infancy, the converſation which ſhe had with God at the end of thoſe eighteen months, her diſcourſes with St. Joachim and St. Anne, and the holy exerciſes which ſhe applied herſelf to till ſhe was placed in the temple at Jeruſalem. If any one ſhould imagine, that among ſo many viſions, there is nothing concerning the Apocalypſe, he is very much deceived; for our Maria, not content with having explained the 12th chapter of the Revelations of St. John, has given us a full and particular explication of the 20th chapter, as it relates to the Conception of the Bleſſed Virgin (4). It would indeed be very ſurprizing, that in traverſing ſo extenſive an Ocean for ſeveral years together, ſhe ſhould not touch upon this rock. The title of this work in the tranſlation of Thomas Croſet is as follows: The Myſtical City of God, the Miracle of Omnipotence, the Abyſs of Grace, or, the Divine Hiſtory of the Life of the moſt Bleſſed Virgin Mary Mother of God, our Queen and Lady, manifeſted in theſe latter ages by the Bleſſed Virgin to Siſter Maria de Jeſus, Abbeſs of the Convent of the Immaculate Conception in the city of Agreda, of the Order of St. Francis, and written by the ſaid Siſter at the command of her Superiors and Confeſſors.

(1) Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, Novemb. 1698. p. 140, 141.
(2) Journal des Savans of the 16th of January 1696. p. 52.
(3) Ibid. p. 53.
(4) Journal des Savans of the 16th of January 1696. p. 53.

[B] The Faculty of Divinity at Paris thought proper to fix a Cenſure upon it.] The Cenſure, which they publiſhed, is known to me only by the Journal des Savans, where I find, I. That the ſixth propoſition condemn'd intimates, that God gave to the Bleſſed Virgin all that he was willing to give, and that he was willing to give her all that he could, and that he could give her every thing but his own Eſſence (5).

(5) Idem of the 26th of Nov. 1696. p. 717.

II, That

oppoſition and clamour, which was raiſed by ſome of the Doctors of that Faculty [C].

II. That the ſeventh propoſition is in theſe terms: "I declare upon the force of truth and of the light, "in which I perceive all theſe ineffable myſteries, "that all the privileges, graces, prerogatives, fa- "vours, and gifts of the pure and ſpotleſs Mary, "which comprehend the dignity of Mother of God, "depend and take their origin from her being im- "maculate and full of grace at her conception; ſo "that, without this privilege, all the others would "appear defective, or like a magnificent building "without any ſolid and proportionable foundation "(6)." III. That the ninth propoſition explains the words of the eighth Chapter of the Proverbs literally as relating to the Bleſſed Virgin, and inſinuates that BY HER KINGS ARE RAISED AND SUPPORTED ON THEIR THRONES, PRINCES GOVERN, AND THE RULERS OF THE EARTH ADMINISTER JUSTICE (7). IV. That the thirteenth propoſition imports, that if men had their eyes ſtrong and penetrating enough to perceive the Lights of the Bleſſed Virgin, they would be ſufficient to convey them to an happy immortality (8). V. That beſides theſe propoſitions there are ſeveral others contained under the fourteenth article, and which are particularly condemned as raſh and contrary to the wiſe rules, which the Church has preſcribed. To which is added, that the greateſt part of them ſavour of a fabulous humour and the chimeras of apocryphal authors, and expoſe the Catholic Religion to the contempt of infidels and heretics (9). VI. That with reſpect to the reſt, the Faculty declares, that they do not pretend to approve of ſeveral other things contained in that book, and eſpecially thoſe places, in which the author perverts the Text of Scripture, in applying it to her own ſenſe and prejudices, and where ſhe proteſts, that the opinions, which are merely ſcholaſtical, were immediately revealed to her. Let us make a few ſhort reflections upon this ſubject.

(6) Journal des Savans of the 26th of Nov. 1696. p. 717.

(7) Ibid. p. 718.

(8) Ibid. p. 719.

(9) Ibid. p. 720.

I. In the firſt place, the School-Divines generally teach, that the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic of the Deity and of the Creatures, is, that God has nothing in his nature derived or adventitious, but that the creatures have nothing, but what is derived from ſome other cauſe. Theſe characters they expreſs by the barbarous terms Aſeitas and Abalieitas; from whence they conclude, that all the Attributes of God are communicable to the creature except the Aſeitas; and conſequently, that it is poſſible for a creature to be eternal à parte ante, and à parte poſt (10), and infinite with reſpect to knowledge, power, local preſence, goodneſs, juſtice, &c. They teach, generally, that by the obediential power, the creatures are capable of the faculty of working miracles, and even the power of immediate creation. If God therefore actually conferred upon the Bleſſed Virgin all that he could, it follows, according to the eſtabliſhed maxims of the ſchools, which Siſter Maria de Jeſus boaſts ſo highly of, that the Virgin muſt have exiſted from eternity, that ſhe is omnipotent, omniſcient, that ſhe fills every place, and in ſhort that ſhe is infinite in every reſpect. I have nothing to do but to ſuppoſe that our Abbeſs of Agreda regulated herſelf upon the opinions of the Spaniſh School-Divines; for it is no matter whether ſhe underſtood them or not. She tells us expreſly, that God gave to the Bleſſed Virgin every thing that he could, and that he could confer upon her all his attributes, except the Divine Eſſence itſelf. This is ſufficient for me to draw the concluſion, as I have done; and ſince it is thus, is it not aſtoniſhing, that the Sorbonne ſays only, that this propoſition is falſe, raſh, and contrary to the doctrine of the Goſpel (11)? Is not ſuch a cenſure much too tender? Ought they to have ſatisfied themſelves with theſe mild expreſſions? Was it ſufficient to ſay, that ſhe was raſh and erroneous, when ſhe applies to the Virgin Mary the literal ſenſe of thoſe words of Solomon, By me Kings reign, and the Princes of the earth decree juſtice (12)?

(10) That is, which has neither beginning nor end.

(11) Journal des Savans, Nov. 1696. p. 717.

(12) Ibid. p. 718.

II. My ſecond reflection is this: Thoſe who have examined attentively all that is ſaid concerning the power of the Bleſſed Virgin, and the ſhare that is given her in the government of the univerſe, have obſerved, that ſucceeding authors by endeavouring to ſurpaſs their predeceſſors, have brought this matter now to the very extremity of flattery, ſo that it is impoſſible to go further in their compliments. But as the reaſons of this extravagant humour of exceeding each other have never been diſcontinued; for when the devotion of people muſt be the ſpring of riches for a great number of men, who are willing to live in eaſe and affluence, there is a neceſſity of awakening this ſuperſtition, and keeping it alive from time to time by the entertainments of a new invention: as this, I ſay, makes it uſeful to break all bounds of probability, it is wonderful, that they have not gone one ſtep further, and that among ſo many Monks and Nuns, who have indulged this humour of invention, there has not been one yet, who has aſſerted, that the Bleſſed Virgin governs the world alone. How comes it to paſs, that Spain has not yet produced ſome writer or other, who ſhould boaſt, that he has learn'd by revelation, that God the Father having found by long experience the infinite capacity of the Bleſſed Virgin, and the excellent uſe that ſhe had made of the power, which he had inveſted her with, had reſolved to abdicate the Empire of the Univerſe; and that God the Son, conſidering he could not follow a better example, had taken the ſame reſolution; ſo that the Holy Ghoſt, who always acts conformably to the will of thoſe two perſons, from whom he proceeds, approving this excellent deſign, the whole Trinity had thus reſigned the government of the world into the hands of the Bleſſed Virgin? That the ceremony of the abdication, and of the tranſlation of the Empire, was performed ſolemnly in the preſence of all the Angels; that there was an act for that purpoſe made in the moſt authentic form; that ever ſince this time God has never interpoſed in any affairs of the univerſe, but repoſes the whole upon the conduct of the Virgin Mary; that orders were given to ſeveral Angels to publiſh this change of Government over the earth, to the end that men might know to whom and in what manner they ſhould hereafter apply in all their acts of invocation: not to God, becauſe he had declared himſelf diſengaged from the care of this world, nor yet to the the Bleſſed Virgin, as a Mediatrix or ſubordinate Queen, but as the ſovereign and abſolute Empreſs of the univerſe? How comes it, I ſay again, that ſuch an extravagance as this ſtill remains to be publiſhed to the world? But it will be ſaid, Have you never heard of ſuch a Rodomontade as this? I confeſs I never have; but I would not ſwear, that ſuch a thought never has appeared, much leſs that it never will riſe in the brain of ſome mad enthuſiaſt. And perhaps if Maria d'Agreda had lived ten years longer, ſhe might have produced this monſter (13), and given us a copy of the Act of Abdication, wherein we ſhould have ſeen, that the Trinity being deſirous to live henceforward at eaſe, and to acknowledge their obligations to the Bleſſed Virgin, who had ſo wiſely ſuſtained for ſeveral ages a great part of the fatigue in the Government of the world, was of opinion, that there could be nothing more proper, nor any recompence more ſuitable to her merits, than to diveſt themſelves of their Government, and to conſign over to her an abſolute authority over the whole world. However it muſt be confeſſed, that the idea of the inalienable power of the Deity is ſo well underſtood in all Chriſtian communions, that there is no reaſon to apprehend, that this chimera of an abdication could have ſubſiſted long, ſuppoſing it had ever riſen. We need not fear ſuch a thing in our days: this may ſatisfy us, and therefore we have no occaſion to torment ourſelves with phantoms, which may appear an hundred years hence. Let poſterity look to that. Noſtros maneat illa cura nepotes.

III. I obſerve in the third place, that there is nothing more true, than the remark of the Sorbonne, that the book of the Abbeſs of Agreda contains many things, which expoſe the Church of Rome to the contempt and ridicule of infidels and heretics. Happy was it for the Chriſtian Religion, that Celſus and Porphyry had not the opportunity of attacking it with thoſe arms, which an infinite number of books of that kind might furniſh them with now. What might not a Pagan Author, who had the vivacity and zeal

(13) We may obſerve, that as ſhe has a talent at perverting the Scripture in ſo egregious a manner, (See the Journal des Savans, Nov. 1696. p. 720.) ſhe could not fail of taking the advantage of what is written in St. John v. 22. The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son; and of another paſſage in the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians xv. 24. When Chriſt ſhall have delivered up the Kingdom unto God, even the Father.

Faculty [C]. This cenſure, however juſt it was, notwithſtanding gave great ſcandal to a vaſt number of people. It is ſuppoſed, that the apprehenſion of this ſcandal obliged the Faculty to inſert in their Act a Declaration [D], which without ſuch a conſideration would have zeal of Arnobius, ſay at this time againſt the church? If Henry Stevens, or Philip de Marnix were to come again into the world, what additions might they receive from the Myſtical City of Maria d'Agreda, the one to his Apology for Herodotus, and the other to his Repreſentation of the Differences of Religion?

IV. In the laſt place I ſay, that theſe authors, who pretend to revelation, impoſe egregiouſly upon the world. They give us that for immediate revelation, which they have learned by their own reading. For inſtance, here is the Abbeſs of Agreda, who affirms, that thoſe opinions, which are merely ſcholaſtic, were diſcovered to her from heaven (14).

(14) Journal des Savans, Nov. 1696. p. 720.

[C] In ſpite of all the oppoſition .... raiſed by ſeveral Doctors of the Faculty.] Here follow ſome extracts from a piece intitled, The Affair of Maria d'Agreda, and the manner in which her condemnation was procured by a cabal of the Sorbonne (15). It is a letter from an anonymous perſon to an anonymous one. The odour of ſanctity in which this excellent Nun died, and the canonization of her, which has been ſollicited at Rome, had given me ſo high an opinion of her perſon, that I was ſurprized to hear that the Faculty of Divinity at Paris had aſſembled in order to condemn her writings. Thus ſpeaks our author (16). Then he proceeds to ſuppoſe, That they were ſome mercenary ſouls, who, at the ſollicitation of three Prelates, to whom they were devoted, procured her condemnation (17). " The whole intrigue, con" tinues he (18), was managed thus. My Lord ***,
" a Prelate more firmly attach'd to the ſentiments of " St. Thomas Aquinas, than a young Jacobine, who " is obliged to ſwear implicitly in verba Magiſtri,
" could never bear that the Faculty ſhould give into
" the immaculate Conception of the Virgin with ſo
" much precipitation. The hatred which he enter" tained againſt Father Thomas Croſet, a Franciſcan,
" and the Tranſlator of that book, and which was
" occaſioned by a report that the Tranſlator had ſpoke
" againſt him, upon refuſal of a ſtation in his Dio-
" ceſe, and a deſire to make amends to A .... the " King's Printer, who lives here now, for a conſi-
" derable loſs, which he ſuſtained by his works, and
" who had bought the impreſſion of this book,
" printed by H .... at Marſeilles, were the grounds
" of this uproar amongſt the Faculty; for in order
" to ſell a book ſoon, it is ſufficient to procure it
" to be condemned. Every body runs for it as it
" were to a fire; and this book, which was not " worth above twenty Sous, was ſold by A ... for " ten Livres, beſides what was ſold privately of " a counterfeit impreſſion. This Prelate, in order
" to ſucceed the better in his deſign, prepoſſeſſed my " Lord .... one of the moſt moderate Prelates of " the Kingdom. Theſe two then joined themſelves
" to my Lord .... a perſon of a very low genius
" and ſuſceptible of every impreſſion and prejudice
" given up entirely to ceremony and trifles. You
" may obſerve that theſe Lords go hand in hand.
" This Triumvirate therefore ſpoke to all their " creatures and gained Monſieur Le Fevre," Syndic of the Sorbonne, who propoſed to the Faculty on the 20th of May the book of Maria d'Agreda. Deputies were nominated to examine it. They made a report (19) of ſixty eight propoſitions, which they termed heretical, raſh, ſcandalous and offenſive to modeſt ears. They were printed with this character, which the Deputies gave them, and diſtributed to the Doctors (20), that they might give their opinions at the firſt aſſembly (21). Father Meron, a Cordelier, of whom we have ſeveral excellent works both in Philoſophy and Chronology, deſired the Faculty not to precipitate the condemnation of a book, of which the Pope had reſerved the cognizance to himſelf, and had deputed ſeveral Cardinals who did then actually examine it (22)... The cabal fell upon him furiouſly, and he was obliged to tell them, that if they went on further without ſhewing any regard to his petition, he would appeal to the Pope from every thing that ſhould be reſolved againſt that book. He declared however, that if this appeal interfered in any manner with the rights of the Gallican Church, he would deſiſt (23). From that day to the time of their meeting, there was a variety of intrigues made uſe of. The day of the aſſembly being come, Meſſieurs de Sauſſoy and Gobillon condemned the book (24). " But Monſieur Le Caron ſhewed them,
" that there was nothing in it that deſerved cenſure,
" which he confirmed by a great many ſtrong rea-
" ſons. There were parties on both ſides, which " exerted themſelves in all the twenty nine Aſſem-
" blies that followed. The Syndic ſtigmatiz'd thoſe
" of Mr. Le Caron's party by the name of Agredins,
" which ſtill remains upon them." This affair was concluded the 17th of September. There was as much clamour in the aſſembly-room as if it were a common hall (25)... The next day Meſſrs. du Flos and du Mas, formerly Counſellors in the Parliament of Paris, proteſted againſt this cenſure, and ſignified their proteſts to the Dean and Syndic of the Faculty, which proteſts ſtill ſubſiſt, not having been reverſed by any act (26). Since that time the Syndic and the Deputies met together, and made another cenſure — which was read the firſt of October; but before the reading of it the Syndic acquainted the Faculty with the oppoſition, that had been made againſt it by thoſe two Gentlemen. He obſerved likewiſe that the Archbiſhop of Paris having ſent for them to come to his Palace, had convinced them by ſuch ſtrong reaſons, that the Abbé du Mas was entirely brought over, and that he was ſure that when Monſr. du Flos had heard the cenſure read, he would likewiſe change his mind. Upon this, the writing of the Syndic was read, and they were all ſurprized to find ſeveral new propoſitions cenſured in it, which had never been mentioned to the Faculty before, and that ſeveral others, which had been coddemned, were retrenched, &c. (27). The reader may judge of theſe extracts as he thinks proper.

(15) Tho' in the Title it is ſaid to be printed at Cologne in 1697, yet I believe that it was printed at Paris. It contains forty pages in 12°.

(16) Pag. 3.

(17) Pag. 12.
(18) P. 13 and the following.

(19) In the Aſſembly of the 2d of July. ibid. p. 28.

(20) Ibid. p. 29.

(21) Ordered to meet the 14th of July.

(22) Ibid. p. 30.

(23) Affaire de Marie d'Agreda, p. 31.

(24) Ibid. p. 35, 36.

(25) Ibid. p. 37.

(26) Ibid. p. 38.

(27) Ibid. p. 39.

[D] That the apprehenſion of this ſcandal obliged the Faculty to inſert in their Act a Declaration.] " They made firſt a ſolemn proteſtation,
" that they did not intend by this cenſure to detract
" any thing from the lawful worſhip, which the Ca" tholic Church renders to the Bleſſed Virgin; that " they honoured her as the Mother of God; that
" they placed a peculiar confidence in her interceſ-
" ſion; that they adhered invariably to the opinion
" of the Fathers touching the Immaculate Concep-
" tion; and that they firmly believed her Aſſump-
" tion into heaven both of body and ſoul (28)." The author of a Letter, of which we have given ſeveral extracts in the preceding remark, tells us, that the cenſure, in which they have laid down as acknowledged points the Conception and Aſſumption of the Virgin, was made by the Syndic and the Deputies, after the body of the Faculty had entirely finiſh'd the judgment (29). This ſhews, that they had not the courage to publiſh the cenſure of the Faculty without joining a Salvo to it; and by this we may judge what danger there is in remonſtrating even againſt the moſt palpable errors, when they have a tendency to raiſe the honour of the Bleſſed Virgin. Whoever ſhould attempt to do it, would be expoſed not only to the indignation of the people, but even to that of the Monks and many other Eccleſiaſtics. They endeavoured therefore to eſcape this reſentment by elaborate Apologies and Prefaces (30). What a ſlavery is this? And what a proof it is, that the diſeaſe is incurable? The obſervation of Livy concerning the Roman Republic is equally applicable now to the Church of that name: Labente deinde paulatim diſciplinâ, velut deſidentes primo mores ſequatur animo: deinde ut magis magiſque lapſi ſunt, tum ire cœperint præcipites, donec ad hæc tempora, quibus nec vitia noſtra nec remedia pati poſſumus, perventum eſt (31). As diſcipline was relaxed by degrees, the ſtrictneſs of their morals began likewiſe to be relaxed; and in this manner declining every day more and more, they ruſh'd on precipitately to deſtruction, till at laſt theſe times are come, in which we can neither bear our vices, nor the remedies of them. The work of Maria d'Agreda is manifeſtly full of fables and abſurd opinions. However, as it favours

(28) Journal des Savans, Nov. 1696. pag. 716, 717.

(29) Affaire de Marie d'Agreda, p. 30.

(30) With regard to theſe devotees, thoſe verſes of Monſieur Deſpreaux have been applied to this ſubject. Un Auteur a genoux, dans un humble Preface au Lecteur qu'il onnie abean demander Grace.

(31) Livius Hiſt. lib. 1. initio.

have been abſolutely ſuperfluous; ſince the queſtion was not concerning any thing ſpecified in that declaration. We muſt not omit to obſerve, that the father of Maria d'Agreda became a Monk in a Convent of the Order of St. Francis, where two of his ſons were Monks at that time, and that he lived there in a very exemplary manner, and died with the ſtrongeſt ſentiments of devotion (e). Nor ſhould we forget to mention, that the canonization of Maria d'Agreda was very warmly ſollicited at Rome. See the remark [C], at the beginning.

(e) Journal des Savans of the 16th of Jan. 1696. p. 51.

the erroneous notions, which ſome would inculcate, of the ſupereminent dignity and unlimited power of the Bleſſed Virgin, there was a neceſſity of uſing the greateſt addreſs, in order to procure the cenſure of it at Paris. The author of the Letter (32) does a greater injury than he imagines to his own Church and Nation, when he expoſes the management and artifice made uſe of by thoſe, who were engaged in cenſuring the myſtical city of this Spaniſh Abbeſs. There would have been no need of caballing, if the minds of men had not been prodigiouſly hardened with prejudice: in ſuch a caſe they would not have been obliged to have recourſe to theſe ſoftening methods. The cenſure would have been made, and nobody would have murmur'd at it. All the Courts of Inquiſition had prevented the Faculty of Divinity at Paris; whereas they have been all ſilent till now, if I am not miſtaken: nay even thoſe, who are ſo ready to condemn every writing, that oppoſes ever ſo tenderly the moſt doubtful traditions, if they are but favourable to the worſhip of Saints (33).

(32) Of which we have given the Title in the beginning of the Remark [C].

(33) The Acta Sanctorum of the Jeſuits at Antwerp were condemned by the Inquiſition at Toledo.

We may obſerve, that there is a particular reaſon, which might oblige the Sorbonne to ſome cautiouſneſs, and expoſe them to the oppoſition of ſome Doctors. And this is, that there have been ſo many conſequences drawn from the epithet of Mother of God, that there is hardly any notion ſo extravagant concerning the excellence and power of the Virgin, but what may in ſome meaſure be ſupported by arguments ad hominem, drawn from theſe conſequences. You are carried on by degrees wherever they pleaſe. The ſubtilties of the School-Divines confound you entirely: if you go back, they charge you with inconſiſtency. Thence it comes to paſs, that thoſe, who value themſelves upon reaſoning conſequentially, and favouring the popular devotion at the ſame time, have choſe rather to advance ſtill further, than to retire back again. And yet notwithſtanding this, their ſyſtem is ſtill irregular and imperfect; they want the Divinity of the Virgin Mary in a literal ſenſe; ſince, according to the order of things, the Mother of God ought to be a Goddeſs, and exactly of the ſame ſpecific nature with her Son. She would be ſo, if we would but adopt the imagination of the Cavalier Borri (34); but that has been condemned. The time however may come, when the neceſſity of this ſhall be diſcovered, and ſo this irregularity and inconſiſtence ſhall be adjuſted. This I imagine is the hearty deſire of a great many people (35). Every thing of this kind is poſſible under certain circumſtances, that is, when there ſhall happen a proper union between the temporal and ſpiritual intereſts. Every thing paſſes, when Princes concur with the Heads of the Eccleſiaſtical Party, under a proper ſituation of affairs in general.

(34) See the Remark [B] in the Article BORRI, and the text of that Article a little above the place to which that Remark belongs.

(35) O ſi angulus ille Proximus accedat, qui nunc deformat agellum! Horat. Sat. VI. lib. 2. ver. 8.

I ſhall conclude by obſerving, that if the Sorbonne had any hopes, that their cenſure would remove a ſtumbling-block out of the way of the New-converts, they were much deceived: for the oppoſition, which they met with from their own body, and the diſſatisfaction, which appeared after the publication of their Cenſure, ſcandalized thoſe Converts much more, than their Cenſure could poſſibly edify them. Add to this, that the great ſubject of their ſcandal appears ſtill entire in the Preface to that Cenſure; a Preface, which gives a new occaſion of continuing that important controverſy concerning the Worſhip of Saints, the exceſſes of which have excited ſeveral curious perſons to examine in a philoſophical manner from whence it took its origin (36).

(36) See the Remark [N] in the Article NESTORIUS.

☞AGRESTIS (JULIUS) a Captain (a) in Vitellius's army, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a very brave, but at the ſame time very ſurpriſing action. The occaſion of it was as follows. Antonius who had revolted from Vitellius to Veſpaſian had took, plundered and laid waſte the city of Cremona. Vitellius, inſtead of doing his utmoſt to retrieve this loſs, endeavoured by all means to conceal it from the people [A]. Agreſtis who could not bear this indolence, or rather this ſtupid diſſimulation, laboured in many conferences he had with the Emperor, to awaken him to magnanimity and manhood; but all in vain: however, he prevailed with Vitellius that he himſelf might be ſent to ſurvey the forces of the enemy, and to learn the late tranſactions at Cremona. Neither attempted he to aſſume the lurking behaviour of a ſpy, and eſcape the notice of Antonius; but declaring to him the inſtructions from the Emperor and his own deſign, demanded to view the whole in perſon. Antonius ſent readily ſome perſons with Agreſtis, who ſhewed him all the ſcene of the fight, the deſolation and remains of Cremona, and the Legions taken priſoners. Agreſtis returned to Vitellius, but finding

(a) Tacitus ſays Centurio; a Centurion had the command over an hundred men.

[A] Vitellius endeavoured by all means to conceal his loſs from the people.] Tacitus's reflection on this occaſion is very judicious. "As Vitellius, ſays he, "after the ſore reverſe of his fortune at Cremona, "carefully ſmothered the news of the calamity, by "ſuch ſtupid diſſimulation he poſtponed not his di-"ſtreſſes themſelves, but the remedies of his di-"ſtreſſes. For had he declared the diſaſter, and had "recourſe to advice, a reſource would have been "found ſtill remaining of hopes and of forces. "Whilſt on the contrary he feigned that all his pro-"ceedings proſpered, he by ſuch falſe repreſentati-"ons left his condition deſperate (1)." This is alſo often the caſe of private perſons, who draw an irretrievable ruin upon themſelves, becauſe either out of ſhame or out of pride they conceal the bad condition of their affairs; whereas by diſcovering it in time to ſome friends, their downfal might have been prevented. And when Princes or their Miniſters endeavour to conceal the misfortunes of the ſtate; when they affect to repreſent it in a flouriſhing condition at the ſame time that trade is decaying apace, and ſtrangers are daily incroaching upon the liberty and the property of the natives, it is almoſt an infallible ſign of an approaching ruin. Of this Vitellius is a ſad inſtance; ſince he fell a ſacrifice to his own ſtupidity after a very ſhort reign (2). We cannot forbear tranſcribing here what Tacitus ſays with regard to this Emperor's diſſimulation. "About his "perſon, ſays he, was obſerved a wonderful ſilence "concerning the war; through the city all diſ-"courſes about it were prohibited, and for this "very cauſe theſe diſcourſes grew more common: "Nay ſuch as had they been left to their liberty, "would have recounted events truly, finding them-"ſelves reſtrained, publiſhed them now with tragi-"cal aggravations. Nor were the Leaders of the "enemy's hoſt wanting to blazen the fame of their "victory; with this view whatever ſpies of Vitel-"lius they ſeized they carried all over the camp, "that they might behold the mighty force of the "conquering army, and then ſent them back to Rome. "All theſe Vitellius, when he had ſecretly examined "them, cauſed to be murdered (3)."

(1) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. 3. p. m. 343.

(2) Of about 8 months, Sueton. in Vitel. cap. 15.

(3) Gordon's Tacitus, Vol. 2. p. 193.

ing him to reject as ſo many falſifications all the accounts which he brought, nay hearing himſelf accuſed of corruption and infidelity. "Since then, ſaid he, ſome remarkable confirmation is neceſſary, and ſince neither my life, nor my death can henceforth avail thee, I will furniſh thee with an evidence which thou may'ſt credit." Having ſo ſaid he left his preſence, and with a voluntary death confirmed to be true what he had declared [B]. Some authors relate, that by orders from Vitellius he was murdered, but of his faith and fortitude give the ſame teſtimony. This is what Tacitus tells us of Agreſtis (b); we have followed for the moſt part Mr. Gordon's tranſlation (c), being perſuaded we could not preſent the reader with one more accurate nor more elegant.

(b) Hiſt. lib. 3. p. m. 343. edit. Bleau.

(c) Vol. 2. pag. 193.

[B] With a voluntary death confirmed to be true what he had declared.] What a noble and generous action was this? How ſtrong a proof of this Captain's fidelity to his Prince, and love for his Country! Happy thoſe Princes who have ſuch faithful Counſellors; and happy the Nation, where thoſe who approach the Throne, dare to tell the truth, not only at the expence of their fortunes, but even at the expence of their very lives. England may boaſt of ſuch Patriots, who chuſe to ſacrifice their private intereſt rather than to enter into ſchemes that are deſtructive to the liberty of the Nation. And we may be ſure that ſuch generous and public-ſpirited men would alſo lay down their lives rather than betray the truſt repoſed in them. When a man undergoes a voluntary death, we may, generally ſpeaking, be perſuaded of his ſincerity: and when he dies to maintain the truth of a fact, of which he has been an eye-witneſs, the fact cannot be called in queſtion. This was the caſe of the Apoſtles with regard to Chriſt's Reſurrection. But then it muſt be obſerved, that thoſe, who had not ſeen the Lord, but believed his Reſurrection only on the teſtimony of others, who had ſeen him, cannot properly be called witneſſes of the Reſurrection, tho' they died for their religion: If the word Martyr [Μάρτυρ] properly ſignifies a witneſs, thoſe only can be ſtyled Martyrs, who had ſeen our Saviour raiſed from the dead, and who died to maintain the truth of his Reſurrection: I wiſh that thoſe, who write in defence of Chriſtianity, would reflect upon this, and not bring in as witneſſes of the Reſurrection, perſons who died in the ſecond or third Century; tho' their voluntary death may be a proof of their ſincerity, yet it cannot be one of Chriſt's Reſurrection, to which they were no witneſſes. I.

☞AGRICOLA (CNEIUS JULIUS), was born at Frejus in Provence. His father's name was Julius Græcinus, a man of Senatorian rank, and famous for his eloquence. He was put to death by Caligula for refuſing to accuſe Marcus Silanus. His mother's name was Julia Procilla, a Lady of exemplary virtue (a). He ſtudied Philoſophy and Civil Law at Marſeilles, as far as was ſuitable to his character as a Roman and a Senator. His firſt ſervice in war was under Suetonius Paullinus in Britain; and upon his return to Rome he married Domitia Decidiana, with whom he lived in the utmoſt harmony and tranquillity. He was choſen Queſtor in Aſia at the ſame time that Salvius Titianus was Pro-Conſul there; and he preſerved his integrity, though that Province was extremely rich, and Titianus, who was enormouſly avaritious, would have readily countenanced all the exorbitances which he could have committed, in order to ſkreen his own. He was afterwards choſen Tribune of the People, and then Pretor, under the Emperor Nero. In Veſpaſian's time he was made Legate to Vettius Bolanus in Britain, and upon his return was ranked among the Patricians by that Emperor, and afterwards appointed Governor of Aquitania; which poſt he held for three years, and upon his return was choſen Conſul, and then Governor of Britain, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage and conduct in ſeveral campaigns. He ſubdued the Ordovices and the Iſland Mona; and then reformed the abuſes occaſioned by the avarice or careleſſneſs of the former Governors. He put a ſtop to all manner of extortions, and cauſed juſtice to be impartially adminiſtred. Veſpaſian dying about this time, Titus his ſon, knowing his great merit, continued him in the government. In the ſpring he marched toward the North, where he made ſome new conqueſts, and ordered Forts to be built for the Romans to winter in. He ſpent the winter following in endeavouring to bring the Britons to conform to the Roman cuſtoms [A]. In his third campaign he advanced as far as the river Tweed; and in his fourth he ſubdued the nations between the Tweed and the two Bays, known by the names of the Fryths of Edinburgh and Dunbritton, into which the rivers Glota and Bodotria diſcharge themſelves. Here he built caſtles and fortreſſes in order to ſhut up the nations which were yet unconquered. In his fifth campaign he marched beyond the Fryths, where he ſubdued ſome nations, and fixed garriſons

(a) Tacit. Vit. Agricol. c. 4.

[A] To bring the Britons to conform to the Roman cuſtoms.] He thought the beſt way of diverting them from any attempts of riſing and taking arms, was to ſoften their rough manners, by propoſing to them new kinds of pleaſure, and inſpiring them with a deſire of imitating the cuſtoms of the Romans. Soon after this the country was adorned with magnificent temples, portico's, baths, and many other fine buildings both public and private. The Britiſh Nobles had their ſons educated in learning, and they, who before had the utmoſt averſion for the Roman language, now ſubmitted to the ſtudy of the Roman eloquence. They wore likewiſe the Roman habit. In ſhort, as Tacitus obſerves (1), they were brought to conſider thoſe things as ſigns of politeneſs, which were only ſo many badges of ſlavery. Idque apud imperitos humanitas vocabatur, cum pars ſervitutis eſſet. Juba, in the Tragedy of Cato, has elegantly expreſſed the Roman pretences of civilizing the world:

A Roman ſoul is bent on higher views;
To civilize the rude, unpoliſh'd world,
And lay it under the reſtraint of laws;
To make man mild and ſociable to man;
To cultivate the wild, licentious ſavage,
With wiſdom, diſcipline, and liberal arts,
Th' embelliſhments of life. Virtues like theſe
Make human nature ſhine, reform the ſoul,
And break our fierce Barbarians into men.

(1) Vit. Agric. c. 21.

garriſons along the weſtern coaſts over-againſt Ireland, deſigning to make a deſcent upon that Iſland, having had a perfect information of the ſtate of that country from a Nobleman, who had been baniſhed from thence. In his ſixth campaign he paſſed the river Bodotria, ordering his fleet, the firſt which the Romans ever had upon thoſe Seas, to row along the coaſts, and take a view of the northern parts. He was advancing farther northwards, when he was informed that the northern nations were marching againſt him with a formidable army, which he routed. In the following ſpring the Britons raiſed an army of thirty thouſand men commanded by Galgacus, who made an excellent ſpeech to them [B]. Agricola likewiſe addreſſed his ſoldiers in a very ſtrong and eloquent manner. The former were routed, and ten thouſand killed, whereas but three hundred and forty of the Romans were loſt. Domitian being informed of this victory grew jealous of him, and recalled him [C], under pretence of making him Governor of Syria. His death was ſuſpected to have been occaſioned by poiſon given him by that Emperor [D], and happened very ſeaſonably for him, conſidering the calamities which followed the unbounded cruelty and tyranny of Domitian. Tacitus the Hiſtorian, who married his daughter, has written his life, in which he gives an excellent character of him [E], and laments his death in a very beautiful and [B] Galgacus, who made an excellent ſpeech to them.] He was a man of eminent rank and virtue, and his ſpeech is one of the ſevereſt ſatyrs imaginable upon the Romans. However Tacitus has inſerted it at length; and we ſhall give an abſtract of it as far as it relates to their character. "As often, ſays he, as "I conſider the cauſes of the war and our neceſſity, I "ſtrongly hope, that this day, and your unani-"mous conſent, will lay the foundation of our li-"berty over all Britain. For you are all free from "ſlavery; and there is no other land remaining for "us, or indeed any ſea ſecure, ſince the Roman fleet "is purſuing us. And therefore war and arms, "which are moſt honourable for the men of cou-"rage, are now the greateſt ſecurity even to the "coward." He then tells them, that tho' their diſtance had at firſt protected them from the attempts of the Romans, yet now their enemies had purſued them to the extremities of their country. Thoſe robbers of the world, ſays he, when they can find no more land to ſubmit to their univerſal devaſtation, are reſolved to ſearch the ſea. If an enemy is rich, they are covetous; if poor, they are ambitious; they are not ſatisfied with the conqueſt of the whole Eaſt and Weſt; but have an equal deſire to the poor and richeſt countries of the world; to rob, and kill, and take away under falſe pretences, they call EMPIRE; and when they made a general ſolitude, they call it PEACE. Raptores orbis, poſtquam cuncta vaſtantibus defuere terræ, & mare ſcrutantur; ſi locuples hoſtis eſt, avari; ſi pauper, ambitioſi. Quos non oriens, non occidens ſatiaverit; ſoli omnium opes atque inopiam pari affectu concupiſcunt: auferre, trucidare, capere falſis nominibus, imperium; atque ubi ſolitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant (2). He then proceeds to ſhew the miſeries, which they ſuffer'd from the Roman injuſtice and oppreſſion; and animates them with the example of Boadicea; he repreſents to them the importance of that battle, and tells them, that as they were now going to engage, they ſhould think of their anceſtors and their poſterity: Proinde ituri in aciem & majores veſtros & poſteros cogitate.

(2) Id. ibid. cap. 30.

[C] Grew jealous of him, and recalled him.] He received the news with all the outward expreſſions of joy, tho' his mind was very uneaſy at it. He had juſt before celebrated a fictitious triumph over Germany, and had hired men to counterfeit the part of ſlaves; which expoſed him to a general ridicule; ſo that he could not but be extremely chagrin'd, to find that Agricola's victory was every where ſpoken of with the utmoſt commendation. He was very apprehenſive from obſerving that a private man's name was extolled ſo much above his own. However he ſuſpended his reſolutions of reſentment againſt Agricola, till a proper opportunity ſhould offer; and therefore he ordered, that the ſenate ſhould decree him the triumphal ornaments, and a ſtatue crowned with laurel. Nay he inſinuated, that the Goverment of Syria, which was then vacant by the death of Atilius Rufus, ſhould be given to him. Tacitus tells us, that there was a report, that one of Domitian's Freedmen was ſent to Agricola with the orders for his being Governour of that province, and commanded to deliver them to him, if he was in Britain; but meeting him at ſea in his paſſage over from that iſland, he returned to the Emperor without delivering his meſſage. The Hiſtorian is not certain whether that report was true, or only invented as agreeable to Domitian's character. Agricola enter'd Rome very privately and in the night, that he might not give the leaſt umbrage; he lived in ſuch a manner as might prevent any jealouſy in the Emperor. However, his virtues could not but expoſe him to his reſentments; and he was very frequently accuſed before Domitian in his abſence, not on account of any real crime or injury which he had done, but becauſe the Emperor was jealous of his merit and reputation, and his enemies had taken the moſt effectual way to ruin him, by commending him. Cauſa periculi non crimen ullum, aut querela læſi cujuſquam, ſed infenſus virtutibus Princeps, & gloria viri, ac peſſimum inimicorum genus, laudantes (3).

(3) Idem, ibid. c. 41.

[D] His death was ſuſpected to have been occaſion'd by poiſon given him by that Emperor.] Mr. de Rapin Thoyras ſays expreſly, that Domitian cauſed him to be poiſoned (4). And Dion Caſſius * tells us he was killed by that Emperor. But Tacitus only ſays, that there was a conſtant rumour to that purpoſe: however he could not affirm any thing for certain: Nobis nihil comperti affirmare auſim (5). But he tells us, that thro' his whole ſickneſs the Emperor was perpetually ſending the Chief of his Freedmen and Phyſicians to enquire after his health. Whether this care was real or affected, is unknown. The laſt day of his life, there were Meſſengers conſtantly employed by Domitian to give him an account how near Agricola was to his end; and nobody could imagine, that the Emperor would have been ſo haſty to hear news, which would prove diſagreeable to him. Supremo quidem die momenta deficientis per diſpoſitos curſores nuntiata conſtabat, nullo credente ſic adcelerari, quæ triſtis audiret. When he read Agricola's Will, in which he left him coheir with his own wife and daughter, he was extremely pleaſed, as if it were deſigned as a mark of his regard and eſteem for him; for his mind, as Tacitus obſerves, was ſo vitiated by the perpetual flatteries of thoſe about him, that he did not conſider, that a good Father never leaves any but a bad Prince his heir. Satis conſtabat lecto teſtamento Agricolæ, quo cohæredem optimæ uxori & piiſſimæ filiæ Domitianum ſcripſit, lætatum eum, velut honore judicioque tam cæca & corrupta mens aſſiduis adulationibus erat, ut neſciret à bono patre non ſcribi hæredem, niſi malum Principem (6).

(4) Vol. 1. lib. 1. * Ἐσεάγει ὑπὸ Δομετιάνε. Dio. in Tito. p. 212. ed. R. Stephani 1551.

(5) Tacit. ubi ſupra, cap. 43.

(6) Idem, ibid.

[E] Gives an excellent character of him.] He was of a moderate ſtature rather than tall; and his countenance was extremely agreeable, and ſhewed all the marks of a good and great man. He died in the fifty ſixth year of his age; tho' he had lived long enough to eſtabliſh his fame upon the moſt ſolid foundation. He was not ambitious of poſſeſſing too great a fortune; but he enjoyed ſuch an one, as was ſufficient for a noble and generous mind. He had taſted all the ſatisfactions, which reſult from the conſciouſneſs of having acted ſuitably to the obligations of his ſuperior ſtations; and he had been veſted with all the ornaments and titles, which however miſplaced in others, were in him the rewards and pathetic manner [F]. Moreri has committed ſeveral errors in this Article [G].

of real merit. He might be ſtyled an happy man, as Tacitus obſerves, ſince he eſcaped the miſeries, which the Roman Empire was ſoon after involved in, and died while his wife and daughter were living, in the poſſeſſion of his dignity, in the height of his fame, and with all his relations and friends ſafe and proſperous: Filiâ atque uxore ſuperſtitibus, poteſt videri etiam beatus, incolumi dignitate, florente famâ, ſalvis affinitatibus & amicitiis futura effugiſſe. A man of his conſpicuous virtues muſt inevitably prove a ſhocking object to ſuch a tyrant as Domitian; whom Tacitus repreſents to have been more cruel in his treatment of men of merit, than even Nero himſelf. The latter, ſays he, was never preſent at the execution, he only gave orders for the commiſſion of his crimes, but he always avoided ſeeing the perpetration of them; whereas the chief part of the miſery of the ſufferers under Domitian was to ſee him in the midſt of their torments and to be ſeen by him. Nero ſubtraxit oculos; juſſitque ſcelera, non ſpectavit: præcipua ſub Domitiano miſeriarum pars erat, videre & adſpici.

[F] Lamented his death in a very beautiful and pathetic manner.] It is an elegant apoſtrophe to Agricola himſelf. The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to ſee a tranſlation of ſo fine a piece of Oratory, though the ſtrength and conciſeneſs of Tacitus are extremely difficult to be expreſſed in our language. "What aggravates mine and your daughter's ſorrow, "beſides the loſs of you, is, that we had not the "opportunity of ſitting by you in your ſickneſs, "ſupporting you in your faintings, and receiving the "ſatisfaction of your laſt looks and embraces. Then "we ſhould have received from you thoſe commands "and advices, which would have perpetually been "fixed in our memory. This is a great cauſe of our "regret; you were loſt to us by four years abſence "from us. It is certain, that you, beſt of fathers, "wanted nothing ſuitable to your character and cir-"cumſtances, ſince you had your tender wife preſent "with you; but you ſhould have been lamented "with other tears beſides her's, and at your laſt mo-"ments your eyes wanted the ſight of ſome who "were very dear to you. If there be any reſidence "for the Manes of the virtuous; if, as Philoſophers "are of opinion, the ſouls of the great are not ex-"tinguiſhed with their bodies, may you reſt in peace, "and recall us your family from too weak and wo-"maniſh lamentations for your death to the con-"templation of your virtues, which it is very un-"reaſonable to regret. Let us rather honour you "with a juſt admiration. This is the true honour, "and the beſt inſtance of piety, that we your neareſt "relations can ſhew you. This is what I ſhall repre-"ſent to your daughter and your wife, that the for-"mer would revere the memory of her father, and "the latter of her huſband, by revolving all his ac-"tions and words in their minds, and reflect more "upon the character and idea of his ſoul than of "his body. Not that I would in the leaſt oppoſe "the erecting to you images of marble or braſs; "but as the bodies of men are periſhing and mortal, "ſo likewiſe are their ſtatues; but the form of the "mind is eternal, and can never be preſerved or "expreſſed by any foreign materials or art, but only "by the real character and behaviour of the perſon "who imitates it. Whatever we loved and admired "in Agricola, ſtill remains, and will for ever remain "in the minds of men, and in the perpetual fame "that attends noble and great actions. Many of the "Ancients will be ſunk in oblivion without the leaſt "remain of fame or reputation; but Agricola will "be carried down to poſterity, and ſurvive in im-"mortal honour." Quicquid ex Agricola amavimus, quicquid mirati ſumus, manet, manſurumque eſt in animis hominum, in æternitate temporum, famâ rerum. Nam multos veterum velut inglorios & ignobiles oblivio obruet; Agricola poſteritati narratus & traditus ſuperſtes erit (7).

(7) Idem, ibid. c. 46.

[G] Moreri has committed ſeveral errors in this Article.] I. He tells us, that when Agricola was choſen Queſtor or Treaſurer of Aſia, he acted with great integrity, and did not ſuffer himſelf to be perverted by the ill example of HIS PREDECESSOR LUCIUS SALVIUS OTHO TITIANUS. But it appears from Tacitus, that Salvius Titianus was Pro-Conſul of Aſia at the ſame time that Agricola was Queſtor, and not his Predeceſſor in that office. Beſides, that Hiſtorian calls him only Salvius Titianus, and not as Moreri has done. II. He tells us, that Agricola paſſed over to Ireland, a country till then unknown to the Romans, which he ſubdued. But we find nothing of this in Tacitus, who only tells us, that he had a deſign to make a deſcent upon that Iſland; but this was never executed by him. III. He ſays, that upon Agricola's return to Rome, Domitian would not ſuffer him to enter the city in the day time, leſt he ſhould be honoured by a public triumph. But we find from Tacitus, that Agricola entered in this private manner for fear of giving umbrage to Domitian, and not that the Emperor gave any orders for that purpoſe. IV. He tells us, that Tacitus has affirmed, that Veſpaſian promiſed to give his daughter in marriage to Agricola; but there is nothing like this in that Hiſtorian; and it appears that he was married long before to Domitia Decidiana, who ſurvived him. T.

AGRICOLA. There have been almoſt an infinite number of authors of this name; but as there are but three or four, who are particularly known to me, I ſhall ſpeak only of them.

AGRICOLA (GEORGE) a German Phyſician, was excellently well verſed in the knowledge of metals. He was born at Glaucha in Miſnia the 24th of March 1494. The diſcoveries which he made in the mountains of Bohemia after his return from Italy, gave him ſo ardent a deſire of examining accurately into every thing that related to metals, that even when he was engaged by his friend's advice in the practice of Phyſick at Joachimſtal (a), he employed all the time that he could poſſibly ſpare in the ſtudy of Foſſils. In order to gratify this paſſion the more intenſely he removed to Chemnits, where he applied himſelf wholly to that ſtudy. He ſpent in the purſuit of it not only the penſion procured him from Maurice Duke of Saxony, but likewiſe part of his own eſtate, ſo that he gained by his labours much more glory than profit. He compoſed ſeveral works upon his favourite ſubject, as well as upon divers others [A]. He criticiſed upon what Budeus, Leonard Portius and Alciat had wrote concerning cerning Weights and Measures, and discovered several errors in them. Alciat undertook a defence of himself, but without success. Bodin is of opinion, that Aristotle and Pliny may be said to be perfectly ignorant, with regard to the knowledge of Metals, if compared with Agricola (b). I must not omit to observe, that when Duke Maurice and Duke Augustus went to join the army of Charles the Fifth in Bohemia, Agricola attended them, in order to shew his fidelity, though this obliged him at the same time to quit the care of his estate, his children and his wife, who was then big with child (c). He died at Chemnits the 21st of November 1555, a very firm Papist. The zeal with which he attacked the Protestant doctrine in the latter part of his life, though at first he had appeared not very averse from it [B], rendered him so odious to the Lutherans, that they suffered his body to continue unburied for five days together [C]. So that it was obliged to be removed from Chemnits to Zeits, where it was interred in the principal church (d). Such are the effects of a blind zeal [D]!

(a) That is, the Valley of Joachim; it is a town in Miſnia.

[A] He compoſed ſeveral works upon his favourite ſubject, as well as upon divers others.] The Titles of ſome are as follow. De Ortu & Cauſis Subterraneorum. De Natura eorum, quæ effluunt ex terra. De Natura Foſſilium. De medicatis Fontibus. De ſubterraneis Animantibus. De veteribus & novis Metallis. De Re metallicâ. I eſteem as a work of Politics his Oration De Bello Turcis inferendo (1); as a work of Controverſy his Treatiſe de Traditionibus Apoſtolicis; and as a work of Phyſic his Book De Peſte. Melchior Adam is not certain whether the two laſt works were ever printed. I am alſo ignorant of it with regard to the Treatiſe of Controverſy; but I am well aſſured, that the other was printed at Baſil in the year 1554, and that there were two editions of it before Melchior Adam publiſhed his Book. See Merklin in his Lindenius renovatus.

(1) Printed at Baſil in the year 1538.

(b) Bodin. Method. Histor. See in Pope Blount's Censura celebrior. Authorum, p. 413. a great many honourable Elogiums upon Agricola.

(c) Uxore prægnanti cum dulcissimis liberis domi relictâ, fortunis etiam omnibus postkabitis, cum jus jurandum; quo eis erat devinctus, nullo modo negligendum putaret, in exercitu eorum pene serex militavit. Melchior Adam. Vitæ Medicor. p. 79.

(d) Id. ibid. p. 77, & seq.

[B] He appeared at first not very much averse from the Protestant Doctrine.] He disapproved not only of the scandalous traffic of indulgences, but also of several other things. We have four verses of his, which were posted up in the streets of Zwickaw (2) in the year 1519. They relate to the indulgences of Rome.

(2) Where he taught Greek.

Si nos injecto salvabit cistula nummo,
Heu nimium infelix tu mihi, pauper, eris!
Si nos, Christe, tuâ servatos morte beasti,
Jam nihil infelix tu mihi, pauper, eris.

" If wealth alone salvation can procure,
' How sad a fate for ever waits the poor!
" But if thou, Christ, our only Saviour be,
" Thy merits still may bless ev'n poverty!"

Melchior Adam is of opinion, that four things prevented the conversion of Agricola. I. The rash and unguarded Writings of some Divines. II. The scandalous Lives of several of the followers of the Reformation. III. The destroying of the images, and the insurrection of the Peasants. IV. The natural inclination, which he had for the pomp of ceremonies (3). Of these four reasons the three first render'd Erasmus entirely averse to the Protestant Party. A great many other persons, who had intensely longed for the Reformation of the Church, stumbled at the same stone as Erasmus; and thence it is, that Theodore Beza met with so many persons, who had once tasted of the good seed, and yet afterwards fell back into their former errors (4). Whenever this affair is mentioned to those, who are capable of attending to reason, it is observable that they say, that in the situation, in which things then were, there was no possibility of supporting the cause, and advancing it further by a moderate way of writing, and by mere patience; and that so the providence of God, whose methods are always infinitely wise, permit that men should appear such as they are, in the great work of Reformation, in order to obtain his end more naturally, which was, (as experience shews us,) to prevent one Religion from entirely ruining the other. This is well said. There are some means, which as they are the most proper to compleat half the work, are for that very reason incapable of finishing the whole.

(3) Melchior. Adam. Vit. Medicor. p. 80.

(4) See his Hist. Ecclesiast.

[C] They suffered his body to continue unburied for five days together.] Scaliger condemns this behaviour of theirs with a great deal of reason. Agricolam, says he (5), quo nihil doctius, Lutherani mortuum sepelire noluerunt, quia manserat Pontificius. Italus quidam scripsit & hortatus est, ut sepelirent hominem Christianum: Barbaries magna. i. e. " The " Lutherans would not suffer Agricola, one of the " learnedst men of that time, to be buried, merely " because he had continued a Roman Catholic. An " Italian Gentleman writ to them, and exhorted " them to bury a man who was a Christian. This " conduct of theirs was very barbarous." I would not venture absolutely to assert it was false, that an Italian had desired them by a letter to perform this last office of humanity; but I cannot see any probable ground for it. Scaliger's memory, or at least that of his pupils, seems to have confounded different things. There is extant a Letter of Matthiolus, wherein he complains that so venerable an old man as George Agricola should not be allowed in his own country ground enough to bury him. Id. Matthiolus ad Caspar. Nævium Med. (lib. 2. epist.) queritur, hunc præclarum probumque senem in patria tantum terræ non inveniisse, quo suum operiretur cadaver (6). This might give occasion to that false supposition, that an Italian had desired by a letter those, who had the body of that learned man, to bury him. You will not be surprized that I pay little regard to what the great Scaliger says here; for how can I depend upon him in any thing relating to Agricola, when he tells us at another time, that he was a perfect infidel in point of Religion, and scarce deserved even common burial? Non minus eruditus, & in censendâ metallorum naturâ curiosus fuit, quam verè impius, nulli addictus Religioni, ut post mortem vix sepeliri meruerit (7).

(5) In Scaligeranis, p. 5.

(6) Melch. Adam. Vit. Medic. p. 80.

(7) Scaligerana prima, p. 80.

[D] Such are the effects of a blind zeal.] There is scarce a Protestant now, but what condemns this usage of Agricola's dead body; and I doubt not, but that since that time the greatest part of the Lutherans condemned it likewise. Melchior Adam seems to cast the whole blame of it upon the Minister of the place. It is at this time much easier to observe the ill consequences of this false zeal; length of time has appeased the resentment, which like an impetuous storm, darkned the skies.

Eripiunt subito nubes cœlumque diemque
Teucrorum ex oculis: ponte nox incubat atra (8).

(8) Virgil. Æn. l. 1. v. 88.

" Raise all thy winds, with night involve the skies &c.
Dryden Virg.

What excesses are we carried to, in the way of reprisals, and when we think we have reason to speak, as Dido does in Virgil,

Res dura, & regni novitas, me talia cogunt
Moliri (9)!

(9) Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 567.

" My cruel fate,
" And doubts attending an unsetled state
" Force me, &c. Dryd. Virg.

Paul Freher tells us, that Agricola fell into such a violent heat of passion in a dispute in Divinity, that it threw him into a high fever, which carried him off immediately (10). He quotes only Melchior Adam for proof of this, who mentions nothing of it. It is very probable, that Agricola had irritated the Lutherans by some instances of an excessive aversion to them. Peter Albinus represents him (11) as an obstinate and rigid Roman Catholic. Compare this with the first Scaligerana.

(10) Pauli Freheri Theatrum Viror. Illustr. p. 1238.

(11) In his chronicle of Misnia.

AGRICOLA (JOHN), a Saxon Divine, born at Islebe (a) the 20th of April 1492 (b), was the cause of great disorders in the Protestant Religion, which he embraced. It is said, that he attended the Elector of Saxony as his Minister to the Diet of Spire in the year 1526, and to that of Augsbourg in the year 1530. But it is very certain, that in those journies he was only Minister to Count Mansfeld. It is true, that Count attended upon the Elector of Saxony, and during that time his Minister preached sometimes before the Elector; which was the ground of that miſtake. Agricola had a very good talent at preaching; this made him imagine himſelf a very conſiderable perſon, and that he might eaſily raiſe himſelf above Melancthon; for which reaſon he wrote againſt him in the year 1527 (c). His reſtleſs and ambitious temper induced him in the year 1536 to demand leave to quit his own country, where he was Miniſter and Principal of a College. His demand was attended with ſo many complaints, and appeared ſo unreaſonable to Count Mansfeld, that though he gained it, it was with the ſevereſt reproaches upon his ingratitude, avarice and drunkenneſs; beſides which, he was told, that he had exerciſed his function very negligently, and diſputed more againſt the Proteſtants than the Papiſts. He went thence to Wittemberg, and obtained there the place of a Profeſſor and a Miniſter. He taught ſeveral very dangerous doctrines concerning the uſe of the Law under the Goſpel, and in ſhort became the founder of the Sect of the Antinomians (d). Luther, who had been before his good friend [A], attacked him with great ſeverity, and obliged him to promiſe a recantation of his errors; but while the form of it, which he was to ſign, was drawing up, Luther publiſhed ſeveral new books, which piqued Agricola in ſo ſenſible a manner, that he preſented (e) to the Elector a very abuſive petition againſt his antagoniſt, in which he complains among other things, that he had imputed ſentiments to him which he had never eſpouſed. Luther anſwered this, with his uſual vehemence and fire, and that he might not continue under the imputation of a public ſlanderer, he brought teſtimonies from Iſlebe concerning ſeveral private converſations of Agricola. The Divines of Wittemberg came immediately to the aſſiſtance of Luther, and pronounced abſolutely, that his accuſations were well-grounded. The Elector of Saxony, very much embarraſſed with this affair, had appointed judges for both parties, and expreſſed his deſire, that they would find ſome method of accommodation, and then he made Agricola promiſe not to depart till the examination was over. This promiſe was broken; Agricola retired ſecretly to Berlin (f), without waiting for an anſwer to his demand for leave to depart. The Elector of Brandenburg endeavoured to make a reconciliation between him and Luther, but nothing could be done in it, except under one or other of theſe two conditions, either that Agricola ſhould return to wait the deciſion of the judges, or that he ſhould give a formal recantation of his errors in writing, and retract the injuries and reproaches which he had caſt upon Luther. He choſe the latter condition [B], and publiſhed a book at Berlin, in which he aſks pardon of thoſe whom he had offended by his errors, and eſpecially of Luther; and proteſts that he is reſolved to live and die in that faith which he had before attacked. Luther did not confide in theſe ſtrong proteſtations of his. Agricola upon this complained to the Elector of Saxony, and aſſured him, that he never had felt ſo ſenſible a regret for any thing as for the conteſt, which he had with that Man of God (g); and that ſince he could not be believed even upon his oath, he referred his cauſe to the Judge of the whole world. However, he humbly beſeeched his Highneſs the Elector to order the payment of his ſtipend for three months, which was due to him, becauſe he had the greateſt occaſion for it to ſupport his wife and nine children (h). I believe that he was never able to recover the favour either of the Elector, or of Martin Luther. However he comforted himſelf without doubt with the reputation which he gained at Berlin by being Preacher at court, and by being choſen to compoſe a work which made a prodigious noiſe in the world: I mean the Interim which he wrote in conjunction with Julius, Phlug and Michel Heldingus (i), in the year 1548. It is ſaid, that the Emperor rewarded Agricola very magnificently for his ſhare in that affair. The conteſt which was raiſed ſome time after in Germany among the Proteſtant Divines (k), ſhewed that this Miniſter was a man of a dangerous ſpirit, and of a very turbulent ſpirit. He appeared very buſy in bringing matters to a ſettlement, and in all his conferences

(a) A town belonging to Count Mansfeld. He was as well known by the name of Islebius as by that of Agricola.

(b) Melchior. Adam. Vit. Theolog. p. 409.

(c) Concerning the form of eccleſiaſtical viſitation, drawn up by Melancthon.

(d) See the article ISLEBIANS.

(e) On the 20th of March 1540, during the Aſſembly at Smalcalde.

(f) In the year 1540.

(g) See the Remark [B].

(h) Taken from the anſwer of Seckendorf to the Lutheraniſm of Father Maimburg, lib. 3. pag. 306, to p. 310.

(i) He was commonly called Michael Sidonius, becauſe he was titular Biſhop of Sidon.

(k) It was concerning indifferent points in Religion.

[A] Luther . . . had been his good friend.] They were both of the ſame town. We find that Agricola was Secretary to Luther at the Conference at Leipſic in 1519 (1), and that he was ſent to Francfort in 1525 (2), with a letter from Luther to the Magiſtrates, in order to be received as a Miniſter of the Goſpel there. The author, whom I quote (3), cenſures Monſr. Varillas, for ſaying that Luther undertook nothing of importance without the concurrence of Agricola. This is puſhing the matter too far, and it is impoſſible to give proofs of that fact.

(1) Seckendorf. Hiſt. Luth. lib. 1. p. 92. liter. r.
(2) Ibid. p. 243. lit. c.
(3) Ibid. lib. 3. p. 306. num. 1.

[B] He choſe the latter condition.] It is probable, that he was induced to this low ſubmiſſion by theſe two reaſons; Firſt, that he ſaw nothing was to be hoped for from the deciſion of his cauſe: becauſe he could not gain from it, unleſs Luther was declared at the ſame time a ſlanderer of his brethren. And therefore he muſt have been the moſt credulous man in the world, if he had expected ſucceſs in Saxony on thoſe terms. The people would undoubtedly have ſtoned the Judges, if they had caſt ſuch an odium upon their great Reformer. The Church, they would have urged, had need of the good reputation of Luther to ſupport it. The Papiſts would receive a prodigious advantage from any reflection upon him. Have not we ſeen many inſtances of this kind, where thoſe, who are but Pygmies in compariſon of Luther, have by this means eſcaped the Church-diſcipline and ſeverities, which they deſerved for their irregularities? The ſecond reaſon, upon which Agricola acted, was plainly the apprehenſion of loſing, if he ſhould continue obſtinate, his quarter's ſtipend, which was due to him. Read what follows: Neque tamen hoc ſcripto ſtatim, ut ſperaverat, Luthero de verâ converſione ſuâ fidem fecit; id quod ipſe Agricola literis d. 19. Decemb. apud Electorem Saxoniæ queritur, nihilque tota vita ſibi gravius accidiſſe quam ſimultatem illam cum viro Dei, quem ipſe patris loco veneratus ſit, & in cujus obſequio mori velit, apud quem tamen nihil proficiat, ne juramenti quidem oblatione; ideo ſe Deo cauſam committere. Petit tamen ut ſibi, ad alendum uxorem novemque liberos, trimeſtre, quod reſtare ſibi dicit, ſalarium non denegetur, ſe enim id diligenti lectione promeritum (4).

(4) Seckendorf. Hiſt. Luther. p. 310. num. 16.

conferences for that end, he gave full ſcope to the fluency of ſpeech, which he was naturally maſter of; but it was all to no purpoſe. He died at Berlin in 1566. He had been Superintendant (l) of the Mark of Brandenburg (m). It is ſaid, that he wanted to reſtore the uſe of holy oils in the caſe of the ſick, and that he was very poſitive that they would work the ſame miraculous cures as they did in the primitive ages (n). He wrote but few books [C]. It is carrying the matter much too far, to ſay that he returned to Popery [D].

(l) So the Lutherans term thoſe Miniſters, who have the inſpection over ſeveral Churches.

(m) Micrælius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 733. edit. ann. 1679.

(n) Melch. Adam. Vit. Theolog. p. 411.

[C] He wrote but few Books.] An Explication of three hundred German Proverbs was one of the firſt. He there treats Ulric, Duke of Wirtemberg (5) extremely ill. This was complained of, ſo that the author was obliged to acknowledge his fault in a very ſubmiſſive letter. However this did not prevent Duke Ulric from alledging, amongſt other grievances, at the Diet of Francfort in the year 1536, that John Agricola was protected in the country of Mansfeld, tho' he had abuſed him in the moſt virulent and public manner (6). The author added above four hundred Proverbs to his ſecond edition of this work. He wrote Commentaries upon St. Luke; he confuted the Explication of the nineteenth Pſalm, publiſhed in High Dutch by Thomas Muncer, &c. (7).

(5) Idem, lib. 2. p. 135.

(6) Idem, p. 142. lit. b.

(7) Melchior. Adam. Vit. Theolog. p. 411.

[D] He did not return to Popery.] It is very certain, that when he left Saxony, he retired to the Court of Brandenbourg, where the Elector Joachim II, who had eſtabliſhed the Reformation in his dominions, in the year 1539 (8), received him with great diſtinction, and made him his Preacher in ordinary. It is no leſs certain, that he enjoyed the favour of that Prince till his death. It is a very great error therefore to ſay, as Melchior Adam and Paul Freher do, that Agricola was a Papiſt, tunc Pontificiis ſeſe adjunxerat, at the time when Charles the fifth employed him to draw up the Interim. He relaxes, I confeſs, upon ſeveral things, in the Interim; but did not Phlug and the Biſhop of Sidon do the ſame upon ſeveral others? And were they Lutherans upon that account? It is very true that the project formed by theſe three men did not ſatisfy either Proteſtants or Papiſts: But there is a great difference to be made between thoſe, who for the ſake of peace give up ſome particulars of the Reformation, and thoſe, who actually abandon the Proteſtant Communion to enter into that of Rome. Agricola was without doubt of the former claſs; but as he never appeared in the other, he ought not to be conſidered as a Papiſt. There is a great miſtake therefore in thoſe words of Micrælius; Joh. Agricola . . . noſter primò, deinde ſuus, tandem Pontificiorum (9). i. e. "John Agricola was of our party at firſt, then of a particular one "of his own, and at laſt of the Roman Catholic." I cannot tell, whether what he ſays three lines lower, Homini Epicuræo ſimilior quàm pio Theologo, ut ſcribit Oſiander ad annum 1566, quo obiit Agricola. i. e. "He was more like an Epicurean than a pious Divine, as Oſiander ſays of him in his Chronicle under the year 1566, in which Agricola died," is to be underſtood as if he was a man of pleaſure, or only as if he held that all Religions were equally indifferent in themſelves.

(8) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Luther. lib. 3. p. 234, & ſeq.

(9) Micrælius, Syntagma. Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 733.

AGRICOLA (MICHAEL) a Lutheran Miniſter at Abo in Finland, was the firſt who tranſlated the New Teſtament into the language of that country, which contributed very much to the propagation of Lutheraniſm (a).

(a) Micrælius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 733.

AGRICOLA (RODOLPHUS) was one of the moſt learned men in the fifteenth Century. Italy, which at that time treated every thing as barbarous, that was on this ſide the Alps, produced no genius comparable to what Friſeland could boaſt of in her Agricola. This great man was of very mean extraction [A]. He was born in the year 1442 in the village of Baſſlon two miles from Groningen. He gave proofs even in the lower claſſes at ſchool what a figure he would one day make in the world; and he had ſcarce taken his degree of Maſter of Arts at Louvain, when he was offered a Profeſſorſhip. But his inclination carried him rather to travel. He went from Louvain to Paris, after having lived in the former like an ancient athlete, that is, with all the imaginable ſobriety, chaſtity and application to labour [B]. From Paris he went to Italy,

[A] He was of very mean extraction.] I know that in the Life of Agricola among the Profeſſors of Groningen we are told, that he was born of one of the moſt conſiderable families in Friſeland: Ex Agricolarum familiâ apud Friſios inter honoratiores ſemper habitâ vir hic incomparabilis oriundus. But as that Life is not at all different from that in Melchior Adam, it is not ſufficient to ballance the teſtimony of Ubbo Emmius. Let us ſee then what he ſays, ſince he underſtood the Hiſtory of his own country better than any man in the world. Obſcuris natalibus apud Baſloos ortus (Rodolphus Agricola) tantum ſibi in literis nomen paravit per omnem Europam, ut, &c. (1).

(1) Ubbo Emmius, Hiſt. Friſio. lib. 30. ad ann. 1490, p. 457.

I have been referred (2) to two proofs of Emmius's opinion from the Letters of Agricola. One is, that his ſiſter by the mother's ſide was ſent to Groningen to learn to work in furs, and to make cuſhions, pellicea opera & texturam pulvinariam. The other is, that the father of that girl was Receiver to the church in his own village. He was in great diſtreſs, upon his being robbed by one of his ſons of an hundred florins, which belonged to the church. Venit ad me nudius tertius pater tuus turbatus & gemens, & prope cum lacrymis queſtus eſt mihi, Henricum fratrem noſtrum pridie ejus diei clam ſibi abſtuliſſe centum florenos noſtræ monetæ ex pecuniâ ſacrâ, cujus curam, ut ſcis, ille gerit. Our Rodolphus, who was then at Groningen, wrote thus to John his brother by the mother's ſide.

(2) By Mr. de la Monnoie.

[B] Like an ancient Athlete, that is with all the imaginable ſobriety, chaſtity, and application to labour.] The ancients obſerve, that their Athletæ or Wreſtlers inured themſelves to labour, and abſtained carefully from wine and women.

Qui ſtudet optatam curſu contingere metam,
Multa tulit fecitque puer; ſudavit, & alſit,
ABSTINUIT VENERE ET VINO (3).

That is,

"The man that is reſolv'd the prize to gain,
"Doth often run and take a world of pain;
"Bear heat and cold, his growing ſtrength improve,
"Nor taſte the joys of wine, nor ſweets of love.
Creech Horace.

(3) Horat. de Art. Poët. ver. 412, & ſeq.

This abſtinence was very remarkable in Agricola; and the other kind of temperance with regard to drinking was very uncommon and ſingular in him, conſidering the country where he lived. Lovanii vixit honeſtiſſimè ab omni compotatione ac commeſſatione contra gentis ſuæ morem alieniſſimus. Tantus erat in eo bonarum literarum amor, tam indefeſſum ſtudium, ut turpis Veneris fornices & luſtra ne noverit quidem (4). This virtue of chaſtity was always very rare, and the other continues ſo ſtill. For the infinite ſcandal of Chriſtianity and Learning, we ſee almoſt univerſally amongſt Students an horrible inclination to debauchery. Perhaps they were as bad formerly; and in that caſe I am aſtoniſhed, that we have not had a Proverb of this kind, Sine Venere & Baccho frigent Muſæ, i. e. "Without "Venus and Bacchus the Muſes grow cold," as we have already, Sine Cerere & Libero friget Venus, i. e. "Without Ceres and Bacchus Venus grows languid."

(4) Melch. Adam. Vitæ Philoſoph. p. 15.

Italy, and ſtaid two years at Ferrara [C], where the Duke honoured him with a great many conſiderable favours. Theodorus Gaza read Lectures upon Ariſtotle in that city. Agricola, who was one of his Auditors, read likewiſe Lectures in his turn, and was no leſs admired for his ſtyle than for his accent. It was a very ſenſible regret to that nation, that he was not born in Italy. It was in his power at his return to his own country to have been preferred to the moſt conſiderable employments; but his love for learning prevented him from engaging in them, or made him leave them immediately. He accepted at laſt of a poſt at Groningen, and attended the court of Maximilian I. for ſix months upon the affairs of that city. He executed this commiſſion with great ſucceſs, but had no reaſon to commend the gratitude of his maſters, ſo that he left them, and returned to his travels. He refuſed, out of his great fondneſs for liberty, to accept the Preſidentſhip of a College, which was offered him at Antwerp. For how could he be induced to accept it, when he had refuſed to enter into the ſervice of the Emperor Maximilian though upon very advantageous terms? He preferred repoſe and independence to every other conſideration, which ſhewed the juſtneſs of his taſte. After he had lived this ambulatory kind of life for many years, he fixed at laſt in the Palatinate, where the Biſhop of Worms, whom he had inſtructed in the Greek language, had found means to ſettle him. It was in the year 1482 that he fixed in the Palatinate, where he paſſed the reſt of his life [D], ſometimes at Heidelberg, and ſometimes at Worms. The Elector Palatine was pleaſed to hear him diſcourſe concerning antiquity, and deſired him to compoſe an Abridgment of ancient Hiſtory. Agricola performed this with great accuracy and beauty. He read publick Lectures at Worms; but his Auditors being more accuſtomed to the querks and ſubtleties of Logic than to polite Literature, had not that turn of genius which he deſired. He began to ſtudy Divinity about the fortieth year of his age; and having no hopes to ſucceed in it without the knowledge of the Hebrew, he applied himſelf to that language, which he began to make a good progreſs in [E], by the aſſiſtance of a Jew. But death, which ſeized him at Heidelberg the 28th of October 1485 (a), ſuffered him not to continue it. He reſigned up his ſoul to God in a very devout manner, and was buried in the Franciſcan habit in the church of the Minor Friars in that city. The account which has been given of his character plainly ſhews us, that he was a very honeſt man, ſincere, without envy, moderate and good-natured. He was never married, though

(a) Eraſmus was deceived therefore, when he was informed, that Agricola died before he was forty years old. Adagior. Chil. 1. Cent. IV. num. 39.

It ſeems that Youth in all Academies have a long while behaved themſelves in ſuch a manner, as if the former of theſe maxims were true.

[C] And he ſtaid two years at Ferrara.] He learned Greek there, and taught Latin. He diſputed with Guarinus, which of them could write beſt in Proſe, and with the Strozza's, who could make the beſt Verſe; and with reſpect to Philoſopy he had converſations with Theodorus Gaza (6).

(6) Valerii Andreæ, Bib. Belg. p. 798.

[D] It was in the year 1482 that he fixed in the Palatinate; where he paſſed the reſt of his life.] Melchior Adam aſſures us of this. Cum hoc (Joanne Camerario Dalburgio) ab anno 1482 partim Heidelbergæ, partim Wormatiæ, ad ultimum vitæ actum uſque vixit conjunctiſſimè (7). But Mr. de la Monnoie has diſcovered an error in this account; which he has been pleaſed to remark to me as follows: "Rodolphus Agricola in a letter of his to Jacobus "Barbirianus, dated by miſtake 92, inſtead of 82, "and in another of the ſame date to his brother "John, tells them that in a Journey he took that "ſame year to Heidelberg, he had promiſed John "d'Alburg, Chancellor of the Count Palatine, and "Biſhop of Worms, to return to him the year fol-"lowing. We find however by his other Letters, "that he did not return thither before the middle "of the year 1484. So that the calculation of Voſ-"ſius, pag. 566. de Hiſtor. Latin. concerning Ro-"dolphus Agricola's having been three years Regent "at Heidelberg (8), is not at all juſt. Sigiſmond of "Foligni, commonly called Sigiſmundus Fulginus, "is alſo miſtaken, when he tells us, that Rodolphus "died upon the road in his return from Rome to "his own country. He departed from Rome in "1480, and he died five years after at Heidelberg. "I cannot diſcover by reading his works, that he "ever performed the function of a Profeſſor at "Worms." We have a Letter of Peter Scottus dated the 18th of February 1484, in which he ſays, that he underſtood with a great deal of ſatisfaction, that Agricola had begun to read Lectures to the young Students at Heidelberg. Argentinam reverſus, cum intellexiſſem . . . te Heidelbergæ cœpiſſe purgare, & linguas juvenum & aures, ut illæ nil ſceleroſum balbutiant, hæ verò tuis tam peritis & dulcibus elegantiis delibatæ, omnes illas ſciolorum inſulſas & verboſas ineptias quaſi magicas incantationes declinent; tum ego vehementer ſum gaviſus (9).

(7) Melch. Adam. Vitæ Philoſ. p. 16.

(8) Obſerve that Melchior Adam does not ſay, that Agricola ever taught Philoſophy at Heidelberg. Voſſius ſuppoſes that he taught it there for three years.

(9) Centuria Epiſtolar. Philologic. a Gellioſto editarum, p. 55, 56.

[E] He began to make a good progreſs in it.] We find by his own account, that at firſt the ſtudy of it ſeemed to him very difficult. Studia Hebræa . . primùm & plurimùm negotii, uti ſcribit ipſe, exhibuerunt, ut ſibi videretur cum Antæo luctari (10). Afterwards meeting with a Jew, who underſtood that language pretty well, he gained ſo much knowledge of it in a few months, as to be able to tranſlate ſeveral of David's Pſalms without any error. Nactus Judæum ejus linguæ utcunque peritum paucis menſibus tantum profecit, ut aliquot Pſalmos Davidicos in Latinam linguam citra culpam tranſtulerit (11). However we have no grounds to ſay with Voſſius, that he was very learned in the Hebrew, Hebraicè doctiſſimus (12). We may juſtly diveſt him of that ſuperlative title, and treat him as a Cavalier, who is obliged to diſmount, and placed among the Foot. Geſner has diſtinguiſh'd this point much better than Voſſius. The latter has given the ſuperlative indifferently to his skill in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; but Geſner expreſſes himſelf more accurately thus; Græci & Latini ſermonis peritus, & Hebraicæ linguæ non ignarus (13). i. e. "He was skilled in the Latin "and Greek tongues, and not ignorant of the Hebrew." He borrows theſe words from Trithemius. Konig carries it even farther than Voſſius; for he uſes the ſuperlative callentiſſimus. See below the third error of Varillas. We may obſerve likewiſe, that Trithemius does not ſpeak with ſufficient exactneſs, when he tells us, that Agricola made a tranſlation of the Pſalter from the original Hebrew (14); for it is never uſual to rank amongſt the works of an author the Exerciſes which he made, while he was learning a language. Now it is plain, that Agricola's tranſlation of ſome of the Pſalms of David, was an Exerciſe, which his Jew corrected for him. This Jew was converted to Chriſtianity, and John Dalburg, Biſhop of Worms (15), maintained him in his houſe merely out of regard to Agricola, if we may depend upon Valerius Andreas. Primus exſulantes è Germaniâ Græcas reſtituit literas, quibus ætate provectior etiam Hebraicas adjecit, præceptore uſus Judæo quodam ad fidem converſo, quem Wormatienſis Epiſcopus Joannes Dalburgius ſolius Rodolphi cauſa domi ſuæ alebat (16).

(10) Melch. Adam. Vitæ Philoſ. p. 18.

(11) Idem, ibid. p. 19.

(12) De Hiſt. Lat. p. 566.

(13) Geſner. Bib. folio 585.

(14) Quoted by Val. Andreas, Bib. Belg. pag. 798. Geſner likewiſe affirms the ſame thing.

(15) Not of Heidelberg, as Monſ. Bullart ſays, Academie des Sciences, tom. 1. pag. 276.

(16) Val. And. Bib. Belg. pag. 798.

though he was in love, or seemed to be so, several times. He had resolved in his younger years to marry; but having duly considered that affair, he changed his design, not so much out of fear of domestic inconveniences, as from a natural indolence in his temper [F], which rendered him impatient of the least care. One would hardly imagine that a man so deeply engaged in the study of antiquity, could set to music Songs of his own composition, and yet he treated the Ladies sometimes in this manner [G]. It is said, that with respect to religion he had some foretaste and anticipation of that light, which appeared so eminently in the following age [H]. He left his books to Adolphus Occo a native of Friseland, and Physician to the city of Augsbourg (b). Moreri was mistaken in saying, that Erasmus and Agricola became acquainted at Ferrara. Paul Freher did not understand what he copied from Erasmus [K] in praise of Agricola. We learn from the same Erasmus, that Agricola died for want of timely assistance from the Physicians [L]. Reuchlin pronounced the Funeral Oration for this learned man (c). Mr. Varillas has committed a great many errors [M], and will

(b) Melchior. Adam. Vit. Philosoph. p. 15. & seq.

(c) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 798.

[F] From a natural indolence of temper.] As I cannot reach the full force of his expressions, I shall give the Greek words themselves which he made use of. Uxorem nunquam duxit; quanquam in priore ætate duxturum destinârat. Sed postea quam incepit diligentius se ipse introspicere, aversus est ab eo consilio, non incommodis rei œconomicæ, sed deterruit ipsum genus vitæ suæ & animus levissimis etiam curis impar, καὶ φιλάσχολόν τι τῆς φύσεως (verba sunt ipsius, epistola quadam ad Capnionem) ἧγε μᾶλλον ἀπραγμοσύνην καὶ ῥᾳθυμίαν τις παυσῖς τῶν βίων (17).

(17) Melch. Adam. Vitæ Philosoph. p. 19. See likewise the Life of Agricola among those of the Professors of Groningen.

[G] He treated the Ladies sometimes in this manner.] Thus speaks his Historian, Puellas amare se nonnunquam simulabat, verùm nunquam deperibat. In earum gratiam vernaculâ linguâ quædam carmina scripsit elegantissimè, quæ virginibus primariisque amicis præsentibus voce & testudine modulatissimè canebat (18). He understood all kinds of Music, both vocal and instrumental. Canebat voce, flatu, pulsu (19).

(18) Melch. Adam. Vit. Philos. p. 18.

(19) Ibid.

[H] He had some fore-taste and anticipation of that light, which appeared so eminently in the following age.] There was a person, who heard a conversation between him and Wesselus, and testified, that they lamented extremely the darkness of the Church, and expressed their disapprobation of the Mass, Celibacy, and the doctrine of the Monks concerning Justification by works (20).

(20) Ibid. and Vitæ Professor. Groningens.

[I] Moreri was mistaken in saying, that Erasmus and Agricola became acquainted at Ferrara.] It is easy to prove this. Erasmus was born in the year 1467. He studied at Deventer when he was twelve or thirteen years old. Agricola was at Ferrara in the year 1476 and 1477. How then was it possible for him to contract an eternal friendship with Erasmus in that city? If Moreri had read the prediction of Agricola concerning Erasmus, he would not have told us, that it was in this city that they came to know each other. The case is this: Agricola in his return from Italy, having read the Themes and Exercises of Hegius's Scholars at Deventer, he found something so peculiar in those of Erasmus, that he had a mind to see the boy; and having viewed him very attentively, he pronounced that he would prove a great man. Erasmus was not twenty years old, when Agricola died; and at that time he had not broke out of the obscurity in which he was confined by his impertinent tutors. So that there could not possibly be that strict friendship between him and Agricola, which Moreri speaks of. Besides this error, (that I may dispatch them all at once,) there are several others in that writer. Agricola, says he, was well skilled in all kinds of Literature, and even in the Greek language. This is just as ridiculous, as if one should say, Such a man understands every part of Divinity, and even the controversies concerning Grace. Is not the Greek tongue one of the noblest parts of learning? I am at a loss to know where Moreri has read, that Agricola was Syndic of the city of Groningen for two years.

[K] What he copied from Erasmus (21).] He applies to our Agricola what Erasmus speaks of another person. We must observe, that Erasmus having highly extolled Agricola, confesses that one of the reasons, which inclined him to such a profusion of compliments upon him, was, that his own Master (22) had been a Scholar of Agricola (23). Upon this occasion he represents his Master's merit in a strong manner, and among other things he says of him, that even envy herself could not discover any fault in him, except his too great contempt for fame, his neglect of the future, and his never having writ any thing but for amusement. Freher quotes this remark, as if it belonged to Agricola, by which means he makes Erasmus guilty of a great mistake; for the works of Agricola collected into a body (24), and printed at Cologn in the year 1539, shew that he wrote a great deal, and with the utmost accuracy and application.

(21) In his Theatrum Viror. Erudit. p. 1430.

(22) Alexander Hegius.

(23) Erasm. Adag. Chiliade I. Centur. IV. num. 39. p. 145.

(24) By the care of Alard of Amsterdam. They contain two volumes in 4°.

[L] He died for want of the timely assistance of Physicians.] This is what Erasmus tells us; the reader will be pleased to read his own words: Veluti si quis in morbo capitali Medicum opperiatur insignem aut procul accersendum; quæ res hominem illum verè divinum extinxit Rodolphum Agricolam; etenim dum cunctatur Medicus, mors antevertit (25).

(25) Erasm. Adagior. Chil. III. Cent. III. num. 62. p. 703.

[M] Mr. Varillas has committed a great many errors.] I. He says (26), that Agricola had so prodigious a memory, that nothing ever escaped him, which he had once retained. This is an hyperbole, which I find no foundation for in the History of this great Man, tho' we have a very particular account of his excellencies. Is it probable, they would have omitted this, which is the most extraordinary talent imaginable? II. He became a prodigy of learning, without any books, but what he borrowed, and without any master. The hyperbole here is attended with a palpable falsity; for we are told in his Life, that he was sent very young to school (27); and that after he had learned the Grammar, he went to study at Louvain, where he lodged at the college of the Falcon, and performed all the parts of a Student in Philosophy, and devoted himself likewise to persons, who were distinguished for their knowledge of polite Literature. At Ferrara he was a constant auditor of Theodorus Gaza. Ibi Theodorum Gazam Aristotelis scripta enarrantem diligenter audivit (28). It is true that upon his journeys he carried but few books with him, and having left the rest of his Library with his friends, he borrowed what he had occasion for: But besides that there is scarce any Man of letters, but what does so in travelling, will any one pretend to say, that Agricola got all his learning in his travels? III. He began his studies where others use to finish them, that is, with the Hebrew tongue. He was resolved to learn it not only in its purity, but with all the changes, which were made in it by time and the refinement of the Rabbins. He took the same care to learn the Greek.... And at last he applied himself to Latin, without any regard to the remonstrances of those, who would have dissuaded him from this method, by representing to him, that the habit of writing and speaking Hebrew would introduce into his manner of writing something very inconsistent with the phrases and expressions of the Latin. Who can read this without astonishment, if he but knows, that our Rodolphus did not learn Hebrew till a few years before his death, and that he made but a small progress in it (29)? I imagine, that Mr. Varillas was drawn into this mistake by the following Latin passage Transisti enim Hebraicas, Græcasque literas usque adeo stupendâ celeritate, ut nequaquam Groningia in ultima Frisiæ, sed Hierosolymis Athenisque natus ac educatus à doctissimis crederere. Latinam parem tantæ felicitati dedisti, docuisti que, ut &c. (30). "For "you,

(26) Varillas Anecdot. de Florence. p. 184.

(27) Puer admodum in ludum Literarium missus. Adam. Vitæ Philosoph. p. 13.

(28) Ibid. p. 15.

(29) See the Remark [E] above, and join to it these words of Erasmus: Extremo vitæ tempore ad literas Hebraicas totum animum appulerat. i. e. "In "the latter part "of his life he "applied him- "self wholly to "the study "of Hebrew."

(30) Paul. Jovius, Elogior. Cap. XXXIII.

give us occaſion to mention ſome particulars concerning the publication of one of Agricola's books, entitled, De Inventione Dialectica [N].

" you, (it is an apoſtrophe to Agricola,) you paſſed " thro' the Hebrew and Greek tongues with ſuch an " amazing expedition, that you did not ſeem to " have been born at Groningen in Friſeland, but at " Jeruſalem and Athens, and to have been educated " under the moſt learned Men in the world. The " Latin tongue you learned and taught with ſuch " ſucceſs, that &c." This I believe gave occaſion to Mr. Varillas to imagine that Agricola learned Hebrew firſt, then Greek, and laſt of all Latin, and that he uſed to compoſe and converſe in Hebrew. IV. He made ſuch a ſurprizing progreſs in Latin, that Eraſmus, who was not generally very free in commanding thoſe qualifications in others, which he poſſeſſed himſelf, could not be wearied with admiring him, eſpecially after he had publiſhed his Commentaries upon the Rhetoric and Logic of Ariſtotle, written with an elegance worthy the age of Auguſtus. Eraſmus was ſo inconſiderable and unknown in the world, when Agricola died, that it is very abſurd to trace his admiration of him from any time before the death of Agricola. Beſides it is an Anachroniſm to ſay, that this illuſtrious Man lived ſo long, as till Eraſmus's own reputation in polite Learning prevented him from giving any other perſon a ſhare in the glory of it. I have two remarks more to make. The Commentaries upon Ariſtotle's Logic were not publiſhed till after the author's death. Eraſmus acquaints us with this particular, and alſo tells us, that they were mutilated and imperfect. Latitabant apud neſcio quos Commentarii Dialectices; nuper in publicum prodierunt, ſed mutili (31). However it is very certain, that it is not in this work, we are to admire the Latin of Agricola, nor the elegance of the Auguſtan age. V. The Elector Palatine . . . ſent for Agricola to Heidelberg . . . gave him the firſt Profeſſorſhip of Eloquence in the univerſity . . . and made him Counſellor of State. The Life of Agricola, which we have among the Lives of the Profeſſors of Groningen, and that in Melchior Adam, mention nothing of this. It is the Biſhop of Worms, who is ſaid to have engaged him to go into the Palatinate.

(31) Eraſm. Adag Chil. I. Cent. IV. num. 39. p. 145.

[N] One of Agricola's books, entitled, De Inventione Dialecticâ.] Here an obſervation follows communicated to me ſince the firſt edition. " Rodolphus Agricola compoſed no regular Commentaries " upon Ariſtotle's Logic or Rhetoric. We have nothing of his upon that ſubject but three books " De Inventione Dialecticâ, printed firſt at Louvain " in 1516 by the direction of Alard of Amſterdam, " who publiſhed them without any order, as he " had recovered them. Some time after this one " James le Febvre of Deventer cauſed a report to be " raiſed that he had a manuſcript De Inventione Dialecticâ that contained three books more than the edition of Louvain. This proved a notorious falſity. " Alard, who went on purpoſe to ſee this Le Febvre at " Deventer, having examined his manuſcript, found " that it was neither larger, nor more correct, than " that from which the Louvain edition was printed. " Upon this he reproached Le Febvre for having " publiſhed ſuch a falſhood, who endeavoured to " excuſe himſelf, though to little purpoſe. Since " the year 1528 Pompeius Occo, having received the original manuſcript of Agricola, which " had belonged to his uncle Adolphus, he put it " into the hands of Alard, who finding it very " compleat and in good order had it printed at " Cologne in 4to, with large Commentaries, in the " year 1539. Some years before this, John Matthew Priſſemius, to whom Alard had communicated his manuſcript, had publiſhed in the ſame " city with his own Comments. This work, " which is the maſter-piece of Agricola, has been " always eſteemed for the accuracy of the ſtyle (32), " and the exactneſs of the reaſoning." This remark is owing to the ſame hand, to which I am obliged for that in the note [D] (33).

(32) All this may be true, notwithſtanding which the work may be very remote from the polite manners of the age of Auguſtus, and inferior in elegance to the other writings of Agricola.

(33) Mr. de la Monnoie.

☞ AGRIPPA, ſirnamed (CASTOR) (a), flouriſhed under the Emperor Hadrian, about the year 132 (b). He was a man of great learning (c), and wrote a very accurate work againſt the hereſy of Baſilides, in which he confuted his errors, after he had detected them, and ſhewn his ſeveral evaſions and ſubterfuges. Euſebius tells us (d), that Agrippa obſerved, that Baſilides had written four and twenty books upon the Goſpel [A]; that he had forged Prophets who never exiſted, to whom he gave very ſtrange and uncommon names, ſuch as Barcabas and Barcob [B], in order to ſtrike the more forcibly upon the minds of thoſe who were apt to admire ſuch things. He ſaid likewiſe, that this Heretic taught, that it was a matter of an indifferent nature to eat ſacrifices offered up to idols; that it was lawful to renounce the faith in time of perſecution, and that in imitation of Pythagoras, he enjoined his ſcholars ſilence for five years [C]. Theodoret tells us (e), that he confuted Iſidorus the ſon of Baſilides in a book

(a) Euſeb. l. 4. c. 7. S. Hieronym. de Viris Illuſtr. c. 21.
(b) Cave, Hiſt. Litter. pag. 35. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog. 1720.
(c) Euſeb. and S. Hieron. ubi ſupra.
(d) Ubi ſupra.
(e) Hæret. Fab. l. 1. c. 4.

[A] Baſilides had writttn four and twenty books upon the Goſpel.] St. Jerom likewiſe informs us of this particular (1); adverſum viginti quatuor Baſilidis hæretici volumina, quæ in Evangelium confecerat, fortiſſimè diſſeruit. Valeſius in his Notes upon Euſebius (2) obſerves, that he does not mention which of the Goſpels Baſilides wrote thoſe books upon, whether upon that of St. Matthew, or of St. Mark. He ſuppoſes therefore, that he wrote them upon his own Goſpel, which he publiſhed under his own name, and which is mentioned by Origen (3), who calls it Τὸ κατὰ Βασιλείδην εὐαγγέλιον, i. e. " The Goſpel according to Baſilides," and by St. Ambroſe (4), and St. Jerom (5). We have a Fragment of the 13th Book of Baſilides in Archelaus's diſpute with Manes (6); and another in Epiphanius (7). Theſe books of his were called his Exegetics (8); and Clemens Alexandrinus (9) has given us ſome extracts from the 23d Book under that title. The reader may conſult Dr. Grabe's Spicilegium (10).

(1) De Viris Illuſtrib. c. 21.
(2) Loco ſupra citato.
(3) Hom. 1. in Lucam.
(4) Proœm. in Luc.
(5) In Matth.
(6) C. 55. Ses J. A. Fabricii Not. in St. Hieron. de Viris. Illuſt. c. 21.
(7) Hæreſ. xxiv. num. 1.
(8) Ἐξηγητικοί.
(9) Stromat. l. 4. p. 506, 509.
(10) Tom. 2. p. 35, & ſeq.
(11) De Viris Illuſt. c. 21.
(12) Lib. 2.
(13) C. ii.

[B] Barcabas and Barcob.] Rufinus has given theſe names, Barchaban and Barchob; St. Jerom Barcaban and Barcob (11); and Nicephorus (12) Barcabban and Barcoph. In a book, which paſſes under St. Jerom's name, De Hæreſibus (13). we have theſe names Barcobbam and Barcobbet. The name Barcoph is not unlike in ſound to that of the Prophet Parchor, mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus (14), where he quotes Iſidorus the ſon of Baſilides ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ τῶν Προφήτου Παρχὼρ ἐξηγητικῶν. Epiphanius (15) interprets the word Barcabban, the ſon of fornication or parricide. For, ſays he, Cabba means Fornication according to the Syrian Dialect, and Parricide according to the Hebrew. Euſebius (16) ſays, that Coph (17) means a Calling (18); and St. Jerom (19) explains it by the word Vocatio, which is to the ſame purpoſe.

(14) Stromat. p. 64. apud J. Alb. Fabric. ubi ſupra.
(15) Hæreſ. XXVI. 2.
(16) Præpar. x. 5.
(17) Καφ.
(18) Κλῆσις.
(19) Epiſt. 155. ad Paulum.

[C] He enjoyed his Scholar's ſilence for five years.] This, ſays Mr. le Clerc, was done by him, that he might have time to make a trial of their folly and ſtupidity; and indeed he might be very certain, that any man was egregiouſly fooliſh, who would keep ſilence for ſo many years, and follow an impoſtor teaching and acting ſuch a variety of abſurdities. Sectatoribus ſuis quinquennale ſilentium, Pythagoreorum more, imponebat; quod factum ab eo videtur, ut eorum ſtultitiæ experimentum ſumeret; ac ſanè bona fide inſanire eum intelligere poterat, qui per quinquennium ſilentio ſibi impoſito, planum tot abſurda docentem & facientem adſectari ſuſtinebat (20).

(20) Jo. Clerici Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 589. edit. Amſtelod. 1716.

T.

book which he wrote againſt him. We know nothing more of this author; for his works are loſt, and we have no conſiderable fragment of him remaining.

AGRIPPA (HENRY CORNELIUS) a great Magician, if we believe many perſons (A), was a man of conſiderable learning in the ſixteenth Century. He was born at Cologne the 14th of September 1486 (a) of a noble and ancient family [B]. Having an inclination to follow the ſteps of his anceſtors (b), who for ſeveral ages had acted in conſiderable poſts under the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, he entered very young into the ſervice of the Emperor Maximilian. He had at firſt the poſt of Secretary; but as he was equally formed for the ſword and for the pen, he afterwards took arms, and ſerved that Emperor ſeven years in his army in Italy [C]. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral engagements, and as a reward for his illuſtrious actions he received the honour of Knighthood. To theſe military honours he thought proper to add thoſe of the Univerſities [D]; and took the degrees of Doctor of Laws and Phyſick. He was unqueſtionably a very great genius, and well ſkilled in an infinite number of things and a variety of languages [E]; but his too great curioſity, with the freedom of his pen, and the inconſtancy of his humour, involved him in a ſeries of misfortunes. He was for ever changing his ſituation; he was always in ſome diſtreſs or other, and to compleat his unhappineſs, he drew upon himſelf the hatred of the Eccleſiaſtics by his writings. We find by his Letters that he was in France before the year 1507 (c), that he went to Spain in 1508 (d), and that he was at Dole in 1509 (e). He read public Lectures there [F], which engaged him in a controverſy with Catilinet a Franciſcan. The Monks at that time ſuſpected every thing of error or hereſy, which they did not underſtand; how then was it poſſible for them to bear, that

Agrippa

(a) Agrippa Epiſtol. xxvi. lib. 7. p. 1041. edit. Lugd. in 8°.

(b) Idem, ibid. Epiſt. xviii. lib. vi. p. 970, and Epiſt. xxi. lib. vii. p. 1021. See likewiſe pag. 736.

(c) Agrippa Epiſt. i. lib. i.

(d) Epiſt. x. lib. i.

(e) Epiſt. xvii. lib. i.

[A] A great Magician, if we will believe a great many people.] Paulus, Jovius, Thevet, and Martin del Rio, are his principal accuſers. We ſhall ſee in the remark [P] the blunders, which they have fallen into. They are very palpable; and yet an infinite number of people are ſtill perſuaded upon the authority of theſe writers, that he was a compleat conjurer.

[B] Of a noble and ancient family.] It was called de Nettesheym. Mr. Teiſſier p. 99. of the ſecond tome of his Additions to the Elogia extracted from Thuanus, aſſures us, that Agrippa was a native of Nettesheym in the country of Cologne. Melchior Adam, whom he quotes, ſays nothing of this. He tells us, that he was born in the city of Cologne itſelf (1), and refers us to a Letter of his, where we read theſe words addreſſed to the Magiſtrates of Cologne; Poſſim vobis horum veriſſima exempla referre, niſi civium veſtrorum pudori parcendum, & patriæ meæ rationem habendam ducerem. Sum enim & ego, ſi forte neſcitis, civitate veſtrâ oriundus, & primâ pueritiâ apud vos enutritus (2). i. e. "I might, ſays he, "produce inconteſtable examples of theſe things "to you, but that I am willing not to diſgrace "your Citizens, and to have ſome regard to my "own country. For I myſelf, (if you have for"got that circumſtance,) owe my birth and educa"tion to your city." Thevet has committed a prodigious miſtake in ſaying that he was born in the town of Neſtre (3). I know nothing of his father, but that he was engaged in the ſervice of the houſe of Auſtria (4), and died about the beginning of the year 1518 (5).

(1) Melch. Adam. Vitæ Medic. p. 16.

(2) Agripp. Epiſt. xxvi. lib. 7. pag. 1041.

(3) Thevet Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 7. p. 222. Paris ed. in 1671. in 7 Vol. 120.

(4) Agrip. Epiſt. xviii. lib. 6. pag. 970.

(5) Idem, Epiſt. xix. lib. 2. pag. 736.

[C] He ſerved ſeven years . . . in the army in Italy.] Paul Freher, who very ſeldom ventures to recede a ſtep from the authors, whom he copies, has here attempted to proceed upon his own authority, and to ſhew that he can ſay ſomething, that Melchior Adam had not ſaid before him. But he has ſucceeded very ill in it; for he makes theſe ſeven years begin in 1508, and end in 1515. If he had been converſant with Agrippa's works, he would have known, that this author was in Spain in 1508, at Dole in 1509, and in England in 1510. It is plain then that theſe ſeven years muſt have begun in 1511, and that Agrippa muſt have pretended to have been in the Emperor's army all the while he was in Italy. But his letters would have confuted this, when we examine the dates of them. It does not appear that from the time that he took upon him the Profeſſorſhip at Pavia in 1515, he had any poſt in the army. However Freher, in all that he copies from Melchior Adam, contents himſelf with the errors of that author, and never adds any new ones of his own. See his Theatrum, p. 1221.

[D] To theſe military honours he thought proper to add thoſe of the Univerſities.] It is worth while to ſee how he expreſſes this. Utriuſque Juris & Medicinarum Doctor evaſi, antea etiam Auratus Eques; quem ordinem non precario mihi redemi, non à tranſmarinâ peregrinatione mutuavi, non in Regum inthroniſatione impudenti inſolentiâ ſurripui, ſed in publicis præliis media acie bellica virtute commerui (6). i. e. "I was made Doctor of Laws and of Phyſic, "as I was before a Knight; which Order I did not "procure by a venal ſubmiſſion, nor by travelling "into foreign countries, nor extorted inſolently at "the coronation of a King, but merited it by pub"lic proofs of my valour in the midſt of ar"mies."

(6) Idem, Epiſt. xxi. lib. 7. pag. 1021. See likewiſe p. 737, 977.

[E] A variety of languages.] He underſtood eight, and of that great number there was but two, which he was not a perfect maſter of. He will tell it himſelf, tho' perhaps not with too much modeſty; and we ſhall do him no injury in valuing him in as high a manner, as he rates himſelf. Octo linguarum mediocriter doctus, ſed illarum ſex adeo peritus, ut ſingulis non loqui modo & intelligere, ſed & eleganter orare, dictare, & transferre noverim; tum præter multimodam etiam abſtruſarum rerum cognitionem, peritiam, & cyclicam eruditionem, utriuſque Juris & Medicinarum Doctor evaſi (7). i. e. "I am pretty "well skilled in eight languages, and ſuch a com"pleat maſter of ſix of them, that I cannot only "ſpeak and underſtand every one of them, but even "make an elegant oration, dictate, and tranſlate in "them; and beſides a very extenſive knowledge of "the moſt abſtruſe things, and a general acquain"tance with the whole circle of ſciences; I am "likewiſe a Doctor of Laws, and of Phyſic." He engaged very early in the ſearch after the Philoſopher's ſtone; and it ſeems he had been repreſented to ſeveral Princes as a perſon very capable of attaining the Grand Operation; which ſeveral times brought him into danger of loſing his liberty (8). It is very certain, that a man, who ſhould be ſuppoſed capable of making gold, would have great reaſon to apprehend, that ſome Prince or other would confine him. They would ſecure him for their own uſe, and prevent other Princes from receiving any advantage by him.

(7) Idem, Epiſt. xxi. lib. 7. pag. 1021.

(8) Idem, Epiſt. iv. and x. lib. i.

[F] He read public Lectures at Dole.] He ſeems to contradict himſelf upon this affair; for ſometimes he ſays, that he read them without any ſtipend, and ſometimes he had one: Publicis prælectionibus, quas ad honorem illuſtriſſimæ Principis Margaretæ & uniti ſtudii Dolani feci GRATIS. Thus he ſpeaks in his Expoſtulation againſt the Franciſcan Catilinet (9). But in other places he ſays, that he incorporated among the Profeſſors of Divinity, and received his ſtipend accordingly. In Dola Burgundiæ publ. lectura ſacras literas profeſſus ſum, ob quam ab hujus ſtudii Doctoribus in Collegium receptus, inſuper regentia & ſtipendio donatus ſum (10). The method of reconciling this is to ſay, that at firſt he read gratis, and afterwards had a ſtipend allowed him.

(9) Idem, Operum tom. 2. pag. 510.

(10) Idem, Defenſ. Propoſit. p. 596.

Agrippa ſhould explain the myſterious work of Reuchlin de Verbo Mirifico with impunity? This was the ſubject of the Lectures which he read at Dole in the year 1509 with great applauſe. The Counſellors of the Parliament went themſelves to hear him (f). In order to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of Margaret of Auſtria, Governeſs of the Low-Country, he compoſed his Treatiſe of the Excellence of Women (g); but the perſecution which he met with from the Monks, prevented him from publiſhing it. Upon this he quitted the field to them, and went over to England (h), where he laboured upon St. Paul's Epiſtles (i), though he had another very ſecret affair in hand at that time. At his return to Cologne he read public Lectures there upon thoſe queſtions in Divinity, which are called Quodlibetales; after which he went to Italy to join the army of the Emperor Maximilian, and ſtaid there till he was ſent for to Piſa by the Cardinal de Sainte Croix. Agrippa would have diſplayed his talents there, as a Divine of the Council, if it had continued to ſit. This would not have been a proper method of gaining the favour of the Court of Rome, nor have procured him ſuch an obliging Letter as he received from Leo X. [G], and from which we may preſume that he changed his opinion. After this he taught Divinity publickly at Pavia and Turin (k). He read Lectures upon Mercurius Triſmegiſtus at Pavia in the year 1515 (l). His departure from that city the ſame year, or the year following, ſeemed rather a flight than a retreat. This appears from the XLIX Letter of his firſt book compared with the LII. He had at that time a wife and children [H]. It appears (f) See his Expoſtulatio cum Joanne Catlineto Fratrum Franciſcanorum petr. Burgundiam Provinciali Miniſtro. Operum tom. 2. p. 508.

(g) See his Epiſtle Dedicatory to this Treatiſe dated from Antwerp Ap. 1529.

(h) His Expoſtulatio is dated from London in 1510.

(i) Agrip. Defenſio Propoſit. p. 596.

(k) Id. ibid. pag. 596.

(l) Agripp. Operum tom. 2. pag. 1073.

[G] An obliging Letter, which he received from Leo X. (11).] It is dated at Rome the 12th of July 1513, and ſigned Petrus Bembus. He is commended in it for his zeal to the Apoſtolical See, which was repreſented to the Pope by the Nuncio himſelf. Ex literis venerabilis fratris Ennii Epiſcopi Verulani nuncii noſtri, aliorumque ſermonibus de tuâ in ſanctam Sedem Apoſtolicam devotione, deque tuo in ejus libertate incolumitateque tuenda ſtudio diligentiaque intelleximus: quod quidem nobis gratiſſimum fuit. Quapropter te in Domino magnopere commendamus, laudamuſque iſtum animum atque virtutem (12). We may obſerve that this Brief cannot be made uſe of in order to clear Agrippa of the imputation of a Necromancer (13); for it was written ſeveral years before he fell under that ſcandal.

(11) It is the XXXVIIIth of the firſt book among thoſe of Agrippa.

(12) Oper. Agrippæ, tom. 2. p. 710.

(13) It was urged to ſuch a purpoſe in Crocii Animadver. Philol. & Hiſtor. part 2. p. 14, 15.

[H] He had at that time a wife and children.] Though I uſe the plural number, yet I know that he had but one ſon: Quorſum, quæſo, in tam ſuſpecta tempeſtate una cum uxore filioque ac familia confugiſſem, relicta Papiæ domo ac ſupellectile rebuſque omnibus? That is, "To what purpoſe ſhould I run away "in ſo dangerous a time, with a wife, a ſon, and "family, and leave my houſe and furniture and all "that I had at Pavia?" It is thus he ſpeaks in his 49th Letter of the ſecond book. He was very well pleaſed with his wife; for he writes thus of her in another place: Ego quidem Deo omnipotenti innumeram habeo Gratiam, qui uxorem mihi conjunxit ſecundum cor meum, virginem nobilem, bene moratam, adoleſcentulam, formoſam, quæ ita ad meam vivit conſuetudinem, ut ne contumelioſum verbum inter nos intercidat, atque quo fæliciſſimum me dixero, quorſum ſe res vertunt, in proſperis & adverſis, ſemper æque mihi benigna, affabilis, conſtans, integerrimi animi, ſani conſilii, ſemper apud ſe manens (14). That is, "I have "the greateſt reaſon to return innumerable thanks to "Almighty God, that he has given me a wife exactly after my own heart, a virgin of a noble family, well behaved, young, beautiful, of ſo ſweet "and flexible a temper, that there never paſt any "harſh word between us; and what makes me the "happieſt of mankind, in whatever ſituation my affairs are, whether proſperous or adverſe, ſhe ſtill "continues the ſame, equally kind, affable, conſtant, "ſincere and prudent, and always eaſy and miſtreſs "of herſelf." There is but one thing that he has omitted, and that is, whether ſhe was rich or not; for in other reſpects he repreſents her as poſſeſſed of all the qualifications that one could wiſh, beautiful, young, virtuous, noble, and of ſo happy a temper, that ſhe was never out of humour. He loſt her in the year 1521, and had her buried, for what reaſon I know not, at Metz, from which city he had removed ſome time before (15). He gave a fund for ſaying maſs annually for the ſoul of the deceaſed (16). He married a ſecond time at Geneva in the year 1522 (17). He commends this wife as much as the former. Ante biennium hoc ſecundam uxorem duxi, virginem nobilem pulcherrimamque, quæ adeo ad meam vivit conſuetudinem, ut neſcias iſtane priorem, anne hanc illa, utra alterum in amando obſequendoque æquet an ſuperet (18). That is, "About two years "ago, ſays he, I married a ſecond wife, a noble and "beautiful virgin, whoſe temper is ſo agreeable to "mine, that it is doubtful whether ſhe or my former "wife exceeds in affection and obedience to me." But the latter ſurpaſs'd the former very much in fruitfulneſs; he had but one ſon by the former, whereas the latter was brought to bed three times in two years, and a fourth time the year following. Duos iſta mihi filios peperit, ambo ſuperſtites, filiamque unam, quæ vita exceſſit (19).... Uxor mea jam partui proxima eſt (20). That is, "She has given "me two ſons, both alive, and one daughter, who "is dead.... She is now ready to be brought to "bed." He does not ſay, whether ſhe was rich, but one of his friends aſſures us ſhe was. Te nunc degere Gebennis, illicque proba, nobili, formoſa, ac locuplete ducta uxore in artis Apollineæ experimentis clarere ſingulariter (21). But I am not of opinion that this was true; for the Letters of Agrippa, after this ſecond marriage, complain of poverty as much as before. The third ſon, by this marriage had the Cardinal of Lorrain for his God father (22). When he departed from Paris for Antwerp in the month of July 1528, he left his wife at Paris big with child (23). She was brought to bed of her fifth ſon at Antwerp the 13th of March 1529 (24), and died there in the month of Auguſt 1529, extremely regretted by her husband, as appears from his LXXXI Letter of the fifth Book. She was then almoſt twenty ſeven years old. I have not obſerved, that he makes any mention of his third marriage in his Letters; but we know from other hands, that he divorced his wife in the year 1535: Ubi conjugem Mechlinienſem Bonnæ repudiaſſet anno triceſimo quinto ſupra ſeſqui milleſimum. i. e. "When he had "divorced his wife, which he married from Mich"len, at Bonne, in the year 1535." This we underſtand from John Wierus (25), who had been his domeſtic. If Thevet had been acquainted with all theſe particulars, he would not have contented himſelf with ſaying only that Agrippa married Mademoiſelle Louyſe Tyſſie, born of a noble family, in the 25th year of his age, and in that of Chriſt 1509 (26); but he would have ſpoken at leaſt in general of his two other marriages. Melchior Adam knew more of this than Thevet; for he tells us that Agrippa had two wives; Duum uxorum maritus nobilium, & liberorum aliquot parens. But beſides that he ſeems to know nothing of his third marriage, he makes ſeveral miſtakes in Chronology, when he ſpeaks of the firſt. His words are theſe: Mortuo Maximiliano, ſub diverſis & principibus & civitatum magiſtratibus per Italiam, Hiſpaniam, Angliam, Galliam, egit, multaque egregia facinora deſignavit. Tandem laborum terra marique exantlatorum ſatur, ac quietis & otii cupidus ducta uxore, virgine nobili, ſedem in Allobregibus fixit, ut procul negotiis

(14) Agripp. Epiſt. XIX. l. 2. p. 736.

(15) Epiſt. VIII. lib. 3. p. 785.

(16) Epiſt. XIX. lib. 4. p. 846.

(17) Epiſt. XXXIII. lib. 4. p. 800. See likewiſe p. 852.

(18) Epiſt. IX. lib. 3. p. 818.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Epiſt. LXXIX. lib. 3. p. 826.

(21) Ep. XXXIII. lib. 3. p. 800.

(22) Epiſt. LXVI. lib. 3. p. 827.

(23) Epiſt. IV. lib. 6. p. 933.

(24) Epiſt. LXVIII. lib. 5. p. 941.

(25) Wier. de Magis c. 5. pag. 111.

(26) Thevet, Hommes Illuſtres, p. 222, 223.

pears from his ſecond book of Letters, that his friends endeavoured in ſeveral places to procure him ſome honourable ſettlement or other, either at Grenoble, Geneva, Avignon, or Metz. He choſe to fix in the laſt of theſe places; and I find, that in the year 1518 (m), he exerciſed the ſeveral offices of Syndic, Advocate and Orator to that city (n). The perſecutions which were raiſed againſt him by the Monks, becauſe he had refuted the common notion concerning St. Anne's three huſbands, and becauſe he protected a country woman who was charged with witchcraft [I], obliged him to quit the city of Metz. What induced him to write to prove that St. Anne was but once married, was becauſe he ſaw his friend James Faber Stapulenſis abuſed in ſo outrageous a manner by the Preachers of Metz, for maintaining that opinion (o). Agrippa retired into his own country of Cologne in the year 1520, leaving without any reluctance a city, which theſe turbulent inquiſitors had rendered averſe to every thing of polite Learning and real merit (p). This is the fate of every country, where ſuch people gain the aſcendant, whatever religion they profeſs. He left his own country in 1521, and went to Geneva (q). He did not gain much money there, for he complains, that he had not enough to bear his charges to Chamberi (r), in order to ſollicit in perſon a penſion, which he had expectations of from the Duke of Savoy. Theſe expectations were diſappointed; and upon this he went from Geneva to Fribourg in Switzerland (s) in the year 1523 (t), to practiſe Phyſic there, as he had done before at Geneva. The year following he went to Lyons, and obtained a penſion from Francis I. He engaged himſelf to that King's mother as her Phyſician, but he did not make his fortune by it, nor even attend her (u) at her departure from Lyons in the month of Auguſt 1525, when ſhe went to conduct her daughter to the borders of Spain. He was left behind at Lyons, deſiring in vain the aſſiſtance of his friends, in order to procure the payment of his ſtipend; but before he received it, he had the unwelcome account of his being croſſed out of the liſt (x). The cauſe of this diſgrace was, that having received orders from his miſtreſs to examine by the rules of Aſtrology what ſucceſs the affairs of France were likely to have, he took too great a freedom in complaining that this Princeſs ſhould employ him in ſuch impertinent curioſities, inſtead of things of more importance. The Lady was piqu'd extremely at this remonſtrance of his (y); but ſhe was more enraged, when ſhe came to know that his aſtrological calculations had promiſed new ſucceſſes to the Conſtable of Bourbon [K]. Agrippa, finding

(m) Agrip. Epiſt. xii. lib. 2.

(n) See his IVth Oration Operum tom. 2. p. 1090.

(o) Epiſt. xxv. lib. 2. p. 743. See likewiſe pag. 746.

(p) Epiſt. xxxii. lib. 2. p. 749.

(q) Epiſt. vii. lib. 3. p. 784.

(r) Epiſt. xxiv. lib. 3. p. 794.

(s) And not in Briſgaw, as Melchior Adam ſays.

(t) Epiſt. xli. lib. 3. & ſeq.

(u) Epiſt. lxxix. lib. 3. p. 828.

(x) Epiſt. iii. lib. 4. p. 869.

(y) Ep. xxxvii. lib. 4. p. 859. item. p. 870.

negotiis ſibi ac muſis viveret. Invitatus autem ab inclyta Mediomatricum repub. munus Syndici, Advocati, & Oratoris obivit (27). i. e. "After the death of "Maximilian, he lived in ſeveral kingdoms and "publicks in Italy, Spain, England, and France, "where he engaged in ſeveral noble deſigns. At "laſt being tired of the fatigues, which he had ſuf"fered both at ſea and land, and deſirous of living "in a more eaſy and quiet manner, he married a "young Lady of a noble family, and ſettled in Sa"voy, that he might be remote from buſineſs, and "applied himſelf wholly to his ſtudies. But be"ing invited by the famous city of Metz *, he per"formed the office of Syndic, Advocate and Orator "there." We may obſerve, that the Emperor Maximilian died the 12th of January 1519, and that Agrippa went to Spain 1508, and to England in 1510. So that here is a remarkable anachroniſm. After his return from England, he ſtaid ſome time at Cologne; and then went to Italy. He was there ſtill in 1517 (28). He was at Metz in 1518 (29). He did not return to Italy, after he had left it to go to Metz. So that here is another anachroniſm. Obſerve likewiſe, that in the year 1515 he was already married (30). Where then are the great fatigues, which he is ſaid to have ſuffered both by ſea and land after the death of the Emperor Maximilian, which he reſolved to put an end to by marriage? How then can he be ſaid to have ſettled with his wife in Savoy, when he led ſuch an ambulatory kind of life with her in Italy? Add to this, that before his journey to Metz, he had not ſettled himſelf in Savoy, and that he was Syndic of Metz before the death of Maximilian. Melchior Adam has a prodigious number of errors of this kind. But part of theſe, which I have taken notice of, are ſo much the more excuſable in him, as he has fallen into them by following Agrippa himſelf, who for want of memory, or ſome other reaſon, told Margaret Queen of Hungary, that after the death of Maximilian, he took ſuch and ſuch journeys, &c. See his XXI Letter of the VII Book. It would be entertaining enough to ſee ſomebody undertake to reconcile Melchior Adam with Thevet. According to the latter, Agrippa was married at twenty three years of age; but the other aſſures us, that he was not married till after an infinite number of journeys and affairs, which he was engaged in, and when he was quite fatigued with labour, and deſirous of ſome reſt at laſt.

(27) Melchior Adam. Vit. Medicor. p. 17.

* Then a free City.

(28) Agripp. Ep. i. lib. 2. p. 722.
(29) Epiſt. xii. lib. 2. p. 730.
(30) Epiſt. xlvii, xlviii. lib. 1.

[I] He protected a country-woman who was (α) charged with witchcraft.] Nicholas Savini a Dominican, Inquiſitor at Metz, inſiſted upon putting this woman to the torture, merely upon the account of an idle prejudice againſt her, becauſe ſhe was the daughter of one, who had been burnt for witchcraft (31). Agrippa exerted all his endeavours, that the proceſs might be carried on regularly; and yet he could not prevent her from being put to the torture; but he managed the matter ſo, that it appeared ſhe was not guilty. Upon this her accuſers were fined (32), which was too mild a puniſhment, and not an equivalent to that which ſhe would have ſuffered in caſe ſhe had been found guilty.

(31) Ep. xxxix. lib. 2. p. 754.

(32) Epiſt. xl. lib. 2. p. 757. See likewiſe pag. 763.

§ (α) This country-woman was of Vapey *, a village ſituated near the gates of Metz, and belonging to the Chapter of the Cathedral. There appeared in the Clergy of Metz, which were the principal accuſers of that woman, ſo much mean paſſion and prejudice, and ſuch a profound ignorance of all Polite Learning and true Philoſophy, that upon this account Agrippa in his Letter of the ſecond June 1519, gives the city of Metz the character of being omnium bonarum literarum virtutumque Noverca, i. e. "the Step-mother of all good learning and "virtue;" which ignominious words perhaps gave occaſion to the proverb Metis avara ſcientiarum Noverca, i. e. "Covetous Metz, the Stepmother of "ſciences." CRIT. REM.

* Villa Vapeya.

[K] Promiſed new ſucceſſes to the Conſtable of Bourbon.] His complaints of being employed in the impertinences of Aſtrology muſt needs be very diſpleaſing. Scripſi Seneſchallo, ut admoneat illam, ne ad tam indignum artificium ingenio meo diutiùs abutatur, nec in has nugas ulteriùs impingere cogar, qui multò fælicioribus ſtudiis illi inſervire queam (33). i. e. "I wrote to the Seneſchal, that he might de"ſire her, not to abuſe my underſtanding any longer "in ſuch an unworthy employment, nor oblige me "to continue my application to ſo abſurd a ſtudy, "ſince I was able to be uſeful to her in more impor-

(33) Epiſt. xxix. lib. 4. p. 854.

ing himſelf thus abandoned, murmured, raged, threatned [L], wrote, and ſpoke every thing that his impetuous humour ſuggeſted to him; but at laſt he was obliged to look out for a new ſettlement. He caſt his eyes upon the Low-Countries, and having procured at Paris, after a tedious delay, a paſſport which was neceſſary, he arrived at Antwerp in July 1528 (z). One cauſe of this delay was the paſſion of the Duke of Vendome, who inſtead of ſigning the paſſport, tore it in pieces, proteſting he would never ſign it for a conjurer (aa). In the year 1529 Agrippa was invited at the ſame time by Henry King of England, by the Chancellor of the Emperor, by an Italian Marquiſs, and by Margaret of Auſtria, Governeſs of the Low-Countries (bb). He choſe the laſt offer, and accepted of the charge of Hiſtoriographer to the Emperor, which that Princeſs gave him. He publiſhed by way of introduction The Hiſtory of the Government of Charles the Fifth; and ſoon after this he was called upon to make the Funeral Oration for that Princeſs, whoſe death was in ſome meaſure the life of our Agrippa; for they had infuſed into her mind the moſt terrible prejudices againſt him [M]. Beſides, they had done him the ſame diſkindneſs with the Emperor himſelf (cc). The (z) Epiſt. li. lib. 5. p. 932.

(aa) Conſpecto ſive audito nomine meo, præcipiti irâ repente diripuit papyrum totum inquiens ſe nequaquam ſignaturum in favorem Divinatoris. Epiſt. xxx. lib. 5. p. 920.

(bb) Ep. lxxxiv. lib. 5. p. 951.

(cc) Epiſt. xv. lib. 6. p. 969.

" tant ſubjects." But the worſt of the affair was, that this abſurd art diſcovered too great ſucceſs in favour of a party that was odious. Rediit in mentem ſcripſiſſe me Seneſchallo, comperiſſe me in BORBONII natalitiis revolutionibus illum fruſtratis veſtris exercitibus etiam in hunc annum victorem fore . . . dixique intra me, O infelix Propheta! hoc vaticinio jam omnem Principis tuæ gratiam concacaſti: hoc eſt ulcus, hic antrax, hic carbo, hic cancer ille, quem noli me tangere dicunt, quem tu imprudens tetigiſti etiam cauterio (34). i. e. " I remembred that I had writ to " the Seneſchal that I found by calculating Bour- " bon's nativity, that he would vanquiſh your ar- " mies again this year, . . . and I ſaid within myſelf, " Unhappy Prophet that thou art! by this predic- " tion thou haſt ruin'd thy ſelf entirely in the Prin- " ceſs's favour: this is the ulcer, this is ſuch a can- " cer, as they call a noli me tangere, and which thou " haſt touched imprudently even with a cauſtic." Thoſe who are acquainted with the circumſtances of that time, know that our Aſtrologer could have done nothing more improper in paying his court to the mother of Francis I, than to foretel good ſucceſs to the Conſtable. Agrippa was from that moment conſidered a Bourboniſt (35). In order to remove this imputation he repreſented the ſervice, which he had done to France, in drawing off four thouſand good foot ſoldiers from the Emperor's party, and engaging them in that of Francis I. He urged likewiſe the refuſal that he made of very advantageous terms, which were offer'd him, when he came from Fribourg, in caſe he would enter into the ſervice of the Conſtable. It appears from his ivth and vth Letter of the vth Book, that he kept a very ſtrict correſpondence with that Prince in the beginning of the year 1527. He gave him advice and counſel, tho' he refuſed to go to him, and he promis'd him the victory. He aſſured him, that the walls of Rome ſhould fall down at the firſt attack; he forgot only the chief thing of all, that is, that the Conſtable ſhould be ſlain there. Jam fata illis propinquam ſtragem ſuamque perniciem denunciant: mox illa ſuperba mœnia vix oppugnata corruere videbis. Eja ergo nunc, ſtrenuiſſime Princeps, quem tantæ victoriæ ducem fata conſtituunt; rumpe moras, perge intrepide quo cœpiſti proſpere, aggredere fortiter, pugna conſtanter, habes electiſſimorum militum armatas acies; adeſt cœlorum favor, aderit & juſti belli vindex Deus nihil formidaveris; ingens ſiquidem te manet gloriæ triumphus (36). i. e. " The " Fates, ſays he, now threaten them with approach- " ing deſtruction; thoſe proud walls will fall down " before you upon the firſt attack. Riſe then, va- " liant Prince, whom fate has deſtined for ſo glo- " rious a conqueſt; break off all delay; proceed " as proſperouſly as you have begun; attack with " your uſual valour; you have an army of the " choiceſt ſoldiers; you have the favour of heaven " to protect you; you will have God's aſſiſtance in " ſo juſt a war; therefore, fear nothing, while " ſo illuſtrious a triumph is waiting for you." The death of the Conſtable, which happened before Agrippa left Lyons, puts me in mind of three errors of Melchior Adam. He ſays that Agrippa being invited firſt by the Conſtable, and then by the Chancellor, went to the court of Burgundy, where he ſoon became very unhappy by the death of both his patrons. He has here committed three anachroniſms. I. The Conſtable was dead before Agrippa left France, and he never had any deſign to ſend for him to the court of the Princeſs Margaret (37). II. The Chancellor Gattinara indeed had a mind to ſend for him, but it was to the court of Charles the Fifth; Agrippa diſtinguiſhed this invitation very clearly from that, which was propoſed him in relation to the court of Princeſs Margaret (38). III. He was in the Low-Countries, when the Chancellor made propoſals to him.

(34) Epiſt. lxii. lib. 4. p. 880.

(35) Ibid. p. 881.

(36) Epiſt. vi. l. 5. p. 900. This Letter was writ from Lyons the 30th of March 1527.

(37) This is that which is meant by the court of Burgundy.

(38) Ep. lxxxiv. lib. 5. pag. 951.

[L] Agrippa, finding himſelf thus abandoned, murmured, raged, threatned.] He had uſed ſome threats even before his penſion was taken away. His indignation upon his not being paid his ſalary, and the contempt ſhewn him, urged him to ſay, that he ſhould be obliged to take ſome deſperate counſel or other. Crede mihi, ſays he to one of his friends (39), eò ſe inclinant res meæ atque animus, ni tuis precibus illiuſque celeri adjuver auxilio, malo aliquo utar conſilio. Siquidem & malis artibus nonnunquam bona fortuna parta eſt. i. e. " Believe me, my mind and " circumſtances are in ſuch a ſtate, that unleſs your " deſires and her immediate aſſiſtance change my re- " ſolution, I ſhall take ſome deſperate courſe, ſince " good fortune is ſometimes obtained by bad me- " thods." After he knew for certain his diſmiſſion, he wrote ſeveral thundering letters, and threatned to publiſh ſome books, in which he would expoſe all the ſecret hiſtory of thoſe Courtiers, who had ruined him (40). Nay he proceeded ſo far, as to ſay in a very brutal manner, that he would for the future account that Princeſs, to whom he had been Counſellor and Phyſician, as a cruel and perfidious Jezebel. Nec ultra illam ego pro Principe meâ, (jam enim eſſe deſiit,) ſed pro atrociſſimâ & perfidâ quadam Jeſabele mihi habendam decrevi (41). What then would he not have done in ſuch a paſſion, and with ſo ſtrong a deſire of revenge, if he had been poſſeſſed of as great an influence and power over the Devils, as he has been repreſented to have? I never heard, that any one has aſſerted, that this rage of his was the leaſt deſtructive to any perſon in the court of France. This unhappy man was equally diſſatisfied with the court of Charles the Fifth. He preſented a petition to the Privy-Council of that Emperor, in which he diſcovered his paſſion without diſguiſe, and repreſents that he could do whatever miſchief or good he pleaſed. His threatnings were the moſt plain and intelligible in the world; but they ſlighted them without any ill conſequence. Cogeretis me acceptam ea repulſa injuriam ad novarum rerum licentiam transferre, & malo aliquo conſilio (ceu quale Hermocles dedit Pauſaniæ) uti oportere. . . . Quin & malis artibus ſæpiſſime bona fortuna parta eſt. . . Sed interea memineritis inter Æſopi Apologos eſſe murem aliquando ſubveniſſe leoni & ſcarabeum expugnaſſe aquilam (42). i. e. " You will oblige " me by this ill uſage to take my revenge by con- " triving ſome new and dangerous deſigns againſt " you, and to engage in ſome deſperate counſel, ſuch " as Hermocles gave to Pauſanias. . . . For ſometimes " good fortune is procured by bad methods. . . . But " in the mean while remember, that among Æſop's " Fables, a mouſe once aſſiſted a lion, and a beetle " conquered an eagle."

(39) Epiſt. xxv. lib. 4. p. 850.

(40) See the liid and lxiid Letter of the 4th book.

(41) Epiſt. lxii. lib. 4. p. 884. See the liid Letter of the 5th Book, which is full of rage, and the xiiith of the ſame book, where he ſays, that this Princeſs would be ill adviſed, if ſhe took him again into her ſervice.

(42) Epiſt. xxii. lib. 2. p. 979.

[M] They had infuſed terrible prejudices into the mind of that Princeſs againſt him.] Thus he writes concerning

The Treatiſe of The Vanity of the Sciences, which he publiſhed in 1530, enraged his enemies extremely (dd). And that, which he printed ſoon after at Antwerp (ee), of Occult Philoſophy (ff) furniſhed them with new pretences to deſtroy his reputation. It was happy for him, that Cardinal Campegius the Pope's Legate, and the Cardinal de la Mark Biſhop of Liege, ſpoke in his favour (gg). But their kind offices could not procure him one farthing of his penſion as Hiſtoriographer, nor prevent him from being put into priſon at Bruſſels in the year 1531 (hh). He did not continue there long. The next year he paid a viſit to the Archbiſhop of Cologne (ii). He had dedicated to him his Occult Philoſophy, and received a very obliging letter from him in return (kk). His fear of his creditors was the cauſe of his ſtaying longer in the country of Cologne than he was willing (ll). He attacked very vigorouſly the inquiſitors, who had ſtop'd the impreſſion of his Occult Philoſophy, in his ſecond edition of it, which he publiſhed at Cologne with corrections and additions. See the XXVIth Letter of his VIIth Book, and the following Letters. In ſpite of all their efforts he finiſhed this impreſſion in 1533. He ſtaid at Bonne till 1535. That year he took a reſolution to return to Lyons. He was impriſoned in France for ſomething which he had writ againſt Francis the Firſt's mother, but he was enlarged from his confinement at the deſire of ſeveral perſons, and went to Grenoble, where he died the ſame year 1535 (mm). Some authors write, that he died in the Hoſpital; but as Gabriel Naudé aſſures us, it was at the houſe of the Receiver-General of the Province of Dauphiné, whoſe ſon was firſt Preſident of Grenoble (nn). Mr. Alard, pag. 4. of his Bibliotheque de Dauphiné, tells us, that he died at Grenoble, in the houſe belonging to the family of Ferrand in Clerk-Street, and which belonged then to the Preſident Vachon, and that he was interred in the church of the Dominicans. He always lived in the Romiſh communion, ſo that there is no ground for ſaying that he was a Lutheran [N]. I am not of opinion that he wrote for the divorce (dd) Epiſt. xx. lib. 6. p. 974.

(ee) Epiſt. xiv. lib. 6. p. 968.
(ff) See Remark [Q].
(gg) Ep. xx. l. 6. p. 975. Epiſt. xii. lib. 7. p. 1010. Epiſt. xxi. lib. 7. p. 1022.
(hh) Epiſt. xxiii. lib. 6. p. 980.
(ii) Epiſt. 6. l. 7.
(kk) Epiſt. i. l. 7.
(ll) Epiſt. xxi. lib. 7. p. 1024.
(mm) Joh. Wierus de Magis, cap. 5. p. 111.
(nn) Naudé Apol. des grands Hommes, &c. p. 427.

concerning that affair, after having complained, that he was left to ſtarve. Quod ad te ſcribam non habeo aliud, niſi quod hic egregiè eſurio, ab iſtis aulicis Diis totus præteritus. Quid magnus ille Jupiter (43), ſuſpicari nequeo. Ego quanto fuerim in periculo, jam primum reſcivi; tantum enim dictum eſt mihi; prævaluerunt cuculliones illi apud Dominam, ſed muliebriter religioſam Principem, ut niſi illa mox periiſſet, jam ego, quod maximum crimen eſt, monachalis majeſtatis ſacræque cucullæ reus tanquam in religionem Chriſtianam impius periturus fuiſſem (44). i. e. "I have nothing to write to you, but this, "that I am ready to ſtarve here, being entirely "abandoned by thoſe Deities of the court. What "the great Jupiter himſelf intends, I know not. "I underſtand now what great danger I was in "here; the Monks prevail ſo far upon the Princeſs, who is ſuperſtitious, as women generally "are, that unleſs her death had prevented it, I "ſhould undoubtedly have been tried for my offences againſt the Majeſty of the Coul, and the "honour of the Order of Monks, (which are ac"counted the greateſt crimes in the world,) as if "I had blaſphemed the Chriſtian Religion; and this "would inevitably have deſtroyed me." It generally happens, that a Miſtreſs is much more formidable than a Maſter, when a perſon is accuſed of irreligion.

(43) He means Charles the Vth.
(44) Epiſt. xv. lib. 6. p. 968.

[N] There is no ground for ſaying that he was a Lutheran.] I own, that I have not obſerved in his Letters, when he ſpeaks of Luther, that he uſes any harſh expreſſions or reflections. I own too, that he took pains to inform himſelf very particularly of every thing, that Luther or his followers publiſhed concerning the points in diſpute; but this does not ſhew certainly, that he approved of the opinions of that Reformer. Might not the moſt rigid Proteſtants of the Geneva confeſſion give orders for the buying every thing, that the Sectariſts of Tranſilvania publiſh; and would it not be ridiculous to pretend, that they are of the ſame opinion with thoſe heretics? Thoſe, who embraced Luther's Reformation, did not treat that Doctor with the indifference, which appears in Agrippa's Letters, that is, without applauding or blaming him. If Agrippa was the author of the LXXXII Letter of the III Book, there would be no doubt, but that he was a ſtaunch Lutheran; for tho' the title is, Agrippa ad Amicum, i. e. "Agrippa to a Friend," yet it is very certain he was not the author of it. The proof of which is this: He, who wrote that Letter, ſays his wife was brought to bed of a ſon in November 1525. Now Agrippa's wife was brought to bed of a ſon in July before: this is clear from the LXXVI Letter of the III Book, where we ſee, that the Cardinal of Lorrain was Godfather to that child. It appears therefore inconteſtable that Agrippa did not write the Letter in queſtion; not to mention, that he was not at Strasbourg, but at Lyons, at the time when that Letter was writ from Strasbourg. So that thoſe, who would furniſh Sixtus Senenſis, who aſſerts, that Agrippa was a Lutheran (45), with ſuch a proof as this (α), ſupply him with one that ſignifies nothing. Quenſtedt has refuted Sixtus Senenſis, from the VI chapter of the Treatiſe of the Vanity of Sciences, where Agrippa calls Luther an Heſiarch. This argument is infinitely more ſolid, than that, which a Divine of Utrecht made uſe of, who alledges the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, which Agrippa was preferred to at Dole and Pavia, and the employment he enjoyed under the Cardinal de Sainte Croix at the Council of Piſa (46), as proofs, that he was not a Lutheran. This proves nothing at all; for all theſe honours of his were conferred upon him before ever Luther preached againſt the Pope. If it be asked, why Agrippa ſpeaks in ſeverer terms of Luther in his book Of the Vanity of Sciences, than in his Letters, I might anſwer indeed, that this was a work, in which he deſigned to criticize upon all the world; but I choſe to make uſe of another reaſon. When he wrote that Treatiſe, he had evidently loſt the hopes he had at firſt conceived of Luther. I believe that he, as well as Eraſmus, conſidered this Reformer at firſt as an Hero, who would put an end to the tyranny, which the Mendicant Friars and the reſt of the Clergy exerciſed over the minds and conſciences of mankind. They were ignorant and abandoned to pleaſure; they encouraged a thouſand baſe and abſurd ſuperſtitions, and would not ſuffer Polite Learning to make any progreſs in the world. They would not break thro' the barbarity and ignorance of the age, nor permit others to do ſo; ſo that it was enough for a man to have a fine genius, well cultivated with elegant learning, to be the perpetual object of their violent declamations. Agrippa, Eraſmus, and ſeveral other men of diſtinguiſhed wit, were extremely glad, that Luther had broken the ice; they waited for a lucky criſis, to deliver mankind from this oppreſſion; but when they ſaw, that things took another courſe, than what they wiſh'd for, they were the firſt to caſt a ſtone at Luther. However we may obſerve that Agrippa was ſubject to ſome change and irreſolution of mind. He proteſted to Eraſmus, when he ſent him his Diſcourſe upon the Vanity of Sciences, that he was exactly conformable to the opinions of the Church: Illud te admonitum volo, me de his quæ ad Religionem attinent nequaquam ſecus ſentire quam ſentit Eccleſia Catholica (47).

(45) Sixti Senenſis Bib. Sanctâ lib. 5. Annotat. lxxi. apud Quenſtedt de patr. Illuſtr. Viror. p. 144. Delrio Diſſynis, lib. 2. Quæſt. 16. and Tannerus upon the Treatiſe of St. Thomas de Potentiâ Angelorum Quæſt. III. repreſent Agrippa as a Proteſtant. See Voet. Diſp. part 3. p. 616.
(46) Voetii Diſput. Theolog. part 3. p. 616.

divorce of Henry VIII. [O]. With regard to magic, which he is accuſed of, I leave every one to believe as he thinks proper. One thing I know very well, that the Letters

(47) Ep. xxxvi. lib. 6. p. 999.

(48) Epiſt. xii. lib. 7. p. 1013.

(49) See the xiiith Letter of the 7th book, p. 1013. He appears very favourable to this new Religion in his xviiith and liid Letter of the 3d book.

(50) Epiſt. xii. lib. 7. p. 1013.

(51) Epiſt. xvi. and xxxiv. lib. 3. See likewiſe Ep. xv. of the ſame book.

lica (47). In his Apology for this diſcourſe to the Pope's Legate he wiſhes, that God would purge his Church from the impiety of heretics (48). And a little after this he wrote to Melanćthon in the moſt obliging manner imaginable (49): he deſires him to ſalute in his name that invincible heretic Martin Luther: Salutabis mihi invićtum illum hæreticum Martinum Lutherum; qui, ut in Actibus ait Paulus ſervit Deo ſecundum ſećtam quam hæreſim vocant; i. e. "Who after the way, that they call Hereſy, ſerves "God." And then he intimates to him his deſire to depart out of Babylon. Utinam hic Nabuchodonoſor (he ſpeaks of Charles the Fifth,) aliquando ex beſtia rediret in hominem, aut ego relinquere poſſem iſtud Ur Chaldæorum (50). i. e. "I wiſh, ſays he, "that this Nabuchodonoſor would from a beaſt "return to be a man, or that I could leave this Ur "of the Chaldees." There was a time, when the brethren were recommended to him (51). So that what he wrote here to Melanćthon was only a return of thoſe firſt deſires of his, which his own diſgraces and the unjuſt treatment he met with from the Catholic Divines inſpired him with. However it is very certain, that he lived and dy'd in the Romiſh Communion. We ſhall take notice of ſome of his opinions in the remark [T].

§ (α) Agrippa in the 19th chapter of his Apology ſpeaks in ſo magnificent a manner of Luther, and with ſuch contempt of the chief adverſaries of that Reformer, that it is plain Sextus Senenſis's aſſertion, that Agrippa was a Lutheran, was founded upon that paſſage. Now as it was more proper to quote here this writing of Agrippa, than ſeveral of his Letters, it is to be preſumed, that Mr. Bayle had not read it with ſo much care as he did his Letters. CRIT. REM.

[O] I am not of opinion that he wrote for the divorce of Henry VIII.] I have read in the work of a very excellent writer, that Cranmer having taken "a journey into Germany, he fell into the acquaint- "ance of the famous Cornelius Agrippa, to whom "he mentioned the affair of the divorce, and repre- "ſented the neceſſity of it in ſo ſtrong a manner, "that this great man taking upon him the defence "of King Henry's conduct, was very ill treated by "the Emperor, and died at laſt in priſon (52)." An author, who has given us a Criticiſm upon that work, replies among other things; I. That R. Wakefield, who wrote at that time for Henry VIII. ſays poſitively, that he anſwered a book of the Biſhop of Rocheſter's, and another, which was ſuppoſed to be written by Vives or Agrippa. II. That Agrippa died in France, and was never a priſoner in Germany (53). I have obſerved in Agrippa's Letters ſeveral things, which induce me to think that he was not of Cranmer's opinion. The Embaſſador of the Emperor at London (54) wrote to Agrippa the 26th of June 1531, to deſire him to ſupport the intereſt of the Queen (55), and put him in mind of a paſſage in his diſcourſe of the Vanity of Sciences; which is very ſevere upon Henry VIII. Hodie adhuc neſcio cui regi perſuaſum audio, ut liceat ſibi jam plus viginti annorum uxorem dimittere, & nubere pellici (56). That is, "I hear, that a certain King has been perſuaded "to divorce his Queen who has been his wife above "twenty years, and to marry a harlot." Agrippa replied to this, that he would readily engage in this deſign, if the Emperor would give him orders or a commiſſion for that purpoſe. He proteſts in very ſtrong terms, that he deteſted the compliance of thoſe Divines who approved of the Divorce; and with regard to the Sorbonne he writes thus. Non eſt mihi incognitum queis artibus res hæc apud Pariſiorum Sorbonam tractata eſt, quæ cæteris tanti ſceleris auſum temerario porrexit exemplo. Vix me continere queo, quin imitatus poëtam illum exclamem, Dicite, Sorbonici, in Theologia quid valet aurum? Quantum pietatis & fidei illorum pectore clauſum putabimus, quorum venalis magis quam ſincera conſcientia eſt, qui extimeſcendas univerſo orbi Chriſtiano determinationes auro venales fecerunt, ac ſervatam tot annis fidei & ſinceritatis opinionem, nunc tandem extrema avaritiæ infamia corruperunt (57)? That is, "I know very "well with what arts this affair was managed in the "Sorbonne at Paris, who by their raſhneſs have ſet "others an example to lead them into the ſame crime. "When I conſider this, I can ſcarce contain my ſelf "from exclaiming in imitation of Perſius, Say, ye "Sorbonniſts, what has Gold to do with Divinity? "What piety and faith ſhall we think to be in their "breaſts, whoſe conſciences are ſo venal, and who "have ſold their judgments and deciſions, which "ſhould have the greateſt regard paid them by "the whole Chriſtian world, for money, and "have ſpoiled the character, which they main- "tained ſo many years for ſincerity and fidelity "by this extreme avarice." He does not omit to repreſent the danger, which he ſhould be expoſed to, by writing againſt a divorce, which ſo many Divines approved of; a race of men, ſays he, who have a prodigious reſentment againſt me upon the account of my VANITY OF SCIENCES. The Embaſſador returned to the charge; he gave him hopes, that the Queen of England would write either to the Emperor or the Queen of Hungary, to obtain an order for him to write upon that ſubject; and explained to him the reaſon why Eraſmus, Vives, and other fine writers of that time were not to be choſen ſo ſoon as he (58). Agrippa thought himſelf already engaged to undertake that work; for in his Letter to the Queen of Hungary, after his retirement to Bonne, he repreſented to her, how he had devoted his whole ſtudy to his employment as an Hiſtoriographer, though he had yet received no profit from it: I am collecting, ſays he, Memoirs for the Hiſtory of the Wars in Italy and Hungary; and beſides this, I have a greater deſign in agitation, which is to write in defence of Queen Catherine your aunt. His own words are theſe: Sed longe majus his negotium pro veſtri ſanguinis decore, pro tuâ, inquam, materterâ Angliæ celebratiſſima Regina meis humeris impoſitum ſuſcepi, in quo licet multi hactenus operam ſuam collocarunt, nullus adhuc nodum rei diſſecuit (59). I believe that this deſign was never executed. The author being in diſgrace at the Emperor's Court, thought it proper without doubt not to expoſe himſelf to the indignation of the King of England. If Cranmer had gained him (β), it muſt have certainly been in the year 1532; and if Robert Wakefeld publiſhed his Book before the year 1532 (60), it is very plain, that the Treatiſe which he refuted, and which was ſuppoſed to be Vives's or Agrippa's, could not poſſibly be the latter's. We may obſerve likewiſe, that Sanders, who names ſeveral authors who wrote againſt the divorce (61), does not mention Agrippa among them.

(52) The Hiſtory of the Reformation by Dr. Burnet Biſhop of Salisbury, in the year 1530. book 2.

(53) Le Grand Hiſtoire du Divorce de Henry VIII. tom. 2. p. 116. See likewiſe tom. 1. p. 249.

(54) He is called in Agrippa's Letters Euſtochius Chapuſius, and in Eraſmus's Euſtathius Chapuſius.

(55) Agrip. Ep. xix. lib. 6. pag. 973.

(56) Agrip. de Vanitat. Scient. cap. 63. p. 124.

(57) Agripp. Ep. xx. lib. 6. pag. 974.

(58) Epiſt. xxix. lib. 6. p. 986. See likewiſe Ep. xxxiii. p. 996.

(59) Epiſt. xxi. lib. 7. p. 1024.

§ (β) Agrippa was not gained in this affair in 1533, at which time, if I am not miſtaken, he publiſhed his Apology againſt the Doctors of Louvain, and he could not undertake it afterwards without the ſame ſhameful prevarication, which he reproached the Sorbonne with. Eodem, ſays he, ſpeaking of that famous body, his recentibus annis Papam non poſſe diſpenſare, ut frater ducat uxorem fratris mortui ſine liberis, atque propterea matrimonium inter Angliæ regem & Cæſaris amitam, velut contra jus naturale & divinum, indiſpenſabile, pro inceſtuoſo, abominabili, & ſacrilego adulterio damnarunt, magna Sorbonæ infamia: cum non multis ante pro Auguſtino Furnario Civi ac Patricio Genuenſi determinaviſſent oppoſitum *. "A few years ago they determined here, that the "Pope had no power of diſpenſing with a brother's "marrying the widow of his brother who died with- "out children; and for that reaſon they condemned "the marriage between the King of England and the "Emperor's aunt, as contrary both to the law of "Nature and of God, not capable of a diſpenſation, "and as an inceſtuous, abominable and ſacrilegious "adultery, to the great ſcandal of the Sorbonne; "ſince a few years before they determined the very "contrary in favour of Auguſtin Furnarius a Citizen "and Nobleman of Genoa." It is not only in the edition of 1536, that we find the paſſage which we have given in the Remark [X], and which Crenius obſerves was retrench'd in the Lyons edition of the Vanity of Sciences. This paſſage appears again in the edition of 1539, and in all the preceding editions of that book. CRIT. REM.

(60) Mr. Le Grand, tom. 1. p. 249. ſays, that this work was intitled Cotzer. Now it appears from the Catalogue of Oxford, p. 246, that the Cotzer was printed at London in 1527.

(61) Sanderi Hiſt. Schiſmatis Angliæ.

* Agrp. Apol. cap. 2.

ters which he wrote to his moſt intimate friends, without any deſign that they ſhould ever be printed, carry in them all the characteriſtics of a man accuſtomed to reflections of Religion, and to the language of Chriſtianity. His accuſers were not well informed of his adventures [P]; which invalidates their teſtimony. One would be ſurpriſed

[P] His accuſers were not well informed of his adventures.] I obſerved in my firſt remark that Paulus Jovius, Thevet, and Martin del Rio, are his chief accuſers; I promis'd to ſhew their errors, which are as follows.

I. Paulus Jovius tells us, that he died at Lions in a poor Tavern; and charges him with the infamous ſuſpicion of magic, for the reaſon, which follows: "Agrippa, ſays he (62), always had a Devil attending him in the ſhape of a black dog. "When death ſeized him, and he was adviſed to repent, "he took off of the dog's neck a collar ſtudded with "nails, which formed ſome necromantic inſcriptions, and ſaid to him, Get away thou wretched beaſt, "which art the cauſe of my total deſtruction. The "dog immediately run away to the river Saone, "and leap'd in, and was never ſeen more." This author has extolled Agrippa highly for his genius and learning, which, he tells us, procured him the honour of Knighthood from the Emperor. Vir educatus in literis, & à Cæſare eruditionis ergo Equeſtris Ordinis dignitate cohoneſtatus (63). We ſhall begin our Criticiſm with this.

(62) Paulus Jovius in Elogiis cap. 91.

(63) Idem, ibid.

It is certain from the teſtimony of Agrippa himſelf, that the honour of Knighthood was the reward of his military ſervices (64). Again, he did not die at Lyons; and laſtly, John Wierus his domeſtic aſſures us that this black dog was a real dog, and that he himſelf had often led him with an hair-cord. Silentio involvi, ſays he (65), *diutius ob veritatis prærogativam non patiar, quod in diverſis aliquot ſcriptoribus * legerim, Diabolum forma canis ad extremum Agrippæ halitum Comitem ipſi fuiſſe, & poſtea neſcio quibuſmodis evanuiſſe. Satis equidem mirari hic nequeo tantæ exiſtimationis viros tam inſulsè aliquando loqui, ſentire & ſcribere ex inaniſſimo vulgi rumore, canem hunc nigrum mediocris ſtaturæ, Gallico nomine Monſieur, (quod Dominum ſonat,) nuncupatum novi ego ſi quis alius familiariſſimè, quem nimirum non raro, ubi Agrippam ſectarer, loco ex pilis concinnato alligatum duxi; at verè naturalis erat canis maſculus, cui alias fæmellam ferè colore & reliqua corporis conſtitutione ſimilem, quam Gallicè Mademoiſelle (Dominam) appellabat, me præſente, adjunxit.* i. e. "I ſhall not conceal any longer, for "the ſake of truth, what I have read in ſeveral writers, that the Devil attended Agrippa to his laſt "breath in the ſhape of a dog, and afterwards vaniſhed nobody knows how. I cannot but wonder "extremely, that authors of ſo great a character "ſhould venture to ſpeak, think, and write ſo abſurdly merely upon idle and popular rumors. I remember very well this dog, who was black, and "of a moderate ſize, and called by a French name "Monſieur, and I have often led him tied with an "hair-cord, when I waited upon Agrippa. This was "a real natural dog, and his Maſter often in my preſence coupled him with a bitch extremely like him "in colour and ſhape, which he called Mademoiſelle." The ſame author adds, that Agrippa was very fond of this dog; that he kiſſed him very often, let him eat at his table, and lie in his bed; and while Wierus and Agrippa were at ſtudy at the ſame table, the dog always lay upon an heap of papers between them. Now as Agrippa was whole weeks together without going out of his ſtudy, and yet knew almoſt every thing, that paſs'd in different parts of the world, there were ſilly people enough, who ſaid that his dog was certainly a Devil, who told him every thing. It is not long ſince a French Refugee Soldier told me very ſeriouſly, that when Mr. de Melac (66) had his dog with him, he always returned victorious. He aſſured me, that it was the general opinion of the ſoldiers, that this maſtiff was a familiar ſpirit which diſcovered to his Maſter the ſituation of the enemy, their number, deſigns, &c. Mr. de Melac was not perhaps diſpleaſed that they believed ſo; for this notion might give the ſoldiers a ſtrong confidence in his conduct (67). Upon ſuch reports as theſe Paulus Jovius founded his opinion.

(64) See above the Remark [D].

(65) Johan. Wier. de Magis, cap. 5. p. 111.

* Jovius in Elogiis, and from him Andrew Hendorff in Lib. Exempl. Germaner. and others.

(66) Lieutenant General of the French armies. He ſerved in the armies in Germany during the war, which was concluded in 1697. See Remark [B] of the article LANDAU at the end.

(67) See what Plutarch ſays of Sertorius's hind in the Life of that General.

II. Let us now proceed to Mr. Thevet. It is undeniable, ſays he (68), that Agrippa gave himſelf up to the moſt ſubtle and execrable magic imaginable, and which he profeſſed ſo openly in the face of the world, (as will appear from the preſent diſcourſe,) that there is no poſſibility of conteſting that point by denials, palliations, or diſguiſes. Let us now ſee what the proofs, which he pretends to bring, are reduced to. In the firſt place, Anthony de Leva entertained this man ſo intimately, that by his counſel and prudence he gained the great deſigns, which he had in view; and this made ſeveral perſons, who envied that Spaniard his ſucceſſes, report, that it was by the art magic of Agrippa that he griped his enemies with his lame and gouty hands, which other valiant Commanders could not do with all the terror and force of their arms (69). In the ſecond place, the precepts of Agrippa are ſo unreaſonable, that Doctor John Wier, tho' in ſeveral places of his works he commends and extols him as his excellent Maſter, yet ſometimes is obliged to leave him and diſown his opinions (70). He refers us to the 44th chapter of the 2d book concerning illuſions and apparitions of Spirits (71), to obſerve there how John Wier (with Cardan de Subtilitate, Book the 18th) ridicules the whimſical dreams of Agrippa, who invented the moſt abſurd ſtories imaginable of Apparitions. In the third place, his book of Occult Philoſophy was condemned and cenſur'd by Chriſtians . . . and upon that account he was obliged to leave Flanders, where they would not ſuffer him to continue profeſſing magic as he did. Thence he went to Italy, where he lived about three years, and diſperſed ſo much poiſon, that ſeveral perſons of character perceiving that he had in ſo ſhort a time infected the very air of Italy, purſued him with ſuch reſolution, that he retired immediately to Dole, where he read Lectures publicly upon the Book De Verbo mirifico (72). In the fourth place, he made uſe of his Black Art in Burgundy in ſuch a flagrant manner, that if he had not run away, there was reaſon to fear that he would have a fire to light him much nearer than he deſired. In the fifth place, he returned to Lyons in very miſerable circumſtances; he tried every method to ſupport himſelf, but he gained ſo little by it, that he died in a poor mean tavern there, abhorred by all the world, who deteſted him as an execrable magician, becauſe he always carried with him a Devil in the ſhape of a dog. Thevet adds the reſt of the ſtory, which Paulus Jovius has inſerted in his Elogia.

(68) Thevet Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſt. tom. 7. p. 221. Paris edit. of 1671 in 8 vol. in 12°.

(69) Ibid. p. 223.

(70) Ibid. p. 225.

(71) I cannot find any book that bears this title, nor this diviſion, in the works of John Wier, printed at Amſterdam in 1660 in 4°.

(72) Thevet, Hommes Illuſt. p. 226.

It would be eaſy to invalidate all theſe five proofs. There is no occaſion to confute the firſt, ſince Thevet acknowledges, that Anthony de Leva did not apply to Agrippa for any charms, or the aſſiſtance of any unlawful art (73), but rather on account of his great and extenſive genius (74); and that the Emperor took him into his ſervice, at the deſire of Anthony de Leva, only upon the aſſurance, that by his ſagacity and judgment, he would extricate himſelf out of thoſe difficult affairs, in which he was then involved. Thus we ſee he is acquitted even by the confeſſion of the accuſer himſelf; but it is much more difficult to diſcharge the latter from the moſt profound ignorance imaginable. I have not obſerved in Agrippa's Letters any mark of his correſpondence with Anthony de Leva; and I am aſtoniſhed, that ſo many excellent authors have reported upon the ſingle authority of ſuch a writer as Thevet, that he was a favourite of Anthony de Leva, and a Captain in his troops (75). He never was in the Spaniſh ſervice; he ſerved only in the army of the Emperor Maximilian; and I believe, that after the Oration, which he made at Pavia in the year 1515, he never bore arms. Here follows a paſſage in that Oration: Neque mireris, Marchio illuſtris, Joannes Gonzaga ſtrenuiſſimus militum Dux, quod cum me proximis his annis fæliciſſimis Cæſarcis caſtris Præfectum cognoſceres, nunc me ſacrarum literarum præpoſitum pulpito cernas (76). i. e. "Nor wonder, illuſtrious Marqueſs, "John Gonzaga, incomparable General, that you "ſee

(73) Ibid. p. 223.

(74) Ibid. p. 225.

(75) Naudé Apologie des grands Hommes, p. 405. See likewiſe Teiſſier Elog. tirez de Mr. de Thou. tom. 2. p. 99. See below the quotation (79).

(76) Agripp. Operum tom. 2. p. 1075.

priſed at their blunders, and the effects produced by them notwithſtanding all the negligence which they have been guilty of in examining the facts. After all, if he was a Conjurer, it is a very ſtrong proof how inſignificant magic is, for there never was a man who had worſe ſucceſs than he, or was oftener in danger even of wanting bread. The receivers of the revenue of Francis I. and Charles V. were undoubtedly well perſuaded

" ſee me, whom a few years ago you knew an Offi" cer in the Emperor's victorious Army, now in the " chair of a Profeſſor of Divinity." He ſtaid ſome time in Italy; where he had William Paleologus, Marqueſs of Montferrat, for his Patron, to whom he dedicated his Treatiſe De triplici Ratione cognoſcendi Deum, i. e. " Of the threefold method of " knowing God," in the year 1516 (77). He taught at Turin, and paſs'd again the Alps in the beginning of the year 1518 (78). Let any body ſhew me, when Anthony de Leva ſerved the Emperor Maximilian. But there is another more flagrant inſtance of ignorance than this: Agrippa obtained the title of Counſellor and Hiſtoriographer of Charles the Fifth by means of the friends, whom he met with at the court of the Princeſs Margaret, Governeſs of the Low-Countries. Charles the Fifth was not then in the Low-Countries; he came thither ſome time after ſo violently prejudiced againſt Agrippa, that if it had not been for the kind offices of Cardinal Campegius and the Cardinal de la Mark, he would undoubtedly have been committed to priſon. The Sieur Clavigni de Sainte Honorine ſays, that the end of Agrippa would have been as fatal as that of Lucilio Vanini, if Cardinal Campegius and Anthony de Leva, his Patrons, had not prevailed upon Charles the Fifth not to puniſh him (79). He would not ſee Agrippa, nor order the payment of his ſalary, ſo far was he from making uſe of his counſel, in order to extricate himſelf from thoſe difficult affairs which he was involved in. It is a very merry proof of Agrippa's skill in the Law, to ſay that Charles the Fifth received him into the number of his Counſellors. He had ſtudied the Law, ſays Mr. Thevet (80), with ſo much application, that (as I obſerved above) he was admitted by the Emperor Charles the Fifth, as one of his Counſellors. He had ſaid in the preceding page, that he was ſo well received at the court of that Emperor, that he was made one of his Counſellors. Is it not well known, that the title of Counſellor to the King is given to an infinite number of men, to Phyſicians, Hiſtoriographers, and Authors, who are as ſeldom admitted into his Council, as the loweſt of the Citizens? The ſecond reaſon of Thevet proves nothing. Agrippa, ſays he, mentions ſeveral ſtories of Apparitions ſo ridiculous, that even one of his beſt friends cannot forbear laughing at them; therefore he was a conjurer. What then would become of Bodin, Martin del Rio, le Loyer, and the greateſt part of the writers of Demonography, if this manner of reaſoning was to take place? The third reaſon abounds with falſities. If Agrippa had made a profeſſion of magic; they would not have been contented to have driven him out of Flanders; it is not uſual to puniſh ſo black a crime in ſuch a gentle manner. He never was in Italy after the cenſures paſt upon his Occult Philoſophy. That Work was not publiſhed till 1531. If Agrippa had diſperſed in Italy the poiſon of his magic in ſuch abundance, would the Cardinal de Sainte Croix have choſen him for one of the Divines of the Council of Piſa? Would the Pope have written ſo reſpectful a Brief to him as he did in 1515 (81)? So far was he from flying out of Italy to Dole, that he did not go to Italy, till he left Dole. The fourth reaſon is founded upon a falſe ſuppoſition. Agrippa brought himſelf into trouble at Dole by running into the hypotheſes of Capnio, whoſe Book De Verbo mirifico he read Lectures upon there. The diſputes between the Monks and Capnio are well known. Catilinet the Franciſcan, who choſe rather to preach againſt Agrippa before the Princeſs Margaret, than to diſpute fairly with him at Dole, undertook to defame him at Ghent in the pulpit of truth; but he did not accuſe him at all of magic; he only charged him with too great an attachment to the Jewiſh Cabala, and with perverting the Scripture with cabaliſtical interpretations (82). Theſe ill-plac'd declamations of the Franciſcan, who inſtead of prejudicing the Court and the people againſt an abſent Profeſſor, ſhould have accuſed him before the Judges of the Academy, did not hinder the famous Dr. John Colet from entertaining him at his houſe in London, nor the Emperor Maximilian, Grandfather of the Princeſs Margaret, from giving him an employment in Italy (83). The fifth reaſon of Thevet has been already refuted. He only copies Paulus Jovius; and they have both of them been ſo imprudent as to mention the poverty of Agrippa. A proper method this, to perſuade a judicious reader, that he was a great conjurer! An admirable argument to perſuade the people, when it was generally known, that whenever there was a Prince or great Man, whom fortune ſmiled upon, immediately he was reproached with employing and careſſing of Agrippa (84)!

III. With regard to Martin del Rio, he gives us an account of three or four particulars. I. When Agrippa was upon his travels he uſed to pay money at the inns, which ſeemed very good; but in a few days it appeared to be pieces of horn or ſhells (85). II. Charles the Fifth baniſh'd him from the court and the Empire with two other perſons of quality, who had promiſed to raiſe him vaſt treaſures by means of magic (86). III. The ſame Emperor did not remit the puniſhment of death to him; but he condemn'd him to baniſhment, when he found he was fled (87). IV. Agrippa had a boarder in his houſe at Louvain, who was very curious. One day, when he was going out of town, he ordered his wife not to let any perſon into his ſtudy. However the boarder got the key of it, and went into it, where he met with a Book of Conjurations which he began to read; he heard a knocking at the door once or twice without interrupting his reading: The Devil wanted to know who call'd for him, and upon what account; and becauſe the other could not give him an anſwer, he ſtrangled him upon the ſpot. Agrippa at his return home ſaw the Devils leaping and dancing upon his houſe; he called to them, and underſtood from them what had happen'd. Upon this he commanded the Devil, who had killed the man, to enter into his dead body, and to walk ſeveral turns in a place, which was much frequented by the Students, and then to depart. This was done. The boarder, after three or four turns in the walk, fell down dead. It was believed a long while that he died ſuddenly; but there were ſome marks, as if he were ſtrangled, which made the thing ſuſpected from the firſt; but time diſcovered the whole affair; and Agrippa flying thro' Lorrain, begun to publiſh the hereſies, which he had before concealed in his heart (88).

The misfortunes of Agrippa, and the fear, which he repeats ſo often in his Letters of wanting even bread to eat, fully confutes the firſt of theſe ſtories. When a perſon has ſuch a ſhort method of paying his creditors, he has no occaſion to be in pain how he ſhall live: this is always current money. It is not true, that Charles the Fifth ever expelled him his dominions. He was too prudent an Emperor to puniſh in that manner a conjurer, who could raiſe treaſures with ſuch eaſe; he would have apprehended, that other Princes would make uſe of this ſecret to his own injury. Del Rio refutes the ſecond ſtory by the third; for he pretends in the latter, that the Emperor would have put Agrippa to death, if he had him in his power; and that the ſentence of baniſhment was denounced againſt him after his eſcape. Theſe are mere fables. Agrippa preſented one petition after another to the Emperor's Council, that either his ſalary might be paid, or leave given him to depart (89); and when he was quite tired out, and could obtain nothing, he went to Cologne, where he remonſtrated in the boldeſt terms imaginable to the Magiſtrates againſt the Monks, who ſtop'd the impreſſion of his work (90). He lived very peaceably at Bonne till he took his journey to France. 'Would Charles the Fifth have permitted this to a man, who had been baniſhed his dominions?

(77) Ibid. pag. 480, and 718.

(78) Epiſt. pag. 728, 730.

(79) Clavigni de Sainte Honorine de l'Uſage des Livres ſuſpects, p. 106.

(80) Thevet, Hommes Illuſt. p. 222, 223.

(81) Agripp. Ep. xxxviii. lib. 1. p. 710.

(82) See Agrippa's Expoſtulatio tom. 2. of his works, p. 508.

(83) Agripp. Oper. tom. 2. p. 596.

(84) Thevet, Hommes Illuſt. p. 224.

(85) Del Rio, Diſquiſ. Magic. lib. 2. Quæſt. xii. num. 10.

(86) Ibid.

(87) Ibid. lib. 5. Sect. 2.

(88) Ibid. lib. 2. Quæſt. xxix. Sect. 1.

(89) See his works Vol. II. from p. 975 to p. 984. and pag. 1017, & ſeq.

(90) Ib. p. 1033.

perſuaded of his innocence in that point, if we conſider how they trifled with him, when he applied to them for the payment of his ſalary. There are ſeveral miſtakes in fact in the method that ſome have taken to apologize for him [2]. Moreri has declared nions? Would he have ſhewn this indulgence to a conjurer, who had eſcaped even capital puniſhment only by his flight?

With regard to the laſt ſtory, we may conſult Gabriel Naudè, who ſpeaks as follows: One may deny this with more reaſon, as Ludwigius * has done, than Delrio aſſerts it, ſince he tranſlated it word for word from a book intitled The Theatre of Nature, publiſh'd in Italian and Latin under the name of Stroza Cicogna, and in French and Spaniſh under that of Valderama (91). We have likewiſe another way of confuting it, which is thus: Del Rio obſerves that his wife, who lent the key to the boarder, was afterwards divorced from Agrippa. This then muſt have been his third wife. Now his ſecond wife did not die till 1529; ſo that this ſtory of the boarder's misfortune muſt have been later than 1529, and conſequently Agrippa muſt have fled to Lorrain after the year 1530 or thereabouts. It follows then, that after he was made Hiſtoriographer to Charles the Fifth, he muſt have hired an houſe at Louvain for his boarders: but nothing is more falſe than this; for I. he did not go to Lorrain as a fugitive; he went thither to take upon him a very reputable office at Metz, which was offered him in the moſt obliging manner poſſible, at the ſame time that he had ſeveral other honourable and advantageous ſettlements propoſed to him at other places (92). II. He went to Lorrain only in 1518, and then he had his firſt wife with him. III. The opinions which he maintained in that country, and which expoſed him to the indignation of ſeveral Monks, were neither magical nor heretical; they turned only upon this queſtion, whether St. Anne the Mother of the Bleſſed Virgin had three husbands, and a child by every one of them, or only one husband, and one daughter by him. Agrippa maintained the latter opinion (93), which does infinitely more honour to the memory of St. Anne. IV. It is probable that he never lived any where but at Antwerp and Mechlin, after he was made Hiſtoriographer to the Emperor, till he retired to the Elector of Cologne; and I believe he never kept boarders at Louvain. We may therefore be diſpens'd from anſwering Martin del Rio and his adherents, till they have adjuſted the circumſtances of time and place.

I am ſurprized, that the celebrated Monſieur Naudè did not think of objecting againſt the accuſers of Agrippa this prodigious number of hiſtorical falſities, which I have fixed upon them.

[2] There are ſeveral miſtakes in fact in the way, that ſome have taken to apologize for him.] I have Gabriel Naudé in view. He endeavours to juſtify him, amongſt other reaſons, on account of the favour which he was in with two Emperors, and as many Kings (94). This ſuppoſes that Charles V. had a particular friendſhip for him; but if we read the complaints of that author (95), we ſhall evidently ſee the contrary. Beſides, Naudè imagines, that there was no clamour raiſed againſt his Occult Philoſophy, till a long time after it was publiſhed. He tells us, that this book was exclaimed againſt merely upon account of the injuries, which they imagined they had received from his Treatiſe of The Vanity of Sciences. It is true, this laſt book enraged ſeveral perſons extremely. The Monks, the Academics, the Preachers, and the Divines, ſaw themſelves drawn there in their proper colours. Agrippa was a man of too warm a genius. Ex ejus Libri (de Vanitate Scientiarum) qualicunque guſtu deprehendi hominem eſſe ardentis ingenii, variæ lectionis, & multæ memoriæ, alicubi tamen majore copia quam delectu, ac dictione tumultuoſa verius quam compoſita. In omni genere rerum vituperat mala, laudat bona. Sed ſunt qui nihil aliud ſuſtinent quam laudari (96). That is, "I found, ſays Eraſmus, by reading a little of his "book of (The Vanity of Sciences,) that he was a "man of a warm and lively genius, great reading, and "vaſt memory, but ſometimes of greater copiouſneſs than choice; his ſtyle is rather exuberant and "rapid than ſufficiently digeſted and eaſy. Upon "every ſubject he blames what is bad, and commends "what is good. But there are ſome people who can "bear nothing but applauſe." His painting was too ſtrong, his colours too deep, and his ſtrokes too lively and expreſſive. They were diſpleaſed at it, I confeſs; but it is not true that their indignation had any effect upon a book, which had been left undiſturbed for ſeveral years before. Naudè would have done better to have kept this thought for another occaſion; he would have found where to place it, either ſooner or later, though his reading and knowledge had been much leſs than it was. I ſhall explain my ſelf thus. It is not very uncommon for bigots to leave a book a long while in quiet, and even the author, whatever the book is, provided it does not attack themſelves perſonally. But if after the courſe of ten, fifteen, or twenty years, they have any diſpute with the author; if any new work of his appears, that expoſes in publick what they would conceal from the eyes of the world, t e former book is immediately brought out of its repoſe, and is ſtigmatized as heretical, impious, and fit only for the flames. They are in a moment ſeized with the zeal of the Lord's Houſe; they endeavour to infuſe the ſame prejudices into perſons of character; but every one who is a dupe to their unreaſonable humour, ſees well enough what a ſhameful and vicious paſſion they cover under the pretence of Piety and Religion. Let us do juſtice to the Divines of Louvain; they do not deſerve the odious imputation which the Apologiſt of Agrippa has caſt upon them by ſuch an inſinuation as this; the Occult Philoſophy was not printed till after the diſcourſe upon The Vanity of Sciences. It is ſufficient to reproach them with having made uſe of a thouſand mean artifices, in order to fix upon ſome damnable poſitions in his latter book. See the ſtrong anſwer which was made to them: it is in the ſecond volume of Agrippa's works, and begins at page 252.

An inſtance of the unreaſonable conduct of Bigots.

Let us now give a ſhort hiſtory of this Occult Philoſophy. Agrippa wrote this work in his younger years (97), and ſhewed it to the Abbot Trithemius, who inſtructed him in ſeveral points (98). Trithemius was charmed with it, as appears from a Letter writ to him the 8th of April 1510 (99); but he adviſed him not to communicate it but to his moſt intimate friends. I cannot tell whether the author ſhewed it to too many perſons, or whether thoſe who firſt had a copy of it wanted diſcretion. The truth is, that ſeveral manuſcript copies were diſperſed almoſt over all Europe. I need not obſerve that the greateſt part of them were very defective; for this generally happens in ſuch caſes. They had begun to print from one of thoſe faulty copies; it was this determined the author to publiſh it himſelf, with the additional improvements and alterations which he had made in it after he had ſhewed it to the Abbot Trithemius. Melchior Adam is miſtaken, when he ſays that Agrippa, having corrected and enlarged this book in his more advanced years, ſhewed it to the Abbot Trithemius. He had refuted his Occult Philoſophy in his Treatiſe of the Vanity of Sciences; and yet he publiſhed it, in order to prevent others from printing it full of faults and imperfect (100). He obtained the approbation of it from ſeveral Doctors of Divinity, and others, who were particularly appointed by the Emperor's council to read it over. Liber ille jam nuper per aliquos eccleſiæ prælatos & doctores ſacrarum humanarumque literarum eruditiſſimos, & ex Cæſaris conſilio ad hoc ſpecialiter deputatos commiſſarios examinatus & probatus fuerit, deinde etiam totius Cæſarei conſilii aſſenſu admiſſus, & ejuſdem Cæſareæ Majeſtatis authentico diplomate & appenſa in rubra cera Cæſaris aquila privilegiatus, inſuper Antwerpiæ, & poſtea etiam Pariſiis, ſine contradictione impreſſus, & publicè venditus & diſtractus ſit (101). That is, "That book, ſays he, was examined and approved "of by ſeveral Prelates of the Church, and Doc"tors well skilled in Divinity and human learn"ing, who were particularly appointed by the Em"peror's council for that purpoſe; then it was alſo "admitted

An account of his book of Occult Philoſophy.

(97) See the Preface.

(98) Agripp. Epiſt. xxxiii. l. 3. p. 800.

(99) It is extant at the beginning of the book, and in p. 704 of the 2d tome of his works.

(100) See the Preface.

(101) Agripp. Epiſt. xxvi. lib. 6. p. 1033. See likewiſe pag. 1045.

• Quæſt. xv. Dæmonomag. fol. 187.

(91) Naudè, Apol. pour les grands Hommes, p. 423.

(92) Agrip. Ep. ix. and x. lib. 2. but ſee particularly his Addreſs of Thanks to the Gentlemen of Metz, p. 1092.

(93) Agripp. Operum tom. 2. p. 583, 747.

(94) Naudè, Apol. pour les grands Hommes, p. 409.

(95) Agripp. Ep. lib. 4. p. 975, and in many other places; ſee the 2d Vol. of his works, pag. 251, 447, 584, and the places marked above in the marginal quotation of the text (gg).

(96) Eraſmus, Epiſt. lib. 27. p. 1083.

clared boldly in his favour, which is a thing that could ſcarcely be expected from him. His faults are not very numerous upon this Article [R]. We have already touched upon the principal works of Agrippa, but ſhall ſpeak more particularly of them in the Remarks. It is ſufficient to add here, that he wrote a Commentary upon the Art

" admitted by the conſent of the whole council, and " had an authentic privilege with a ſeal of red wax, " repreſenting the Imperial Eagle, hanging to it. " And beſides this it was printed at Antwerp, and " then at Paris, and publiſhed, and bought up, with- " out any manner of contradiction." Upon theſe approbations he gained a privilege from his Imperial Majeſty, and printed his book at Antwerp, and dedicated it to the Elector of Cologne. His dedication is dated from Mechlin in January 1531, and it is the 13th Epiſtle of the 6th book of his Letters. This book was publiſhed in 1531. It was immediately reprinted at Paris. Theſe two editions were ſold without any hindrance. The author was preparing for another edition at Cologne. Father Conrade d'Ulme, Inquiſitor of the Faith, got intelligence of this, and put a ſtop to the impreſſion; but the vigorous petition of Agrippa to the Magiſtrates had without doubt its proper effect, ſince there is an edition of the Occult Philoſophy at Cologne in 1533. It contains three books, whereas the former contained but the firſt (102). After his death there was added a fourth book, which is not by the ſame author. Optimo jure his (libris magicis) annumeratur abominabilis libellus nuper in lucem ab impio homine emiſſus, tributuſque Henr. Corn. Agrippæ, meo olim hoſpiti & præceptori honorando, ultra annos quadraginta jam mortuo, ut hinc falſo ejus manibus jam inſcribi ſperem, ſub titulo quarti libri de Occulta Philoſophia, ſeu de ceremoniis magicis: qui inſuper clavis librorum trium de Occultâ Philoſophia omniumque magicarum operationum jactatur (103). That is, " To theſe (magical books) we " may very juſtly add an execrable book lately pub- " liſhed by ſome impious perſon, and aſcribed to " Hen. Corn. Agrippa, in whoſe houſe I formerly " lived, and who was my honoured preceptor, and " has been dead above forty years; ſo that from " hence I hope it is falſely attributed to him. It is " entitled The Fourth Book of Occult Philoſophy, or " concerning Magical Ceremonies, and it is repreſented " as a key to the three books of Occult Philoſophy, " and to all the operations of magic." Thus writes John Wierus. I have ſeen an edition in folio of the Occult Philoſophy in 1533, without any mention of the place where it was printed. The privilege of Charles V. is at the beginning in French, dated at Mechlin the 12th of January 1529, if I am not miſtaken.

(102) See his dedication of the 2d and 3d book to the ſame Elector of Cologne.

(103) Wier. de Magis, cap. 5. p. 108.

Let us ſee now the falſities which are contained in the following words of Naudè. " The Divines of " Louvain very rigorouſly cenſured his declamation " againſt the Vanity of Sciences. John Catilinet a " Franciſcan, exclaimed publickly againſt his Lec- " tures at Dole de Verbo Mirifico. The Dominicans " of the city of Metz wrote againſt the Propoſitions " which he publiſhed to ſupport the opinion of Fa- " ber Stapulenſis, that St. Anne was but once mar- " ried. And yet not one of theſe Cenſors could ever " find any thing to except againſt in his two firſt " books of Occult Philoſophy, which were printed a " long time before any of theſe writings, as well at " Paris, as Antwerp and other places. . . . (104)." Obſerve, that he repeats theſe words a long time before in page 416. Now in order to comprehend this whole miſtake, we muſt remember that Catilinet declaimed againſt Agrippa's book in 1509; the Dominicans of Metz wrote upon St. Anne in 1519; and the Diſcourſe upon the Vanity of Sciences was publiſhed in 1530, one year before the Occult Philoſophy. " The avarice of the bookſellers and the vanity of " ſome perſons . . . ſays Naudè (105), have injured " the memory of this author, by aſcribing to him a " fourth book, full of magical, vain, ſuperſtitious " and abominable ceremonies, and publiſhing it with " his three books of Occult Philoſophy . . . Wierus " aſſures us *, in defence of Agrippa, that this book " was not publiſhed till twenty ſeven years after his " death, and that he undoubtedly never compoſed " it (106).

(104) Naudè, Apolog. pour les grands Hommes, p. 411.

(105) Ib. p. 413.

* Lib. 2. de Præſtigiis.

(106) Naudè Apolog. pour les grands Hommes, p. 414.

Theſe words of Naudè, till twenty ſeven years after his death, compared with the paſſage in Latin quoted above (107), may cauſe ſome confuſion; but in order to remove this difficulty, it is ſufficient to obſerve the different editions of John Wierus. He reviſed and enlarged his work ſix times. Naudè had without doubt an edition which the author publiſhed in 1562. It was then twenty ſeven years ſince the death of Agrippa. My edition was publiſhed thirteen or fourteen years after this; and this is the reaſon why the author uſes this expreſſion, ultra annos quadraginta jam mortuo; i. e. " who has been dead " now above forty years." It retains ſtill the word nuper, i. e. lately, which is an error; for he deceives his readers by that means. He makes them believe that the fourth book of the Occult Philoſophy, was not printed till twenty ſeven or forty years after Agrippa's death, which is falſe. It very ſeldom happens, that thoſe who make additions to their books ſeveral times, take care to change throughout them the particular words which diſtinguiſh the times.

(107) Quotation (103).

Out of regard to thoſe, who have not read the works of Agrippa, I ſhall give an account here how it is proved, that the declamation againſt the Vanity of Sciences was printed in 1530, and the Occult Philoſophy in 1531. It appears from a Letter printed with thoſe of Agrippa, and dated the 10th of January 1531 (108), that the Elector of Cologne had received a copy of that of the Vanity of Sciences, and had ſeen ſeveral leaves of the Occult Philoſophy, which was printed at Antwerp. The author of the Bibliotheque de Dauphinè has taken unneceſſary pains in his Errata; he puts there 1567 inſtead of 1467. His book intimates, that the Treatiſe of the Vanity of Sciences was compoſed at Grenoble in 1467. But as this is corrected in the Errata, you muſt ſuppoſe, that it was compoſed thirty two years after the author's death. It would have been as well not to have corrected this at all. I believe it would have been an error, whatever year he had pitch'd upon; for I am of opinion that our author was but a ſhort time at Grenoble before he died there.

(108) It is the 14th of the 6th book, p. 968.

[R] The faults of Moreri are not very numerous upon this article. I. We may obſerve in him Cohori inſtead of Gohori; Gattinaria inſtead of Gattinara; Rauclin inſtead of Reuchlin; Carlinetus inſtead of Catilinetus. II. He ſays that Agrippa obtained a Profeſſorſhip at Padua: this is falſe, for it was at Pavia. Mr. Teiſſier was likewiſe deceived by the ſimilitude of words: he has given us Paris for Pavia. Perhaps it is the fault of the Printer. However the reader ought to be told not to credit what he finds in Teiſſier, that Agrippa was a Profeſſor of Divinity at Dole and Paris (109). It is to be feared, that ſome compiler will collect all that he ſhall find diſpers'd in ſeveral books, and ſo give us an account one time or other, that Agrippa was a Profeſſor of Divinity at Dole, Paris, Pavia, Turin, Padua, Cologne, &c. It happens without doubt very often, from ſuch a cauſe as this, that the preferments of a man have been multiplied beyond the truth, and ſeveral reflections have been made from thence to his advantage upon the great extent of his merit. III. The following words occaſion great confuſion: The Cardinal de Sainte Croix would have engaged him to attend him to the Council, which was to be called at Pisa; and at the ſame time he was ſollicited by the King of England, by Margaret of Auſtria, and by Gatinaria, Chancellor of Charles the Fifth, to enter into their ſervice. The rules of Grammar require that all this ſhould be referred to the ſame time; and upon that foot Moreri has committed a very great error; for it was in 1529, and a long while after the affair of Piſa, that Agrippa was ſent for by Henry the Eighth, Margaret of Auſtria, and the Chancellor of Charles the Fifth. But otherwiſe, if any one would take upon him to conteſt this point, he might deny, that all theſe offers were referred to the ſame year. The reader foreſees the poſſibility of ſuch cavils as this; and ſo, he cannot tell, where to fix himſelf. IV. But there is no

(109) Teiſſier, Elog. tirez de Mr. de Thou. tom. ii. p. 99. edit. of Utrecht in 1696.

Art of Raimund Lulli, and a Diſſertation upon Original Sin, where he aſſerts, that the fall of our firſt parents was occaſioned by their immodeſty and luſt. He promiſed a piece againſt the Dominicans (S], which would have pleaſed a great many perſons, as well thoſe of the Romiſh church as others who are divided from it. He had ſome opinions which were out of the common road of thinking [T] ; and there never was any Proteſtant who ſpoke with more zeal than he againſt the intolerable boldneſs of the Legendary writers (oo).

(oo) See the Preface before his Treatiſe of the Monogamy of St. Anne, Operum, tom. 2. p. 1053.

We muſt not omit to mention the key of his Occult Philoſophy. He reſerved it only for his friends of the firſt rank, and he explained it in a manner not very different from the doctrines of our Quietiſts [U]. We may obſerve, that the edition of his works no art or palliation can be made uſe of in favour of what follows: But Agrippa, who loved liberty extremely, preferred the pleaſure of travelling to all theſe advantages; and having paſſed ſome time at Fribourg, Geneva, and other places, he retired at laſt to Lyons. This is a very great anachroniſm, and complicated with ſeveral other falſities. Moreri pretends that he accepted none of the offers made him; but it is certain, that he embraced that of the Princeſs Margaret; and even at that time, he thought no more of travelling again, having ſatisfied his deſire, and been at Geneva, Fribourg, and Lyons. V. It is not true, that Paulus Jovius, Del Rio, Thevet, and ſeveral other writers, aſſert, that Agrippa had two Devils attending him in the ſhape of two little dogs, and that he called one of them Monſieur, and the other Mademoiſelle. Paulus Jovius, Thevet, &c. ſpeak only of one dog, and never mention his name. VI. We are not to diſtinguiſh the Treatiſe of the Vanity of Sciences from the other works of Agrippa, which make up two volumes; for that book is at the beginning of the ſecond volume. I ſay nothing of the confuſion in point of Chronology, that runs thro' the whole account of him by Moreri.

[S] He promis'd a piece againſt the Dominicans.] As they were the chief Directors of the Inquiſition, there is no wonder, that he was exaſperated againſt them more than againſt all others. His patience was quite loſt, when he ſaw them ſpare the errors of their brethren, at the ſame time that they were ſo ſevere and inflexible againſt the doubtful propoſitions of others. This indulgence of theirs would have been leſs ſcandalous, if it had been only found in them; but the misfortune is, that the people are ſo abſurd, that while they commend the zeal of an Inquiſitor, who finds hereſies wherever he pleaſes, they will not bear any recrimination upon him, nor ſuffer his pernicious doctrines to be expoſed to the public. Agrippa deſigned to ſpeak to the Dominicans concerning this, and other matters likewiſe. Neque tamen putetis, ſays he (110) to the Magiſtrates of Cologne, hunc ſolum articulum apud illum reperiri hæreticum, ſed alii multi, quos cum hic nimis longum vobiſque tædioſum foret referre enumerabo alibi, in eo ſcilicet libro, quem De Fratrum Prædicatorum Sceleribus & Hæreſibus inſcripſi, ubi infecta ſæpius veneno Sacramenta, ementita ſæpiſſime miracula, interemptos veneno Reges & Principes, proditas urbes & reſpublicas, ſeductos populos, aſſertaſque hæreſes, & cætera ejuſmodi Heroum illorum facinora flagitiaque in varias transfuſa linguas, omnique populo expoſita dilucidè narrabo. i. e. "Do "not imagine, that this is the only heretical article "in that order *; there are a great many more, which "it would be here too tedious to mention; but I "ſhall give a particular account of them in another "book of mine, which I have entitled An Hiſtory "of the Crimes and Hereſies of the Predicant Friars, "where I ſhall ſhew the world the intolerable wic"kedneſs of that Order, how often they have poi"ſoned the Sacraments themſelves, what fictitious "miracles they have invented, how many Kings and "Princes they have killed, how many Cities and "Commonwealths they have betrayed, how many "people they have ſeduced, and what hereſies they "have maintained, with many other of their enormi"ties and crimes, publiſhed to all the world in ſeveral "languages, and which I ſhall give the world a clear "account.

(110) Agripp. Oper. tom. 2. p. 1037.

* The Dominicans.

[T] He had ſome opinions, which were out of the common road of thinking.] I have already touch'd upon that concerning the Fall of Adam. The others were not ſo very obnoxious; the only fault of them was their being conformable to the doctrines of the Reformation. His Diſſertation upon Marriage, dedicated to Louiſa of Savoy, Mother of Francis I, ſtrikes very ſtrongly upon the Law of Celibacy, and ſhews very clearly, that adultery breaks off the marriage-compact. One of his friends (111) gave him to underſtand, that this Diſſertation diſpleaſed the Court, and that they dared not then preſent it to the Princeſs. See his anſwer to this. He did not approve of images; and he would very willingly have embraced a Reformation, which would not have occaſioned the raiſing of altar againſt altar (112)

(111) Capellanus, Phyſician to Francis I. ſee Agrippa's Letters p. 832, 833, 836.

(112) See Geſner. Biblioth. fol. 309 verſo.

[U] He explained his Occult Philoſophy in a manner not very different from the ſpeculations of our Quietiſts.] I ſhall quote another obſervation of Naudè, deſigned to ſhew, that under the pretence of this key, there is no reaſon for aſſerting Agrippa to have been the author of the 4th book of the Occult Philoſophy. Nor muſt it be objected, ſays he (113), that the ſame Agrippa ſays in ſeveral places of his Epiſtles *, that he kept to himſelf the Key of the three books, which he had publiſhed (114); for, beſides that we may anſwer with a great deal of probability, that he mentioned this Key in order to make himſelf be courted by the curious, as Jamet Gohory †, and Vigenere ‡, tell us, that he boaſted upon the ſame view, that he had diſcovered the manner of making the mirror of Pythagoras, and the ſecret of extracting the ſpirit of gold from its body, in order to make fine gold from ſilver and copper, by adding only that ſpirit to it, which had been ſeparated from the gold. beſides this reaſon, I ſay, he explains ſufficiently what he meant by ſuch a Key in his 19th Letter of the 5th Book. "Hæc eſt illa vera & mirabilium "operum occultiſſima Philoſophia, clavis ejus intel"lectus eſt: quanto enim altiora intelligimus, tanto "ſublimiores induimus virtutes, tantoque & majora, "& facilius, & efficacius operamur." That is, "This is the true Occult Philoſophy, which per"forms ſuch wonderful things; the key of it is the "underſtanding; for the higher knowledge is raiſ"ed, the more ſublime virtues we gain, and the "eaſier and more effectually we perform great "things." Naudè ſtops here, but Mr. de la Monnoie goes much further; for he has done me the favour to ſhew me, that the ſentiments of Agrippa are very agreeable to thoſe of the Quietiſts. We ſhall eaſily be convinced of this, if we examine what follows. Agrippa mentions this Key in two Letters, which he wrote to a Monk (115), who was very much attached to the Occult Sciences. He repreſents to him, that all that theſe books tell us of the power of Magic, Aſtrology, and Alchymy, is falſe and deluſive, when it is underſtood literally; that the myſtical ſenſe is to be ſought for; a ſenſe, which none of the adepts have yet diſcovered and unfolded; and which is almoſt impoſſible to unfold, without the aſſiſtance of a good interpreter, at leaſt if a perſon is not illuminated by the Spirit of God; which happens to but very few (116). O quanta leguntur ſcripta de inexpugnabili magicæ artis potentiâ, de prodigioſis aſtrologorum imaginibus, de monſtrifica alchymiſtarum metamorphoſi, deque lapide illo benedicto, quo, Midæ inſtar, contacta æra mox omnia in aurum argentumve permutentur; quæ omnia comperiuntur vana ficta, & falſa, quoties ad literam practicantur (117). He then adds, We muſt not ſeek for the principle of theſe grand operations out of our ſelves. It is within us: it is an inward Spirit, which can very innocently perform all that Magicians and Alchymiſts promiſe. I ſhall not write to you particularly upon this point; for theſe are things not proper to

(113) Naudè, Apol. pour les grands Homm. p. 414, 415.

* Epiſt. lvi. lib. 4. xiv. lib. 5.

(114) Naudè is miſtaken, they were not then publiſhed.

† Libro de Myſt. not. Comment. in Paracelſ. de Vit. longa, fol. 61.

‡ In his Chiffres fol. 16 and 27.

(115) Aurelius ab Aquapendente, Auguſtinianus.

(116) Niſi furcit divino Numine illuſtratus, quod datur pauciſſimis, Agripp. Ep. xiv. lib. 5. p. 904.

(117) Idem, ibid.

works at Lyons in two volumes in Octavo was caſtrated in one place, which might have given offence to the Eccleſiaſtics [X].

be committed to writing. The Spirit communicates them to the Spirit in a few conſecrated words. Atque hoc eſt, quod te nunc ſcire volo, quia nobis ipſis eſt omnium mirabilium effectuum operatur: qui, quicquid portentoſi Mathematici, quicquid prodigioſi Magi, quicquid invidentes naturæ perſecutores Alchymiſtæ, quicquid dæmonibus deteriores malefici Necromantes promittere audent, ipſe novit diſcernere & efficere, idque ſine omni crimine, ſine Dei offenſâ, ſine religionis injuriâ. In nobis, inquam, eſt ille mirandorum operator,

Nos habitat, non tartara, ſed nec ſydera cœli.
Spiritus in nobis qui viget, illa facit.

Verum de his nobis quam latiſſimè tecum conferendum eſt, & coram. Non enim committuntur hæc literis, nec ſcribuntur calamo, ſed Spiritu Spiritui paucis ſacriſque verbis infunduntur, idque ſiquando nobis ad te venire contigerit (118). I have taken this extract from a Letter dated from Lyons the 24th of September 1527. The other Letter was written from the ſame city the 19th of November following. Agrippa there opens his myſtery. He ſays that true and ſolid Philoſophy conſiſts in being united to God by an eſſential and immediate contact, which is able to transform us into the Divine Nature. "The underſtanding, ſays he, is the key "of this Philoſophy; but in order to be united to God, "we muſt be diſengaged from matter, and dead to the "world, to the fleſh, to the ſenſes, and to all the "animal man." His Latin will much better expreſs this jargon. Quod ad poſtulatam Philoſophiam attinet, te ſcire volo, quod omnium rerum cognoſcere opificem ipſum Deum, & in illum tota ſimilitudinis imagine ceu eſſentiali quodam contactu ſive vinculo tranſire, quo ipſe transformeris, efficiareque Deus, ea demum vera ſolidaque philoſophia ſit: quemadmodum de Moyſe ait Dominus, inquiens; Ecce ego conſtitui te Deum Pharaonis. Hæc eſt illa vera & ſumma mirabilium operum occultiſſima Philoſophia. Clavis ejus intellectus eſt. Quanto enim altiora intelligimus, tanto ſublimiores induimus virtutes, tantoque majora, & facilius & efficacius operamur. Verum intellectus noſter carni incluſus corruptibili, niſi viam carnis ſuperaverit, fueritque propriam naturam ſortitus, divinis illis virtutibus non poterit uniri, (non enim, niſi ſibi quam ſimilibus congrediuntur,) ac pervidendis illis occultiſſimis Dei & Naturæ ſecretis omnino inefficax eſt; atque

Hoc opus, hic labor eſt, ſuperas evadere ad auras:

....Mori enim oportet, mori, inquam, mundo & carni, ac ſenſibus omnibus, ac toti homini animali, qui velit ad hæc ſecretorum penetralia ingredi; non quod corpus ſeparetur ab anima, ſed quod anima relinquat corpus. De qua morte Paulus ſcribit Coloſſenſibus; Mortui eſtis, & vita veſtra abſcondita eſt cum Chriſto; & alibi clarius de ſeipſo ait, Scio hominem in corpore vel extra corpus neſcio, (Deus ſcit,) raptum uſque ad tertium cœlum; & quæ reliqua ſequuntur (119). "This precious death, "adds he, is granted but to a few, who are favoured "by God, or bleſs'd with a benign influence of the "Stars, or raiſed by their merits, or ſupported by "the ſecret of the art." Hac, inquam, precioſa in conſpectu Domini morte mori oportet, quod contingit pauciſſimis, & forte non ſemper. Nam id

Pauci, quos æquus amavit
Jupiter, aut ardens evexit ad æthera virtus,
Diis geniti potuere:

Primum, qui non ex carne & ſanguine, ſed ex Deo nati ſunt; proximè, qui naturæ beneficio ac cœlorum genethliaco dono ad id dignificati ſunt; cæteri meritis nituntur & arte, de quibus viva vox te certiorem reddat (120). He confeſſes ingenuouſly that he is not of the number of theſe favourites of heaven, and that he has no hopes of attaining that ſublime degree of happineſs; for he had always been embarraſs'd in the vortices of matter, he had been too ſenſual in the turn of his mind, too fond of his wife, too much attached to the fleſh, and the world, and to the cares of his family, &c. His only deſire was to be conſidered as a director, to ſhew others the right way (121). Verum hoc te admonitum volo, ne circa me decipiaris, ac ſi ego aliquando divina paſſus tibi iſta prædicem, aut tale quid mihi arrogare velim, vel concedi poſſe ſperem, qui hactenus humano ſanguine ſacratus miles, ſemper ferè aulicus, tum carnis vinculo chariſſimæ uxori alligatus, omnibuſque inſtabilis fortunæ flatibus expoſitus, totuſque in carne, à mundo, à domeſticis curis tranſverſum actus, tam ſublimia immortalium Deorum dona non ſum adſecutus; ſed accipi me volo velut indicem, qui ipſe ſemper præ foribus manens, aliis, quod iter ingrediendum ſit, oſtendo (122).

[X] Caſtrated in one place, which might have given offence to the Eccleſiaſtics.] The author declaims in that paſſage againſt the Law of Celibacy, and ſays, that thoſe, who ſupport it, would perhaps chooſe rather to allow concubinage than marriage to the Prieſts, becauſe they receive a conſiderable revenue by giving licences to keep concubines. He adds, that a certain Prelate boaſted openly at his table, that he had in his Dioceſe eleven thouſand Prieſts, who kept concubines, and paid him each of them a crown a year for their licences. Here is the paſſage, which was cancelled in the Lyons edition. Mr. Crenius, who firſt diſcovered it, complains extremely of the fraud. His words are theſe: Mala fide per Beringos fratres Lugduni anno MDC in 8vo edita ſunt Henrici Cornelii Agrippæ.... Opera; utpote in quâ multa omiſſa ſunt editione, quæ in prioribus erant. Atque ne hoc gratis dixiſſe videar, capias exemplum è tractatu De Incertitudine & Vanitate Scientiarum atque Artium, in cujus C. LXIV pag. m. 189, de Lenonia ſequentia hæc, quæ ex optima, recognita, plena, & ſcholiis marginariis (retineo vocem in titulo libri poſitam,) illuſtrata editione, ſine loci adjectione, anno MDXXXVI, in 8vo, excuſa, admodum rara, daturus ſum, in Lugdunenſi plane dempta ſunt: Jam vero etiam lenociniis militant leges atque canones, cum in potentum favorem pro iniquis nuptiis pugnant, & juſta matrimonia dirimunt: ſacerdoteſque ſublatis honeſtis nuptiis turpiter ſcortari compellunt: malueruntque illi legiſlatores ſacerdotes ſuos cum infamia habere concubinas, quam cum honeſta fama uxores, forte quia ex concubinis proventus illis eſt amplior. De quo legimus gloriatum in convivio quendam Epiſcopum, habere ſe undecim millia ſacerdotum concubinariorum, qui in ſingulos annos illi aurium pendant. Hæc omnia, & alia forte plura, neque enim integrum hactenus contuli, pro more eraſerunt adverſarii, clarum relinquentes documentum illorum quid editionibus tribuendum (123).

(118) Id. ibid.

(119) Idem Ep. xxx. lib. 5. pag. 909.

(120) Agripp. Epiſt. xix. lib. 5. p. 909.

(121) Compare this with the Porters of the faith, whom the Sieur Pariſot ſpeaks of in his book intitled, Faith unfolded by Reaſon. You may find it in the Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, Oct. 1685. p. 1140, &c.

(122) Agripp. Epiſt. xix. lib. 5. p. 909, 910.

(123) Thomas Crenius Animadverſ. Philologic. Hiſt. part 2. p. 13, 14.

☞AGRIPPA (HEROD) was the ſon of Ariſtobulus, and the Grandſon of Herod the Great. A little before the death of his Grandfather he went from Judea to Rome, where he became acquainted with Druſus Tiberius's ſon, and inſinuated himſelf into his friendſhip. He alſo made himſelf very acceptable to Antonia the wife of Druſus Tiberius's brother, and the mother of Germanicus and of Claudius who was afterwards made Emperor. Though Agrippa was of a very generous mind, yet he durſt not diſplay it as long as his mother was alive, for fear of expoſing himſelf to her indignation. But when ſhe was dead he gave a free ſcope to his liberal inclinations, and by his exorbitant expence, and eſpecially by the conſiderable preſents he made to Tiberius's freed-men, whoſe friendſhip he courted, he ran himſelf ſo deeply in debt, that it was out of his power to ſatisfy his creditors. This, together with the death of Druſus

Druſus his good friend, obliged him to quit Rome, and to retire to the Caſtle of Malatha in Idumea, in order to ſpend at that place the remaining part of his unhappy life. However, by the means of his wife, who was his couſin-german [A], he received ſome comfort [B], being made by Herod the Tetrarch one of the principal Magiſtrates at Tiberias. But Herod having one day reproached him with the favours he had done him, and upbraided him with his poverty, Agrippa was ſo much offended at it, that he went to Flaccus Governor of Syria, with whom he had been acquainted at Rome. Flaccus received him very kindly, as he had before Ariſtobulus his brother; and though Agrippa and Ariſtobulus were at variance, this did not hinder Flaccus from being equally kind to both. But Ariſtobulus left no ſtone unturned till he had inſpired the Governor of Syria with a violent hatred againſt Agrippa [C], in which he ſucceeded ſo well, that his brother having loſt Flaccus's friendſhip was reduced to the utmoſt neceſſity; he retired to Ptolemais, where, having nothing to live upon, he reſolved to return into Italy, for which journey he was obliged to borrow money [D]. Being arrived at Puteoli † he wrote to the Emperor * who was then at Caprea, that he deſired to go and pay his reſpects to him. The Emperor anſwered him immediately in a very gracious manner, and told him that he ſhould be welcome. Thereupon Agrippa went to Tiberius, who received him with all the diſtinguiſhing marks he could wiſh, and made him lodge at his own palace. But the next day the Emperor received a letter from Herennius, who acquainted him, that having preſſed Agrippa to return a ſum of three hundred thouſand pieces of ſilver, which he had borrowed from the treaſury for a certain time, which was now elapſed, he ran away. This letter exaſperated Tiberius to ſuch a degree, that he gave ſtrict orders to his guards not to let Agrippa have acceſs to him till he had paid this debt. Agrippa ſoon found means to get the money he wanted, and by paying the debt, he ingratiated himſelf again ſo deeply into Tiberius's favour, that he committed to him the care of Tiberius Nero his grandſon, and ſon of Druſus. But Agrippa being willing to acknowledge the favours he had received from Antonia, neglected the truſt repoſed in him by Tiberius, and employed all his endeavours to render himſelf acceptable to Caius Caligula, Antonia's grandſon; and being one day with him in his chariot, he told him it was time for Tiberius to make room for Caius, who deſerved more than he did to ſway the Imperial Scepter. But this coſt him dear; for his diſcourſe having been reported to the Emperor, Agrippa was caſt into a priſon [E], where he ſtaid till the death of Tiberius, when Caligula, being raiſed to the throne, not only ſet him at liberty, but † Now Puzzuolo in the Kingdom of Naples.

* Tiberius.

[A] Who was his couſin-german.] Herod had two daughters by Mariamne the daughter of Hircanus, the eldeſt called Salampſo was married to Phaſaël ſon of Phaſaël Herod's elder brother. The younger called Cypros was married to Antipater Herod's nephew by Salomé his ſiſter. Phaſaël had five children by Salampſo, three ſons, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander, and two daughters, Alexandra married to Timius, a Nobleman of Cyprus, by whom ſhe had no children, and Cypros, who was married to Agrippa (1). By which it appears that this King's wife was his couſin-german, ſince ſhe was the granddaughter of Herod by Cypros his daughter, as he was his grandſon by Ariſtobulus his ſon.

(1) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 18. c. 7.

[B] By the means of his wife he received ſome comfort.] She uſed all her endeavours to diſſuade him from retiring into Idumea. She wrote to Herodias his ſiſter, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, and entreated her to afford him ſome aſſiſtance. Her requeſt was granted. Herod and Herodias ſent for Agrippa, they gave him a ſum of money, and made him one of the principal Magiſtrates at Tiberias, as we have ſaid.

[C] Ariſtobulus left no ſtone unturned, till he had inſpired the Governor of Syria with a violent hatred againſt Agrippa.] Agrippa himſelf imprudently furniſhed his brother with an opportunity of doing him that ill ſervice. The occaſion of it was as follows: The people of Damaſcus had ſome diſputes with the inhabitants of Sidon concerning their boundaries; this affair was to be determined by Flaccus. Thoſe of Damaſcus offered a large ſum of money to Agrippa, that he might employ all the credit he had with the Governor, in their favour. Agrippa promiſed he would do what lay in his power to ſerve them. Ariſtobulus having got a hint of this, acquainted Flaccus with it, who inquired into the affair, and finding that he had been well informed, he deſerted Agrippa (2).

(2) Id. ibid. c. 8.

[D] For which journey he was obliged to borrow money.] He ordered Martias, his freedman, to do all his endeavours in order to get money. Martias went to Protus, who had been manumiſed by Bernice Agrippa's mother, and been by her in her laſt will recommended to Antonia, who for that reaſon took him into her ſervice. Martias offered his bond for the money he intended to borrow for his Maſter. But Protus anſwered that Agrippa was already in his debt; however he took from Martias a bond for twenty thouſand Attick Drachms (3), for which he gave him only ſeventy two thouſand five hundred drachms, keeping back the remaining two thouſand five hundred, notwithſtanding all the endeavours Agrippa could uſe to perſuade him to the contrary (4). Having received this ſum, he went to Anthedon, where meeting with a ſhip, he intended to continue his voyage, when Herennius Capito, who had the management of the treaſury at Jamnia, ſent ſome ſoldiers to him, to oblige him to pay three hundred thouſand pieces of ſilver, which had been lent him out of the treaſury when he was at Rome. Agrippa promiſed them that he would ſatisfy them; but as ſoon as it was dark he weighed anchor and ſailed for Alexandria: Being arrived in that city, he deſired Alexander, one of the chief Magiſtrates there, to lend him two hundred thouſand pieces of ſilver; Alexander anſwered he would not lend them to him, but that he would readily truſt Cypros his wife with that money, becauſe he admired her virtue and love for her husband. She accepting the offer, and being willing to be Agrippa's ſurety, Alexander gave him then five Talents (5), and promiſed he would give him the reſt at Puteoli; not thinking it proper to give him all at once, for fear leſt, prodigal as he was, he would ſpend it too ſoon (6).

(3) An Attick Drachm, according to Brerewood, is worth 7 pence halfpeny of our money; ſo that 20000 Drachms make 625 l. But according to Dr. Bernard an Attic Drachm is worth 8 pence farthing of our money; ſo that 20000 Attic Drachms will make 687 l. 10 ſh.

(4) Joſeph. ubi ſupra.

(5) A Talent of Gold (Alexandrian money, as we may ſuppoſe is meant here) makes 7200 l. If of Silver, it is but a ſixteenth part of that ſum. See Prideaux's Preface to his Connexion, p. 21.

[E] Agrippa was caſt into a priſon.] Eutichus one of Agrippa's freedmen, who was driving the chariot, overheard his Maſter's diſcourſe; which he did not publiſh then: But ſome time after this, Agrippa having charged him with a robbery, he run away; and having been taken and carried before Piſo then Prefect of Rome, he examined him; but he inſtead of anſwering to the queſtions, ſaid he had ſomething very material, and which concerned the Emperor's life, to impart to him. He was immediately carried to Caprea,

(6) Joſeph. ibid.

but alſo put the diadem on his head, and made him King or Tetrarch of a great p of Judea. The next year Agrippa obtained leave from Caligula to go to his Kingdom, in order to ſettle there the publick affairs. It was a very ſurpriſing thing to ſee this Prince return with a crown on his head, after all the misfortunes and the extreme miſery that had obliged him to leave his native country. Some could hardly believe what they ſaw, others admired the conſtancy and reſolution with which he purſued his deſigns, and was at laſt arrived at the enjoyment of his wiſhes (a). His Kingdom was ſoon after encreaſed through the pride and ambition of Herodias his ſiſter [F], who was prea, where Tiberius then was, who without enquiring further into the matter, ordered him to be put in priſon, where he remained there a long while without being heard. Agrippa deſired Antonia, who was very much in favour with Tiberius, to prevail with him to give audience to Eutichus, that he might know of what crime he was accuſed. She did accordingly ſpeak to Tiberius about it, who anſwered, that if Eutichus intended to accuſe his Maſter falſly, he was ſufficiently puniſh'd for it by what he ſuffered in priſon; that Agrippa ſhould take care not to act imprudently in this affair, nor to puſh it on too warmly, leſt the injury he intended to do his freedman ſhould fall upon himſelf. Agrippa inſtead of growing remiſs in the purſuit of this affair, by ſo prudent an anſwer, entreated Antonia more eagerly, to oblige Tiberius to enquire into it. So that one day, as Tiberius was taking the air in his litter, and Caius (7) and Agrippa walked before him, Antonia requeſted him that he would ſend for Eutichus. "I ſwear by the Gods, anſwered Tiberius, "it is againſt my own inclination, and only not to "deny your requeſt, that I will do what you deſire." Thereupon he ſent for Eutichus, who being brought before him, Tiberius asked what he had to ſay againſt the perſon to whom he owed his liberty. "Sir, replied he, one day, as Caius whom I ſee "here, and Agrippa were riding in a chariot, which "I drove ſitting at their feet, Agrippa after ſome "other diſcourſes ſpoke thus to Caius; Shall I never "ſee that day, in which the old man (8) will depart "to the other world, and leave this at your command? "Tiberius his grandſon cannot prevent your coming "to the Empire, for it will be an eaſy matter for "you, to get rid of him. How happy ſhould the "whole earth then be, and what a ſhare would I "have in its happineſs?" Tiberius was ſo much the more inclined to believe this, as he knew that Agrippa, inſtead of applying himſelf to Tiberius Nero his grandſon, had entirely devoted himſelf to Caius. The Emperor without heſitation ſaid to Macro Commander of the Pretorian guards, "Take "this man (pointing to Agrippa) and chain him." Macro could not believe this was meant of Agrippa, ſo that he deferred obeying till he had more particular inſtructions. Tiberius having taken a turn or two more in the hippodromus, ſeeing Agrippa ſtill, ſaid to Macro, "Have I not commanded you "to ſeize that man?" What man, Sir, ſaid Macro? Agrippa, anſwered Tiberius. Agrippa hearing this, entreated him by the memory of his beloved ſon, with whom he had been educated, to pardon him this crime; but all his prayers and entreaties were ineffectual: the ſoldiers carried him to priſon cloathed in his purple garments (9). It happened one day, as Agrippa was with other priſoners before the palace, and being tired leaned againſt a tree, upon which an owl came and reſted. A German, who was amongſt the priſoners, asked one of the ſoldiers that guarded them, who that man was that leaned againſt the tree; and being told that he was one of the moſt conſiderable men among the Jews, he begged leave to ſpeak with him, as tho' he was deſirous to inquire into the laws and cuſtoms of the Jewiſh nation: his requeſt was granted, and being brought near Agrippa, he ſpoke to him after this manner: "I perceive you are ſadly afflicted at the great and "ſudden change of your condition, and I fear you "will hardly believe, that by the Divine Providence "your deliverance is near at hand. But I ſwear by "the Gods I adore, and by thoſe that are worſhipped in this country, and who have put us both in "theſe chains, that by what I am to tell you I don't "intend to afford you vain hopes, being perſuaded "that when they are fruſtrated they only ſerve to "increaſe our miſery. I will declare to you, tho' "not without danger to myſelf, what the bird "which flew over your head portends to you. In "a little time you will be ſet free, and raiſed to "ſuch an high power and dignity, that thoſe who "now pity your misfortunes, will envy your glory. "You will be happy the remaining part of your "days, and will have children that will inherit "your happineſs. But when you will ſee this bird "appear another time over your head, know that "then you will have but five days to live." This prediction appeared ſo ridiculous to Agrippa, that he then laughed at it as heartily as he was aſtoniſhed when the event had confirmed it. This is what Joſephus tells us (10), without adding the leaſt thing by which it might appear that he doubts of the truth of that ſtory. We leave it to the reader to judge by what kind of proofs ſuch a fact ought to be atteſted, before any man of ſenſe can believe that it was not invented after the event.

(a) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 18. c. 8.

(7) Caligula.

(8) Speaking of Tiberius.

(9) Joſeph. ibid.

(10) Ibid.

[F] His kingdom was encreaſed by the pride and ambition of Herodias his ſiſter.] She could not without envy behold her brother's proſperity by which he was raiſed above her husband. Pride and jealouſy poſſeſſed her, when ſhe conſidered that Agrippa, who had been forced to ſhelter himſelf under her and her husband's protection when he was unable to pay his debts, would now be adorned with honour and glory. She could not bear this change of his condition, eſpecially when ſhe ſaw him walk in his royal robes ſurrounded with a multitude of people. This ſhe repreſented to Herod her husband; "What, "ſaid ſhe, ſhall Agrippa, the ſon of a private "man, wear a crown, when you, who are the ſon "of a King, you, whom all your relations deſire "to ſee inveſted with Royalty, reſt contented with "a private life, and don't aſpire at the honour "of ſwaying a Scepter? If till now you could "bear to be in a condition leſs elevated than that of "your father, you ſhould at leaſt at this time begin "to wiſh for a dignity, which you deſerve by your "birth and quality. Don't ſuffer your ſelf to be "inferior to a man whom you have formerly main-"tained. Be not ſo baſe as not to labour in the "midſt of the riches you enjoy, to acquire that "honour which Agrippa obtained, when he was in "the utmoſt want, and deſtitute of every thing. Be "aſhamed to ſtoop before him whom you have ſeen "reduced ſo low, that he could not live without "your aſſiſtance. Let us go to Rome; let us ſpare "no pains nor coſt, ſince there is leſs pleaſure in "keeping one's treaſures, than in ſpending them to "get a Kingdom." Thus ſpoke Herodias. But as Herod loved eaſe and quietneſs, and diſtruſted the court of Rome, he did all that lay in his power to diſſuade his wife from her deſign. But the more he oppoſed her, the more ſhe preſſed him; and teaſed him ſo much that at laſt he conſented to go to Rome. As ſoon as Agrippa had the hint of it, he ſent Fortunatus one of his freedmen to the Emperor with preſents, and letters againſt Herod; he alſo charged this meſſenger to endeavour to have a private audience of the Emperor. Fortunatus arrived at Puteoli as ſoon as Herod. Caligula was then at Baiæ (11), whither Herod and Fortunatus went. When Herod had paid his reſpects to the Emperor, Fortunatus gave him Agrippa's letters, which Caligula read immediately; he found that Herod was accuſed of having conſpired with Sejanus againſt Tiberius, and that he was actually aſſiſting Artabanus King of Parthia againſt the Emperor; and to prove this it was alledged, that he had arms for ſeventy thouſand men in his magazines. The Emperor ſtartled at this accuſation, asked Herod, whether he really had ſuch a vaſt quantity of arms? Herod, who could

(11) A little town in Campania in Italy.

was married to Herod Tetrarch of Galilee (b). Agrippa returned ſome time after this to Rome, where he obtained from Caligula that his ſtatue ſhould not be placed in the temple of Jeruſalem [G]; but this favour was ſoon revoked again [H]. Dion Caſſius ſays (c), that Agrippa, together with Antiochus King of Commagena, laboured to inſpire Caligula with tyrannical principles; and indeed it is very probable that he would not have been ſo much in favour with that Emperor, if he had not flattered him, and praiſed, or at leaſt juſtified all his baſe, fooliſh and wicked actions. After Caligula's death Agrippa not only adviſed Claudius to accept of the crown which was offered him by the army (d), but was alſo very much inſtrumental in making him Emperor [I]. Claudius was not ungrateful of this ſervice; for no ſooner was he ſeated on the (b) Id. ibid. cap. 9.

(c) Lib. 59. p. m. 757.

(d) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 19. c. 3.

could not deny it, was obliged to confeſs it. The Emperor thinking this circumſtance was ſufficient to prove the conſpiracy, deprived Herod of his Tetrarchy and gave it to Agrippa; he alſo baniſhed the depoſed Tetrarch to Lyons in France, and confiſcated all his money, but knowing that Herodias was Agrippa's ſiſter, he offered her that money, thinking ſhe would not follow her husband, and told her, that he pardoned her for the ſake of her brother, But this generous Lady anſwered; "Sir, it is "worthy of you to offer me this favour, but my "love for my husband does not allow me to accept "it. As I have had a ſhare in his happineſs, it "would not be juſt in me to leave him in his miſ"fortune." Caligula's baſe heart could not bear this generoſity in a woman; he baniſhed Herodias with her husband, and gave all their riches to Agrippa. Thus Herodias was puniſhed for the envy ſhe bore her brother (12). We will ſay by the way, that this Herodias is the perſon, whoſe daughter dancing before Herod pleaſed him ſo much, that he promiſed her upon oath, whatever ſhe could deſire; the young girl adviſed with her mother what ſhe ſhould ask, who bad her ask John the Baptiſt's head in a diſh (13).

(12) Id. ib. c. 9.

(13) Matt. xiv. 6—8. Marc. vi. 22—24.

[G] He obtained from Caligula, that his ſtatue ſhould not be placed in the temple of Jeruſalem.] The Emperor had given ſtrict orders to Petronius for that purpoſe. Agrippa was then at Rome. It happened one day, that he invited Caligula to a very ſumptuous entertainment. The Emperor ſurpriſed and moved by Agrippa's liberality, who ſpared nothing to pleaſe his Sovereign, told him, "I have had long ago ſeveral "proofs of your love for me. You gave me teſtimonies "of it even with danger to your ſelf during the life of "Tiberius; and I find you ſtill continue in your endea"vours to convince me of your tender affection. I "ſhould be aſhamed to be behind hand with you: "Therefore I will make amends for what I have not "yet done, add new favours to thoſe I have already "beſtowed upon you, and make your future happi"neſs greater ſtill, than that you enjoy at preſent." Caligula having ſaid this, did not queſtion but Agrippa would ask of him ſome large territories, or the revenue of ſome cities. But Agrippa, who had been long before prepared to ask a favour of another kind, took hold of this opportunity to obtain it, and anſwered, that when he applied himſelf to him during the life of Tiberius, it was not out of private intereſt, but only to make himſelf acceptable to him, and that the favours he had already received from him ſurpaſſed all his wiſhes. And though the Emperor could ſtill encreaſe his favours, yet he was thoroughly ſatisfied with what he had done for him. The Emperor, ſurpriſed at his moderation, preſs'd him to ask new favours, being ready to grant whatever he could deſire. "Sir, anſwered Agrippa, ſince "you are ſo kind to me as to think me deſerving of "your favours, I will ask one which does not relate "to the encreaſing of my riches, becauſe by your li"berality towards me, I have no occaſion for it. "The favour I beg of you is ſuch, that it will gain "you a great reputation of piety, and render God "favourable to you in all your deſigns; this favour "will alſo be more advantageous to me, than all "thoſe I have received at your hands; therefore I "earneſtly deſire you would be pleaſed to revoke the "order you have given to Petronius of placing your "ſtatue in the temple of Jeruſalem." Caligula admired Agrippa's generous mind, who preferred the obſervations of the laws of his country, and the worſhip of his God, to the enlarging of his own dominions, and the encreaſe of his riches. He granted his requeſt, and wrote to Petronius, that if his ſtatue was already in the temple he ſhould let it ſtand, but if it was not yet there, he ſhould not force the Jews to receive it (14).

(14) Joſeph. ubi ſupra, cap. 11.

This affair is differently related by Philo (15), who tells us, Petronius wrote to the Emperor with regard to the placing his ſtatue in the temple, that if the Jews were provoked, it was to be feared leſt they ſhould take ſome deſperate courſe, and out of revenge ſhould burn all their harveſt which was then almoſt ripe. This exaſperated the Emperor againſt them; Agrippa who knew nothing of the letters which the Emperor had received, went as uſual to pay his court to him. Caligula, looking ſeverely upon him, ſaid, "See what good and honeſt men your citizens are; "they alone refuſe to acknowledge Caius (16) for a "God; it ſeems by their obſtinacy they will run "into a certain deſtruction. I have commanded that "the image of Jupiter (17) be conſecrated in their "temple; and they all ran in crouds together out of "the cities and the country, ſeemingly to pray and "ſupplicate, but really to tread my orders under "their feet." This diſcourſe filled Agrippa with horror, he trembled through all his limbs, and would have fallen down if ſome body had not ſupported him; he was carried home ſenſeleſs; whereupon Caligula ſaid, "If Agrippa my particular friend, "on whom I have beſtowed ſo many favours, is ſo "much addicted to the religious ceremonies of his "country, that a word only ſpoken againſt them "throws him into a ſwoon, what can be expected "from others, who have no particular reaſon to re"nounce or ſlight thoſe ceremonies?" Agrippa having recovered his ſenſes wrote to the Emperor in his own defence, that he could not but take up the cauſe of his countrymen; and concluded his Letter in theſe words: "What would not only "my nation, but the whole world ſay of me? I "muſt either paſs for a traytor againſt my country, or "I muſt loſe your favour and friendſhip; both which "are the greateſt misfortunes that can befall me. "For if I ſtill continue in favour with you, tho' "my country is not ſaved nor the temple undefil"ed, I muſt be a traytor; ſince it is well known that "you conſult your beſt friends in what regards the "affairs of the Empire. And if I am diſagreeable "to your Majeſty, don't put me in chains, as Ti"berius has done, but let me be put immediately "to death, for life is nothing to me, if I have loſt "your favour." This Letter ſoftened the Emperor's anger; who wrote to Petronius, what we have related above.

(15) In Legatione, ap. Uſſerium, Annal. p. m. 654.

(16) Caligula.

(17) I ſuppoſe he meant himſelf.

[H] This favour was ſoon revoked again.] Caligula hearing that the Jews threatened to take up arms, and conſidering this audaciouſneſs as inconſiſtent with his authority, he fell in a violent paſſion againſt them, and gave freſh orders to Petronius for putting his ſtatue in the temple; but the veſſel which carried this Letter meeting with contrary winds, Petronius had already had notice of Caligula's death, when the Letter was delivered to him, ſo that he did not think himſelf obliged to obey his commands (18).

(18) Joſephus, ubi ſupra.

[I] Agrippa . . . was very much inſtrumental in making him (Claudius) Emperor.] Claudius being amongſt the ſoldiers who had choſen him Emperor, and Agrippa being with him exhorting him to accept of the Imperial Dignity, the Senate ſent for Agrippa to have his advice in this conjuncture. He went to them, and ſwore that he was ready to lay down his life to maintain the dignity of the Senate: but he added, that they ought at preſent to conſider more what was expedient and uſeful to them, than the Imperial throne, but he confirmed Agrippa in the Kingdom which his predeceſſor had given him. He publiſhed for that purpoſe a proclamation or edict, in which, after a great encomium on Agrippa, he added Samaria and Judea to the Provinces which he poſſeſſed already, as belonging to him in juſtice, becauſe they had been enjoyed by Herod his grandfather: Claudius alſo granted him Abila, which had been poſſeſſed by Liſanias, and all the territories of Mount Libanus. The treaty of alliance between Agrippa and the Romans was engraved on copper plates, which were put up in the great market-place at Rome (e). Agrippa was ſo much in favour with Claudius, that on his behalf he publiſhed two edicts in favour of the Jews (f), of which we ſhall give an account in the remarks [K]. Agrippa returned afterwards into his Kingdom, and hung up in the temple of Jeruſalem the gold chain which Caligula had given him in remembrance of his impriſonment, and which was of the ſame weight with that of iron, with which he had been chained. Joſephus's reflexion on this occaſion does not appear well-grounded [L]. Agrippa alſo accompliſhed the vows he had made, and had ſacrifices offered to God for him in the temple. He afterwards began to exert ſome acts of Sovereignty; for he deprived Theophilus ſon of Ananas of the High-Prieſthood, and put in his place Simon ſurnamed Canthara, ſon of Boëtus the High-Prieſt, whoſe daughter Herod the Great had married (g). Hence it appears that Agrippa followed the example of moſt of the great men, who uſe to give places and preferments to their kinſmen and relations before any other people. But Simon did not enjoy that high poſt a long time; for Agrippa being of opinion that Jonathas deſerved that honour more than him, offered it him again, but he refuſing to accept it [M], Mathias his brother was inveſted with it (h). Agrippa, in order to diſplay his gratitude to the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, who had given him ſeveral teſtimonies of their love and affection, freed them from a tax which every family in the city was obliged to pay. A little while after this ſome young men at Doris were ſo audacious that they placed a ſtatue of the Emperor in a Synagogue of the Jews there; at which Agrippa was ſo exaſperated, that he went immediately to Petronius Governor of Syria to complain of this raſhneſs. His complaint had the effect he deſired upon that Governor, who thereupon wrote to the inhabitants of Doris, repreſenting to them that the will and pleaſure of the Emperor was, that the Jews ſhould enjoy a full liberty with regard to their Religion (i) [N]. Agrippa undertook to ſtrengthen Jeruſalem with new (e) Id. ibid. c. 4.

(f) Id. ibid.
(g) Id. ibid. c. 5.
(h) Id. ib. c. 6.
(i) Id. ibid.

what was agreeable; that if they were reſolved to recover the ſovereign authority, they wanted money, arms and ſoldiers to ſucceed in this undertaking. He was anſwered, that the Senate had money, arms and ſoldiers enough, and that they could arm a vaſt number of ſlaves, who would be made free. "I wiſh, ſaid Agrippa, that your deſign may "have the good ſucceſs you expect; but my con-"cern for you obliges me to tell you, that there "is a great difference between that great number "of diſciplined ſoldiers, who ſide with Claudius, "and the new levies you intend to raiſe. Theſe "are incapable of being diſciplined, and ſcarce "know how to manage a ſword. Therefore my "opinion is, that you muſt ſend Deputies to Clau-"dius, and diſſuade him from accepting the Em-"pire, and if you will give me leave, I will go with "your Deputies." This propoſition was accepted; Agrippa went with ſome Senators to Claudius, and ſpeaking to him privately, he diſcovered to him in what conſternation the Senate was, and adviſed him to ſpeak as a Prince who was already poſſeſſed of a crown. Claudius followed his advice, and by this means ſettled himſelf in the Imperial Throne (19).

(19) Id. lib. 19. cap. 3.

[K] Claudius ... publiſhed two Edicts in favour of the Jews, of which we ſhall give an account.] In the firſt of theſe Edicts the Emperor ſays, "It appears "by ſeveral Records, that the Kings of Egypt have "anciently granted to the Jews at Alexandria the "ſame privileges which the other inhabitants en-"joyed; Auguſtus confirmed to them thoſe privi-"leges, after he had joined the city of Alexandria "to the Roman Empire, and alſo gave them the "liberty of living according to their Laws, and to "follow their own Religion, forbidding all perſons to "moleſt them on that account. But when Caligula "was become ſo bold as to make himſelf worſhipped "like a God, the other inhabitants of Alexandria "took this opportunity to exaſperate the Emperor "againſt the Jews, becauſe they refuſed to adore "him. And as nothing is more unjuſt than to per-"ſecute them on that account, we order and com-"mand that they be maintained in the full enjoy-"ment of all their privileges." In the other Edict the Emperor declares that his two particular friends Agrippa and Herod having deſired him to grant to all the Jews throughout the Empire the ſame privileges he had granted to thoſe of Alexandria, he was willing to comply with their requeſt, not only to pleaſe the two eminent perſons who interceded for them, but alſo becauſe the Jews deſerved that favour by their love and fidelity to the Romans. He adds, that he indulges them in this liberty to oblige them by this proof of his favour not to deſpiſe the Religion of other nations, but to live peaceably in the enjoyment of their own (20).

(20) Id. ibid. cap. 4.

[L] Joſephus's reflexion on this occaſion does not appear well grounded.] Agrippa's chain, ſays he (21), was hung up in the temple, that every body might ſee in his perſon an inſtance of the inconſtancy of fortune, and learn that when ſhe throws a man down, ſhe can reſtore him, and make him enjoy a greater happineſs, than that which he loſt. Thus far we may approve of Joſephus's reflexion; but we cannot but blame him when he ſuppoſes afterwards, that Agrippa had been impriſoned againſt the reſpect that was owed to his birth, and for a very ſlight reaſon: for if a man be guilty, his quality cannot be an objection againſt his ſuffering for his crime: and it is always a crime, eſpecially in a private perſon as Agrippa was, when he was impriſoned by Tiberius, to ſhew that he deſires his King's or his Sovereign's death.

(21) Ib. cap. 5.

[M] He refuſing to accept it.] "I am very much ob-"liged to you, ſaid he (22), for the honour you de-"ſigned me; but ſince God does not judge me fit "for that holy function (23), it is enough for me "to have enjoyed it once: I could not accept it "again now as innocently, as I might have done the "firſt time. But if your Majeſty will confer that "dignity on a perſon who deſerves it much more "than myſelf, and whoſe piety muſt make him ac-"ceptable to God, I will not ſcruple to propoſe my "brother to you." Agrippa was highly delighted with this modeſt anſwer, and complied with Jonathan's requeſt.

(22) Id. ibid. cap. 6.
(23) The High-Prieſthood.

[N] The will and pleaſure of the Emperor was that the Jews ſhould enjoy a full liberty with regard to their Religion.] There is in the Letter which Petronius wrote to the Magiſtrates of Doris, a paſſage which is worth notice. "I have heard, ſays he (24), that in "defiance new walls and fortifications, but before the work was compleated, Vibius Marſus then Governor of Syria wrote to the Emperor about it, and repreſented that this would be dangerous in caſe the Jews ſhould happen to revolt, which obliged the Emperor to ſend Agrippa orders to deſiſt, with which he complied (i). This Prince, ſays Joſephus (k), was naturally ſo generous and benevolent, he had ſo great a love for his ſubjects, that he neglected nothing to make his reign glorious by great and commendable actions; in which he very much differed from Herod his grandfather, who was ill-natured and cruel, and who preferred the Greeks to the Jews: Agrippa on the contrary was civil and obliging to every body, treated his ſubjects as kindly as he did ſtrangers, and took a particular delight in relieving the miſerable and the afflicted. Jeruſalem was the place of his uſual reſidence, and he obſerved ſo ſtrictly the ancient cuſtoms of the Jews, that he let no day paſs without offering ſacrifices to God. We will give in the Remark a particular inſtance of his clemency and mildneſs, and alſo of his anger and reſentment [O]. He ſpent great ſums of money in adorning ſeveral cities (l). He was ſo much eſteemed by all the Princes his neighbours, and the great men of his time, that being at Tiberias in Galilee, Antiochus King of Commagena, Sampſigeramus King of the Emeſſenians, Cotis King of Leſſer Armenia, Polemus Prince of Pontus, and Herod King of Chalcide Agrippa's brother came to viſit him, he entertained them with great pomp and magnificence, which ſhewed he deſerved to receive ſuch gueſts. When all theſe Kings were together, Marſus Governor of Syria came alſo to viſit Agrippa, who out of reſpect for the Roman Empire went to meet him; but this became the occaſion of the miſunderſtanding that aroſe between them. For all the Kings that came to viſit Agrippa being with him in his Chariot, Marſus thought this great union of ſo many Princes might be of dangerous conſequence to the Empire, he therefore let them know that they ſhould return to their reſpective States; this exaſperated Agrippa againſt him to ſuch a degree, that he could never ſuffer him afterwards (m); for which reaſon he often importuned the Emperor to remove Marſus from his employment, which however was not done till after the death of Agrippa (n). This Prince being at Ceſarea celebrated there magnificent and ſolemn games to the honour of the Emperor. All the Great Men and the Nobility were preſent at thoſe games. On the ſecond day Agrippa came early in the morning to the Theatre, being dreſſed in a ſumptuous garment made of a ſtuff of which the ground was ſilver, and ſo artfully worked, that when the Sun ſhone upon it, it reflected ſo ſtrong a light, that it was impoſſible to behold the perſon who wore that habit, without veneration and fear. Agrippa appearing thus as it were in a godlike manner, thoſe baſe flatterers, whoſe poiſonous diſcourſes corrupt the hearts of Princes, began to cry, "That till then "they had conſidered their King only as a mortal man, but now they underſtood "that they muſt revere him like a God, and beg of him to be favourable and graci-"ous to them, ſince it appeared that he was not, like other men, of a mortal condition." Agrippa was pleaſed with this impious diſcourſe, which he ought to have ſeverely puniſhed.

(24) Apud Joſeph. ibid. c. 6.

(i) Id. ibid.

(k) Ibid. ch. 5.

(l) Ibid.

(m) Ibid. cap. 7.

(n) Id. ibid. lib. 20. cap. 2.

"defiance of Claudius's Edict, by which he grants "the Jews a perfect liberty to live according to their "own Laws, ſome men amongſt you have been ſo "bold, as to profane their ſynagogue by placing a "ſtatue of the Emperor in it; and thus have of-"fended equally againſt their Religion, and the Em-"peror's piety, whoſe intention it is that every Dei-"ty be worſhipped in the temple conſecrated to it." We need not make any reflection on that paſſage, every intelligent reader will eaſily underſtand what conſequences may be drawn from it.

[O] A particular inſtance of his clemency and mildneſs, as alſo of his anger and reſentment.] That of his clemency is as follows: A Doctor of the Law named Simon was ſo daring as to accuſe him publicly at Jeruſalem as being a wicked man, who ought to be forbid the temple, ſince the gates of it ſhould be open only to ſuch perſons as are chaſte and virtuous. The Governor of the city having given notice of this to Agrippa, he gave orders that Simon ſhould be brought before him. When Simon arrived at Ceſarea, Agrippa happened to be at the theatre. He ordered him to ſit down near him, and without any paſſion he ſaid to him, "Pray tell me what are the "vices you accuſe me of?" Simon was ſo aſhamed at this, that not knowing how to anſwer he begged pardon of Agrippa, who pardoned him immediately, telling him at the ſame time that Kings muſt be more inclined to clemency than to ſeverity, and ſent him away having made him ſome valuable preſents (25). If this be an inſtance of Agrippa's clemency, here follows one of his ſeverity. Silas a General of his armies had been a very faithful ſervant to him during all his misfortunes; he had expoſed himſelf to ſeveral perils and undertook the moſt dangerous deſigns for his ſervice; this made him believe that he could take ſome liberty with him, and often remind him of the ſervice he had done in order to engage him to acknowledge them. Agrippa looking upon this as ſo many reproaches, and being tired with it, not only deprived Silas of his poſt, but alſo ſent him to priſon. Some time after this, when his paſſion was cooled, he called to mind the many ſervices which Silas had done him, and ſent for him to be preſent at the entertainment he gave on his birth-day. But Silas who was incapable of diſſembling, and perſuaded that the King had done him wrong, ſaid to ſome of the company, "You ſee what ho-"nour the King confers upon me this day; but it "will not laſt long, he will ſoon deprive me of it, "as he has deprived me of my employment, which "I had deſerved by the many ſervices I have done "him. For can he be ſure that I will ceaſe to ſpeak "freely? As I have nothing upon my conſcience, I "will publicly declare every day, from what dangers "I have delivered him, and what labours I have un-"dergone to ſecure his perſon and encreaſe his "glory; and lo! the chains and darkneſs of a dun-"geon have been the reward of all my labours "and my ſufferings. This injury is too great ever "to be forgotten; I will remember it, not only "all my life time, but even after my death." This faithful tho' imprudent ſervant did not only ſay this to the perſons who were with him at the entertainment, but he alſo deſired them to acquaint the King with it, who finding Silas's folly was not to be cured, ordered him to be put in priſon again (26). The boaſting of the ſervices which one has done, is a frailty indeed, but ſuch a one as we muſt bear with, eſpecially in old people; and to be offended at it, is generally a proof of an ungrateful heart.

(25) Ib. cap. 7.

(26) Ibid.

puniſhed. But lifting up his eyes, he perceived an owl upon a rope over his head; this he thought portended ſome great evil to him, as it had formerly been an omen of his happineſs; and at that very moment he felt in his bowels an inſufferable pain, as though they had been torn to pieces, and turning himſelf to his friends, "Behold the "man, ſays he, whom you would perſuade that he is immortal; he is juſt upon the point "of death, and this unavoidable neceſſity he is under, is a ſtrong and ſudden proof "of the falſhood and vanity of all your flatteries; but I muſt ſubmit to the will of "God. I was too happy; there is no Prince upon earth whoſe happineſs I could "envy." Having ſaid theſe words he felt his pains encreaſe; he was carried into his palace; and a rumour being ſpread abroad that he was at the point of death, all the people appeared in ſackcloth, according to cuſtom, and prayed to God for his recovery. Agrippa ſeeing them proſtrated could not forbear ſhedding tears; and having been in moſt violent agonies during five days, he died at laſt in the fifty fourth year of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign (o) A. C. XLIV (p). This part of Agrippa's Hiſtory is related in a different manner by St. Luke (q), who tells us, that Agrippa being cloathed in his royal robe, and ſeated in his Tribunal he harangued the people; whereupon the people cried out, This is the voice of a God and not of a man. But all of a ſudden an Angel of the Lord ſtruck him, becauſe he did not give glory unto God; he was gnawed by worms and gave up the ghoſt. Joſephus obſerves (r), that though his revenues were very conſiderable, yet he was ſo generous and lived in ſuch a ſplendid manner, that he was often obliged to borrow money.

(o) Id. ibid. lib. 19. cap. 7.
(p) Of the vulgar Æra.
(q) Act. Apoſt. ch. xii. 21--23.
(r) Ubi ſupra.

☞AGRIPPA II. ſon of the preceding was at Rome when his father died; he was then but ſeventeen years of age. The Emperor Claudius, at whoſe court he was educated, deſigned at firſt to ſend him immediately into Judea, that he might take poſſeſſion of his father's Kingdom; but the Emperor's friends, and his freedmen, who had a great power over him, made him alter his reſolution, by repreſenting to him that all that a man of a conſummate wiſdom and prudence could do was to govern that Kingdom quietly, and to keep it in peace, and that young Agrippa was not yet capable of ſuch a taſk. The Emperor yielded to theſe arguments, and ſent Caſpius Fadus Governor into Judea, which became thus a Province of the Roman Empire (a). The Emperor expreſly commanded the new Governor to puniſh ſeverely thoſe of Ceſarea and Sebaſta, who had treated the memory of Agrippa I. with the utmoſt indignity [A]. Though Agrippa had no authority, yet he was very much in favour with the Emperor, and knew how to make uſe of it in behalf of the Jews, to whom he did a great ſervice on an important occaſion [B]. Herod King of Chalcide and brother of Agrippa I. dying four years (b) after his brother, Claudius gave his Kingdom to our Agrippa (c). Mr. Le Clerc (d) ſuppoſes, that before this time Claudius had granted to Agrippa the ſovereign power over the temple of Jeruſalem, and the right of creating the High-Prieſt; but that learned author is here miſtaken, as we ſhall ſhew in the Remark [C]. Agrippa having been King of Chalcide three or four years was

(a) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. 5. p. m. 396.
(b) Uſher's An. p. 658. 662.
(c) A. C. 48. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 20. cap. 3.
(d) Hiſt. Eccleſ. ad A. C. 46. p. 361.

[A] Thoſe of Ceſarea and Sebaſta, . . . had treated the memory of Agrippa I. with the utmoſt indignity.] As ſoon as they heard he was dead, they forgot all the favours he had beſtowed upon them. "Their "abominable ingratitude, ſays Joſephus (1), went ſo "far, that they endeavoured to diſgrace him with "ſuch indignities and outrages, as I dare not men"tion. Some were ſo audacious that they took "the pictures of the Princeſſes his daughters, and "carried them into thoſe houſes, where the moſt "profligate and diſſolute aſſemble; and after they "had expoſed thoſe pictures to public view for "ſome time, they put them to the moſt unworthy "and ſhameful uſe. They alſo made public enter"tainments in the open ſtreets, offered ſacrifices to "Caron, and drank one another's health, to ſhew "their joy at the death of Agrippa. This was the "way in which they acknowledged the favours they "had received from Herod the great, Agrippa's "grandfather, who not only had built their cities, "but alſo adorned them with thoſe ſtately temples, "and ſumptuous havens, which rendered them ſo "famous."

(1) Antiq. Jud. lib. 19. cap. 7.

[B] He did (the Jews) a great ſervice on an important occaſion.] The occaſion was this: Fadus Governor of Judea had ſent for the Prieſts and principal inhabitants of Jeruſalem, and commanded them, by the Emperor's order, to depoſit the Pontifical habits, which the High-Prieſts only are allowed to wear, in the fortreſs Antonia, to be there kept by the Romans; and becauſe he was afraid leſt his command ſhould cauſe a revolt, he had brought ſome troops with him to Jeruſalem. The Prieſts durſt not refuſe to obey; but they earneſtly deſired Longinus and Fadus to give them leave to ſend to the Emperor, and not to alter any thing in the uſual practice, till they had his anſwer. Their requeſt was granted on condition that they ſhould give their own children as hoſtages till the Embaſſadors returned, with which the Jews complied. When the Embaſſadors were arrived at Rome, Agrippa prevailed with the Emperor to give them a favourable anſwer. Claudius ſent for them, and told them that he would grant their requeſt, but that they ſhould thank Agrippa for it, becauſe it was for his ſake that he was willing to beſtow that favour upon them. He alſo wrote a Letter to the Magiſtrates, Senate, and people of Jeruſalem, which deſerves to be taken notice of. "Your Deputies, ſays the Em"peror, have been introduced to me by Agrippa, "who has been educated with me, and for whom "I have a great regard: They have returned me "thanks for the care I take of your nation, and "earneſtly requeſted of me that I would give you "leave to keep the crown and pontifical ornaments "of your High-Prieſt, as Vitellius has done: I have "granted their petition, not only out of piety, but "alſo becauſe I think it is but juſt and reaſonable, that "every one ſhould have the liberty to follow the Re"ligion of his country, &c. (2)." This is what right reaſon will teach every man, who is not byaſſed by prejudice, education, or intereſt.

(2) Id. ibid. lib. 20. cap. 1.

[C] This learned author is here miſtaken as we ſhall ſhew in the remark.] Here follow his own words: Idem Agrippa (Junior) poteſtatem in templum Jeroſolymitanum, & ſacrum ærarium, juſque Pontifices maximos eligendi, cum nullus eſſet Judææ Rex, impetravit & mox amoto Simoni Cantharæ, Joſephum Canei vel Camydis filium ſuffecit. That is, "As there "was then no King of the Jews the ſame Agrippa (the "Younger) obtained from the Emperor the power "over the temple of Jeruſalem, and over the trea"ſury, was deprived of that Kingdom by Claudius, who gave him in the place of it, thoſe Provinces, which Philip the ſon of Herod the Great had enjoyed (e), beſides the Province of Abila, which belonged to the Tetrarchy of Lyſias (f). Agrippa having received theſe favours from the Emperor, thought now of marrying his ſiſters. He gave Druſilla to Aziza King of the Emezenians, who embraced the Jewiſh Religion. Druſilla had been promiſed before to Epiphanes ſon of King Antiochus, who had given his word that he would turn a Jew; but his not keeping his word was the reaſon why that match was broke. Mariamne Agrippa's other ſiſter was married to Archelaus ſon of Chelcias, to whom ſhe had been betrothed by Agrippa her father. Bernice his eldeſt ſiſter had been married to Herod her uncle, and after his death ſhe remained ſome time a widow: but as it was reported that ſhe was too free with her brother, ſhe propoſed to Polemon King of Cilicia to marry her, and to embrace the Jewiſh Religion, being in hopes that this would perſuade the publick that ſhe had been unjuſtly accuſed. Polemon accepted the propoſal becauſe ſhe was exceedingly rich; but they did not live long together, for ſhe left him out of laſciviouſneſs, as it is reported; and he finding ſhe had abandoned him, renounced the Religion he had profeſſed (g). Agrippa's other ſiſters were not more virtuous than Bernice [D]. After the death of the Emperor Claudius, Nero his ſucceſſor enlarged again Herod's Kingdom by adding four cities with their territories to it, viz. Abila and Juliade in the Province of Perea, and Tarichea and Tiberias in Galilee (h). Agrippa, to render more beautiful the palace he had near the temple at Jeruſalem, built an upper room in it, which had a fine proſpect over the whole town, and from which one could view all that was done round about the temple. The principal inhabitants of Jeruſalem were very much offended at it, becauſe by the Jewiſh Law no body is permitted to obſerve what is done in the temple, eſpecially when ſacrifices are offered. Therefore the Jews built a high wall, which entirely hindered the proſpect from Agrippa's palace towards the temple. Agrippa being exaſperated at this, as well as Feſtus Governor of Judea, they commanded the Jews to pull down the wall; but the Jews begged of him that they might ſend Embaſſadors to the Emperor concerning this affair, becauſe, ſaid they, they would chuſe death rather than ſee any part of their temple ruined. Accordingly they ſent ten of the principal inhabitants of Jeruſalem to Nero, together with Iſhmael the High-Prieſt, and Chelcias Keeper of the ſacred treaſure. Nero gave them audience, and the Empreſs Poppea his wife, who was a pious woman, interceding for them, the Emperor not only pardoned them for her ſake what they had done, but alſo permitted that the wall they had built ſhould not be demoliſhed. The ten Embaſſadors returned to Jeruſalem with this agreeable news; but Poppea kept Iſhmael and Chelcias at Rome as hoſtages of the fidelity of the Jews (i). The Jews having been treated very hard and cruelly by Feſtus their Governor, reſolved at laſt to take up arms againſt the Romans: Agrippa, who knew the ſad conſequences of ſuch a war, uſed all his endeavours to diſſuade them from it [E]. The people anſwered, that it was not againſt the Romans

(e) Theſe Provinces were Batanea and Traconite.

(f) Joſephus ubi ſupra, cap. 5.

(g) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 20. c. 5.

(h) Joſeph. de Bell. Judaico. lib. 2. cap. 22.

(i) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 20. c. 7.

" ſury, and the right of chuſing the High-Prieſts:
" and immediately he removed Simon the ſon of " Canthara, and choſe Joſeph the ſon of Caneus or
" Canys." Thus far Mr. le Clerc, who quotes Joſephus, Ant. Jud. Lib. xx. Cap. 1. But there we find it was Herod Prince of Chalcide and brother of Agrippa the Great, who asked and obtained thoſe favours from the Emperor: It appears however that Agrippa had afterwards the power of eſtabliſhing and depoſing the High-Prieſts; for Joſephus tells us (3), that after the death of Feſtus King Agrippa removed Joſeph from the Prieſthood and eſtabliſhed Ananus in his ſtead. The father of this High-prieſt was alſo called Ananus, and was looked upon as one of the moſt happy men in the world; having enjoyed that ſacred honour as long as he pleaſed, and having had five ſons, who enjoyed it after him; which never happened to any body beſides him. The Jewiſh Hiſtorian gives us in the chapter we have quoted ſome other inſtances by which it appears, that Agrippa diſpoſed of the religious offices at Jeruſalem as he pleaſed.

(3) Antiq. Jud. lib. 20. cap. 8.

[D] His other ſiſters were not more virtuous than Bernice.] Druſilla not long after her marriage left her husband. The reaſon for it was as follows: As ſhe was the moſt beautiful woman at that time, Felix Governor of Judea fell paſſionately in love with her. He ſent one Simon a Jew born at Cyprus his particular friend, and very well skilled in the magical arts to Druſilla, and propoſed to her that if ſhe would leave her husband and marry him, he would make her the moſt happy woman in the world. Druſilla, who ſuffered a great deal becauſe her ſiſter Bernice envied her on account of her beauty, was glad that an opportunity was offered her to get rid of theſe vexations. She readily accepted Felix's propoſals, and renounced the Jewiſh Religion to marry him; ſhe had a ſon by him called Agrippa, who periſh'd with his wife in the conflagration occaſioned by mount Veſuvius under the Emperor Titus. Mariamne abandoned Archelaus her husband to marry Demetrius, the moſt noble and the richeſt of all the Jews of Alexandria, where he was one of the chief Magiſtrates, by whom ſhe had a ſon named Agrippinus (4).

(4) Idem, ibid. cap. 5.

[E] Agrippa uſed all his endeavours to diſſuade them from the war.] He ſpoke to them after this manner: " If I thought that you were all reſolved to " make war againſt the Romans, I would not have
" took upon me to adviſe you at preſent, ſince when
" a whole people is inclined to take the worſe courſe,
" it is needleſs to propoſe any thing advantageous
" to them: But I am perſuaded that the greateſt
" and moſt reaſonable part of you deſire to maintain
" the public peace. Some indeed are too young ſtill
" to know how terrible and dreadful the evils are,
" which war creates; others are led away by the vain
" hopes of recovering their ancient liberty; and " ſome there are, who out of covetouſneſs expect to " find their private advantage in the public calami-
" ties and miſeries of the whole nation. But if you
" will hearken to me, I will propoſe what ſeems
" to me moſt expedient for you, and I will endea-
" vour to prevent the miſchief, which the bad coun-
" ſels of a few ſelf-intereſted men may draw upon
" the whole State." He then repreſents to them, that being under the Government of the Romans, it is in vain for them to talk ſo much of liberty as they uſed to do; liberty was out of the queſtion at that time, ſince the reaſon or pretence of their rebellion mans nor againſt the Emperor they would make war, but againſt Florus their Governor, whoſe tyranny they could no longer bear. "But do not your actions ſhew, "ſaid Agrippa, that it is againſt the Romans you revolt, ſince you refuſe to pay the "taxes to the Emperor, and ſince you have pulled down the gallery which was be- "tween the temple and the Fort Antonia (k)? If then you intend to ſhew that you "do not deſign to revolt, make haſte to pay your taxes, and to rebuild that fort; for "it is to the Emperor that money is due, and the fort belongs, and not to Florus (l)." The people ſubmitted to that ſeaſonable advice; and Agrippa thought there was no more reaſon to fear a war; and to ſuppreſs all the remains of rebellion, he endeavoured to perſuade the people to ſubmit to Florus, till the Emperor had ſent another Governor in his ſtead. But this ſo highly exaſperated the people, that they forced him out of the city with the moſt opprobrious language, ſome throwing even ſtones at him. Agrippa ſeeing it was impoſſible to put a ſtop to the rage of theſe ſeditious men, retired into his own Kingdom, complaining bitterly of the ill uſage he had met with from them (m). The principal inhabitants of Jeruſalem, after they had done all that lay in their power to ſuppreſs the ſedition, in which they had no hand, ſent ſome perſons of note to Florus and to Agrippa, deſiring them to come to Jeruſalem with ſome troops, that they might reſtore the peace in the city, before the revolt had run a greater length. Florus, who deſired to kindle the fire more and more, gave no anſwer to the deputies; but Agrippa, who was willing to ſave the city, and to maintain to the Jews their temple and country, ſent them three thouſand ſoldiers commanded by Darius under Philip the ſon of Joachim; but this did not quell the revolt, which ended at laſt in the total overthrow of the Jewiſh nation, as may be ſeen in Joſephus (n). In the war which the Emperor Veſpaſian carried on againſt the Jews, Agrippa ſent him a ſuccour of two thouſand men (o), by which it appears, as well as by what we have ſaid before, that though a Jew by religion, he was yet entirely devoted to the Romans, whoſe aſſiſtance indeed he wanted, to ſecure the peace of his own Kingdom, when the inhabitants of Tiberias and Tarichea had revolted; but they were reduced by the bravery and conduct of Titus Veſpaſian's ſon (p). When the city of Gamala was beſieged by the Emperor, Agrippa being come near the walls to exhort the inhabitants to ſurrender, he received a wound in his arm by a ſtone that was thrown at him. This put the Romans in a great paſſion, not only becauſe they had a great eſteem and love for Agrippa, but alſo becauſe they perceived by this, that ſince the Jews did not ſpare a King of their own nation and religion, it was probable they would be much more cruel againſt ſtrangers (q). However, Agrippa did not die of the wound he received on this occaſion, ſince he lived to the third year of Trajan, and died at Rome A. C. 100. He was the ſeventh and laſt King of the family of Herod the Great (r). It was before him and Bernice his ſiſter that St. Paul pleaded his cauſe [F] at Ceſarea (s).

(k) Where the Pretorian guard uſed to be kept.

(l) Joſeph. de Bell. Jud. lib. 2. cap. 28.

(m) Ibid. c. 29.

(n) De Bell. Jud. lib. 2. & ſeq.

(o) Joſeph. ibid. lib. 3. cap. 5.

(p) Id. ibid. ch. 31, 42.

(q) Joſeph. de Bell. Jud. lb. 4. cap 2.

(r) Clerici Hiſt. Eccleſ. ad Ann. ch. C. § 7. pag. 522.

(s) Acts xxv, xxvi.

☞AGUCCHIO

bellion was not their being ſubject to the Romans, but their being cruelly treated by their Governor. Agrippa then ſhews, that complaints and murmurs are not the right method to pacify exaſperated Governors, but duty and ſubmiſſion; for when they are reproached with little faults they might have committed, it provokes them more and more and obliges them to be more haughty and ſevere. He afterwards tells them that tho' they had never ſo much reaſon to complain againſt their Governor, yet this ſhould not oblige them to carry their reſentment againſt all the Romans, and even againſt the Emperor himſelf; ſince they were not accountable for the conduct of Governors. "Have they commanded them to "oppreſs you, ſays he, can they from the Weſt "where they live, ſee what paſſes in the Eaſt, and "is it not very difficult for them to be perfectly "acquainted with what regards us?" But we beg leave to obſerve here, that this is a very bad reaſon. For if the Romans could not govern with juſtice and equity thoſe remote nations, they ſhould not have conquered them;

Pourquoy ——— ———
Ne pouvant nous regir nous avez vous conquis (5)?
That is,
"Why did you conquer thoſe you cannot rule?"

(5) Fables de la Motte. l. 3. Fab. xiii.

Agrippa next repreſents to them, that ſince their Governors don't hold their places for life, they may hope for redreſs when a new Governor would be ſent to them; therefore they ſhould ſubmit patiently till ſuch a happy change arrived. He then deſires them to conſider that they wanted every thing neceſſary to carry on a war againſt the Romans, to whom the moſt famous nations had been obliged to ſubmit. He preaches paſſive obedience with all the eloquence imaginable, and does not forget to enforce ſome motives borrowed from Religion. "Conſi- "der, ſays he, that tho' you were more powerful "than your enemies, yet you cannot expect ſuc- "ceſs againſt them; for if you obſerve the ſab- "bath religiouſly, you muſt be vanquiſhed on ſuch "a day as your anceſtors were by Pompey, who al- "ways choſe to forward his attacks on a day, when "they durſt not defend themſelves; and if you don't "ſcruple to infringe the law by fighting on a ſab- "bath day, how can you pretend that you take up "arms only to maintain your Laws and your Reli- "gion? And how can you hope for God's favour, "at the ſame time that you highly provoke him, by "voluntarily diſobeying his commandments? A war "muſt not be undertook without the aſſiſtance ei- "ther of God or men; when both are wanting it "is impoſſible not to be reduced to ſlavery." He then repreſents to them the miſerable condition they will be reduced to if they are vanquiſhed by the Romans, who will burn the city to aſhes, and deſtroy the whole nation with the ſword, that they might become an example to deter other nations from reſiſting the Roman power. He finiſhes his diſcourſe by calling upon the Angels of God as witneſſes of his ſincerity, and ſwearing by every thing ſacred, that he did all what lay in his power to ſave the nation; and concludes with theſe words; "If you will "follow my advice, we will all enjoy a perfect "peace; but if you deſign to follow the inconſide- "rate and furious paſſion, which now tranſports you, "I am reſolved not to expoſe myſelf to thoſe dan- "gers, which you may yet eaſily avoid (6)."

(6) Joſeph. de Bell. Jud. lib. 2. cap. 18.

[F] It was before Agrippa and Bernice, ... that St. Paul pleaded his cauſe.] This incident affords me matter for a few obſervations. I. When St. Paul was accuſed before Feſtus, that Governor expected that the Jews would lay to his charge crimes of a very different nature from thoſe they accuſed him of ☞AGUCCHIO (JOHN BAPTISTA) Archbiſhop of Amaſia in Natolia, was born at Bologna the 20th of November 1570. He had the advantage of being educated under the care of Philip Sega his uncle, who was raiſed on account of his diſtinguiſhed merits to the dignity of a Cardinal by Pope Innocent IX. and of Jerom Agucchio his brother, who was made Cardinal by Pope Clement VIII. in the year 1604. Cardinal Sega had a prodigious love and eſteem for him on account of his genius, and the progreſs which he made in polite Literature [A]; and he carried him with him to France, when he went thither as Legate from the Pope. Agucchio had ſo great a ſhare in the Cardinal's confidence there, that Lanfranc Margotius his Secretary, being jealous of him, deſired to be diſmiſſed his ſervice, and returned to Rome, where he was afterwards made Cardinal by Paul V. (a). After the death of Sega, Agucchio was appointed Secretary to Cardinal Aldobrandini, nephew to Pope Clement VIII, and attended him when he went Legate to Henry IV. of France, of which journey he wrote a very elegant account. After the Cardinal's return he committed the management of his houſe to Agucchio, which province he executed till the death of Pope Clement VIII. and of his brother the Cardinal Agucchio, when his want of health obliged him to retire from the court [B]. But Cardinal Aldobrandini brought him again into his former of (7). He thought perhaps that they would charge him with ſedition and murther (8); but when he heard that the queſtion related only to their Religion, and to Jeſus, which was dead, and Paul affirmed to be living (9), he ſeemed to deſpiſe that affair, and was willing to finiſh it very ſoon by judging St. Paul at Jeruſalem. It is ſurprizing that Feſtus, and eſpecially Agrippa, ſhou'd appear ſo ignorant of what had happened concerning Chriſt, and the Religion which was eſtabliſhing by his Apoſtles. This is a proof that Chriſtianity had not yet made any conſiderable progreſs; and indeed it was only after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem that the Goſpel was propagated amongſt the Gentiles: Till then the Chriſtians did not ſeparate from the Jews, but kept their feaſts and obſerved the ceremonies of the Law. This may be the reaſon why Feſtus and Agrippa were ſo little acquainted with the Chriſtians. II. The charge laid againſt St. Paul was, That "he taught all men every "where againſt the people, the law, and the temple, "and that he had brought Gentiles into the temple, "and had thus polluted the holy place (10). Now in all likelihood this charge was grounded on the doctrine which St. Paul preached, viz. that thoſe who believed in Chriſt were no more under the law, and conſequently not obliged to practiſe its ceremonies, eſpecially circumciſion. And it muſt be obſerved, that St. Paul's Epiſtles to the Romans and to the Galatians were already written when he appeared before Felix, Feſtus and Agrippa (11); and it is well known how much he labours in theſe Epiſtles to diſſuade the Chriſtians from obſerving the law of Moſes. It is therefore a matter of ſurprize, that St. Paul ſhould not ſay a word concerning that charge, neither in his Speech to the people of Ceſarea (12), nor in that before Ananias the High-Prieſt (13), nor in that before Agrippa; in which one would have expected that he ſhould have laid open the whole doctrine of Chriſtianity, in order to convert the King. But to this it may be anſwered, that in order to convince a Jew of the truth of Chriſtianity, it muſt firſt be proved to him, that Chriſt is really ſent by God; for it would ſhock him, if one ſhould begin by diſſuading him from obſerving the law of Moſes; this would only ſerve to give him an invincible prejudice againſt the Goſpel. III. Agrippa ſaid to St. Paul, Almoſt thou perſuadeſt me to be a Chriſtian (14). Now it may be asked what kind of arguments St. Paul employed to perſuade Agrippa of the truth of the Chriſtian Religion. Indeed if Agrippa only intended to ridicule St. Paul, there is no room for ſuch a queſtion; but I am much more inclined to think he ſpoke in earneſt (15). Now St. Paul in his Diſcourſe gives firſt an account of himſelf, and of the manner of his converſion; then of his doctrine, of which he ſays only, that he taught none other things than thoſe which the Prophets and Moſes did ſay ſhould come, that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, and that he ſhould be the firſt who ſhould riſe from the dead, and ſhould ſhew light unto the people and to the Gentiles (16). And for the truth of this he appeals to Agrippa himſelf, and to the knowledge that King had of the ancient Prophets, which he believed (17). It does not appear that St. Paul made uſe of any arguments to convince

(a) Jon. Nic. Erythræ. Pinacotheca Tertia, p. 734. edit. Lipſiæ 1712.

(7) Acts xxv. 18.
(8) See Acts xxi. 38.
(9) Ibid. cap. xxv. 19.
(10) Ibid. xxi. 28.
(11) The Epiſtle to the Romans was written A. C. LVIII, and that to the Galatians about the ſame time, and it was A. C. LX. that St. Paul appeared before Agrippa. See Cleric. Hiſt. Eccleſ. ad Ann. C. LVIII. and LX.
(12) Acts xxii.
(13) Ibid. xxiii.
(14) Chap. xxvi. 28.
(15) Mr. Le Clerc does not determine it. Seu ſerio, ſeu joco, ſays he, Hiſt. Eccleſ. ad Ann. LX. § 5.
(16) Act. xxvi. 22, 23.
(17) Ibid. ver. 26, 27.

Agrippa. How then could he be almoſt perſuaded to become a Chriſtian? If we may be allowed a conjecture, we would ſuppoſe that St. Luke has given us only an abſtract of St. Paul's Diſcourſe, omitting to mention thoſe things, which he had already related before; and it is very probable, that St. Paul gave an account of the Miracles of Chriſt, of thoſe which happened at his Reſurrection, and thoſe performed on the day of Pentecoſt. Nay his anſwer to Feſtus (18) intimates this; The King knows theſe things, ſays he,---for I am perſuaded that none of theſe things are hidden from him. For this thing was not done in a corner. Now this cannot relate to the latter part of St. Paul's Diſcourſe, where he ſpeaks of the Prophecies of the Old Teſtament concerning Chriſt, and can be ſaid only of ſome notorious and public events, ſuch of the miracles which happened at Chriſt's Death and Reſurrection, and thoſe at the time of Pentecoſt. Theſe miracles, we preſume, St. Paul had related, when Agrippa declared himſelf almoſt a Chriſtian. But this is a conjecture, we entirely ſubmit to the judgment of the reader. P.

(18) Verſ. 26.

[A] The progreſs which he made in Polite Literature.] His application to his ſtudies was very early. He ſpent his firſt years, not in the common diverſions and amuſements of children, but in following the nobler purſuits of real and uſeful knowledge, and laying a juſt foundation, upon which he might build all his future improvements in learning When he had paſſed thro' the lower branches of ſcience, he applied himſelf to Logic, in order to attain a clear and diſtinct manner of thinking and reaſoning upon all ſubjects; and then began the ſtudy of Philoſophy and Civil Law; in which latter Science he took his Degrees But after all he was moſt charmed with Polite Literature, in which a man of true taſte finds ſo much ſatisfaction from the variety of elegant and uſeful knowledge, which it affords him, that it ſcarce ever fails to fix the mind, that has once engaged in it. Agucchio gained an exact and perfect knowledge of the Latin and Italian tongues; and wrote in each of them with the utmoſt beauty and propriety. But the learned reader will not be diſpleaſed to hear Nicius Erythræus in his Ciceronian Latin upon this ſubject. Nullam ille ætatis ſuæ partem ſtudiorum labori detraxit, ſed unamquamque habuit in illis extenſam. Primum pueriles annos, non ludis, non æqualium ſtudiis, ſed humaniſſimis politiſſimarum artium literis dedit; & quibus cum exceſſit, ad eos magiſtros venit, qui regulam tradunt, qua vera & falſa judicentur, quæque quibus propoſitis, quæque non ſint, conſequentia, videlicet Dialecticam. Qua arte inſtructus Philoſophiæ & Juris Civilis eſt curſum ingreſſus. Quo confecto, eorum, quibus jus eſt juris civilis publicè interpretandi facultatem dares votis omnibus declaratus eſt juris ejuſdem interpres atque magiſter. Sed pulcherrima elegantium literarum ſpecies ac formæ ejus ad ſe animum magis attraxit, atque arctius ſibi conjunxit. In primis exactam atque perfectam utriuſque linguæ notitiam tenuit, Latinæ nimirum & Etruſcæ, & in unaquaque earum ſcripſit elegantiſſimè (1).

(1) Pinacoth. Tertia, p. 734.

[B] His want of health obliged him to retire from former employment, in which he continued till the Cardinal's death. After which Gregory XV. obliged him to take upon him the office of his Secretary, which he discharged to univerſal ſatisfaction till the death of that Pope, who had determined to have rewarded his ſervices with a Cardinal's Hat. Urban VIII ſent him in the year 1624 Nuncio to Venice, where he gained a general eſteem, though he maintained the rights of the See of Rome with the utmoſt zeal and vigour. The contagious diſtemper which ravaged Italy in 1630, obliged him to retire to Friuli, where he died in 1632. If he had lived a little longer, he would perhaps have been raiſed to ſome of the higheſt dignities of the church. Nicius Erythræus has given us his character [C]. He wrote ſeveral books [D].

from the court.] He obtained leave for that purpoſe, in order to recover his health, which was very much impaired by the fatigues of journeys, and the variety of buſineſs at court, which he had paſſed thro'. But when his health was reſtored by this eaſe and retirement, he reſolved never to return to court, or immerge in the affairs of it, but to apply himſelf entirely to Religion, (for he was then in Orders) and to the purſuits of Learning. For that purpoſe he procured himſelf the acquaintance of all the learned Men, who were then at Rome, and had frequent aſſemblies of them at his houſe, where they indulged themſelves in a free and entertaining converſation. In this manner he lived with the utmoſt ſatisfaction, till he was again forced into public buſineſs (z).

(z) Ibid.

[C] Nicius Erythræus has given us his character.] Agucchio was very famous, ſays he, for his excellent talent, at writing Letters; and he underſtood oeconomy extremely well, ſo that he never injured the tenants or ſervants to enrich the Lord, but always treated them in the beſt manner imaginable without the leaſt detriment to the latter. He ſeemed to be a man of ſome ſeverity, but in common converſation with his friends he ſhewed the utmoſt humanity and gaiety of temper. He was almoſt a perfect maſter in every kind of diſcourſe and converſation; and whatever the ſubject was, he talked of it with all the learning and fluency imaginable; whether it was concerning the State of a Commonwealth, the Duty of a Prince, of Nature, the Vices of men, the Paſſions, Appetites, Moderation, Continence, Hiſtory, Philoſophy, Divinity, I mean that part of it, which relates to Morality; for he was never converſant with the ſubtle and abſtruſe part of it. However he had one fault among all his excellencies, which was, that he never ſhewed generoſity enough in aſſiſting his friends. Magnam in ſcribendis epiſtolis habuit gloriam; œconomus ſummus, ita tamen ut nihil familiaribus, quibus præerat, detraheret, quod dominis adderet, ſed eos ſine dominorum damno largè copioſèque tractabat. Paululum ſeveris moribus videbatur, quamvis in communi amicorum conſuetudine omnem humanitatem amœnitatemque exerceret. Erat in omni genere ſermonis & humanitatis pene perfectus, & de quacunque re, quæ in diſputationem caderet, doctè copioſèque diſſerebat; de repub. de Principis officio, de naturâ, de vitiis hominum, de cupiditatibus, de modo, de continentiâ, de hiſtoriâ, de philoſophiâ, de theologiâ, de eâ, inquam, quæ ad mores pertinet, non autem de eâ, quæ in diſſerendi ſubtilitate verſatur; nam hanc nunquam attigerat. Unum in eo vitium deprehendebatur, quod fidem ac benevolentiam ſuam amicis, ad eos ſublevandos adjuvandoſque non præſtaret.

[D] He wrote ſeveral Books.] A Treatiſe upon Comets and Meteors, The Life of Cardinal Sega, and that of Jerom Agucchio his brother, The Antiquities of the city of Bologna, an Hiſtory in Latin, mentioned by Nicius Erythræus, which he ſays was not then publiſhed, Advice to the Apoſtolical Nuncio's to be obſerved by them in their management of the affairs of the Popes with Kings and Princes, and Diſcourſes concerning the right adminiſtration of a Commonwealth. Theſe two laſt pieces were not publiſhed, when Erithræus wrote his Pinacotheca. T.

☞AGUILLONIUS (FRANCIS) a Jeſuit, was born at Bruſſels in Flanders. He taught Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Doway for ſeveral years, and Divinity at Antwerp, and other Sciences in other Cities. He was Rector of the Jeſuits College at Antwerp. He was very eminent for his knowledge in the Mathematics, and was the firſt who introduced the ſtudy of that Science among the Jeſuits in the Low-Countries. He underſtood ſeveral languages; his judgment was very exact and penetrating, and his learning extenſive. His patience and greatneſs of mind were extremely remarkable [A]. He died at Antwerp the 20th of March 1617, in the fiftieth year of his age. He wrote a book of Optics intitled, Opticorum Lib. VI. Philoſophicis juxta ac Mathematicis utiles, printed at Antwerp by Plantin in 1613 in fol. He was employed in finiſhing his Catoptrics and Dioptrics, when death prevented him (a).

(a) Alegambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societ. Jeſu, p. 112. edit. Antwerp. 1643. in fol.

[A] His patience and greatneſs of mind were extremely remarkable.] Alegambe tells us, that when his brethren of the ſame Order were ſeized with the plague, he ventured, notwithſtanding the imminent danger of ſuch an attempt, to viſit them, and afforded them all the aſſiſtance in his power. He had been afflicted from his youth with a conſtant catarrh and aſthma; and yet he could never be induced to pray for health, reſigning himſelf entirely to Divine Providence; nay he very often deſired that God would add new pains to his former, rather than abate the leaſt of thoſe trials, which he willingly ſuffer'd. Juſt before his death he very frequently repeated theſe words, Let God's will be done; I ſubmit to it; I am willing to form myſelf abſolutely upon the Divine pleaſure. Fiat voluntas Dei; in eâ conquieſco; ad Dei nutum me penitùs fingere volo. And when he was afflicted with the moſt exquiſite pains imaginable, he ſaid very calmly; "I have now the torments, which "I often wiſh'd for, and deſired of God:" Habeo, inquit, cruces, quas ſæpe optavi, atque à Deo poſtulavi (1). Such a reſignation as this is perhaps the moſt difficult of all virtues; pain is generally of too ſevere and inflexible a nature to be abated by the ordinary force of reaſon; and how many Stoics ſoever there may have been in Theory and Speculation, I queſtion there have been but few, who could maintain their principles, when they were put to the trial. However the reflections on religion, and the opinion of the merit of ſubmitting to pain with due reſignation, and the rewards attending it, will have a much greater effect than all the pompous reaſonings of Philoſophy. T.

(1) Alegambe, p. 112.

AGUIRRA. The Bibliotheca of Spaniſh writers give us five or ſix authors of this name. The moſt conſiderable of them I think is MICHAEL DE AGUIRRA, a native of Aſpeitia in the dioceſe of Pampeluna, in the Province of Guipuſcoa. He was a Civilian, and being a member of the College of St. Clement at Boulogna, he wrote in favour of the pretentenſions

tenſions of the King of Spain, Philip II. to the crown of Portugal [A]. He exerciſed the office of Judge in ſeveral courts of the Kingdom of Naples, and afterwards he was choſen a Counſellor in the council of Grenada in Spain. He died in 1588 (a). Thoſe who ſhall undertake to continue the work of Don Nicholas Antonio, will have another Aguirra infinitely more famous to give an account of. I mean JOSEPH SAENZ DE AGUIRRA, a Benedictine, one of the moſt learned men of the ſeventeenth Century. He was Cenſor and Secretary of the Supreme Council of the Inquiſition in Spain, chief Interpreter of the Scriptures in the Univerſity of Salamanca; and he had been more than once Abbot of the College of St. Vincent, when he was honoured with a Cardinal's Hat by Pope Innocent XI. in 1686. He had undertaken a very great work (b), which he proſecuted with the utmoſt diligence even after he was made a Cardinal. Thoſe who would form a juſt idea of it, ought to read the Prodromus, which he publiſhed at Salamanca in 1686 [B]; or, if they have not that, the Abſtracts which the Journaliſts give of it [C]. It was a long while believed that he was the author of a very learned work againſt the deciſions of the Clergy of France in the year 1682 [D]; but at laſt the contrary appeared (c). Theſe conjectures were not without probability, conſidering

(a) Ex Nicol. Antonii Bib. Script. Hiſpaniæ, tom. 2. p. 102.

(b) An edition of all the councils held in Spain.

(c) See the Remark [D].

[A] He wrote in favour of the pretenſions of the King of Spain, Philip II, to the Crown of Portugal.] His Book was printed at Venice in 1581, under the title of Reſponſum pro ſucceſſione regni Portugalliæ pro Philippo Hiſpaniarum Rege, adverſus Bononienſium, Patavinorum, & Peruſinorum collegia; That is, "An Anſwer in defence of the ſucceſſion of the "kingdom of Portugal in Favour of Philip King of "Spain, againſt the opinions of the Univerſities of Bononia, Padua, and Perugia. Beſoldus has inſerted this in his Collection of Councils.

[B] The Prodromus, which he publiſhed at Salamanca in 1686. The title runs thus: Notitia Conciliorum, Hiſpaniæ atque novi orbis, Epiſtolarum Decretalium & aliorum Monumentorum ſacræ antiquitatis ad ipſam ſpectantium, magna ex parte hactenus ineditorum, quorum editio paratur Salamanticæ cum Notis & Diſſertationibus, ſub auſpiciis Catholici Monarchæ Caroli II, ſtudio & vigiliis M. Fr. Joſephi Saenz de Aguirre. Salmanticæ, apud Lucam Perez, Univerſitatis Typographum 1686, in 8vo. That is, "An Account of the Councils of Spain and the new "World, and of the Decretal Epiſtles and other "Monuments of ſacred antiquity, relating to this "ſubject, for the moſt part never yet publiſhed; an "edition of which is now preparing at Salamanca "with Notes and Diſſertations, under the auſpicious "protection of his Catholic Majeſty Charles II, and "by the care and ſtudy of Father Joſeph Saenz de "Aguirra. Printed at Salamanca by Lucas Perez, "Printer to the Univerſity, 1686, in 8vo."

We may obſerve that the Cardinal did not follow in every thing the ſcheme, that he laid down in his project, when he came to execute it. Thoſe, who have not the four volumes in folio, which he publiſhed at Rome under the title of Collectio maxima Conciliorum omnium Hiſpaniæ & novi Orbis &c. i. e. "A large Collection of all the Councils of "Spain and the new World &c." need only read the Abſtracts, which the Journaliſts of Leipſic give us in their Acta Eruditorum in the year 1696.

[C] The Abſtracts which the Journaliſts give of it.] Thoſe of Leipſic give an account of it in their Acta Eruditorum for the month of February 1688. The Abbot de la Roque gave an Extract of it in his Journal of the 13th of January 1687. I am ſurprized that this Journal has not appeared in the editions of Holland. The article, which relates to the work which I ſpeak of, is very curious. There is very good advice ſuggeſted there to the Cardinal de Aguirra, upon his having declared, that he would defend ſeveral of the Decretals as genuine, which have been conſider'd by all learned men as ſpurious.

[D] He was believed to be the author of a very learned work (1), againſt the deciſions of the Clergy of France in the year 1682.] The title is as follows: Tractatus de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ, continens amplam diſcuſſionem declarationis factæ ab illuſtriſſimis Archiepiſcopis & Epiſcopis Pariſiis mandato regio congregatis, anno 1682. Auctore M. C. S. Theologiæ Doctore, Leodii apud Matthiam Hovium, 1684, Superiorum permiſſu. That is, "A Treatiſe concerning "the Liberties of the Gallican Church, containing "an ample diſcuſſion of the declaration made by "the moſt illuſtrious Archbiſhops and Biſhops aſſembled at Paris by the King's command in the year "1682. Written by M. C. S. Doctor of Divinity. "Printed at Liege by Matthew Hovius, 1684. By "the permiſſion of the Superiors." I have read a Preface of Abbot Faydit (2), in which among other things he gives us expectation of a Confutation of the principal maxims of a Treatiſe de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ adverſus quatuor propoſitiones Cleri; i. e. "concerning the Liberties of the Galli-"can Church againſt four propoſitions of the Cler-"gy;" printed at Liege and aſcribed to the Cardinal de Aguirra and to Monſignor Cazzoni. And thus he ſpeaks of it in pag. 184. The author of a Treatiſe de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ, or rather the authors of it, for I underſtand that there were ſeveral engaged in compoſing that piece, and that all the Doctors of Rome exhauſted their whole ſtock of learning upon it, tho' it is a very indifferent work; theſe authors, I ſay, maintain, &c. But let us ſee a little what is ſaid by the author of a Letter from an Abbé to a Prelate of the Court of Rome concerning the Decree of the Inquiſition of the 7th of December 1690, againſt thirty one propoſitions. "We ourſelves "(3) in our aſſemblies, have not even the liberty of propoſing what we judge uſeful for our cauſe. You know "whoſe fault it is. This is the occaſion, that a book, "which ought to have been vigorouſly confuted by "our Divines, and even to have the Epiſcopal Cen-"ſure fix'd upon it, is diſperſed thro' France with "impunity, while thoſe, who are of the ſame opi-"nions propagate it every where, and in their com-"mendations of it boaſt, that no perſon has yet "dared to reply to it. He nam'd immediately "the Treatiſe de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ, in "4to, the author of which is not ſo much unknown, "as ſome imagine. It is a ſhameful thing, continues "he, that the Clergy of France ſuffers without "making any anſwer, that this author, who is a "French Monk, ſhould teach a doctrine, which we "all account as heretical; for he maintains in plain "terms, that we have no divine right for our Epiſ-"copal Juriſdiction." The Anatomy of the Sentence againſt Father Queſnel acquaints us (4), that the Book de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ was compoſed at Rome, at the deſire of the Miniſters of the Holy See, and printed by their order, and under the care of the Inter-Nuncio at Bruſſels, even in Bruſſels itſelf, tho' it was pretended to be done at Liege. But if the Cardinal de Aguirra is not the author of that piece, it is true however that he wrote againſt the Deciſions of the Aſſembly of 1682. The Letter, which I have quoted, aſſures us of this in a manner, which deſerves to be particularly mentioned, that the reader may know what judgment was paſs'd in France concerning the Cardinal's Book. "Our four articles had ſcarce appeared, continues he "(5), when a crowd of writers were alarmed and "begun to oppoſe them; and we could hardly find "one in France, to undertake the defence of them. "I do not mean, that the writings, which were pub-"liſhed againſt them, were any ways formidable. "No, they were moſt of them very weak and "wretchedly performed; yet they did a great "deal of harm in thoſe countries, that were al-"ready diſpoſed to favour the doctrine, which they "defend...

(1) See what is ſaid in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for July 1685, Article 1.

(2) See an extract of a Sermon preached on St. Polycarp's day at St. John's en greve at Paris printed at Liege in 1689.

(3) It is a Biſhop who is repreſented as ſpeaking, p. 59.

(4) Pag. 76, 77.

(5) Lettre d'un Abbé à un Prelat, p. 55, 56.

conſidering his attachment to the doctrines of the Ultramontanians, and the zeal which he ſhewed to prevent the accommodation between the court of Rome and France, which was notwithſtanding concluded in October 1693. The expence which he was at in printing the two volumes of Don Nicholas Antonio, his old friend, is very commendable. I ſhall ſpeak of it in the Article of ANTONIO.

" defend. . . In ſhort, the noble rewards, with which " the Court of Rome knows how to gratify the zeal " of thoſe, who declare for her, give a value and " luſtre even to thoſe works, which are the leaſt " conſiderable and moſt obſcure. Is it not by this " means that the Cardinal de Aguirra was raiſed to " the ſtation he now enjoys from the condition " of a Spaniſh Monk? Was not the Abbé de St. " Gal named to a Biſhoprick, and even deſign- " ed for a Cardinal's Hat (6), as a reward for " the piece, which he wrote againſt the four Arti- " cles, as well as the Cardinal de Aguirra?" Three years before the Letter, from which I have made this Extract, was printed, there was a public complaint (7), that the Penſioners of the Clergy left the Tractatus de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ without any anſwer to it. The Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned tells us (8), that the author of that Treatiſe is a French Prieſt, named Anthony Charlus, a refugee at Rome, on account of the Regale. Perhaps his right name was Charlas; for it is probable he was of the ſame family with a Monk of that name, who was a native of l'Iſle in Jourdain (9), and died in his baniſhment, after having ſuffered many diſgraces on account of the affairs of the Biſhop of Pamiers (10).

(6) He was made a Cardinal in 1696. He was called Sfondrate. He died ſome time after.

(7) In the Sentimens d'Eraſme publiſhed at Cologne in 1688, p. 155.

(8) For the month of May 1696. p. 426.

(9) In the Dioceſe of Toulouſe.

(10) Francis de Caulet.

☞AGUIRRA (JOSEPH SAENZ DE) Mr. Bayle not having completed this Article, we ſhall endeavour to ſupply his defects. He was born the 24th of March 1630, and took the degree of Doctor of Divinity at the Univerſity of Salamanca in 1668, and read Lectures in that faculty for many years. He died at Rome the 19th of Auguſt 1699 (a). His life was very exemplary; and the dignity which he was raiſed to was ſo far from making any change in his natural ſimplicity, that he ſhewed an inſtance of modeſty, which is very uncommon in this age, by retracting in an expreſs piece the doctrine of probability, which he had before maintained, as ſoon as ever he found that it was inconſiſtent with the purity of the Chriſtian morality. His firſt work was intitled, Ludi Salmanticenſes ſive Theologia Florulenta [A], printed in the year 1668. In 1671 he publiſhed three volumes in folio upon Philoſophy, and in 1675 a Commentary upon Ariſtotle's ten books of Ethics. In 1677 he publiſhed another book intitled, A Treatiſe upon the Virtues and Vices, or Diſputations upon Ariſtotle's Moral Philoſophy. In this work he proceeds upon the principles of natural light, but he maintained in it the doctrine of probability, which he afterwards abandoned. He then applied himſelf to the ſtudy of St. Anſelm's works; upon whoſe principles in Divinity he compoſed ſeveral volumes [B]. In 1683 he publiſhed a large book againſt the Declaration of the Aſſembly of the French Clergy made in 1682, concerning the Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Power, under the title of, A Defence of the See of St. Peter [C]. Mr. Du Pin has objected to his Collection of the Councils of Spain [D]. Aguirra propoſed to have publiſhed ſeveral other works [E].

(a) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 18. p. 248. edit. Amſterd. 1711.

☞AHAB

[A] Intitled Ludi Salmanticenses, ſive Theologia Florulenta.] Theſe are Diſſertations, which he wrote, according to the cuſtom of the Univerſity of Salamanca, before he received his degree of Doctor of Divinity there. He treats in his Book of good and bad Angels, and has enliven'd his ſubject with a variety of curious Learning. However he has paſt a cenſure upon it in his laſt edition of the Divinity of St. Anſelm; which is to this purpoſe; that he had given extravagant commendations to ſome perſons; that he had expreſſed ſome things in a manner, which was not grave and ſerious enough; that he had given too much weight and authority to the opinion of a ſingle Doctor, who was however a man of great piety and learning; and that he had quoted ſeveral ſuppoſititious Hiſtorians under the names of Dexter, Maximus, Luitprand, and Julian de Perez (1).

(1) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

[B] Several Volumes.] In the year 1679 and the two following he printed at Salamanca his Divinity upon the principles of St. Anſelm, which he afterwards enlarged and publiſhed at Rome in three Volumes in folio in 1690. In 1693 and 1694 he fixed chiefly upon St. Anſelm's Monologium, as the moſt conſiderable work, on account of the importance of the ſubject, which contains the whole ſyſtem of doctrines concerning the Nature and Attributes of God. This work treats of two kinds of queſtions. The firſt are thoſe, which are debated in the ſchools by Divines, and in which they maintain different opinions. The others are thoſe points, which are of more importance, and are oppoſed to Atheiſts, Pagans, Jews, Heretics, and Schiſmatics. The Cardinal touches very ſuperficially upon the former in his Commentary; but he examines the latter with the utmoſt accuracy, and confirms what he advances with the authority of Scripture, Councils and Fathers. Beſides the queſtions treated of by St. Anſelm, he propoſes others, which were not introduced into the ſchools till the following ages, but in his examination of them he always quotes ſome paſſage of that Father in order to ſupport the opinion, which he embraces. The firſt volume contains the twenty ſeven firſt chapters of the Monologium; and the other volumes contain the commentaries upon the remaining chapters (2).

(2) Du Pin, ibid. p. 249.

[C] A Defence of the See of St. Peter.] This work was written and printed the ſame year. It was aſſerted by ſome, that this was not compoſed by Aguirra, but by another Doctor of Salamanca; who wrote it at the ſame time, that the Declaration of the French Clergy appeared. But he defended himſelf very vigorouſly againſt that ſuſpicion; and it was this work, which procured him the Cardinal's Hat from Pope Innocent XI, in 1686.

[D] Mr. Du Pin has objected to his Collection of the Councils of Spain.] Having told us, that Aguirra has inſerted into his Collection not only the Acts of the Councils, but likewiſe ſeveral ancient pieces, and added to them a great many Diſſertations of his own; he then complains, that ſeveral of theſe Diſſertations are written in defence of the ſpurious Decretals of the firſt Popes. It is an aſtoniſhing thing, continues Mr. Du Pin, that he ſhould not rectify that error, but ſhould undertake the defence of a cauſe, which will not poſſibly admit of any. But he ſeems to have been a man of much greater application and reading, than clearneſs of judgment and juſt knowledge of criticiſm. Mr. Bayle (3) has obſerved, that he declared in his Prodromus his reſolution to maintain the authority of thoſe Decretals.

(3) Note [B].

[E] Propoſed to have publiſh'd ſeveral other works.] Particularly a fourth volume of the Divinity of St. Anſelm; a ſecond volume of the Ludi Salmanticenſes, ☞AHAB the ſon of Omri King of Iſrael, ſucceeded his father A. M. 3086 (a). He ſurpaſſed all his predeceſſors in impiety and wickedneſs (b). He married Jezebel daughter of Ethbaal King of the Zidonians [A], who induced him to commit idolatry, and worſhip Baal (c). God being provoked by his crimes, ſent Elijah to him, to declare, that the Land ſhould not be watered with rain or dew for three years; the Prophet having denounced this judgment, departed, for fear that Ahab or Jezebel ſhould put him to death. This drought had continued three years, when Ahab ſent Obadiah, the Governor of his houſe, to ſeek for ſome water or paſturage, leſt all the cattle ſhould periſh (d). He was met by Elijah, who ordered him to go and tell Ahab that he was there. When Ahab came he reproached the Prophet in very ſtrong terms, who replied with equal ſeverity, and ordered him to ſend for all the people to Mount Carmel, together with the Prophets of Baal and the Prophets of the Groves [B]. When they were aſſembled, Elijah cauſed fire to deſcend from heaven, and conſume the ſacrifice. After this he obtained rain from God, and the earth was reſtored to its former fertility. This happened A. M. 3096, before Chriſt 904, and before the Vulgar Æra 908. Six years after this Ben-hadad King of Syria, with thirty two Kings [C], came and beſieged Samaria (e). He ſent Embaſſadors into the city to tell him, that whatever he had which was valuable, and his wives and his children, were his own right [D], which claim Ahab agreed to; but Ben-hadad having ſent again to acquaint him, that he ſhould deliver up the next day whatever he thought proper, whether it belonged to his ſubjects or himſelf, Ahab called the Elders together, who adviſed him not to pay any regard to that demand. The Embaſſadors returned, and informed Ben-hadad of this reſolution, who was highly enraged at it [E]. In this exigence came a Prophet to Ahab to aſſure him, that God would deliver the enemies into his hands, by

(a) See Calmet's Dict. de la Bible, tom. 1. p. 43. edit. 2d de Geneve 1730.

(b) 1 Kings xvi. 30.

(c) Ibid. 31.

(d) C. xviii. 5.

(e) C. xx. 1.

ſes, ſive Theologia Florulenta; a volume of Letters written to Princes and Men of Learning; two volumes of Miſcellaneous Works; an Apology deſigned to ſhew, that John Gerſon Abbot of the Benedictin Order is the true author of the four books of the Imitation of Jeſus Chriſt, aſcribed to Thomas a Kempis, and of St. Anſelm's Prayers with Notes.

T.

[A] He married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, King of the Zidonians.] This aggravated all the other crimes of Ahab; tho' other Kings before him had married ſtrange women, yet they had obliged them, it is ſaid, to paſs thro' ſome formalities, and to embrace the Jewiſh Religion. But Ahab never laid this obligation upon Jezebel. In ſhort, the event ſhewed, that all the crimes which he had been guilty of were inconſiderable in compariſon of this. She was a woman of a turbulent and bold diſpoſition, and infinitely attached to her idolatrous worſhip (1). Her cruelty was exceſſive and unbounded. Impiety, and every other vice, not only found a protection in her, but even rewards and honours. In ſhort her name became a Proverb, to denote an haughty, impious and cruel woman (2). Grotius compares her to Tullia the wife of Tarquin, Fulvia the wife of Mark Anthony, and Eudoxia the wife of Arcadius. Ethbaal, her father, was King of the Sidonians, or rather the Tyrians; for the Kings of Tyre were probably at that time Lords of all the country of the Sidonians, and even of the city of Sidon. Solomon ſpeaks of the Sidonians as ſubject to the King of Tyre (3). Joſephus (4) ſays, that he was King of the Tyrians and Sidonians; and calls him Ithobal; Ἰθοβάλῳ τῷ Τυρίων καὶ Σιδωνίων Βασιλέως. This King was not unknown to the Pagan Writers. Menander the Hiſtorian, quoted by Joſephus (5), calls him Ithobalus (6); and informs us (7), that under this Prince "there was a prodigi-" ous drought in the country, from the month Hy-" perberetæus to the ſame month the year following; " but upon his humble prayer to God an exceeding " ſtorm of thunder followed." This is probably the ſame with the drought of three years continuance mentioned in Scripture, which happen'd under Ahab, who married Ethbaal's daughter (8).

(1) Joſeph. Antiq. Jud. lib. 8. c. 13. § 1. pag. 457. edit. Havercamp. 1726.

(2) Rev. ii. 20.

(3) 1 Kings v. 6.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

(5) Contra Apion. l. 1. c. 21.

(6) Ἐθθωβάλος.

(7) Ant. l. 8. c. 13. §. 2.

(8) Calmet, Comment. Litt. in locum.

[B] The Prophets of Baal and the Prophets of the Groves.] There were four hundred and fifty of the former, and four hundred of the latter. Theſe Prophets eat at Jezebel's table; but Mr. le Clerc is of opinion, that they were maintained by her only in ſuch a time of famine, when the people, whom they uſed before to impoſe upon by their pretences, were incapable thro' their neceſſities of ſupporting them by their contributions. This is a ſtrong proof of Jezebel's zealous attachment to idolatry, that ſhe ſhould maintain ſuch a prodigious number of impoſtors. Selden (9) thought that נביאי האשרה (Chabie haaſherah) ſignified perhaps the Prophets of Aſtarte; which perhaps is true, tho' it does not follow, that אשרה was the name of the Goddeſs. It was only the Grove, in which ſhe was perhaps worſhipped by thoſe falſe Prophets. The Prophets of the Grove did not follow thoſe of Baal to mount Carmel; but the reaſon of it is not mentioned in Scripture.

(9) De Diis Syris, Syntagm. II. cap. 2.

[C] Ben-hadad, King of Syria, with thirty two Kings.] Joſephus calls him (10) the Son of Adad (11), and Adad; and the Septuagint the Son of Ader (12). Juſtin from Trogus Pompeius calls him (13) Adores. He was the ſon of another King of Syria of the ſame name, who made an irruption into the land of Iſrael in the reign of Baaſha King of Iſrael, at the requeſt of Aſa King of Judah (14). The thirty two Kings, who attended Ben-hadad, were little Princes of Syria and Arabia, who either were tributary to the King of Damaſcus, or auxiliaries. In that country moſt of the cities had particular Kings of their own. The Septuagint and Joſephus place the account of this war after the Hiſtory of Naboth.

(10) Antiq. l. 8. c. 14. § 1.

(11) Ἀδὰδ's vide.

(12) vide Ἀδὴρ.

(13) L. 36. c. 2.

(14) 1 Kings xv. 18, 19.

[D] Were his own right.] He had no other right to them, than what reſulted from his ſuperior force. Ahab in his Anſwer acknowledged himſelf to be the Vaſſal of Ben-hadad; he was willing to pay the tribute, which ſhould be exacted of him; and he readily put himſelf under his protection. In this manner Paulus Æmilius would have perſuaded Perſeus to reſign himſelf and his kingdom into the hands of the Romans; Ut ſe, ſuaque in fidem & clementiam populi Romani permitteret (15). But there was a very great difference between the manner, in which Ahab underſtood this, and Ben-hadad's pretenſions. The latter wanted to diſpoſe abſolutely of all the goods, perſons and ſubjects that belonged to the King of Iſrael, as if they were his own, as he declared expreſly in his ſecond Embaſſy to Ahab; whereas Ahab ſubmitted only in hopes of obtaining moderate and eaſy conditions, as being merely obliged to pay tribute, and to procure peace by ſome conſiderable preſent (16).

(15) Liv. l. 44.

(16) Grotius, Le Clerc and Calmet in locum.

[E] Highly enraged at it.] He expreſſed his reſentments in a very ſtrong hyperbole; The Gods do ſo unto me and more alſo, if the duſt of Samaria ſhall ſuffice for handfuls for all the people, that follow me (17). The Vulgate Tranſlation has rendered it to the ſame purpoſe; Si ſuffecerit pulvis Samariæ pugillis omnis populi, qui ſequitur me. That is, according to the opinion of ſome interpreters (18), "If "every one of my ſoldiers were to take an hand-"ful of the ground of Samaria, there would not be "any remaining." Or, to repreſent it in a manner ſtill ſtronger (19). "The whole land of the country "would not be ſufficient for my people, if every "one of them were only to take away as much as "would

(17) 1 Kings xxii. 10.

(18) Grot. Jun. Mald. Nat. Mercch.

(19) See Munſter. Quidam in Vatab. Chald. Interpr.

by means of the young men of the Princes of the Provinces [F]. Theſe young men, with the army that followed them, put the Syrians to flight; but Ben-hadad eſcaped on horſeback. The Prophet came again to Ahab to acquaint him, that Ben-hadad would return the year following, who accordingly came to Aphek [G]. The army of the Iſraelites was vaſtly inferior to that of the Syrians, but a Prophet from God aſſured the former of the victory; agreeably to which prediction the latter were abſolutely routed and deſtroyed. Ben-hadad having recourſe to Ahab's clemency, obtained an alliance " would ſtick to his ſhoes." Or perhaps it may be underſtood in this manner. " I will deſtroy Sa-" maria ſo effectually, that I will not leave an hand-" ful of earth in it." To which ſenſe we may apply that paſſage of Ezekiel (20), where the Prophet threatens Tyre with total deſtruction; I will alſo ſcrape her duſt from her, and make her like the top of a rock. But Joſephus has given us a different repreſentation of the ſenſe of theſe words of Ben-hadad; aad tells us, that he threatned, that he could eaſily raiſe terraſſes higher than the walls of Samaria, tho' his ſoldiers ſhould but take every one of them an handful of earth; Ἀπειλῶν ὑψηλότερον τῶν τειχῶν οἷς καταφρονεῖ χῶμα τοῦτοις ἐπεγείρειν αὐτῷ τὴν στρατίαν κατὰ θράκα γῆν λαμβάνουσαν. The Septuagint have given a very extraordinary turn to this paſſage: Εἰ ἐκποιήσει ὀχὸς Σαμαρείας ταῖς ἀλώπεξι, πάσῃ τῷ λαῷ, τοῖς πεζοῖς ἐμοῦ. That is, " The duſt of Samaria ſhall not ſuffice " for the foxes, and all my people, and my foot-ſol-" diers." Which intimates, that the country was not capable of containing his whole army; and if they were to encamp in Samaria, there would not be room even for a fox. The Hebrew word שׁעל, may ſignify a fox, or an hand, or handful (21).

(20) C. xxvi. 4.

(21) See Calmet.

[F] The young men of the Princes of the provinces.] The Vulgate Tranſlation has render'd it, Per pediſſequos Principum provinciarum; that is, " The footmen " of the Princes of the Provinces;" and Mr. le Clerc in his Verſion, Per famulos Præfectorum provinciarum; that is, " The ſervants of the Governors of " the provinces." And in the margin of our Engliſh Tranſlation the word Young-men is tranſlated Servants. The Hebrew Original is equivocal; and may ſignify either the Sons or Servants of the Princes of the provinces. Commentators are divided upon that point. Joſephus calls them the Sons of the Governors, tho' falſely, as Mr le Clerc is of opinion. Others likewiſe ſuppoſe them to have been the Sons of the chief Officers of the King; while many repreſent them as ſervants or footmen to them. However it is certain they were a body of men without any conſiderable ſtrength or experience, and conſequently very little qualified to execute what was expected from them upon that occaſion (22).

(22) Idem.

[G] Who accordingly came to Aphek.] He was induced to undertake this expedition by the perſuaſion of his ſervants, who told him, that becauſe the Gods of the Iſraelites were Gods of the Hills, they had gained the advantage in the former battle; but if he ſhould engage them in the plain, he would undoubtedly prove the Conqueror. We have an inſtance here of the readineſs of mankind to caſt the blame of their ill ſucceſs upon every thing but their own miſconduct. Fortune is charged immediately with their miſcarriages. Ben-hadad's flatterers would not venture to tell him the true cauſe of his misfortune. His pride, injuſtice, and ambition would not have ſuffered him to hear a diſagreeable truth. And therefore his Courtiers being poſſeſſed with a notion, that the world was divided between different Deities, ſome of whom preſided over one place, and others over another, they perſuaded him, the God of the Jews exerciſed his power chiefly in the hills; but if they could be drawn into the plains, their ſupport from their tutelary Deity would immediately fail. That, which might confirm the Syrians in this abſurd opinion, that the God of Iſrael was God of the Hills, was very probably, becauſe his temple, and the moſt ancient and conſiderable of his altars, were placed upon hills. He had given the Law from mount Sinai, and publiſhed it in the Land of Promiſe upon Gerizim and Ebal; the miracle, which had happened not long before upon mount Carmel, was known over the whole country; and in ſhort, the victory over the Syrians at Samaria, which was ſituated upon a mountain, ſeemed to give them ſome plauſible pretence for this opinion. The Heathens acknowledge particular Gods for every people, country, and city. The mountains, woods, ſprings, ſeas and rivers had their Deities; the ſea Neptune, the ſky Jupiter, the ſubterraneous regions Pluto, and the fire Vulcan (23). The Greeks and Romans had the Orcades or Mountain-Nymphs,

(23) Idem.

Fauno ſque, Satyro ſque, & Monticolas Silvanas (24).

(24) Ovid.

That is,

" And Fauns, and Satyrs, and the various train
" Of mountain loving Silvans."

They thought, that theſe Nymphs and Pan, whom they ſtyled ὀρειβάτης, or Mountain Walker, uſed to throw a panic terror into the minds of whole armies: Such was the dread of the Syrians in the former battle, when a prodigious number was put to flight by ſo inconſiderable a body of men. Hence we have accounts of ſeveral nations who worſhiped Mountains; which is not to be underſtood of the groſs and viſible matter of the Mountains, but of the Deity who was thought to inhabit them. Maximus Tyrius in his thirty eighth Diſſertation tells us, that Atlas was a temple and ſtatue to the people who lived round about it. Now Atlas, ſays, is a Mountain, &c. Τοῖς Ἀνθρώποις τούτοις ἱερὸν ἐστὶ καὶ ἄγαλμα ὁ Ἄτλας ὄρος, &c. This intimates, that it was a ſtatue and temple of the Deity which was ſuppoſed to dwell there. He obſerves a little after, that it was a Temple and a God, and an Oath, and a Statue to the Libyans: Λιβύων τοῦτο καὶ ἱερὸν καὶ Θεὸς καὶ ὅρκος καὶ ἄγαλμα. He tells us likewiſe, that the mountain Olympus in the country of the Lycians caſt out fire, not like Ætna, but in a gentle manner; and this fire was to thoſe people a Temple and a Statue. It appears from hence, that they imagine that ſome God reſided in the Mountain, as the Sicilians and Greeks thought that Vulcan dwelt in Ætna. They likewiſe dedicated a Cave to him, which he was ſuppoſed particularly to honour with his preſence, and which Gratius (25) calls Vulcano condicta domus, and addreſſes himſelf to that Deity in this manner:

(25) Cynegetic ver. 433.

Te primum, Vulcane, loci, pacemque precamur,
Incola ſancte, tuam; des ipſis ultima rebus
Auxilia, &c.

That is,

" Thee, Vulcan, firſt, thou dread inhabitant
" Of that moſt ſolemn place, and thy aſſiſtance
" I now invoke to favour my attempts.

Maximus Tyrius adds the Cappadocians to the other nations, who worſhiped Mountains; and Strabo (26) obſerves the ſame of that people. There was alſo a Mountain in Syria called the Face of God, Θεοῦ πρόσωπον. But if we come nearer, as Mr. Le Clerc obſerves, to the country and people, who are mentioned in this Hiſtory, we ſhall find that Mount Carmel was eſteemed a God. Tacitus tells us (27), that Carmel, which is the name of the Mountain and Deity, lies between Judea and Syria: nor did the Jews, according to the tradition of their anceſtors, erect any Statue or Temple to the God, but only an Altar, and appointed a proper worſhip to be paid to him. Veſpaſian ſacrificed there, as we find in Suetonius (28); ſo it is evident the Syrians thought that the Gods, who were worſhiped at Samaria, defended their Mountain. But let us fight againſt them in the plain, and ſurely we ſhall be ſtronger than they. They were for combating not only with their enemies, but even with the Gods themſelves, as Mr. Le Clerc remarks; for the Gods of every nation and city were ſuppoſed to fight for them; ſo that there was no leſs contention between the Deities than between mortals. This is a point well

(26) L. 7. pag. 298. edit. Paris.

(27) L. 2. cap. 78. apud Le Clerc in locum.

(28) C. 5. apud eund.

alliance with him, which provoked God very highly againſt Ahab (f) [H]. This happened A. M. 3104. The year following Ahab being deſirous of purchaſing a vineyard that belonged to Naboth a Jezreelite, for a garden of herbs, and his offer being rejected [I], was extremely uneaſy at the diſappointment. Jezebel diſcovering the cauſe of his uneaſineſs, ſent letters ſealed with the King's ſeal to the Elders of Jezreel, accuſing well known ever ſince the time of Homer. Virgil has a paſſage to the ſame purpoſe (29), in his Deſcription of the Sea-fight at Actium.

(f) Ibid. 35 & ſeq.

(29) Æneid. viii. ver. 698, & ſeq. apud Le Clerc.

Omnigenumque Deûm monſtra & latratur Anubis
Contrà Neptunum & Venerem, contraque Minervam
Tela tenent; ſævit medio in certamine Mavors,
Cælatus ferro, triſteſque ex æthere Diræ,
Et ſciſſâ gaudens vadit Diſcordia pallâ,
Quam cum ſanguineo ſequitur Bellona flagello.
Actius hæc cernens arcum intendebat Apollo
Deſuper; omnis eo terrore Ægyptus & Indi,
Omnis Arabs, omnes vertebant terga Sabæi.

That is,

" Her country Gods the monſtĕrs of the ſky
" Great Neptune, Pallas, and Love's Queen deſie,
" The dog Anubis barks, but barks in vain,
" Nor longer dares oppoſe the Ætherial train.
" Mars in the middle of the ſhining ſhield
" Is graved, and ſtrides along the liquid field.
" The Diræ ſowſe from heav'n, with ſwift deſcent,
" And Diſcord, dy'd in blood, with garments rent,
" Divides the preaſe; her ſteps Bellona treads,
" And ſhakes her iron rod above their heads.
" This ſees Apollo, from his Actian height,
" Pours down his arrows: at whoſe winged flight
" The trembling Indians and Egyptians yield:
" And ſoft Sabæans quit the watry field. Dryden.

[H] Provoked God very highly againſt Ahab.] There is ſomething very remarkable in the manner in which God diſcovered to him his anger on that account. The Scripture tells us, that one of the ſons of the Prophets commanded his neighbour in the word of the Lord to ſmite him; which he refuſing to do, the former aſſured him, that a lion ſhould kill him as ſoon as he went away; and this came to paſs. But the Prophet met with another man, who ſmote him in ſuch a manner, that he was wounded. Upon this he diſguiſed himſelf, with aſhes upon his face, and cried out to the King, as he paſſed by, that a man having committed a priſoner to his cuſtody in the midſt of the battel; on condition that if he let him eſcape, he ſhould forfeit his life or pay a talent of ſilver, while he was employed, the other eſcaped. The King hearing this told him, that his own judgment ſhould ſtand good againſt him. The Prophet immediately diſcovered himſelf to the King, and told him, that ſince he had ſuffered a man, whom God had deſigned for deſtruction, to eſcape, his life and his people ſhould atone for it. It is objected to this Hiſtory, that it ſeems a little cruel, that a man ſhould be puniſhed with a violent death for refuſing to ſtrike the Prophet. In anſwer to this it may be ſaid, that the word, which our Engliſh Tranſlators have render'd ſlay, [a lion ſhall ſlay thee,] is the ſame in the Original with that, which they have tranſlated juſt before ſmite, [ſmite me, I pray thee]; and it ſignifies to wound as well as to kill. The Vulgate and Mr. le Clerc render it percutiet, [percutiet te leo]. But the latter obſerves, that tho' it ſhould ſignify here to kill, yet this puniſhment will not appear to be diſproportionate to the offence, if we conſider that it was a Prophet or one of the ſons of the Prophets who commanded him in the name of the Lord to ſmite him. For tho' it ſeems contrary to humanity and to the laws to wound another perſon, yet he might have underſtood from his being commanded to do this by a Prophet, that God would diſpenſe with thoſe laws upon ſome particular account, and therefore that he might juſtly obey it. For if a Prophet refuſed to obſerve the demands of another Prophet, who elſe could be expected to do it? And if this diſobedience ſhould generally have prevailed among the people, the Jewiſh Religion would have been entirely deſtroyed. Joſephus (30) and other writers (31) tell us, that the Prophet who commanded the other to ſmite him, was Micaiah, who is mentioned afterwards. The wounding of the Prophet was a ſign of what was to happen to Ahab. This is one of thoſe prophetic actions, which expreſs a particular deſign, without the help of words (32). This Prophet concealed himſelf at firſt, that Ahab might anſwer with more freedom; for his deſign was to draw Ahab's condemnation from his own mouth. For that purpoſe he invented a kind of parable, as Nathan did in the caſe of David; and to give the greater probability to it, he procured himſelf to be wounded, and transferred the whole affair to himſelf. But it will be ſaid perhaps, Was Ahab's ſelf-condemnation of ſuch importance, that the Prophet ſhould invent ſuch a method, and even have himſelf wounded, to prevent the King from ſuſpecting him? In anſwer to this it may be urged, that with regard to Ahab indeed it was not neceſſary; but it was of great ſervice with reſpect to the people of Iſrael, that they ſhould know, that God had juſt reaſon for puniſhing Ahab, and that all alliances with the idolatrous Nations, who were perpetual enemies to the Jews, were abſolutely unlawful. Mr. le Clerc obſerves, that from this Hiſtory it appears, that all fictions are not to be condemn'd, but thoſe only, which are uſeleſs or injurious, either at the time when they are publiſhed, or afterwards. This ſtory was invented by the Prophet with all the marks of probability; for he ſhewed his wounds, as if they had been given him by the perſon, who had committed the priſoner to his cuſtody. Ex hac etiam hiſtoria liquere poteſt non omnes fictiones eſſe damnandas, ſed eas tantum, quæ ſunt aut inutiles, aut noxiæ, vel quo tempore proferuntur, vel poſtea. Eſt enim hæc hiſtoria ficta à Prophetâ, & ita ficta, ut nihil ſimilius vero fingi poſſet; cum vulneratum ſeſe oſtenderet, quaſi ab eo, qui captivum fidei ejus commiſerat. With regard to God's anger againſt Ahab for ſparing Ben-hadad, whom he declares he had appointed for utter deſtruction; it is not certain whether the Prophet, who promiſed the victory to him, had commanded him to cut off the Syrians entirely; but ſince they were not of the number of thoſe people, whom God had devoted to abſolute ruin and extermination, it ſeems very reaſonable, that Ahab ſhould have received ſome particular command in that caſe, which perhaps he did. However, as Mr. Le Clerc obſerves, if he had no particular command, he might eaſily have collected from the opinion of that age, and the cuſtom of the Jewiſh Kings, what he ought to have done with regard to an haughty, ambitious and cruel King, and one who was an idolater and contemner of the true God. Ahab's conduct therefore, tho' it ſeemed to carry the appearance of an act of clemency, yet was not really ſo, ſince no mercy is to be ſhewn towards the common plunderers of mankind; who if they are releaſed, become more injurious, as was really the caſe of Ben-hadad. God had given Ahab the victory, and delivered a wicked King into his hands, that he might puniſh him, and not that he might treat him in ſo courteous a manner. Beſides it does not appear, that Ahab was in other reſpects a man of the leaſt humanity; for he ſuffered a great number of Prophets to be put to death by his wife Jezebel. And therefore it is probable, that he had ſome particular reaſon for ſparing Ben-hadad, which was leſs agreeable to the Law of Moſes, and might ariſe from ſome propenſion in him towards idolatry. The judicious Commentator abovementioned obſerves, that if we had a full account of this affair, we might collect a great many things for the clearing of theſe points, which now appear obſcure to us, from the circumſtances, which are omitted in ſuch a ſhort and compendious account. Si plenam haberemus harum rerum hiſtoriam, ex circumſtantiis, in compendiariâ narratione omiſſis, multa colligere poſſemus, quæ nunc nos fugiunt. This remark may juſtly be applied to many other paſſages of Scripture, where the difficulty of accounting for them ariſes undoubtedly from our not being acquainted with all the circumſtances of the affair.

(30) Ant. l. 8.
(31) See Sanct. & Cornel. and Calmet.
(32) Calmet and Grotius.

[I] His offer being rejected.] Naboth had a great averſion to the ſelling of his vineyard. The Lord forbid it me, that I ſhould give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee. There was an expreſs Law of Moſes, that the land ſhould not be ſold for ever (33).

(33) Levit. xxv. 23.

accuſing Naboth of blaſpheming againſt God and the King, and commanding them to put him to death. Theſe orders being executed, Ahab took poſſeſſion of his vineyard. But as he returned from Jezreel to Samaria, Elijah met him and aſſured him from God, that he would inflict him and his family with all imaginable evils, and that he and his wife Jezebel ſhould both die a violent death, attended with all the circumſtances of miſery and infamy. Ahab, ſhocked at this declaration, began to ſhew ſome ſigns of repentance [K]; upon which God told the Prophet, that he would not inflict the evils which he had threatened in his time, but in his ſon's (g). Two years after Jehoſhaphat King of Judah was ſollicited by Ahab to join with him againſt Ben-hadad King of Syria, to which he conſented, but deſired that God might be conſulted upon that affair. The four hundred Prophets who were aſſembled by Ahab [L], promiſed ſucceſs; but Jehoſhaphat importuning him to conſult a Prophet of the Lord, he ſubmitted with great reluctance to ſend for Micaiah the ſon of Imlah [M], who at firſt told him that he ſhould proſper; but being conjured by him to declare the truth, he aſſured him, that he ſaw all Iſrael ſcattered upon the hills, as ſheep that have not a ſhepherd; and that God had permitted a lying ſpirit to enter into Baal's Prophets [N]. Ahab

(g) C. 21.

This Law was ſtill ſubſiſting in Iſrael, notwithſtanding the general depravation of that time. There were always ſome perſons of good characters, ſuch as Naboth, who obſerved exactly the Laws of their Nation. He was not in neceſſity, which was the only caſe, in which the Law permitted the ſale of an inheritance. If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath ſold away ſome of his poſſeſſions, &c. (34). Naboth foreſaw, that if his vineyard was once ſold to the King, and turned into a garden, he ſhould never recover it again, not even at the Jubilee, which was not very exactly obſerved in ſo diſorderly a reign as that of Ahab. St. Ambroſe (35) highly extolls Naboth's zealous regard to the laws of his country and the honour of his fathers. He imagined, that he ſhould caſt a blemiſh upon his own memory and violate the reſpect due to his anceſtors, if he ſhould alienate the inheritance, which he received from them. He thought, that it was by no means proper for a man to heſitate, whether he ſhould regard his character or his intereſt; and therefore he choſe to expoſe his life with honour, than purſue his advantage with ſhame: Maluit periculum cum honeſtate, quam utilitatem cum opprobrio (36).

(34) Ver. 25.

(35) L. 3. Officior.

(36) See Calmet in locum.

[K] Began to ſhew ſome ſigns of repentance.] There is a queſtion among Commentators, whether Ahab's repentance was ſincere. Father Calmet has repreſented the arguments, which are urged on both ſides, in a very clear manner. It is certain from the 29th verſe, that God being touched with his humiliation of himſelf, revoked, at leaſt in part, the ſentence pronounced againſt him, and reſolved not to inflict the puniſhment of his crime upon him, but upon his ſon and his deſcendents. However this does not prevent ſeveral eminent Writers (37) from conſidering his repentance as inſincere. They ſuppoſe, that the fear of puniſhment made Ahab aſſume the outward appearances of a penitent; and tho' God can immediately ſee through all ſuch diſguiſes, yet to ſhew his regard for true repentance, he was even willing in ſome meaſure to reward the appearance of it. Beſides Ahab did not ſhew the reality of his repentance by the proper fruits; he did not deſtroy the idols, renounce his ſuperſtitions, reſtrain Jezebel, reſtore Naboth's vineyard, and by his future good conduct remove the ſhocking imputation of having ſold himſelf to work evil. But Grotius, Le Clerc, and Calmet, allow that his repentance was ſincere for the time, but very imperfect and tranſient; however it procured him an exemption from part of the puniſhment denounced againſt him. And this appears to have been the ſentiment of Tertullian (38), and St. Chryſoſtom (39).

(37) St. Gregor. Homil. x. in Ezechiel. Lyran. Cajetan. Hugo Cardinal. Theodoret. and Procop.

(29) Lib. 4. adverſus Marcionem. c. 10.

(39) Epiſt. ad Theodor. Lapſ.

[L] The four hundred Prophets who were aſſembled by Ahab.] Mr. le Clerc tells us, that theſe profeſſed themſelves to be Prophets of the true God; Qui ſe veri Dei Prophetas profitebantur. From whence, ſays he, it appears, that Elijah was miſtaken, when he ſaid, that he was the only Prophet left alive; for it is not probable, that ſuch a great number ſhouldhave riſen ſince that time, but they might conceal themſelves for fear of Jezebel. But Grotius is of opinion, that they were idolaters, who propheſied in the name of the God of the Amorites: Idolatras, qui nomine Dei Amorræorum vaticinabantur. And this he confirms from Jehoſhaphat's calling for a Prophet of the Lord in oppoſition to them. Father Calmet obſerves, that they were probably the Prophets of the Groves, who did not go with thoſe of Baal and Mount Carmel (40).

(40) 1 Kings xviii. 19 and 22.

[M] He ſubmitted with great reluctance to ſend for Micaiah the ſon of Imlah.] He had a particular reſentment againſt Micaiah, becauſe he never propheſied good things concerning him. This was extremely abſurd in him, for the Prophet only foretels what God has reſolved, whether it be good or evil. But Tyrants are generally of ſuch a temper, that they are averſe to the hearing of the truth, unleſs it agrees with their intereſts or pleaſures. Sed eo ingenio ſunt Tyranni, qui verum audire non poſſunt, niſi cum eorum utilitatibus congruat (41). Thus Agamemnon upbraids Calchas in Homer (42).

(41) Le Clerc, Comment. in 1 Regum, cap. 22. ver. 8.

Μάντι κακῶν, ὐ πώποτ' ἐμοὶ τὸ κρήγυον εἶπας.

That is,

" Prophet of evil things, thy envious tongue,
" Ne'er gave to me a kind propitious anſwer.

(42) Iliad. l. 1. ver. 106.

It was the cuſtom among thoſe people, who undertook no public enterprize without conſulting the Soothſayers, for the Kings to have a ſet of falſe Prophets ready, who uſed by their orders to declare ſucceſs upon their undertakings, in order to poſſeſs their army with greater courage and reſolution. Of this kind were the Aruſpices and Augurs of the Greeks and Romans; whoſe anſwers either ſtruck terror upon the common people, or elſe filled them with hopes. Qu. Curtius has a fine paſſage to this purpoſe (43): Nulla res efficacius multitudinem regit quam ſuperſtitio; alioquin impotens, ſæva, mutabilis; ubi vanâ religione capta eſt, melius Vatibus, quam Ducibus, ſuis paret. That is, " There is nothing " that governs the multitude ſo effectually as ſuper- " ſtition; tho' in other reſpects the people are of " a very unmanagable, cruel, and variable diſpoſition, " yet when they are poſſeſſed by a falſe Religion, " they much more readily obey their Prophets and " Soothſayers, than their Generals." This Hiſtorian gives an inſtance of this immediately after.

(43) L. 4. c. 10. apud Le Clerc ubi ſupra.

[N] That God had permitted a lying ſpirit to enter into Baal's Prophets.] Mr. Le Clerc tells us, that to prevent the ill conſequences that might be drawn from this prophecy, we muſt firſt premiſe this conſideration, that this account of Micaiah is not to be taken in the ſtrict and literal ſenſe, but only that it was a ſymbolical viſion, in which he was ſhewn how it came to paſs that ſo many Prophets propheſied falſely, becauſe they were actuated, not by a ſpirit of truth, but of ſervile flattery. And therefore the circumſtances of this viſion are no more to be urged than thoſe of a parable, which the ſpeaker's deſign is only to be conſidered as ſuch. This opinion may be ſupported by two reaſons: the firſt is, becauſe God is deſcribed here as governing and regulating the affairs of the Jews, not as he really did, but in ſuch a manner as was obvious to the common people, and agreeable to the cuſtom of Kings. For God being ſeated upon his throne, conſulted the good and bad Angels who ſtood round him, concerning the method by which Ahab might be induced to go to Ramoth-Gilead. Various expedients were propoſed, but rejected by Ahab enraged at this freedom of his, ordered him to be confined and treated with the utmoſt ſeverity, till himſelf ſhould return in peace. The two Kings went to Ramoth Gilead, and Ahab adviſed Jehoſhaphat to appear in his uſual robes, but diſguiſed himſelf, becauſe he knew that the King of Syria had given an expreſs command to his ſoldiers to fight only againſt the King of Iſrael; ſo that Jehoſhaphat being in the royal robes, was attacked by the Syrians till they diſcovered their miſtake. But a man having drawn a bow at a venture wounded Ahab, who died in the evening, and was carried to Samaria, where he was buried. His chariot and armour were waſhed in the pool of Samaria, and the dogs licked up his blood, agreeably to the prediction of the Prophet (k). This happened in the year of the world 3107, before Chriſt 893, and before the vulgar Æra 897.

(k) C. 22.

God, till a lying ſpirit offered his aſſiſtance, which was embraced, becauſe it was the moſt adapted to bring about that deſign. No perſon who has juſt notions of Providence can imagine that God governs the world in this manner. The other reaſon why it may be concluded that this was only a ſymbolical viſion of the event, may be taken from the thing itſelf. For the veracity and holineſs of God would not permit him to ſend a lying ſpirit into the Prophets, which they could not poſſibly avoid; for then it would follow that he was the author of error, and the men themſelves would not be in the leaſt criminal or blameable. If thoſe Prophets could not diſtinguiſh between the inſpiration of the Devil and that of God, it was by no means their fault. Add to this, that if ſuch things ever happened that the Prophets of the true God, when they ſpoke ſincerely, and thought themſelves to be inſpired by him, were notwithſtanding deceived by an evil ſpirit, this muſt inevitably weaken the credit and authority of prophecy, both in the minds of the Prophets, who could not diſtinguiſh the true inſpiration from the falſe, and with the people, when they ſaw that the true Prophets, as well as the pretended, ſometimes foretold things which proved falſe, and imagined themſelves to be inſpired, when in reality they were not. Whoever, ſays Mr. Le Clerc, conſiders theſe things and others, which might be urged, will undoubtedly conclude, that this viſion is not to be eſteemed as an account of what was really tranſacted in heaven. Qui hæc aliaque quæ omittimus, apud ſe expendent, facilè, niſi fallor, intelligent hanc viſionem pro re verò apud Deum geſta non eſſe habendam. Father Calmet inclines to the ſame opinion with Mr. Le Clerc; and obſerves, that God adapts himſelf to our capacities, and very often to our prejudices in his revelations to mankind. The Jews conceived God in heaven, as a King in his kingdom; the good and evil ſpirits were conſidered as the inſtruments to execute his deſigns; the one ſtanding on the right hand, and the other on the left. And ſince the Princes of this world very ſeldom do any thing of conſequence without the advice of the chief officers, ſo God is repreſented as deliberating concerning the caſe of Ahab. This without doubt, ſays that learned Commentator, ought not to be taken in a literal ſenſe. We know that God has no occaſion for any foreign advice or aſſiſtance to execute his purpoſes. Who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counſellor? (44) We know likewiſe that the evil Angels do not appear before God, and ſtand at the left hand of his throne in heaven. The Scriptures of the old and new Teſtament inform us, that they fell down from heaven, and are kept in chains of darkneſs (45). However Job (46) repreſents them as appearing in the preſence of God, as Micaiah has done; which ſhews us, that this manner of thinking prevailed not only among the Jews, but even among other nations, which were not ſunk into idolatry. With regard to the Lying-Spirit's entring into the Prophets, Mr. Le Clerc is of opinion, that theſe four hundred Prophets were Prophets of the Lord, or at leaſt Diſciples of the true Prophets, but that they were not inſpired then, becauſe they came with a deſign to flatter Ahab. This diſpoſition of theirs to declare a falſity to that King, rendering them unworthy of any Divine Afflatus, God permitted an evil ſpirit to impoſe upon them, though they might eaſily have diſtinguiſhed his ſuggeſtions from thoſe of God: ſo that they were guilty of two crimes; firſt by inclining to ſuch a baſe inſtance of flattery, and then by raſhly believing the ſuggeſtion of an evil ſpirit. We may obſerve likewiſe, that the words do not ſignify an abſolute command or approbation, but only a permiſſion, by which is ſignified that God did not hinder the evil ſpirit from deceiving the Prophets; and ſuch a direction and management of the circumſtances as was free from any mixture of guilt, and yet had a tendency to promote the end, which God deſigned. Thus Chriſt ſays to Judas (47), That thou doeſt, do quickly, which is far from a proof that he commanded or approved of his crime. So likewiſe God ſays to Iſaiah (48); Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and ſhut their eyes; which was only a prediction of what was to come to paſs. The paſſage which our Engliſh Tranſlators have rendered, The Lord hath put a Lying-Spirit in the mouth of all theſe thy Prophets, is tranſlated by Mr. Le Clerc thus (49): Nunc autem Jehova PASSUS EST eſſe Spiritum Mendacii in ore iſtorum omnium Prophetarum. i. e. "God PERMITTED a Lying-Spirit to be in the mouth "of all theſe Prophets;" and he has proved by ſeveral paſſages of Scripture, as particularly Geneſis xx. 6. Exod. xii. 23. and Pſal. xvi. 10 that the Hebrew word נתן Nathan, very often ſignifies to permit or ſuffer. Rabbi Solomon ſays, that this Lying-Spirit was the ſpirit of Naboth, who came to take his revenge of Ahab (50).

T.

(44) Rom. xi. 34.

(45) Iſ. xl. 12. Luke x. 18. Rev. xii. 9. Epiſt. of Jude ver. 6.

(46) C. i. 6, 9, 12.

(47) John xiii. 27.

(48) Ch. vi. 10.

(49) 1 Kings xxii. 25.

(50) See Grotius and Calmet in locum.

AJAX the ſon of Oileus, was one of the principal Generals that went to the ſiege of Troy. As he was the ſon of a Prince whoſe dominions were very conſiderable and extenſive in the country of the Locrians, he very eaſily fitted out forty ſhips for that famous expedition (a). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral encounters; and it is ſaid, that there are three verſes in the 2d book of the Iliad, which are not Homer's, becauſe they give the ſuperiority to Ajax the ſon of Telamon over this Ajax (b), which is not conſiſtent with what Homer ſays of them in another place (c). It is certain that our Ajax may be compared to any other Prince in the Grecian army (d), with regard to courage, reſolution and ſwiftneſs [A]. As for judgment and conduct, he had no great

(a) Hom. Iliad. lib. 2. ver. 41. in Deſcript.

(b) Scholiaſt. Hom. in Iliad. lib. 2. ver. 35. in Deſcript.

(c) Hom. Iliad. lib. 13. ver. 701.

(d) Philoſ. in Heroic.

[A] Swiftneſs.] Homer generally gives him the epithet of ταχὺς, ſwift (1). The three hands which others give him, ſignify only the activity in battle. A multis Hiſtoricis Græcis tertiam manum dicitur poſt tergum habuiſſe, quod ideo eſt fictum, quia ſic celeriter utebatur in prælio manibus, ut tertiam habere putaretur (2). Several Commentators underſtand theſe words of Horace, & celerem ſequi Ajacem (3), i. e. "and Ajax ſwift to purſue," of this Ajax. Mr. Hofman admits this explication, and confirms it by theſe words of Homer Οἰλῆος ταχὺς υἱός, i. e. "the ſwift ſon of Oileus." I could not imagine what he meant, by confirming by thoſe Greek words what the compiler of his Dictionary had ſaid concerning the Swiftneſs of Ajax: Quod autem ſupra, Ajacem pedibus velocem fuiſſe ſcribit hujuſce Dictionarii compilator, Homerum habet authorem. It appeared ſtrange and incomprehenſible to me, that great pretenſions to thoſe talents. The Poets repreſent him ſo fearleſs and intrepid, that they ſay, even when the Gods fell upon him with all their thunder and ſtorms, they could not conquer his reſolution and boldneſs; ſo that it was much eaſier for them to deſtroy, than to humble him [B]. The action which expoſed him to this reſentment of the Gods was infamous and brutal to the laſt degree. He had raviſhed Caſſandra the daughter of Priam, even in the Temple of Minerva, where ſhe thought to find a ſanctuary. The Greeks themſelves were ſhocked at ſo profane an outrage, and Ulyſſes was of opinion that he ought to be ſtoned to death (e). It appears from ſeveral paſſages in the Antients, that Ajax denied the fact, and offered to clear himſelf of it by oath (f). He confeſſed indeed, that he took that Lady from the Temple of Minerva, and that he forced her from the ſtatue of that Goddeſs which ſhe had embraced (g), but he profeſſed that he did not raviſh her, and that it was Agamemnon who raiſed that falſe report, in order to keep Caſſandra, whom he had ſeized, in his own hands, and whom Ajax reclaimed, as having firſt taken her priſoner. We ſhall ſee in the Remarks how Minerva revenged herſelf for that injury [C]. The body of Ajax was thrown by the waves of the Sea upon the Iſland of Delos, where Thetis buried it [D]. Some (e) Pauſan. lib. 10. p. 347.

(1) See the laſt verſes of the 14th book of the Iliad.

(2) Servius in Æneid. lib. 1, ver. 1.

(3) Horat. Od. xv. l. 1. ver. 19.

(f) Id. ibid. p. 343.

(g) Philoſt. in Heroicis.

that Mr. Hofman ſhould ſpeak of the compiler of his Dictionary as an author diſtinct from himſelf; but at laſt I found the ſolution of this riddle. Mr. Hofman had taken word for word from Mr. Lloyd's Dictionary what I have quoted. In Lloyd the thing has no difficulty, becauſe that author has given his Dictionary only as a ſupplement and correction of that of another writer. There is a vaſt number of obſcurities in Books, which proceed from the ſame cauſe as this of Mr. Hofman. They never take care to alter what ſhould be alter'd, when they abridge, or copy any paſſage of another author (4).

(4) See the Remark (g) of the Article ACHILLEA towards the end.

[B] It was eaſier to deſtroy, than to humble him.] Minerva had tried almoſt every method to puniſh him; ſhe had raiſed a furious ſtorm; he ſaw his ſhip periſh; notwithſtanding which he ſaved himſelf upon a rock.

Καὶ νύ κεν ἔκφυγε κῆρα, Ϲ ἐχθόμενός περ Ἀθήνῃ
Εἰ μὴ ὑπερφίαλον ἔπος ἔκβαλε, Ϲ μέγ' ἀάσθη (5).

(5) Hom. Odyſſ. lib. iv. ver. 502.

" Impious he roar'd defiance to the Gods:
" To his own proweſs all the glory gave.
Pope.

In this dreadful exigence he inſulted the Gods with an horrible blaſphemy, In ſpite of the Gods, ſays he, I will eſcape.

Φῆ ῥ' ἀέκητι Θεῶν φυγέειν μέγα λαῖτμα θαλάσσης (6).

(6) Id. ibid. ver. 504.

" The pow'r defrauding who vouchſaf'd to ſave.
Pope.

Neptune, enraged at this inſolence, ſtruck the rock in two with his trident, ſo that the part upon which Ajax ſtood fell into the ſea. Thus Homer tells us in the 4th Book of his Odyſſey. Quintus Calaber gives a more particular and minute account of it; nay he is ſo prolix, that this paſſage alone would ſhew, that he was no great maſter of Poetry. However he tells us, that Minerva not contented with the thunderbolts which Jupiter gave her, deſired Neptune likewiſe to lend her his ſtorms. The tempeſt was the moſt dreadful that can be imagined: Minerva hurled down her thunder every moment; ſhe ſet Ajax's ſhip on fire, and deſtroyed it immediately. This furious man notwithſtanding ſaved himſelf in the midſt of the tumultuous waves, and upon a rock, where he inſulted the Gods.

Φῆ δὲ Ϲ εἰ μάλα πάντες Ὀλύμπιοι εἰς ἓν ἵκοιτο
Χωόμενοι, Ϲ πᾶσαν ἀναῤῥήσωσι θάλασσαν
Ἐκφυγέειν (7).

(7) Quint. Calaber. lib. 15. ver. 564.

" He boaſts,
" Tho' all the Gods ſhall raiſe the ſtormy main,
" And rage tremendous, they ſhall rage in vain:
" His ſingle power ſhall guard him from the force
" Of their united efforts.

In ſhort, there was no deſtroying him, but by overwhelming him with a mountain, as Enceladus was before. Seneca, in his Tragedy of Agamemnon, agrees in this account: read the firſt Scene of the third Act, where you will ſee the deſcription of a reſiſtance, fierceneſs and reſolution puſh'd to the greateſt extremity. Le Feſtin de Pierre * affords us nothing comparable to it. Our modern Poets would not be ſuffered to carry their fictions ſo far as this upon the ſtage. Thus we have one Latin, and two Greek Poets, who aſcribe the death of Ajax to Neptune; but Virgil and Hyginus (8) give the glory of it to Minerva.

(8) Hygin. cap. 116.

Pallaſne exurere claſſem
Argivûm, atque ipſos potuit ſubmergere ponto,
Unius ob noxam & furias Ajacis Oïlei?
Ipſa Jovis rapidum jaculata è nubibus ignem
Diſjecitque rates, evertitque æquora ventis.
Illum expirantem transfixo pectore flammas
Turbine corripuit, ſcopuloque infixit acuto (9).

(9) Virgil. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 39.

" Cou'd angry Pallas with revengeful ſpleen
" The Grecian Navy burn, and drown the men?
" She for the fault of one offending foe,
" The bolts of Jove himſelf preſum'd to throw:
" With whirlwind from beneath ſhe toſs'd the ſhip
" And bare expoſed the boſom of the deep:
" Then as an eagle gripes the trembling game,
" The wretch yet hiſſing with his father's flame,
" She ſtrongly ſeiz'd, and with a burning wound,
" Transfix'd and naked, on a rock ſhe bound.
Dryden.

[C] How Minerva revenged herſelf for that injury.] See the preceding remark. I ſhall only add here, that the tempeſt, which ſhe raiſed, deſtroyed a great number of ſhips near the rocks of Caphareus, not far from the iſland of Eubœa, now call'd Negrepont. One cannot without the higheſt imprudence, and proceeding upon a falſe principle, condemn the Greek Poets, who repreſent this Goddeſs as puniſhing a whole Nation for the crime of a particular perſon,

Unius ob noxam & furias Ajacis Oïlei;

" For the fault of one offending foe.
Dryden.

Or, as another Poet expreſſes it

Quicquid Oïlides commiſerat, omnibus unus
Peccavit Danais, omnibus ira nocens (10).

(10) Sabin. in Epiſt. Ulyſſ.

The ſenſe is the ſame as in the verſe quoted from Virgil.

Such an objection would prove too much, and might be retorted againſt the Hiſtory of David. It is true, not only in profane, but alſo in the ſacred Writers, that,

Quicquid delirant Reges plectuntur Achivi (11).

(11) Horat. Ep. 2. lib. 1. ver. 14.

" The people ſuffers when the Prince offends.
Creech.

[D] The iſland of Delos, where Thetis buried it.] Lycophron acquaints us with this particular (12), ſince the Commentators have diſcovered his meaning from the midſt of his enigmatical expreſſions. See what Canterus and Meurſius ſay upon this head; but we muſt not truſt them abſolutely, for they are miſtaken in a paſſage of Pauſanias, which they quote to confirm their conjectures. Pauſanias does not ſpeak at all of the tomb of the ſon of Oileus (13); but only of that of Ajax the ſon of Telamon. The criticiſm of Meurſius upon the Greek of Pauſanias

(12) Lycophron ver. 400.

(13) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 34.

* One of Molier's Comedies.

Some authors have reported, that he eſcaped the ſtorm, and returned home again in ſafety [E]. The Locrians had a ſingular veneration for his memory (b). We ſhall give an account in the Article of Caſſandra how they were obliged to expiate his crime. He made a ſerpent fifteen foot long ſo gentle and familiar to him, that it followed him about like a dog, and eat at his table (i).

(b) See the Remark [D] of the Article ACHILLEA.
(i) Philoſt. in Heroicis.

is by no means juſt; he thinks, that inſtead of τὴν ἔσοδον πρὸς τὸ μνῆμα ἐ καλεπὴν ποιῆσαι, it ſhould be read τὴν ἔσοδον πρὸς τὸ μνῆμα οἱ καλεπὴν ποιῆσαι. According to this correction, the Myſian, who ſpoke to Pauſanias, would have ſaid, that the ſea rendered the acceſs of that tomb very difficult; whereas on the contrary he told Pauſanias, that the ſea had occaſion'd them to ſee how large one of the bones of Ajax was. We muſt therefore underſtand it thus, that the ſea having waſh'd away the earth, had render'd that place more eaſy of acceſs, and leſs ſteep, than before, &c.

[E] Some authors have reported, that he eſcaped the ſtorm, and returned home again in ſafety.] Mr. Lloyd quotes theſe words out of Timæus Locrus, Hiſt. Lib. 2. Μετὰ τῆς Τροΐας ἅλωσιν πολλοὶ τῶν Λοκρῶν περὶ τὰς Γηρέας ναυηγησάντων ἀπῴθησαν. οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ σὺν Αἴαντι μόλις ἐς λοκρίδα διεσάθησαν. That is, "After the deſtruction of Troy a great number of the "Locrians were ſhipwreck'd and periſhed upon the "Girean rocks (14); the reſt ſaved themſelves with "Ajax with great difficulty, and returned to their "own country." It is probable, that inſtead of Timæus Locrus, he ſhould have quoted Timæus Tauromenita.

(14) Rocks in the Ægean Sea. See Philoſtratus's Paintings.

(a) See in the Remark [A] of the Article TELAMON the genealogy of Ajax, both on the father's and mother's ſide.
(b) His father was King of that Iſland. He gave 12 ſhips to Ajax. Hom. Iliad lib. 2.
(c) Sophocl. in Ajace. Quint. Calaber lib. 5.

AJAX the ſon of Telamon (a), was, next to Achilles, the moſt valiant General among the Greeks [A] at the ſiege of Troy. He commanded the troops of Salamis (b), and performed a great many noble actions, which we have an account of in the Iliad, in Dictys Cretenſis, Quintus Calaber, and in the 13th book of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, in the ſpeech that he made upon the diſpute concerning the arms of Achilles. He loſt his cauſe, for they were adjudged to Ulyſſes his rival. He was ſo enraged at this, that he immediately became mad (c). He ruſhed furiouſly upon a flock of ſheep, and made great ſlaughter amongſt them, imagining all the while that he was killing thoſe who had offended him, by conteſting the arms of Achilles with him, or aſſigning them to another perſon; but perceiving afterwards that he had only killed the cattle, he became much more furious upon it, and ſtab'd himſelf. It is ſaid, that his madneſs was of great advantage to the beſiegers [B]. He loſt his cauſe, as ſome tell us, not by the votes of the Greek Princes, but by the deciſion of the Trojans, who were aſked, which of them had done their city moſt damage, Ajax or Ulyſſes (d). The foundation of this opinion is expreſly contained in the eleventh book of the Odyſſey. Ajax reſembled Achilles in ſeveral points; he was paſſionate and impatient of contradiction as he was (e), and invulnerable in every part of his body, except one [C]. Whoever

(d) Euſtathius and Scholiaſtes in Odyſſ. lib. 11. Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. in Equit.
(e) Plutarch. Sympoſiac. lib. 1. ſub finem, p. 629. Cicero de Officiis lib. 1. cap. 31.

[A] He was next to Achilles the moſt valiant General among the Greeks.] It is upon the teſtimony of ſeveral Poets that I make this reſtriction.

(1) Homer. Il. lib. 2. ver. 768.

Ἀνδρῶν δ' αὖ μέγ' ἄριστος ἔην Τελαμώνιος Αἴας,
Ὄφρ' Ἀχιλεὺς μήνιεν. (ὃ γὰρ πολὺ φέρτατος ἦεν) (1).

That is,

" Ajax in arms the firſt renown acquir'd,
" While ſtern Achilles in his wrath retir'd
" His was the ſtrength that mortal might exceeds.
Pope.

(2) Pindora Nem. 7.
(3) Sophocles in Ajace.
(4) Horat. Sat 3. lib. 2. ver. 193.

Pindar calls Ajax Κρατίστου, Ἀχιλεος ἄτερ, μάχα (2); i. e. "the moſt valiant in battle except Achilles." Sophocles ſays the ſame (3); and Horace likewiſe, Ajax Heros ab Achille ſecundus (4); i. e. "Ajax, "an Hero next in valour to Achilles." Plutarch relates, as a tradition, which admitted no diſpute, that Ajax was the moſt beautiful and valiant, and of the largeſt ſtature amongſt all the Greeks, next to Achilles (5). Theſe compliments are founded upon the following lines of Homer:

(5) Plutarch. Sympoſiac. l. 9. Quæſt. 5. p. 740. A.
(6) Homer. Od. lib. 11. ver. 549; ſee likewiſe ver. 468.

Αἴαντ' ὀς πάρι μὲν εἶδος πάρι δ' ἔργα τέτυκτο
Τῶν ἄλλων Δαναῶν μετ' ἀμύμονα Πηλεΐωνα (6).

That is,

" With him the ſtrength of war the ſoldiers pride,
" Our ſecond hope to great Achilles dy'd.
Pope.

Plutarch upon this forms an objection againſt Plato, who feigned, that the ſoul of Ajax was but the twentieth, that was enrolled. Τί οὖν (εἶπεν) ὁ δευτεραῖα μὲν ὁ Αἴας καλλὺς καὶ μεγέθυς & ἀνδρείας ἀεὶ φέρεται μετ' ἀμύμονα πηλείωνα? i. e. "What, (ſays he) was not "Ajax always eſteemed next to Achilles in beauty, "ſtature, and valour?" Moreri quotes this paſſage but very erroneouſly; his words are theſe: Plutarch obſerves in his Sympoſiacs or Table-Queſtions, upon what account Plato gave to Ajax's ſoul but the 22*d place after Achilles; tho' he was the firſt in beauty, ſtrength and courage; and he ſhews, that the Philoſopher plaid upon the different ſignification of names.*

[B] His madneſs was of great advantage to the beſiegers.] It would be unreaſonable however to conclude, that true courage has need of ſuch an aid. The advantages that may ſometimes attend a vice, do not alter the nature of the vice. I refer you to this fine paſſage of Cicero. Non deſiderat fortitudo advocatam iracundiam: ſatis eſt inſtructa, parata, armata per ſeſe. Nam iſto modo quidem licet dicere utilem vinolentiam ad fortitudinem, utilem etiam dementiam, quod & inſani & ebrii multa faciunt ſæpe vehementius.

Semper Ajax fortis, fortiſſimus tamen in furore.
Nam facinus fecit maximum, quum Danais inclinantibus
Summam rem perfecit manu, prælium quum reſtituit inſaniens,
Dicamus igitur utilem inſaniam (7).

That is,

" True fortitude has no need of calling anger to its
" aſſiſtance; it is ſufficiently inſtructed, prepared,
" and armed of itſelf. For in that way of reaſoning
" you might ſay, that drunkenneſs and even mad-
" neſs were of uſe to fortitude, becauſe men who " are mad or drunk, do very often things with an " uncommon ſpirit and vigour.

(7) Cicero Tuſcul. lib. 4. cap. 22, & ſeq.

" Ajax was always valiant, always bold;
" But valiant moſt, when madneſs ſeiz'd his brain;
" For then while all the Greeks retir'd in fear,
" He ſingly ſtood the ſhock, renew'd the battle,
" And gain'd the field triumphant: --- Thus ev'n
" madneſs
" Is ſometimes uſeful."

[C] He was invulnerable in every part of his body, except one.] This was the occaſion of that uncommon particular. Hercules, ſeeing Telamon uneaſy for not having children, prayed to Jupiter to give him

Whoever underſtands the leaſt of the antient mythology knows, that the cauſes and circumſtances of his death are told in ſo various a manner, that one deſtroys the other [D]. One of the characters of Ajax was Impiety and Irreligion [E]; not that he denied the Gods a very extenſive power; but he imagined, that as the greateſt cowards might conquer by their aſſiſtance and interpoſition, there was no glory in conquering in ſuch a manner. He would not owe his victory to any thing but his own perſonal courage. It is feign'd, that his ſoul having the liberty of chooſing a body (f) to return into the world with, preferred that of a lion before that of a man, ſuch him a ſon, who ſhould have a skin as hard as that of the Nemean lion, and as much courage likewiſe (8). He ſaw an eagle, as ſoon as he had finiſh'd his prayer, and taking this for a good omen, he promiſed Telamon ſuch a ſon as he had prayed for, and ordered him to give the infant the name of Ajax, from the eagle (9), who had given the lucky preſage. He came again to ſee Telamon, after the birth of Ajax, and taking the child quite naked, he covered him with the skin of the Nemean lion; from thence the body of Ajax became invulnerable, except in that part, which was under the hole in the skin, where Hercules hung his quiver (10). It is not agreed where the part was, that remained untouched; ſome place it under the arm-pit (11), others under the neck (12), others under the ſide (13), others under the breaſt. Tzetzes upon Lycophron is of the laſt opinion; and Ovid ſeems to be of the ſame in the 13th book of the Metamorphoſis, v. 39.

(f) Plato de Repub. lib. 10. pag. 765.

(8) Pindar Iſthmit Ode 6. Apollodor. lib. 3.

(9) The Greeks call an Eagle Αἰετός.

(10) Suidas in Ἀσφαδάσω. Scholiaſt. Sophoc. in Ajacem. Scholiaſt. Homer. in Iliad. lib. 23. and Tzetzes in Lycophron.

(11) Suidas in Ἀσφαδάσω.

(12) Tzetzes; likewiſe the Scholiaſt. Hom. in Iliad. l. 23.

(13) Scholiaſt. Sophoc. in Ajace.

Dixit, & in pectus tum denique vulnera paſſum,
Qua potuit ferro lethalem condidit enſem.

That is,

" He ſaid, and with ſo good a will to die,
" Did to his breaſt the fatal point apply
" It found his heart ———.

[D] The cauſes and circumſtances of his death are told in ſo various a manner, that one deſtroys the other.] For there are ſome authors, who tell us, that he killed himſelf in the fit of madneſs, which ſeized him after he had loſt the cauſe concerning the arms of Achilles. Others ſay, that he had no conteſt with Ulyſſes about theſe arms, but about the Palladium, which was taken at the ſacking of Troy. Theſe two accounts are inconſiſtent, ſince Achilles's arms were adjudged to Ulyſſes before the taking of Troy, and Ajax fell into his madneſs immediately after the cauſe was determined againſt him. However Dictys Cretenſis relates, that Ulyſſes carried the Palladium from Ajax by the judgment of the Chiefs, and that Ajax, tranſported with rage, threatned to kill thoſe, who had done him this injuſtice; but that the next day he was found dead in his tent, run thro' the body with a ſword (14). Ulyſſes being ſuſpected of this murder, and perceiving the general murmurs of the army, embarked immediately, and ſet ſail with all poſſible expedition. Suidas (15) and Cedrenus acknowledge that Ajax and Ulyſſes diſputed the Palladium; but not that the Judges declared in favour either of the one or the other. They tell us, that they parted, before any thing was determined; and that the night following Ajax was found dead. There are ſome, who write, that his engagement with Paris was fatal to himſelf as well as his enemy; he received a wound, of which he died (16), and he killed Paris at the ſame time (17). Others ſay, that the Trojans being advertized by an Oracle, that iron would have no effect upon his body, and that the only way to kill him was by ſmothering him with dirt, took that method to diſpatch him (18).

(14) Dict. Cretenſ. lib. 5.

(15) Suidas in voce παλλάδιον.

(16) Dares Phrygius, and Scholiaſt. Sophoc. in Argument. Ajac.

(17) Dares Phrygius.

(18) Apud Scholiaſt. Sophoc. ib.

[E] One of his characters was impiety and irreligion.] When he was going to the army, his father recommended to him always to join the aſſiſtance of God to his own perſonal courage and valour. Ajax replied, that even cowards themſelves were very often victorious by ſuch an aid as that; but for his part, he ſhould have no regard to it, and that he was aſſured he ſhould be able to conquer without it.

Τέκνον, δορὶ
Βάλλε κραΐειν μὲν, σὺν Θεῷ δ' ἀεὶ κρατεῖν.
Ὁ δ' ὀψικόμπως καὐφρόνως ἠμείψατο,
Πάτερ, Θεοῖς μὲν κἂν ὁ μηδὲν ὢν ὁμοῦ
Κράτος κατθήσαιτ'. Ἐγὼ δ' ἄνευ σέθεν
Κείνων, πέποιθα τοῦτ' ἐπισπάσειν κλέος (19).

(19) Sophoc. in Ajace. p. 80, 81.

That is,

" My ſon, ſays he,
" Be brave, but let thy valour reſt alone
" On God's aſſiſtance; for the conqueſt's his.
" Ajax reply'd with folly and preſumption;
" Even cowards conquer with the aid of God;
" I'll ſeize the glory with my valiant arm,
" Nor wait ſubmiſſive for the aid of heaven.

We find another paſſage very like this in the ſame author;

Εἰ δὲ τὶς Θεῶν βλάπτοι, φύγοιτ' ἂν κἀκ τοῦ κρείσσονα (20).

(20) Ibid. p. 51.

That is,

" When God reſiſts, even cowards ſcape the force
" Of mighty Heroes, and elude the chace.

Minerva once interpoſing to adviſe him, he anſwer'd with indignation; Do not you trouble yourſelf about my conduct; I ſhall give a good account of that; you have nothing to do but to keep your favour and aſſiſtance for the other Greeks (21). Another time ſhe offered to guide his chariot in the battle; but he would not ſuffer her (22). Nay he even defaced the owl, which was engraven in his ſhield (23). He was jealous, it ſeems, leſt that figure ſhould be conſidered as an act of reverence to Minerva, and a mark of his diſtruſt in his own native vigour and abilities. It will be but juſt however to acquaint the reader here, that he is not repreſented ſo irreligious in Homer; for tho' he does not pray to Jupiter himſelf, when he prepares to engage the valiant Hector, yet he deſires others at leaſt to pray for him, either with a low voice, leſt the Trojans ſhould hear him, or louder, if they pleaſed; For, ſays he, I fear no perſon in the world (24). However he cannot upon this account be recommended as a pattern of devotion, as he is in the Commentary upon Alciat's Emblems: Recte Ajax apud Homerum, qui Deos invocat, ſeſe ad arma componens; neque enim putat ſibi felicius rei bene gerendæ auſpicium capere poſſe, quam ab invocatione numinis (25). " Ajax, ſays that " writer, acts very juſtly in Homer, praying to " the Gods, when he is preparing himſelf for the " combat; for he conſidered that there is no better " way of beginning any affair, than with an invoca- " tion of the Deity." This is a falſe repreſentation of the fact; the paſſage in the 17th book of the Iliad, ver. 645, is nothing to the purpoſe. He is not willing that the Trojans ſhould hear the prayers for the ſucceſs of his arms. This may be explained two ways. He was fearful perhaps leſt the Trojans ſhould conſider that invocation of God as a mark of diffidence in his valour; or rather, he was apprehenſive, leſt the Trojans, perceiving the prayers of the Greeks for him, ſhould do ſo likewiſe, and even more ardently for their Hector. The former of theſe two explications makes him guilty of a vanity very injurious to the reverence due to the Gods; the latter ſhews a ſtrong perſuaſion in him of their power and adminiſtration. But to what purpoſe is this, ſince he conſents that they ſhould pray aloud; ſince he conſents, I ſay, through the confidence that he had in his own force and addreſs; in ſhort, becauſe he feared nothing, and did not the leaſt regard whether the Trojans prayed againſt him or not? Is this ſuch an example of devotion as ought to be propoſed by the Commentator upon Alciat? A Gentleman was ſaying the other day, that the Catholick Princes did wrong to put into the Gazettes the pilgrimages to Loretto, the offerings, vows, prayers of forty hours, which they appointed, in order to procure a ſucceſsful campaign; for, as ſoon as the enemy knew this, they would appoint the ſame things among

(21) Ibid. p. 81.

(22) Scholiaſt. Sophoclis.

(23) Idem.

(24) Hom. Iliad. lib. 7. ver. 194.

(25) Comment. in Emblem. 127. Alciati, p. 547.

ſuch an indignation had he conceived againſt mankind for the injuſtice done him in the diſpute concerning the arms of Achilles. We ſhall give ſome account in another place (g) of his poſterity, from whence ſprung the family of Miltiades. The Poets give to Ajax the ſame commendation that the holy Scripture gives to King Saul with regard to his ſtature (b). He has been the ſubject of ſeveral Tragedies, as well Greek as Latin (i). The famous Comedian Æſop refuſed to act that part (k). The Greeks paid great honours to this valiant Captain after his death (l). They erected a noble monument to him upon the Promontory of Rheteum [F]. There are ſeveral wonderful ſtories told concerning this tomb [G]. The error, which Ronſard imagined he had fallen into concerning Ajax [H], was corrected in a new edition of his book.

(g) In the Article of TECMESSA.
(b) See the Remark [G].
(i) Auguſtus began a Tragedy upon this ſubject. See Sueton. in his Life, cap. 85.
(k) Cicero de Officiis lib. 1. cap. 31.
(l) Quint. Calaber, lib. 5. Dictys Cretenſis, lib. 5.

among themſelves, and promiſe ſtill greater gifts to the Saints of both Sexes. It was ſaid in anſwer to this, that this procedure ſhewed the honeſty of thoſe Princes, who were not willing to ſurprize the determinations of heaven; they would not, like Ajax, prevent the adverſe party from knowing their petitions, and cut them off from the means of providing againſt them; for that would have been to have engaged the judgment of heaven, without giving the opportunity of hearing both ſides.

[F] The Greeks erected a noble monument to him upon the promontory of Rhete.] This was one of thoſe, which Alexander deſired to ſee and honour (26). We have ſhewn in another place (27), that there is no reaſon for accuſing Pliny, that he miſtook the true ſituation of this tomb. But if it be certain, that the Greeks erected this monument, what does Horace mean, when he cenſures Agamemnon for having left Ajax unburied?

(26) Diodor. Sic. lib. 17.
(27) In the Remark [K] of the Article ACHILLES.

Cur Ajax heros ab Achille ſecundus
Putreſcit, totus ſervatis clarus Achivis,
Gaudeat ut populus Priami, Priamuſque inhumato,
Per quem tot juvenes patrio caruere ſepulchro (28)?

That is,

" Then why does Ajax, he the ſtout the brave,
" And who ſo oft the Grecian ſhips did ſave,
" Achilles ſecond rot without a grave?
" That joyful Troy and Priam laugh to ſee,
" That he, by whom their youth, that mighty he
" Is now denied himſelf a grave by thee. Creech.

(28) Horat. Sat. 3. lib. 2. ver. 193.

In anſwer to this I obſerve, that the Poet only makes uſe here of one of the incidents in the Tragedy of Ajax; it is that, where Sophocles feigns, that Agamemnon would not conſent, that Ajax ſhould receive the honours of a funeral. At laſt he ſubmitted to the ſtrong importunity of Teucer. Obſerve, that ſome authors tell us, that his body was not burnt, but others aſſert the contrary. Dictys Cretenſis and Quintus Calaber are of the latter opinion; but Philoſtratus is of the former. He tells us, that Chalcas declared, that Religion would not permit thoſe to be burnt, who had killed themſelves (29). You may ſee in the ſame Philoſtratus how the Athenians diſtinguiſhed themſelves in honouring of this Hero. Pauſanias tells us, that one of their tribes bore the name of Ajax (30); and that the honours, which they decreed both to him and to his ſon Euryſaces, were ſtill ſubſiſting (31). The people of Salamis built a temple to him (32). The whole country of Greece invoked him a little before the battle of Salamis (33), and dedicated to him, as part of the firſt-fruits due to the Gods, one of the Ships, which they had taken from the Perſians in that memorable battle (34).

(29) Philoſtrat. in Heroicis.
(30) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 33. Plut. Sympoſ. lib. 1. Quæſt. 10. pag. 628. Herod. l. 5. c. 66.
(31) Pauſan. ib. p. 83.
(32) Id. ibid.
(33) Herod. l. 8. cap. 64.
(34) Id. ibid. cap. 121.

[G] There are ſeveral wonderful ſtories told concerning this tomb.] Ulyſſes being ſhipwreck'd upon the coaſt of Sicily, loſt amongſt other things the arms of Achilles. The ſhield was thrown up by the waves near the tomb of Ajax, and was placed upon it; but the next day it was ſtruck with thunder. Theſe things are related by Ptolomy the ſon of Hepheſtion (35). Pauſanias ſays in general, that the tempeſt caſt up the arms of Achilles upon the tomb of Ajax, after the ſhipwreck of Ulyſſes (36). This ſtory was too fine, and afforded too many moral reflections, not to be taken notice of by the Poets. See in the Anthologia what the Greeks have ſung upon this ſubject (37). Alciat has taken one of his Emblems from it (38). With reſpect to the prodigies and wonders, which made Ajax talk'd of after his death. See Pauſanias in the 34th page of his 1ſt book. I ſhall cloſe this article, with obſerving, that when the waves had half opened the tomb of Ajax, people were curious to look into it, and they ſaw a knee-bone, which was as large as one of the diſcus or quoits, which they uſed anciently to play with in their public games (39). The man, who told this to Pauſanias (40), intimated to him, that he might judge by that how large the ſtature of Ajax was. Homer gives him a very noble one.

(35) Apud Photium, p. 484.
(36) Pauſan. l. 1. p. 34.
(37) Anthol. lib. 1. cap. 22. initio.
(38) In the 28th.
(39) Pauſan. l. 1, p. 34.
(40) See in the Remark [D] of the preceding Article ſome errors with regard to this paſſage of Pauſanias.

Αἶαν᾽ ἠΰς τε μέγας τε
Ἔξοχος Ἀργείων καφαλὴν ἠδ᾽ ἰυρέας ὤμους (41).

That is,

" Broad is his breaſt, his ſhoulders larger ſpread,
" Tho' great, Atrides overtops his head. Pope.

(41) Homer. Iliad. lib. 3. ver. 226.

[H] Ronſard imagined he had fallen into an error concerning Ajax.] He had placed Ajax amongſt thoſe heroes who took Troy; but he altered this in the ſecond edition of his Franciade, being advertiſed by Florens Chriſtianus, that Ajax killed himſelf before the taking of that city (42). It is probable he knew not, that according to ſome authors, this great General did not die till after the deſtruction of Troy; for if he had known that he would have told Florens Chriſtianus, that he was well enough acquainted with what Homer, Sophocles, Ovid, and other writers had related, but that he knew likewiſe what others had writ, and that he choſe rather to conform himſelf to Dictys Cretenſis than to Homer; and thus he would not have been obliged to confeſs an error; a confeſſion very diſagreeable to a Poet, and even to other authors.

AJAX the ſon of Teucer, built a temple to Jupiter in Olbus, a city of Cilicia. The Prieſt of that Temple was Lord of the Country, which was called Trachiotis. Several Tyrants endeavoured to ſeize that country, and to keep it to themſelves, ſo that it became a Theatre of war and contention. After the expulſion of theſe Tyrants, it was called the country of Teucer, and the Prieſthood. Theſe are the names which it had in the time of Strabo, who adds, that the greateſt part of the Prieſts had born the name either of Teucer or Ajax; and that Aba, daughter of Zenophanes, one of the Tyrants, being married into this family, made herſelf miſtreſs of this country, after her father had governed it under the title of Protector. She was confirmed in the poſſeſſion by Mark Anthony and Cleopatra to whom ſhe had paid her court with great addreſs. After her death the country returned to thoſe who were its lawful poſſeſſors. This is all that Strabo gives us an account of (a). We ſhall ſhew from thence that the Supplement of Moreri is full of errors in this Article [A]. The

(a) L. 14. p. m. 462.

[A] The Supplement of Moreri is full of errors in this article.] Having conſidered with myſelf, I find the ſhorteſt way is to tranſcribe the whole article of the Supplement; which is thus: Ajax, the ſon of Teucer, King

The Remark which I ſhall add to it will prove this ſufficiently.

King of Salamis in the Iſle of Cyprus, having ſucceeded his father, dedicated a temple to Jupiter in the city of Olbus. He maintained himſelf in the poſſeſſion of that kingdom againſt ſeveral Princes, who would have made themſelves maſters of it, and left it to his deſcendants, who almoſt all of them bore the name of Ajax or of Teucer, Strabo, l. 14. I obſerve upon this, I. That the reader would be induced to believe from this account, that the city of Olbus was in the Iſle of Cyprus. II. That it is not true that Strabo tells us Ajax ſucceeded his father in the Kingdom of Salamis. The indefatigable Meurſius, who has accurately collected all the names of thoſe who reigned in Cyprus, has not found one of that of Ajax (1). III. That it is falſe, that ſeveral Princes attempted to diſpoſſeſs Ajax of the Kingdom of Salamis. Their efforts were directed againſt Trachiotidis, the patrimony or church lands of Jupiter Olbus in Cilicia; and Strabo does not tell us that they endeavoured to drive out Ajax, or that Ajax ever was poſſeſſed of it. A perſon may build a temple without being Prieſt of it, and without enjoying the eſtate annexed to it. IV. That ſuppoſing Ajax had been at the ſame time Prince and Prieſt of Trachiotidis, yet it would be falſe that he kept the poſſeſſion of it, and left it to his deſcendants. It appears evidently from the account of Strabo, that the ſeries of his lawful ſucceſſors was ſometimes interrupted.

(1) See his Treatiſe de Cypro, l. 2. cap. 7, & ſeq.

AJAX, an Eccleſiaſtic famous for his piety and virtue under the reign of Theodoſius. He had a brother named Zeno, who was remarkable for his merit as well as himſelf. They diſtinguiſhed themſelves upon that account at firſt not in the deſert, but in the city of Gaza, and afterwards entered upon a monaſtic life. They received very often hard uſage, becauſe they maintained couragiouſly the true faith againſt the Pagans. Ajax had married a very beautiful Lady, but it is ſaid he never knew her but three times, from which commerce he had three ſons; after this he ſeparated from her with reſpect to the conjugal embrace, and governed the church of Betolium with great wiſdom. He brought up two of his ſons to the ſtudy of Divinity and Celibacy, and married the third (a).

(a) Sozom. l. 7. cap. 28.

☞AIDAN, a famous Scottiſh Biſhop of the ſeventh Century, was employed by Oſwald King of Northumberland for the converſion of the Engliſh [A] (a). Aidan, at his coming to Oſwald's court, deſired that the Biſhop's See might be removed from York and fixed in Holy-Iſland, which was granted him immediately; and every thing that he ſuggeſted was readily complied with, the King thinking himſelf obliged to be governed by his directions in whatever related to religion. Nay his regard for Chriſtianity was ſo eminent, that Aidan not having a perfect knowledge in the Engliſh tongue, the King was his interpreter, and explained his diſcourſes to his Nobility and Retinue, for as he had lived a long time in Scotland during his baniſhment, he was a perfect maſter of that tongue (b). Aidan being thus ſucceſsful in his employment, ſeveral of his countrymen came in to his aſſiſtance, and preached with great application over all Oſwald's dominions. By this means Chriſtianity made a very conſiderable progreſs; there was a prodigious concourſe of people to hear their diſcourſes; and churches were built in ſeveral places; lands were granted by the King for the ſupport of monaſteries, and a great many of the Engliſh put themſelves under the diſcipline of thoſe religious ſocieties. This manner of living was probably recommended to them by the Scottiſh Miſſionaries, who were moſt of them Monks, and particularly Aidan himſelf, who was of that order, and belonged to the monaſtery of Hii or Jona, which had a juriſdiction over the reſt belonging to the Scots and Picts. Aidan's behaviour in this employment was very pious and exemplary [B], and had a great influence upon King

(a) Beda, Eccleſ. Hiſt. Gentis Anglor. l. 3. c. 3.

(b) Idem, ibid. See Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great Britain, Vol. 1. Book 2. Cent. 7. p. 37. edit. 1708.

[A] Employed by Oſwald King of Northumberland for the converſion of the Engliſh.] This Prince being a man of great piety, and zealouſly attached to the belief of the Chriſtian Religion, was reſolved to uſe all poſſible methods to reduce his ſubjects from their paganiſm and idolatry. To this purpoſe he ſent to Scotland, whither he had been formerly baniſhed, to deſire that ſome man of character and learning might come and inſtruct his ſubjects. The Scotiſh Clergy diſpatched a miſſionary immediately; but he being a man of a rough and ſevere temper proved diſagreeable to the Engliſh, and made no manner of impreſſion upon them. And thus finding himſelf unſucceſsful he returned home, and gave an account of his miſſion in a Synod, and told his countrymen, that the Engliſh were an untractable and barbarous people, and therefore it was impoſſible to do them any ſervice. The Synod being ſhocked at this account, began to conſider whether any farther expedient could be tried. Upon this Aidan, who was preſent at the Synod, addreſſed himſelf to the Prieſt who came back from England, and told him, that the method he had taken was not the moſt proper which could be fixed upon; that he had been a little too rigid to his audience, and not accommodated himſelf ſufficiently to their weakneſs and prejudices; that he had not followed the Apoſtle's advice by feeding them with milk at firſt, and propoſing to them eaſy and obvious truths, till they were by degrees enabled to advance to the more perfect and ſublime precepts of God. This diſcourſe of his turned the eyes of every one who was preſent upon him, and they came to this unanimous concluſion, that he deſerved the honour of the Epiſcopal character, and that none was better qualified than he for the inſtruction of unbelievers, Since he was endued with the talent of diſcretion, which is the mother of virtues. Upon this he was immediately conſecrated, and ſent upon the employment. Tunc ait Aidanus, (nam & ipſe concilio intererat) ad eum, de quo agebatur, ſacerdotem; Videtur mihi, frater, quia durior juſto indoctis auditoribus fuiſti, & non eis juxta Apoſtolicam diſciplinam primò lac doctrinæ mollioris porrexiſti, donec paulatim enutriti verbo Dei ad capienda perfectiora, & ad facienda ſublimiora Dei præcepta ſufficerent. Quo audito omnium, qui conſedebant ad ipſum ora & oculi converſi diligenter quid diſceret diſcutiebant, & ipſum eſſe dignum epiſcopatu, ipſum ad erudiendos incredulos & indoctos mitti debere decernunt. Qui gratia diſcretionis, quæ virtutum mater eſt, ante omnia probatur imbutus, ſicque illum ordinantes ad prædicandum miſerunt (1).

(1) Beda, l. 3. c. 5.

[B] Aidan's behaviour in this employment was very pious and exemplary.] He recommended his doctrine by his example, and lived up to the rules, which he propoſed to others. He regarded no ſecular intereſt, and was perfectly indifferent to the common gratification of this life. Whatever the King or any Perſons of fortune preſented him with, he generally gave away to the poor. He travelled every

King Oſwald, who was an excellent Prince [C]. We may obſerve that this King and he were both of the Scottiſh or Britiſh church, and died under that diſtinction [D]. After that Prince was killed in battle, Aidan gained the eſteem of Oſwin the ſon of Oſric of the family of King Edwin, who governed in the diviſion of Deiri, but was at laſt treacherouſly killed in the ninth year of his reign, Anno 651 by King Oſwi, who ſucceeded his brother Oſwald (c). Bede gives a noble character of this King Oſwin, and relates (c) Idem, ibid. c. 14.

every where on foot, unleſs he was obliged by any particular neceſſity to make uſe of an horſe. Whoever he met with, whether rich or poor, he uſed to apply himſelf to them. If they were Pagans, he inſtructed them in the principles of Chriſtianity, and attempted their converſion. If they were Chriſtians, he confirmed them in their faith, and preſſed them to ſhew the reality of it by their charity and good works. He was ſo zealous in Religion, that whoever travelled with him, whether Clergy-men or Laymen, were obliged to ſpend a conſiderable part of their time in reading the Scriptures, or learning of Pſalms by heart. Cujus doctrinam id maximè commendabat omnibus, quod non aliter quam vivebat cum ſuis ipſe docebat. Nihil enim hujus mundi quærere, nil amare curabat. Cuncta quæ ſibi à regibus vel divitibus hujus ſæculi, donabantur, mox pauperibus, qui occurrerent, erogare gaudebat. Diſcurrere per cuncta & urbana & ruſtica loca non equorum dorſo, ſed pedum inceſſu vectus, niſi ſi major forte neceſſitas compuliſſet, ſolebat. Quatenus ubicunque aliquos vel divites vel pauperes incedens aſpexiſſet, confeſtim ad hos diverteni, vel ad fidei ſacramentum, ſi infideles eſſent, invitaret, vel ſi fideles, in ipſa eos fide confortaret, atque ad eleemoſynas bonorumque operum executionem & verbis excitaret & factis. In tantum autem vita illius à noſtri temporis ſegnitiâ diſtabat, ut omnes, qui cum eo incedebant, ſive adtonſi ſive laici meditari deberent, id eſt, aut legendis ſcripturis, aut pſalmis diſcendis operam dare. Hoc erat quotidianum opus illius, & omnium, qui cum eo erant fratrum ubicunque locorum deveniſſent (2). We may obſerve here, that it appears from this paſſage, that the Romiſh Religion was not yet carried to that prodigious exceſs, as it was in the following ages. Men were not then precluded a juſt examination into the nature and grounds of their Religion; the Bible was not eſteemed a dangerous book, or kept under reſtraint, or granted only with faculties and diſpenſations. The Saxon Homilies exhort the people with great earneſtneſs "To the frequent peruſal of the Scriptures, "and inforce this advice from the great benefit of "that exerciſe viz.; that the mind was refined, and "the paſſions purged thereby; that this was the "way to revive their attention to their moſt im-"portant intereſt, and make the apprehenſions of "a future judgment have a due impreſſion upon "them; that as a blind man often ſtumbles in his "motion, ſo thoſe who are unacquainted with the "Word of God, are apt to make falſe ſteps, and "miſcarry (3)." But to reſume Aidan's character; if he happened (which was very ſeldom) to eat with the King, he uſed to carry one or two of his Clergy with him; where after having taken a very moderate repaſt, he withdrew with his company, that they might loſe no time for reading or praying. He had one remarkable quality among the reſt, and that was, never to ſpare a great man upon account of his wealth or quality, but always to reprove with freedom, when occaſion required; neither was it his cuſtom to preſent the rich with any thing, except entertainment, when they came to his houſe. Whatever gifts he received, he beſtowed them either in charity or for the redemption of ſlaves and captives. Nay ſome of thoſe, whom he redeemed, he took under his care and inſtruction, and even raiſed them to the Prieſthood. Et ſi forte eveniſſet (quod tamen rara evenit) ut ad Regis convivium vocaretur, intrabat cum uno Clerico aut duobus, & ubi paululum refici-ebatur, accelerabat ocyus ad legendum cum ſuis, ſive ad orandum egredivit. . . . Nunquam divitibus honoris ſive timoris gratia, ſi qua deliquiſſent, reticebat, ſed aſperâ illos invectione corrigebat. Nullam potentibus ſæculi pecuniam, exceptâ ſolummodo eſcâ, ſi quos hoſpitio ſuſcepiſſet, unquam dare ſolebat. Sed ea potius, quæ ſibi à divitibus donaria pecuniarum largiebantur, vel in uſus pauperum (ut diximus) diſpergebat, vel ad redemptionem eorum, qui injuſtè fuerunt venditi, diſpenſabat. Denique multos, quos precio dato redemerat, redemptos poſtmodum ſuos diſcipulos fecit, atque ad ſacerdotalem uſque gradum erudiendo atque inſtituendo provexit (4).

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Notæ Wheloc. ad cap. 5 l. 3. Bedæ. See Collier, Eccleſ. Hiſt. Vol. 1. l. 2. c. 7. p. 88.

(4) Bed. ubi ſupra.

[C] Who was an excellent Prince.] This King ſucceeded his brother Eanfrid, who had been routed and deſtroyed by Caedwalla, King of the Britons. The latter marched with a very numerous army againſt Oſwald, but was defeated and ſlain at a place called Deniſes-Burn, or the River of Dennis (5). . . Oſwald before the battle begun, was remarkably devout, obliging all the army to fall upon their knees, and pray to God for the ſucceſs of their arms. He likewiſe erected a croſs with his own hands; but without any application to it, or to any of the Saints, as we find from Bede (6); tho' it appears that a ſuperſtitious reverence for it began to prevail then, and this Hiſtorian mentions a miracle, which he ſays was performed by the wood of that croſs. Oſwald's dominions were much larger than any of his predeceſſors; he reigned over the whole iſland, and had the Britons, Picts, Scots, and Engliſh, within his juriſdiction. However we are not to ſuppoſe him ſole Monarch of Great Britain, but only that he received ſome kind of homage or acknowledgment from the other Princes. All this advantage and diſtinction of grandeur did not give him the leaſt tincture of pride, or make him neglectful of the loweſt of his ſubjects. We have a remarkable ſtory of him, that one Eaſter-day, when he and Biſhop Aidan were at dinner together, there was a fine ſilver diſh of meat curiouſly dreſs'd ſet upon the table. They were juſt going to beg a bleſſing, when the King's Almoner came in, and acquainted him, that there were a great many poor people in the ſtreets, who deſired ſome relief from the King. Upon this he immediately ordered the meat ſerv'd up to be given to the poor, and the ſilver diſh to be cut in ſmall pieces, and diſtributed among them. Bede tells us, that Aidan was ſo highly pleaſed with this act of charity, that he took the King by the hand, and ſaid to him, May this hand of yours never periſh; which happened accordingly; for when the King was killed, and his hand and arm were cut off from his body, they remained uncorrupt, and were enchac'd in ſilver, and kept in St. Peter's church in the city of Bebba *. The Hiſtorian obſerves further, that by Oſwald's prudent conduct, the provinces of the Deiri and Bernicii, laid down their ancient animoſities, and were incorporated as it were into one body (7).

(5) Idem, l. 3. c. 1.

(6) L. 3. c. 2.

* Now called Bamborrow in Northumberland.

(7) Id. l. 3. c. 6.

[D] Were both of the Scottiſh or Britiſh church, and died under that diſtinction.] They kept Eaſter differently from the Roman cuſtom, and therefore lived independent of that See; becauſe conformity in that point was inſiſted on by Auguſtin the Monk as a condition of communion, without which the Britiſh, and conſequently thoſe of their opinion were not to be received (8). We may obſerve therefore from Bede's giving ſo great a character of Oſwald and Aidan, notwithſtanding they were not conformable to the Church of Rome, and refuſed to come under the Pope's Patriarchate, or ſubmit to his regulations; that this Hiſtorian, tho' he lived in that Church, did not believe the Pope to be a neceſſary center of communion, or that the reſt of Chriſtendom were indiſpenſably obliged to be ſubject to his orders and authority. Had this been his belief, as Mr. Collier remarks (9), he would never have raiſed Oſwald and Aidan to ſo great a degree of Saintſhip; nor have told us what numbers of converts they made, and how Chriſtianity flouriſhed under them. He would not have recorded their miracles, nor inſiſted ſo much upon the cures which were wrought by the touch of their relicks. Nothing can be more evident, than that, as he thought them eminent for their holineſs upon earth, ſo he made relates a remarkable ſtory concerning him and Aidan [E]. The Biſhop ſurvived that Prince but twelve days, and died the laſt of Auguſt 651 (d). Bede mentions ſeveral miracles performed by our Biſhop; but what credit is to be paid to them, conſidering the ſuperſtition and credulity of that age, muſt be left to the judicious reader to determine.

(8) Id. l. 2. c. 2.

(9) Eccleſ. Hiſt. ver. 1. l. 2. c. 7. p. 91.

(d) Idem, ibid.

not the leaſt queſtion of their being proportionably rewarded in heaven. And thus even in Bede's opinion, a man might live independently of the Pope, and not obſerve the cuſtoms and diſcipline of the Romiſh church, and yet be miraculouſly favoured by God, and eminently happy in the other world.

[E] Bede gives a noble character of this King Oſwin, and relates a remarkable ſtory concerning him and Aidan.] He tells us, that Oſwin was a man of a very graceful perſon, and of an admirable diſpoſition. He was remarkably obliging and condeſcending in his behaviour, and both the rich and poor had a large ſhare in his bounty. As he was thus eminent for the advantages of his perſon and mind, he was univerſally beloved and admired; ſo that Men of the firſt Quality came from all parts of the iſland to his court, and offer'd their ſervice. Among his other excellent qualities, his humility was particularly extraordinary, as appears from the following inſtance. He gave a fine horſe to Aidan the Biſhop; who, tho' he uſed commonly to walk on foot, yet wanted the convenience of an horſe upon ſome occaſions. The Biſhop a little after happening to meet with a poor man upon the road, who begged his charity, diſmounted immediately, and gave him the horſe with all the rich hangings and furniture; for the Biſhop was ſo compaſſionate, that he could not bear the ſight of a poor man without relieving him. The King being informed of this, when the Biſhop came the next time to dine with him, he addreſſed him in this manner: "My Lord Biſhop (10), what "induced you to give away my horſe, which you "ſhould have kept for your ſelf, to a beggar? If "there was a neceſſity of ſetting him on horſeback, "could you not have furniſh'd him with one of "leſs price? or if he wanted any other relief, you "might have ſupplied him in another way, and not "have parted ſo eaſily with the preſent which I made "you." The Biſhop replied; "Your Majeſty ſeems "not fully to have conſidered this affair; for o-"therwiſe I know you'll grant that a Son of God is "to be preferred to the ſon of a Mare." Upon this they went in immediately to dinner. Not long after the King came from hunting, and ſtood by the fire to warm himſelf with his ſervants, and recollecting of a ſudden what the Biſhop had ſaid to him, he took off his ſword, and gave it to his ſervant, and went immediately to the Biſhop, throwing himſelf down at his feet, and deſiring him not to be diſpleas'd at what he had ſaid about the horſe; aſſuring him likewiſe, that he never would ſpeak of it again, or venture to cenſure his charity, or preſcribe the proportion of it. The Biſhop being diſturbed to ſee the King in this poſture, took him up immediately, promiſed him to forgive it entirely, if the King would reſume his former mirth. And now the Biſhop grew melancholly in his turn, and wept extremely; and being ask'd the reaſon by one of his Prieſts in the Scotch language, which was not underſtood by the King and his Attendants, he replied, that he foreſaw Oſwin's life would be very ſhort, "In my life, ſays he, I "never ſaw ſuch an humble Prince before. His "temper is too heavenly to dwell long among us; "for this Nation does not deſerve the bleſſing of "ſuch a Governor." Aidan proved a true Prophet, for the King was killed ſoon after; and Aidan himſelf died about twelve days after, and as Bede expreſſes it (11), received the eternal rewards of his pious labours in heaven. Quem dum presbyter ſuus linguâ patriâ, quam rex & domeſtici ejus non noverant, quare lacrymaretur interrogâſſet. Scio, inquit, quod non multo tempore victurus eſt rex: Nunquam enim vidi antehac humilem regem. Unde animadverto citius illum ex hac vitâ rapiendum. Non enim digna eſt hæc gens talem habere rectorem. Nec multo poſt dira antiſtitis præſagia triſti regis funere, de quo ſupra diximus, impleta ſunt. Sed & ipſe antiſtes Aidan non plus quam duodecimo poſt occiſionem regis, quem amabat, die, id eſt, pridie Kalendarum Septembrium de ſeculo ſublatus, perpetua laborum ſuorum a Domino præmia recepit. T.

(10) Domine Antiſtes.

(11) L. 3. c. 14.

☞AIDAN King of Scotland lived in the latter end of the ſixth Century and in the beginning of the ſeventh (a). He was the ſon of Conran or Goram, who having been murthered by Donald, Aidan was obliged to fly into Ireland with his mother, to eſcape the ſnares of Eugenius III. who had been raiſed to the throne (b). Afterwards under the reign of Conwall [A] Cholumbus (c), a famous Abbot, who was alſo gone into Ireland, returned into Scotland and brought Aidan with him by the King's command, that he might be reſtored to his father's Kingdom; they were ſcarce landed but they heard that Conwall was dead, and that Kinnatill his brother had been elected in his room by the common ſuffrage of the people. It was to be feared this new King would not be pleaſed with Aidan's return; however Cholumbus ſtill thought fit to purſue his journey with the young Prince, and againſt every body's expectation he was very kindly received by the King, who alſo very affectionately embraced Aidan, and told him that he would ſoon be raiſed to the throne, and that a Prince would deſcend from him, who in future times would deliver the Scots from many hardſhips [B]. Kinnatill owned on his death-bed that he then deſigned to abdicate the ſovereign power, and to reſtore the Kingdom to Aidan, but he was prevented by ſickneſs; for on the twentieth day of his reign he was ſeized with a violent quinſey, which obliged him to keep his room; he then left the government of the Kingdom to Aidan; and his ſickneſs being afterwards attended with a high fever he died, having reigned but fourteen months; before his death he ſurrendered the crown to Aidan by Cholumbus's advice, who after Kinnatill's death crowned the new King A. C. 570 (d), and made at the ſame time a fine

(a) Buchan. Rer. Scotic. lib. 5. p. 159. and Calviſius, ad ann. 570, and 604.

(b) A. C. 536. Boët. Hiſt. Scot. lib. 9. fol. 162 verſo, and 163.

(c) The Latin writers of our antient Hiſtory call him Columba, and the French writers Columban; it is from him the Iſland Cholmkill, or Cholemkill takes its name, he having eſtabliſhed a monaſtery there.

(d) Buchan ibid. Calviſ. ibid.

[A] Under the reign of Conwall.] By the Genealogy of Fergusius II (1), it appears that Eugenius III, Conwall, and Kinnatill, who reigned ſucceſſively in Scotland, were firſt-couſins to Aidan; for their father Congall was the brother of Conrad who ſucceeded him, and who was Aidan's father.

(1) Ap. Leſlæum, de Morib. & Reb. Geſt. Scotor. p. 130.

[B] A Prince would deſcend from him, who would deliver the Scotch from many hardſhips.] This Prince was Eugenius IV (2), Aidan's ſon, who indeed did not ſucceed his father immediately, for Kenneth Keir Conwall's ſon was elected after Aidan's death; but this King dying within four months (3) after his election, Eugenius ſucceeded him. It is ſaid that Kenneth himſelf before he died delivered the kingdom to Eugenius, by the conſent of the Nobles. Boetius, who relates this, tells us further, that Aidan having asked Cholumbus which of his children would reign over Scotland, the holy man, being divinely inſpired, and knowing that Aidan's other ſons would be killed in battle, pointed out Eugenius to him (4).

(2) He is alſo by ſome authors called Brudus.

(3) Others ſay, within twelve-months. Buchan. Rer. Scot. lib. 5. p. 160.

(4) Boetius Scot. Hiſt. lib. 9. fol. 171. verſo.

fine ſpeech to him and to the people [C], which being finiſhed the people took the oath of obedience to the King. The firſt memorable action Aidan did after his coronation, was to repreſs the audaciouſneſs of ſome robbers, who ravaged the county of Galloway. He eſtabliſhed afterwards three annual meetings of the chiefs of the nation, who were to aſſemble in the counties of Galloway, Lockquabyr (e) and Caithneſs, to conſult together about the affairs of ſtate, and to adminiſter juſtice among private men. Theſe meetings were not unlike what we now call the Aſſizes (f). Cholumbus was deſired to be preſent at theſe meetings, that he might take care of the affairs of Religion. The whole nation was ſo much the more inclined to obey their pious King, that Cholumbus had told them, this would be highly pleaſing to God. Thus juſtice and equity flouriſhed for ſome time in Scotland under Aidan's government. But this happineſs did not laſt long, for a quarrel ariſing among ſome young Noblemen who were hunting, they committed an horrid murther. The King ſent ſome of his officers to take the murtherers, but they not thinking it ſafe to ſtay in the King's dominions fled to Brudeus King of the Picts. Aidan ſent Embaſſadors to him to demand the criminals, as was uſual in ſuch caſes: But Brudeus out of an unſeaſonable and too great compaſſion for the young Noblemen protracted the affair, and endeavoured to juſtify, or at leaſt to extenuate their crime; this at laſt became the occaſion of the war which broke out between the Scots and the Picts: for Aidan being exaſperated at Brudeus's conduct, who eagerly entreated him to pardon the criminals, and had refuſed to deliver them to his Embaſſadors, ordered his ſubjects to plunder the county of Angus (g), where they killed a great number of people, and came back with a very great booty. The Picts highly offended at this made repriſals, and fell upon the county of Galloway, where they were not behind hand with the Scots. The quarrel came at laſt to an open war; an army was raiſed on both ſides, and the Picts and Scots came to a battel near the county of Galloway; after a great ſlaughter on both ſides, the victory at laſt declared in favour of the Scots. But the joy they could receive from this victory was not to be compared to their grief, when they knew that Arthur the King's eldeſt ſon who commanded the army had been killed. Cholumbus hearing of this war came to Aidan, and reproved him ſeverely for what he had done; he told him, that he began to forget the laws of God, ſince for a very ſlight cauſe, for an injury for which he could eaſily get ſatisfaction, he had entered into a cruel war againſt a nation allied to the Scots; a war, in which ſo many innocent perſons were killed, and many more utterly ruined. He repreſented alſo to him, that unleſs he did immediately repair the injury he had done, he would infallibly draw upon himſelf and his whole family the vengeance of heaven. Aidan terrified at theſe threatnings, and not knowing how to excuſe his conduct, entreated the holy man to tell him in what manner he could atone for his crime. But the man of God would give him no anſwer, and was going away from him; the King endeavoured to detain him, and begged of him not to abandon and leave, without comfort or advice, a man whom he had himſelf raiſed to the throne by God's authority; he confeſſed himſelf guilty, but proteſted at the ſame time that he repented, and promiſed, with ſighs and tears, he would undergo any penance to expiate his crime. The King's ſubmiſſions and penitent heart at laſt moved Cholumbus's compaſſion, and prevailed with him to endeavour to reſtore the peace between the Scots and the Picts. He went to Brudeus King of the latter, and by his prudence concluded or renewed a ſtrict alliance between the two nations. But a new war was kindled again in a little time between them; for Edelfred King of the Northumbrians, who hated the Scots mortally, perſuaded Brudeus to attack them again under pretence that by his laſt treaty with the Scots the latter had not ſufficiently made amends for the injuries they had done the Picts. Edelfred alſo promiſed them, that he would aſſiſt them with all his forces, becauſe he knew that the Scots were always highly incenſed againſt the Saxons. Aidan finding the united forces of the Picts and Saxons would be too hard a match for him, entered into an alliance with the Britons, in which it was ſtipulated, that whenever either of the two nations ſhould be invaded by the Picts and the Saxons, the other ſhould come to its aſſiſtance. The Saxons having heard of this alliance immediately attacked the Britons in order to draw the Scots out of their own country. Aidan (b) came directly with an army to aſſiſt them. Cenlin (i) King of the Weſt-Saxons was then in alliance with Edelfred, and intended to join him with a powerful army, but before he could perform that deſign, the Scots and Britons engaged his army and routed it, having killed a vaſt number of men, amongſt whom was Cuthwin Cenlin's ſon. Aidan would not permit his ſoldiers to purſue the enemy, becauſe Edelfred was near; and indeed he ſhewed his prudence in this, for he was ſoon after obliged to

(e) Or Loquabrea.

(f) Leſlæus, de Moribus, & Reb. Geſtis Scotor. p. 150.

(g) Called Horeſtia by Boëtius, fol. 168. verſo.

(b) Bede calls him Aidanis or Aidanides, ap. Boetium ubi ſupra, fol. 161.

(i) Rapin calls him Ceolin, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 1. liv. 2.

[C] Cholumbus made a fine ſpeech to him (Aidan) and to the people.] He firſt exhorts the Nation to ſubmit to the King, whom under God's Providence they had themſelves elected. He then indirectly tells the King what was his duty, viz. to adminiſter juſtice equally to all his ſubjects, to maintain the public tranquillity, as much as lay in his power; to inſult or provoke none of his neighbours, nor to ſuffer any to injure him unpuniſhed. He afterwards ſhews, how the practice of piety and all Chriſtian virtues both of the King and of his ſubjects will draw upon them the bleſſings of the Almighty; and threatens them with the greateſt miſeries, if they forſake the true Religion, and give themſelves up to wickedneſs; and concludes his diſcourſe with entreating them not to provoke the anger of heaven againſt them by growing proud and inſolent in the enjoyment of their happineſs and proſperity (5).

(5) Boetius, ibid. fol. 167 verſo, and 168.

to fight againſt the united forces of Edelfred and Brudeus, whom Cenlin alſo joined with the remains of his army. In this battle the Scots and Britons were routed, and Aidan would have been killed, if Dongar his third ſon had not expoſed himſelf to the blow which was aimed againſt the King; the young Prince loſt his life in this pious and generous action (k). Rapin gives us a different account of this, as we ſhall ſee in the Remark [D]. Aidan ſoon retrieved the affairs of his Kingdom, by a great victory he gained over the Saxons and the Picts, the circumſtances of which deſerve to be known [E]. It is reported that the whole event of this battle had been revealed by God to Cholumbus, when he prayed for the King and for his people in the monaſtery of Cholumbkill, of which he was Abbot, and that the very moment the Saxons were put to flight, the holy man openly told his brethren that Aidan was conqueror, and that the Saxons were vanquiſhed (l). About eleven years after this victory the Saxons and Picts ravaging that part of Scotland, that bordered upon their reſpective countries, the Britons and Scots agreed to join their forces againſt the common enemy. Aidan, though very much advanced in years, took the field firſt, and having in vain expected the Britons, he plundered the Saxons country. Edelfred taking hold of this opportunity fell upon the Scots when they were diſperſed, and killed a great number of them, though this victory coſt him dear enough; for his brother Theobald was killed in the engagement and ſome regiments (m) were entirely defeated. Aidan took this loſs ſo much to heart, as well as the death of Cholumbus, which happened about the ſame time (n), that he died ſoon after, viz. in the year of Chriſt 606, having reigned twenty ſeven years, according to Boetius (o); but Buchanan ſays (p) he reigned thirty four years, and died A. D. 604 (q). Eugenius his ſon reigned in Scotland after him, though not immediately, as we have ſaid in the Remark [B].

(k) Boet. and Buchan. ubi ſupra.

(l) Boet. ibid.

(m) Cohortes.

(n) Buchan. ubi ſupra, p. 159.

(o) Boet. fol. 171.
(p) Ubi ſupra.
(q) Boetius places the beginning of his reign A. D. 579; but Buchan. places it A. D. 570. in which he is followed by Calviſius.

[D] Rapin gives us a different account of this.] He tells us (6), that the Britons having been formerly obliged to invite the Saxons into their country to aſſiſt them againſt the Scots, they were now under a preſſing neceſſity to implore the help of the Scots againſt the Saxons, and unanimouſly reſolved to ſend Embaſſadors to Aidan King of Scotland, that they might engage him to undertake their defence. They repreſented to him, "that their deſtruction would "infallibly be attended with his own ruin. That the "Saxons had no other view, than to invade the "whole iſland, a great part of which they were al-"ready maſters of. That if once they conquered the "meridional part of it (7), poſſeſſed by the Britons, "the Scots could not expect to enjoy peaceably the "Northern parts, ſince in all likelihood they would "not be treated better than the Picts, who had al-"ready loſt a great deal of their country. They ad-"ded, that the Chief of the Saxons was an active "and ambitious Prince, capable of forming ſuch "projects, that all his neighbours ought to dread "the conſequences of them, if they did not take "care to oppoſe his progreſs in time." The King of Scotland, ſays Rapin, yielded to theſe ſtrong arguments, and met the Britons with a great army to attack the enemy together. Ceolin having notice of his approach, made all the haſte he could to meet him with whatever troops he could aſſemble. But the other Saxon Princes not being very forward to aſſiſt him, his forces were very unequal to thoſe of the Britons and Scots; however he engaged in battle againſt them with great courage, but having diſputed the victory for ſome time, he was at laſt overpowered by the number of his enemies; his army was cut in pieces, and he himſelf narrowly eſcaped being killed. This victory heightened the Britons courage to ſuch a degree, that they already began to think of driving the Saxons entirely out of their country: but they were not in a condition to execute this project. For the Saxon Princes being ſatisfied with ſeeing Ceolin humbled, did not think it for their advantage, to ſuffer the Britons and Scots to reap any benefit from the victory they had gained; and by the powerful and ſpeedy ſuccours they ſent to Ceolin, they ſoon enabled him to form a much greater army, than that he had before; as ſoon as he had drawn his forces together, he went in queſt of the enemy, and in a ſecond battle repaired his former loſs by a compleat victory. Aidan after this defeat retired into his own country. Thus far Rapin. It is eaſy to ſee how much this account differs from that we have given in the text of this article from Boëtius and Buchanan. Rapin does not ſay a word here of Edelfred, of whom he begins to ſpeak only under the year 586 (8), (where he calls him Adelfred,) and he places the battle we have mentioned between the years 578 and 584. We don't know how to make him agree with Boëtius and Buchanan. Such a difference between famous Hiſtorians cannot but introduce ſcepticiſm into Hiſtory. Rapin alſo tells us in a note (9), that ſome ſay Aidan was killed in the battle, and he quotes Buchanan L. v. who is ſo far from ſaying this, that he exactly agrees with Boëtius's account of Aidan.

(6) Hiſt. d'Ang. tom. 1. liv. 1. p. 135.

(7) England.

(8) Pag. 135, 136.

(9) Pag. 136.

[E] A victory . . . the circumſtances of which deſerve to be known.] Edelfred, the next year after the victory he gained over the Scots and Britons, entered with the Picts into Galloway, thinking to make it an eaſy prey, becauſe of the conſternation which the laſt defeat muſt have occaſioned amongſt the people: But Aidan coming upon him unexpectedly drove the plunderers into their camp; and the following night joined the Britons in the narrow valley in Annandale. Edelfred having ſhut up the avenues of that valley with his army, thought the enemy could not eſcape. But Aidan having fortified his camp as tho' he intended to ſtay there, retired with the Britons and Scots at low water, paſſing thro' ſuch places as he knew were fordable, and entered into Cumberland, and afterwards into Northumberland, laying waſte all the country, through which they paſſed. This unexpected retreat forced Edelfred and Brudeus to return into Northumberland in queſt of the enemy; they marched day and night, till at laſt they met them, when a terrible battle enſued; the Britons and Scots at laſt gained the victory, retook the ſpoils which the enemy had taken out of the county of Galloway, and returned it to the owners. Aidan had four Generals in his army beſides himſelf; viz. Conſtantius and Alencrine both Britons, and Calan and Modoc two noble Scots (10). Boëtius ſays, that Cholumbus died the next year after this victory, and that Aidan ſoon followed him; but Buchanan places Aidan's death about eleven years after it (11).

(10) Boet. and Buchan. ubi ſupra.

(11) See the text of this Article, P. marg. quot. (f).

AIGUILLON, a little city in Guienne, upon the confluence of the Lot and Garonne four leagues below Agen [A], was erected into a Duchy and Peerdom in favour of the Duke

[A] Below Agen.] If I had a mind to ſhew between what cities Aiguillon is ſituated, I ſhould not pitch upon Agen and Nerac, as Moreri has done, for theſe three places form a triangle; but I ſhould have taken Agen and Tonneins, the one above, the other below Aiguillon, upon the Garonne. The error, which I object againſt here, is the more conſiderable, as it leads the reader to imagine that Nerac lies upon the ſame river.

Duke of Maienne in the year 1599. The patent was verified in parliament the year following (a); but the poſterity of that Duke faiſing, it was again erected under the reign of Lewis XIII. in 1638 by a patent, which was verified the ſame year (b). Cardinal Richelieu did it in favour of Madam de Combalet his niece, who was afterwards ſo well known by the name of the Ducheſs of Aiguillon. We ſhall ſpeak of her in her proper place (c). She left this Duchy by her will to Mary Magdalen Tereſa de Vignerod her niece, ſiſter to the Duke of Richelieu (d). There is nothing more extraordinary in Hiſtory, than the reſiſtance which the city of Aiguillon [B] made in 1346 againſt the Duke of Normandy, who was afterwards King John. One would be aſhamed to read it now; and our ſoldiers cannot but be extremely ſurprized to find the art of war ſo miſerably defective at that time, in compariſon of what it is at preſent. If the Duke of Normandy, the eldeſt ſon of the King of France, had taken Aiguillon after fourteen months ſiege, he would then have merited a noble triumph upon that account; and yet in our age, ſo inconſiderable a city as that was then, would ſcarce have done any honour to an ordinary Colonel, though he ſhould take it at the firſt attack. The Romans made juſt ſuch a reflection, when they compared the firſt wars of their city [C] with the conqueſts they gained a long time after. Mezerai is very inaccurate in his account of the ſubject which I am ſpeaking of (e). Aiguillon had not entirely the ſame advantage againſt the Engliſh as againſt the Duke of Normandy; for when they beſieged it in 1430 they did not take the caſtle, but only the city, which they plundered (f).

(a) The ſecond of March.
(b) The 19th of May.
(c) In the Article of VIGNEROD (MARY DE).
(d) See L'Etat de la France, tom. 2. p. 88 and 89. edit. 1680.
(e) See the Remark [B].
(f) Darnalt. Antiquitez d'Agen, p. 100.

[B] Nothing is more extraordinary . . . than the reſiſtance of Aiguillon.] Papyrius Maſſon ſays, that this ſiege laſted fourteen months. Acilionem (1) urbem iritâ Joannis poſtea Regis Francorum, & tunc Ducis Normanniæ, quatuordecim menſium obſidione memorabilem (2). The vaſt army of the Duke of Normandy was no leſs conſiderable than the length of the ſiege. This Duke came to Tolouſe in the beginning of January with an hundred thouſand men that bore arms. All this formidable army did nothing for three months but take a few poor villages about Agen, and after that the city of Angoulême; from thence they went to Tonneins, and then began the ſiege of Aiguillon . . . which was ſtrong and well fortified for that age (3). The manner of their attack is another circumſtance, that deſerves to be remarked. In all that age (4), there was no ſiege more conſiderable both for the attack and defence than that of this city. It received three aſſaults every day for a week together; after that they made uſe of their artillery and engines both by land and ſea (5). The following Extract contains both theſe paſſages of Mezerai. I have taken it from Catel. Froiſſard, ſays he, in his 121ſt chapter of his firſt volume writes, that while the Duke of Normandy with an hundred thouſand French was beſieging the city of Aiguillon then held by the Engliſh, he ſent to Tolouſe for eight of the largeſt engines, which were in that city; and when the inhabitants of Aiguillon were upon the point of being attacked, it was agreed by the French Lords, that thoſe of Tolouſe, Carcaſſonne, and Beaucaire ſhould attack them in the morning till noon, and thoſe of Rouergue, Cahors, and Agenois from noon till the evening (6).

Mezerai's telling us, that the three aſſaults a day laſted but one week, is a thing, that no ways anſwers the attention, which he had raiſed in his reader; for what a ſmall matter is one week in fourteen months? There is no doubt therefore, that he has ſuppreſſed the juſt account of thoſe aſſaults. Beſides he has committed an error in Chronology. According to him, the Duke of Normandy arrived at Toulouſe in the month of January 1346; he ſpent three months in taking a few inconſiderable towns; after that he took Angoulême; and then returning towards the Garonne, he took Tonneins, beſieged Aiguillon, and raiſed the ſiege of it, on account of the battle at Creci. That battle was fought the 26th of April 1346. It is not only impoſſible, according to Mezerai's account, that the ſiege of Aiguillon ſhould have laſted fourteen months, but likewiſe that, conſidering the cuſtom of that time, this ſiege could have been very long; and it is very wrong to ſay that the Duke of Normandy was obſtinate in it (7). The arrival of that Prince at Tolouſe muſt be placed in the year 1345.

[C] When they compared the firſt wars of their city &c.] Thus ſpeaks Florus in his florid ſtyle, and full of exclamations. Sora (quis credat) & Algidum terrori fuerunt: Satricum atque Corniculum provinciæ. De Verulis & Bovillis, pudet, ſed triumphavimus. Tibur nunc ſuburbanum, & æſtivæ Præneſte deliciæ, nuncupatis in capitolio votis petebantur. Idem tunc Fæſulæ, quod Carræ nuper; idem nemus Arcinum, quod Hercynius ſaltus; Fregellæ, quod Geſeriacum; Tiberis, quod Euphrates. Coriolus quoque (proh pudor,) victus adeo gloriæ fuit, ut captum oppidum Caius Marcius Coriolanus quaſi Numantiam aut Africam nomen induerit (8). i. e. "Sora, (who would believe it,) and Algidum were a terror to the Romans; Satricum and Corniculum were provinces then. We triumph'd, (tho' it was no very illuſtrious triumph,) over the Veruli and Bovilli. Tibur, which is a ſuburb to the city, and Preneſte, which is our ſummer-retirement, had then prayers and vows put up in the capitol for the conqueſt of them. Fæſulæ was then what Carræ was lately; the Aricinian grove what the Hircynian foreſt now; Fregellæ, what Geſoriacum; the Tiber what the Euphrates. The taking of Coriolus (how inconſiderable an action?) was ſo great an honour then, that Caius Marcius aſſumed the name of Coriolanus, with as much ſatisfaction, as if he had conquered Numantia or Africa." But whatever diſgrace it was for the French not to have been able to take Aiguillon with ſo prodigious an army, and commanded by the King's eldeſt ſon, yet it was a great honour to the Engliſh, to have defended it for ſo long a time.

(1) Baudrand calls it Aguillonium.
(2) Pap. Maſſo, Deſcript. Flumin. Galliæ.
(3) Mezerai, Abreg. Chron. in the year 1346, tom. 3. p. 24. Holland edit. 1673.
(4) It was the 14th Century.
(5) Ibid.
(6) Catel. Memoires pour l'Hiſtoire du Languedoc, p. 563.
(7) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 3. p. 24.
(8) Florus, cap. 11. lib. 1.

☞AILBERT [A] a Frenchman who lived in the ſeventh Century. He went into Ireland to ſtudy Divinity, and ſtaid a good while in that country (a). On his return he paſſed through England, and being at Wincheſter, Cenwald King of Weſſex propoſed to him to ſtay in his dominions, and to inſtruct his ſubjects in the Chriſtian Religion. Ailbert accepted this office, and having been conſecrated a Biſhop, he went to reſide at Dorcheſter: but as he could not learn perfectly the Engliſh tongue, the King who underſtood no other language, grew weary of him, and thought it neceſſary to have (a) Act. Pontif. Cantuar. Auctor. Gervaſio. in Hiſt. Anglic. Script. decem, tom. 2. Col. 1635. ed. a Rog. Twiſden, Lond. 1652.

[A] AILBERT.] Rapin calls him Agilbert, and ſo he is called by Gervaſius and Richard Middleton, Gilbert by Thomas Stubbs; theſe authors ſpeak of him and only by the way. But John Bromton, who gives the largeſt account of him, calls him Ailbert, and ſo does Henry of Huntendon (1), and we thought it proper to follow their example.

(1) See Hiſt. Angl. Scrip. x. Coll. 293, 756, 1635, 1690. and Hiſt. Angl. Script. poſt Bedam, p. 331.

have another Biſhop, who being a native of the country, could ſucceed better in the inſtruction of the people. He choſe therefore one Wine or Wina, who had ſtudied in France, but was born in England. Cenwald divided the Biſhoprick between Ailbert and Wina, leaving the former at Dorcheſter, and fixing the latter at Wincheſter, where the court was kept. Ailbert was highly offended at this, which had been done without his knowledge or advice; and what grieved him more was, his being left in a country-town, whilſt the new Biſhop reſided at court: This obliged him to leave England and retire into France, where he was ſoon made Biſhop of Paris (b). The King having afterwards deprived Wina of his Biſhoprick, ſent again for Ailbert, but he not caring to leave his Biſhoprick ſent Leutherius or Eleutherus his nephew in his ſtead, who was made Biſhop of the whole Kingdom of Weſſex, and governed his Biſhoprick alone for a long time (c). Ailbert came again into England in the year 664, and aſſiſted at the council which was held in the monaſtery of Whitby or Stranelagh, to determine the controverſy concerning the time at which Eaſter was to be celebrated (d). We will give an account of what paſſed in that council in the Remarks [B]. I cannot find when nor where Ailbert died.

(b) Henr. Huntendon. Hiſt. l. 3. In Rer. Angl. Script. poſt Bedam, edit. ab Hen. Savile, An. 1601. p. 331. Joh. Bromton, ap. Rog. Twiſden, ubi ſupra, tom. 1. Col. 736. Rapin, Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 1. l. 3. p. 255.

(c) Joh. Bromton, ubi ſupra.

(d) Rapin ibid.

[B] An account of what paſſed in that Council.] That the reader may not be at a loſs where to find an account of theſe diſputes concerning Eaſter, we'll give here a ſhort hiſtory of them. Theſe diſputes began in the Eaſt about the ſecond Century. The Churches in Aſia celebrated Eaſter on the fourteenth day of the Moon, according to the Law of Moſes, whatever day of the week it was, and ended the faſt on that day. But the Weſtern Churches uſed to faſt to the day of Chriſt's Reſurrection, that is, to the Sunday following. Several councils were held on that ſubject in the Eaſt as well as in the Weſt, but neither party would yield to the other, each maintaining they had tradition on their ſide, which indeed was probable. Thoſe of the Eaſt ſaid the cuſtom they obſerved had been eſtabliſhed by St. John; and thoſe of the Weſt maintained they followed St. Peter's and St. Paul's appointment. Suppoſing the truth of theſe traditions, it was eaſy to conclude from them, that this was a point entirely indifferent, ſince the Apoſtles themſelves did not agree about it. And indeed notwithſtanding this difference the two parties did not divide, but communicated with one another, till Pope Victor I. excommunicated the Quarto-Decimans (2). This boldneſs of the Pope occaſioned a great ſcandal in the Church; and Irenæus Biſhop of Lyons, tho' he was of his opinion, could not forbear to reproach him with having broken thro' the laws of charity, for an affair ſo little important. He quoted to him the examples of Anicetus, Pius, Hyginus, and Theleſphorus, who notwithſtanding this difference communicated with the Churches of Aſia; and told him he would have acted much more like a Chriſtian, if he had imitated Anicetus, who with his own hand gave the Communion to Polycarpus, tho' he thought differently from him on this ſubject. Victor's haughtineſs was ſo far from drawing the Churches of Aſia into his opinion, that it made them ſtick more obſtinately to their own: and they did not think themſelves obliged to ſubmit to the Biſhop of Rome, ſince he could give no proofs of what he pretended with regard to St. Peter and St. Paul; tho' they would have been themſelves at a loſs to ſhew that their practice had been eſtabliſhed by St. John. For, as Socrates obſerves (3), "neither our Saviour nor "his Apoſtles have given any commandment to "this purpoſe; for their deſign was not to make "laws concerning feaſts or holy-days; but to in"force the practice of virtue and piety. It ſeems "probable to me, that as ſeveral other things have "been inſenſibly introduced, ſo it is with regard to "the celebration of Eaſter; it was eſtabliſhed by "cuſtom, and not by any command of the Apoſtles... "The Quarto-decimans maintain, that their practice "has been eſtabliſhed by St. John. The Romans and "thoſe of the Weſtern Churches pretend they re"ceived their cuſtom from St. Peter and St. Paul, "but as neither of them alledge any ancient teſti"mony of what they maintain, I think we may infer "from thence, that Eaſter is obſerved in every coun"try according to the practice that was introduced "at the beginning." All men of ſenſe look'd upon controverſy as of very little importance, yet to avoid non-conformity even in the leaſt things, it was decreed in the Council of Arles in the year 314, that all the Churches ſhould celebrate Eaſter on the ſame day, viz. on the Sunday after the fourteenth of the Moon of March, when that Moon ſhould happen after the vernal Equinox. This decree was confirmed by the Council of Nice in the year 325, and the Emperor Conſtantine ſent his orders into all the provinces of the Empire, to obſerve that decree, and ſaid in the Letter he wrote for that purpoſe, the ground of this decree was, that the Quarto-decimans were but few, and that their practice reſembled too much that of the Jews. For that ſame reaſon it was alſo ordered by the Council, that Eaſter ſhould be celebrated on the next Sunday after the full Moon of March. According to this decree all the Churches celebrated Eaſter on a Sunday. But there remained ſtill a doubt, which having not been determined occaſioned ſome diverſity in the celebration of Eaſter. For when the fourteenth day of the Moon happened to fall on a Sunday, the Churches of the Eaſt celebrated Eaſter on that day, and conſequently at the ſame time with the Jews; but the Church of Rome put off Eaſter to the Sunday following.

(2) Thus they called thoſe that celebrated Eaſter the fourteenth day of the Moon.

(3) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 22. p. 292, 293. ed. Reading, Lond. 1720.

Now King Oſwy having been inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion by Scots Monks, and the Queen by a Prieſt who followed the Roman practice, it happened ſometimes, that the King celebrated Eaſter, when the Queen was ſtill in Lent. Oſwy earneſtly deſired, that the day for celebrating Eaſter might be ſo fixed, that every body could keep it at the ſame time. It was for this reaſon he had called together the Council of Withby. The Fathers of the Council were divided, ſome favouring the Scots, and others the Romaniſt. Each party did his utmoſt to ſecure as many votes as he could. But it appears that the Roman party was much more active and buſy, than that of the Scots; the former found out ſome pretence to invite Ailbert then Biſhop of Paris to the Council, who came with one of his Prieſts called Agathon, and was at the head of the Romaniſts. The other party was headed by the King himſelf, and by Colman Biſhop of the Northumbrians, and was ſupported by all the Scots Prieſts and Monks, and by all thoſe who had been ordained in Scotland. The Council being aſſembled, the King repreſented to them, how deſirous he was that all his ſubjects ſhould celebrate Eaſter on the ſame day; he then deſired Colman to explain the reaſons, on which the practice of the Scots was grounded. Colman ſaid it had always been the practice of Scotland; that Columbus, Aidan, and Finan never departed from it, and that if theſe authorities were not ſufficient, he could quote that of St. John the beloved Apoſtle of Chriſt. When he had enlarged on that ſubject, Ailbert was asked to confute what had been alledged, but he begged to be excuſed, becauſe he could not ſpeak Engliſh well enough, and deſired that Wilfrid, a Prieſt who lived with the Romaniſts, might be heard. Wilfrid, who had probably been well inſtructed by Ailbert beforehand, anſwered Colman with much warmth and paſſion; he explained in what manner Eaſter day had been fixed by the Romans, and ſaid, that all the Churches in the world followed their example, adding that the Scots, Picts, and Britons were the only nations, who perſiſted in their folly and obſtinacy. Colman anſwered him, that in ſaying this he reflected on the

AILLI (a) (PETER D') Biſhop of Cambray (b), and Cardinal, was born at Compiegne in Picardy [A] in the year 1350. His family was very obſcure. Some writers tell us, that he was Under-porter of the College of Navarre (c), but they are miſtaken. He did not enter that College till about the year 1372. He was received as a penſioner amongſt the ſtudents in Divinity. He was then Procurator of the French nation in the Univerſity of Paris, and capable of raiſing himſelf a conſiderable character as an author, as appears from his Treatiſes of Logic [B], according to the hypotheſes of the Nominals, and from his Diſcourſes upon the Nature of the Soul and upon that of Meteors. He ſhewed ſo much penetration and genius in thoſe writings, that in them he laid the foundation of that vaſt reputation to which he afterwards raiſed himſelf. He ſucceeded likewiſe extremely well in his explication of Peter Lombard in the year 1375. This application of his to ſcholaſtic learning did not hinder him from becoming an excellent Preacher. He received his Doctor's degree in 1380, and a Canonſhip at Noion. He was recalled to Paris four years after to take upon him the charge of Grand Maſter of the College of Navarre. He had a prodigious number of ſcholars then under him, and particularly John Gerſon and Nicholas de Clemangis. He pleaded with ſuch force in 1387 before the Pope (d), againſt a Dominican (e), who had appealed from the ſentence pronounced againſt him by the faculty of Divinity at Paris, that he got the ſentence confirmed. He wrote likewiſe a piece againſt that Dominican. This raiſed him to ſuch a height of reputation, that in the year 1389 he was made Confeſſor and Almoner to Charles VI [C], and Chancellor of the Univerſity. Five years after this he had the firſt dignity in the ſacred chapel at Paris conferred upon him, that is, the office of Treaſurer. Such a variety of employments did not however prevent him from ſeeking out the moſt effectual means of putting an end to the ſchiſm, which divided the Church of Rome. He went with the King's commiſſion to the Antipope Benedict XIII. in 1394, and gave ſo advantageous a character of him at his return, that it was reſolved in the King's council to acknowledge him as the lawful Pope. He obtained the Biſhoprick of Puy in Vellai (f) about the end of the year 1395, and that of Cambray

(a) In Latin Petrus de Alliaco, or ab Alliaco, or ab Alyaco, or Alliacenſis, or Aliacus, or Ailliacus, &c.

(b) Thevet and Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. p. 548; de Sc. Math. pag. 182, 228, make him Archbiſhop of that city.

(c) See Remark [A].

(d) This was the Antipope Clement VII, who ſat at Avignon.

(e) He was an Arragonois named John de Monteſon, who denied the immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary.

(f) According to Moreri he was Biſhop of Bellai; but that is a miſtake.

memory of St. John, who would never have eſtabliſhed a cuſtom, which it was a folly to obſerve. Wilfrid finding, that he might have ſcandalized the Aſſembly, undertook to excuſe St. John, by ſaying that he was obliged to keep ſomething of Judaiſm in order not to give offence to the Jews of Aſia, in the like manner as St. Paul had been obliged to circumciſe Timothy. He then aſſerted that the Church of Rome exactly conformed to the eſtabliſhment of St. Peter and St. Paul. He would certainly have been at a loſs to prove that aſſertion; but as Colman and the Scots probably were not very learned, and only intended to keep to their own cuſtoms without pretending to draw the Romans into their opinion, they ſtill urged St. John and Columbus's authority. But Wilfrid, after he had excuſed St. John, as we have ſaid, asked Colman in a triumphing manner, whether he would compare Columbus with St. Peter, the Prince of the Apoſtles, and to whom Chriſt had ſaid, Thou art Peter, and upon that ſtone I will eſtabliſh my Church. We are not told what Colman anſwered; for it muſt be obſerved that all the account we have of what paſſed in this Council, is given us by the partizans of Rome. King Oſwy ſeemed at laſt to be perſuaded, that St. Peter had received from Jeſus Chriſt ſome privileges beyond what was granted to the other Apoſtles; for he declared at laſt in favour of the cuſtom which that Apoſtle was ſaid to have eſtabliſhed at Rome, and preferred it to that of St. John. It is ſaid that he yielded to this, becauſe he was afraid, leſt St. Peter, who has the keys of heaven, ſhould ſhut him out of it, if he perſiſted obſtinately to oppoſe, what that Apoſtle had eſtabliſhed. No ſooner had the King declared for Rome, but the majority followed his example, ſo that Colman and his followers loſt their cauſe (4).

(4) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 1. l. 3. p. 242, &c.

[A] He was born at Compiegne in Picardy.] This appears from the public Regiſters of the church of Cambray (1). We may therefore place among the errors, which Thevet has committed, what he ſays concerning the country of Peter d'Ailli. He was a native, ſays he (2), of Germany, and born in a very obſcure village call'd Ailli: and from thence, on account of the meanneſs of his parents, he took his name. He was ſo poor that to ſupport himſelf in the purſuit of his ſtudies, he was obliged to ſerve as an under-porter in the college of Navarre. Volaterranus had before publiſhed, that he was a German (3).

(1) Apud Launoium, Hiſt. Coll. Nav. p. 137.

(2) Thevet, Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 7. p. 86. of the edit. in 12°.

(3) Geſneri Biblioth. fol. 543 verſo.

[B] His Treatiſes of Logic.] He underſtood it perfectly well; and it was owing to this, that he gained ſuch a force and skill of argumentation, with which he eſtabliſhed his own opinions, and refuted thoſe of others. The famous Weſſelus of Groningen ſpeaks in this manner of him: Quis unquam ad illum apicem Theologiæ, quo Petrus de Alliaco conſcendit, abſque definitionibus, diviſionibus, argumentationibus, inſtantiis logicalibus, perveniret? In diſputationibus dico, ubi diſcuſſione diſertâ opus eſt. Quomodo Petrus Joannem de Monteſono in Rota de errore quatuordecim illarum concluſionum concuſſiſſet, niſi diſtinctione multiplici, aut elenchi ignorantia antecedente vel conſequente deluſum docuiſſet? Opus igitur Theologicis Logicam inferre. Et Gerſon ipſe, quo tandem tantus ipſe Theologus, niſi per accuratiſſimam illam ſuam Magiſtri Petri Logicam evaſit (4)? i. e. "Who can "ever attain to that prodigious knowledge of Divi- "nity, which Petrus ab Alliaco arrived at, without "a skill in definitions, diviſions, arguments, and "logical rules? In diſputations, I ſay, wherein "there is a neceſſity of a plain and open diſcuſſion "of the point. How could he convict John de Mon- "teſon of fourteen errors in the Rota at Rome, "but by a variety of diſtinctions; and by ſhewing "how he was miſled by an antecedent or conſe- "quent Ignorantia Elenchi, or miſtaking of the "true ſtate of the queſtion? There is a neceſſity there- "fore of applying Logic to Divinity. And with "reſpect to Gerſon himſelf, how did he become ſo "great a Divine, but by means of the accurate Lo- "gic of his Maſter Peter ab Alliaco?" It is to be obſerved that Mr. de Launoi believed that theſe words in the paſſage quoted above, Rota de errore &c. were the title of a book writ by Peter d'Ailli; but I think that by Rota, we are rather to underſtand the place, where the Pope heard the Diſputants. However it is certain, that it was Logic, which occaſioned principally that compliment paid to Peter d'Ailli; Aquila Franciæ, atque aberrantium à veritate malleus indefeſſus (5); "the Eagle of France, "and the indefatigable confounder of thoſe, who "depart from truth."

(4) Wiſſelus de Poteſtate Papæ, cap. 9. apud Launcium, Hiſt. Navar. p. 469.

(5) Launoius, ib. p. 134, 476.

[C] Almoner to Charles VI.] See du Poyrat, p. 345, of the Antiquities of the King's Chapel. He obſerves there, that Peter d'Ailli never had the office of Grand Almoner of France, nor of Grand Almoner to the King, which were then unknown, and never inſtituted till the reigns of Charles VIII, and Francis I, whatever is alledged by the author of GALLIA CHRISTIANA *, in which particular the writer of the Continuation of the Annals of Baronius is likewiſe deceived.

* Claudius Robertus, in Gallia Chriſtiana, fol. 68.

Cambray in the beginning of the year following. He was very much eſteemed by Benedict IX, and he employed his intereſt with him to get a Profeſſor of Divinity eſtabliſhed in all the Epiſcopal Churches of the Kingdom. He preached at Genoa in 1405 upon the Myſtery of the Trinity, before Pope Benedict XIII, and perſuaded that Pope to order the celebration of the Feaſt of the Trinity in all churches. He raiſed a great admiration of his learning and wiſdom in the council of Piſa in 1409. He maintained at Paris in all the Aſſemblies, where they deliberated upon proper remedies for terminating the ſchiſm, that the only effectual method was to call a general council. Two years after this he was made a Cardinal (g); he went into Germany in the year 1414, in the character of the Pope's Legate. He preſided in the third Seſſion of the Council of Conſtance. He wrote ſeveral Treatiſes during that Council: one, de emendendâ Eccleſiâ, i. e. "of reforming the Church"; another, de duodecim Honoribus beati Joſephi, i. e. "of the twelve Honours of bleſſed Joſeph;" another, de Modo & Formâ eligendi Papæ, i. e. "of the Manner and Form of chooſing a Pope;" and no perſon had a greater ſhare than he in the affairs of that great Aſſembly which was held for three years. He died in 1425 [D], and was buried in his own Cathedral of Cambray. He did great ſervices to the College of Navarre [E], and ordered by his will large ſums of money to be given to ſeveral Churches for Maſſes to be ſaid for the repoſe of his ſoul (h). Mr. de Launoi, from whom I have taken all theſe particulars, has not forgotten to obſerve, that his Doctrine concerning the Eccleſiaſtical power is to be conſidered as a blemiſh in a beautiful body. He would have this imputed to the unhappineſs of that age (i); but I am ſurpriſed that he forgot another weakneſs of this Doctor with regard to judiciary Aſtrology [F]. However, our Peter d'Ailli, who ſubjected even

(g) Moreri ſays, it was at Piſa; but he is miſtaken.

(h) Hiſtor. Regii Navarræ Gymnaſii, by Mr. de Launoi, p. 467, & ſeq.

(i) Dictata ejuſmodi danda injuriæ temporis ſunt, nævus in candidiſſimo pectore, Launoius, ibid. p. 480.

[D] He died in the year 1425.] It is ſurprizing, that a man of his rank and diſtinction ſhould die, without our knowing for certain where, or in what year his death happened. Some ſay, that he died in Germany in 1416. Others, that he died at Avignon, the 8th of Auguſt 1425, while he was the Pope's Legate in France (6). Others ſay indeed, that he died at Avignon, but they place his death in 1426 (7). Mr. de Launoi thinks proper to fix it in the year 1425 in the 479th page of his book; but in p. 129 he tells us that he died while he was Legate of the Holy See in Germany 1423; Anno poſtquam vaſtatum eſt à Burgundionibus quinto; i. e. five years "after it was plundered by the Burgundians." Now in p. 126 of the ſame book he places that ravage of theirs under the year 1418. The Regiſters of the Church of Cambray inform us, that he died the 9th of October 1425, while he was Legate of the Holy See in lower Germany; and that in the month of July following his body was carried to Cambray, where it was interred under the great altar (8). The difference between 1416 and 1426 happened thro' an error of the preſs; the figure 1 being put thro' negligence inſtead of 2, was the occaſion of the two different opinions.

(6) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 179.

(7) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 548. Bellarmin. de Script Eccleſ. p. 384. fixes upon the ſame year, but does not mention any city.

(8) Apud Launoium, Hiſt. Gymn. Nav. p. 137.

[E] He did great ſervices to the College of Navarre.] He has been called the ſecond Founder of it (9). He built the houſe for the Divines, but not the library. Spondanus who aſſures us of this, is miſtaken. It was the work of Charles VIII. Spondanus in Annalibus Eccleſiaſticis prodidit ab eo extructam eſſe Bibliothecam. Sed aberrat; id eſt opus Caroli octavi Regis cujus et nomen Μονόγραμμοι in Bibliothecæ vitro centies depingitur, & ſtatua in occidentali turbinati parietis cono erecta conſpicitur (10). i. e. "Spondanus in his Eccleſiaſtical Annals ſays, "that the Library was built by him; but he is miſ-"taken in that particular; for it is the work of "King Charles VIII, whoſe name is painted a hun-"dred times in the glaſs, and his ſtatue erected on "the Weſt-end of the wall." It is true, Peter d'Ailli ordered that part of the eſtate, which he left to this college, ſhould be ſpent in purchaſing books, and that he very often gave books to it (11). I cannot tell, whether he gave his own Library, as Aubertus Miræus tells us. Alliacus, ſays he (12), anno 1425 Avenione moriens Bibliothecam ſuam legavit Navarræo Pariſiis Collegio, quam ibi magna cum voluptate aliquando vidimus. i. e. "Alliacus, who "died in the year 1425 at Avignon, left his Libra-"ry by will to the College of Navarre at Paris, "which I have ſeen there ſometimes with a great deal "of pleaſure." I cannot find, that Mr. de Launoi ſays any thing of this; his ſilence alone is ſufficient to confute what this Flemiſh Writer ſays upon that ſubject.

(9) Ibid. p. 134, 475.

(10) Ibid. pag. 475.

(11) Ibid. p. 134, 135.

(12) Miræus in Auctario de Script. Eccleſ. cap. 454. p. 265.

[F] His weakneſs with regard to judiciary Aſtrology (13).] Bellarmin has not forgot this blemiſh upon his character. Unum eſt, ſays he (14), in quo reprehenditur hic auctor, quod videlicet cenſiſſe videatur Chriſti nativitatem prænoſci potuiſſe ex genethliacis obſervationibus, atque ad hoc adduxerit apparitionem ſtellæ, quæ apparuit Magis. i. e. "There "is one thing, for which this author is blamed, and "that is, that he imagined our Saviour's Nativity "might have been known before by aſtrological cal-"culations; and for this purpoſe he urged the appear-"ance of the Star, which guided the Magi mentioned "in the New Teſtament." Others obſerve, that Peter d'Ailli in his book De Concordia Hiſtoriæ & Aſtrologiæ divinitricis, i. e. "Of the Agreement between "Hiſtory and Judiciary Aſtrology," aſſerted, that Noah's Flood, the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt, and other miracles of that kind, and all ſorts of prodigies, might have been foretold by means of Aſtrology (15); and that he referred the riſe, changes, and declenſions of Commonwealths and Religions to the conjunctions of the high Planets (16). Bodin adds, that Joannes Picus, Prince of Mirandola, took the hypotheſes of Peter d'Arliac (α) (17) for certain, without enquiring further into the truth of them; tho' of the 36 grand conjunctions, which that Cardinal obſerved from the 115*th year after the Creation of the World to the* 1385*th year of Jeſus Chriſt, there are not ſix true* (18). This paſſage of Bodin has been thus changed in the Latin Edition: Mirum mihi viſum eſt quamobrem J. Picus Mirandolæ Princeps illius hominis errores ſane pudendos in cœleſtium orbium doctrina pro certis & compertis demonſtrationibus habuerit; cum enim poſt orbem conditum anno centeſimo decimo quinto uſque ad annum Chriſti 1385, triginta ſex Jovis & Saturni concurſus tradiderit, vix tamen ullus eo quo decit loco ac tempore deſcribitur. i. e. "It is ſur-"prizing to me that J. Picus, Prince of Mirandola "ſhould receive that man's flagrant errors in Aſtrology "as certain and inconteſtable demonſtrations; ſince of "36 conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn, which he has "given from the 115th year of the Creation of the "World to the year of Chriſt 1385, there is ſcarce "one deſcribed in its proper place and time." The ſame Bodin attacks the very foundation of theſe hypotheſes: The Cardinal d'Arliac, ſays he (19), begins with the grand conjunctions at the time of the Creation of the World, ſuppoſing, according to his computation, that there are 7158 years; which is following the error of Alphonſus, who is condemned by all the Jews, and at preſent by the general conſent of all the Churches..... And it is an intolerable error to ſuppoſe a grand conjunction of three great Planets in the year 320 of the Creation, and to lay it down as a truth that there are at preſent 7118 years, that is 1200 years before the world was created. This method of attacking Peter d'Ailli will not be deciſive at preſent, ſince a great number of learn-

(13) See Remark [K] towards the end.

(14) Bellarmin. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 384. He refers us to Sixtus Senenſ. Biblioth. Sanctæ Annot. xv. and lxxxi. and lib. 6. Annot. x.

(15) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. p. 215.

(16) Bodin de la Republiq. liv. 4. p. 548 of the firſt edition.

(17) He names him ſo.

(18) Bodin de la Republiq. liv. 4. p. 543.

(19) Pag. 549.

even crowns and ſcepters to the Eccleſiaſtical power, who enlarged the number of feſtivals, who founded ſo many Maſſes for the repoſe of his ſoul, who condemned John Hus to death [G], notwithſtanding all this appears in the Catalogue of the Witneſſes of Truth [H], as a forerunner of Luther and Calvin. The Carteſians conſider him alſo as a forerunner ed Men prefer the calculation of the Greek Bible with regard to the duration of the world, to that of the Hebrew text. Voſſius had more reaſon to fall upon him on the account of the origin of the hereſy of Arius, than that of the age of the world. The words of Voſſius are as follows; in which we ſhall ſee that our Aſtrologer placed the beginning of that hereſy ſeven hundred years after Chriſt; which is a monſtrous error. Valde etiam futile eſt fundamentum, quod arti iſti ponit. Ait ab initio mundi uſque ad diluvium fluxiſſe annos 2042 (20), à diluvio ad natalem Chriſti 3102. His ita conſtitutis, totus eſt in eo ut oſtendat quandocunque mirandum aliquid contigit in terris etiam illuſtrem aliquam ſtellarum conjunctionem apparuiſſe in cœlis. Atqui falſiſſimum eſt quod ſibi ſumit de anno vel diluvii vel natalis Domini; nec levis eſt error ſed ſpiſſiſſimus; in priori quidem numero annorum pene ſexcentorum, in altero autem paulò pauciorum (21). Quid mirum? Omnino Cameracenſis fuit Chronologiæ imperitiſſimus, ut vel arguit quod Arrianam hæreſin cœpiſſe dicat anno Chriſt ſeptingenteſimo, quam veriſimilius tum pene extinctam dixiſſet. Ortum verò conſtat ferè initio ſæculi quarti (22). i. e. "But the foundation, upon which he builds his art, is very weak. He ſays, that from the beginning of the world to the flood were 2042 years, from the flood to the birth of Chriſt 3102 years. Having laid down this, he proceeds to ſhew, that whenever any wonderful thing happened on the earth, there was ſome remarkable conjunction of the Stars in heaven. But there is a very flagrant error both in the year of the Flood, and that of our Saviour's Birth; in the former there is a miſtake of 600 years, and in the latter of ſomething leſs. But this is not ſtrange in him, ſince he appears extremely ignorant of Chronology, as is evident from his placing the riſe of the Arian Hereſy in the year of Chriſt 700, whereas he ſhould rather have ſaid that it was then almoſt extinct. For it is very certain that it began about the beginning of the fourth Century." If Thevet wrote with any judgment, would he have ſpoken thus of Peter d'Ailli? "I deſire, that thoſe who are curious in Aſtrology, would carefully read his books; they will not loſe their labour; for beſides the ſingular obſervations, which I have mentioned (23), they will find an expreſs charge drawn up againſt thoſe, who under pretence of true Aſtrology, take a pleaſure in being bewitched and infatuated by the ſpurious Aſtrology, and introduce an idolatrous reverence for the Stars, which is abſolutely abominable (24)." This pretended idolatry was no more to be apprehended in the time of Thevet, than the worſhip of the earth; ſo that, if the books of Peter d'Ailli were of no other uſe than to convert this kind of idolaters, they would be of little importance. But ſince on the other hand they were formed to ſupport the reputation of Aſtrology by extolling the virtues, which that author aſcribes to the conjunctions of the Planets, of which Thevet makes no manner of mention, the reading of them was infinitely more prejudicial, than uſeful.

(20) Voſſius would have ſaid 2242.

(21) Voſſius, according to his Syſtem, ſhould have found here an error of above 600 years.

(22) Voſſius de Scient. Mathemat. p. 215.

(23) He had mentioned only the reduction of all the Parallels of Ptolomy to twelve.

(24) Thevet, Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 7. p. 89.

§ (a). De Alliaco is the common Latin name of Peter d'Ailli Alliacus; and thence it is, that Bodin has formed Arliac by changing the firſt of the two ll into an r, as in Varlet, Merlin, Merluſine, which are formed from Vallet, Mellin, Melluſine. CRIT. REM.

[G] Who condemned John Hus to death.] He did not do this without firſt exhorting him to ſubmit, and declaring to him that this was the beſt way he could take. Examinatis dictis teſtium, & recitatis articulis erroneis in patrum confeſſu, Cardinalis Cameracenſis, Judex cauſæ deputatus à concilio, dixit ad Joannem Huſs; "En viæ duæ propoſitæ ſunt "tibi, ut ex his eligas unam; aut te offeras omnino "totum in poteſtatem & gratiam concilii ejuſque de- "cretis ſuper hac re acquieſcas; ita namque fiet ut "concilium ob honorem Domini noſtri Regis Romano- "rum nunc præſentis, at fratris ejus Bohemiæ Re- "gis clementer acturum ſit tecum; aut ſi ex dictis "articulis quoſdam tenere ac defendere intendas, & "deſideres aliam audientiam, concedetur tibi qui- "dem; ſed tunc ſcias hic eſſe magnos & illuminatos "viros, qui fortiſſima habent adverſus articulos tuos "fundamenta, & verendum eſt ne inde gravioribus "involvaris erroribus. Id conſulendo dixerim tibi, "non ut judex (25)." i. e. The witneſſes having been examined, and the heretical articles read in the aſſembly of the Fathers, the Cardinal of Cambray, being appointed Judge of this cauſe by the Council, ſpoke thus to John Huſs; "You ſee there "are two ways propoſed to you, that you may "chooſe one of them; either to ſubmit yourſelf "entirely to the will and mercy of the Council, "and conſent to its decrees upon this matter; for "then the Council will deal gently with you out of "regard to our Lord the King of the Romans now "preſent, and to his brother the King of Bohemia; or if you intend to maintain and defend "any of theſe articles, and deſire another hearing "for that purpoſe, it will be granted you indeed; "but know then, that here are great and learned men, who have the ſtrongeſt arguments againſt your articles; and it is to be feared, that "by your defence you may be involved in greater "errors. I ſpeak this as a friend, and not as a "judge." Mr. de Launoi having related this, adds, that this heretic choſe rather to maintain obſtinately his opinions, and to be burnt for them, than to follow the wholeſome counſel of Cardinal d'Ailli. Verum litigioſus homo dogmata ſua nimis pertinaciter propugnare maluit & comburi, quam uſque adeò ſalubre Cardinalis Alliaci conſilium ſequi.

(25) Launoi, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navar. p. 474, from the relation of a certain Huſſite in Bzovius ad ann. 1415, num. 47.

[H] He appears in the Catalogue of the Witneſſes of Truth.*] "By order of the Council of the French "Church, he was commiſſioned to declare to the "two Popes, who contended for the Papacy, that "they ſhould immediately reſign their pretenſions "to it. In anſwer to this it was ſaid, that the "Popes of Rome are exempt from all imputations "of ſchiſm; but that they were the French Prelates, "who out of levity of mind had fallen into ſchiſm. "Upon this occaſion he was ſent again, according "to the advice of the Council held at Paris, with "the Sieur John Maingre, Marſhal de Boucicaud, "who fell very ſeverely upon the Antipope at Avignon, as likewiſe did Cardinal d'Ailli (26). It "is this, that ſeems to have occaſioned Henry Pantaleon to place him in the Catalogue of thoſe, "who in that age exclaimed both in perſon and by "their writings againſt the ambition of the Popes, "the corruption of the Church, and the ſchiſms and "diviſions, which roſe then every where; and the "ſame author tells us, that he wrote a book entitled, "Of the Reformation of the Church, which however does not appear in the Catalogue of his writings, which are very numerous, both in Divinity "and Mathematics (27)." Nothing is more certain, than what Pantaleon aſſures us concerning this book of Peter d'Ailli. With reſpect to the Catalogue of the Witneſſes of the Truth, compiled by Flacius Illyricus, we find in that work Peter d'Ailli condemning the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation (28), and giving the Council of Conſtance a ſcheme a Reformation, according to which the Court of Rome would have been deprived of ſo many methods, by which they amaſs riches; the Prieſts would have been obliged to live regularly, and to execute their functions well; the pomp of ceremonies, unneceſſary feſtivals, the abuſe of faſting, and the canonizing of Saints, would have been aboliſhed; and the number of Monks, images, and churches, diminiſhed (29). We may certainly believe, that all the writings of our author were not adapted to pleaſe the Court of Rome, ſince there are three or four inſerted in the Appendix to the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum (30). Orthuinus Gratius had before inſerted in that Faſciculus the Treatiſe

* Dailly.

(26) See what du Pleſſis Mornai quotes from Froiſſard upon this ſubject, in his Myſtery of Iniquity, p. 486, &c. of the Saumur edition in 1611. in folio.

(27) Thevet, Hommes Illuſt. tom. 7. p. 88.

(28) See the Diſſertation of Mr. Allix before the Determinatio, Fr. Joannis Pariſienſis, printed at London in 1686, in 8vo p. 71, 72.

(29) See du Pleſſis Myſtery of Iniquity, p. 523.

(30) Printed at London in 1690.

ner of their ſect with regard to the queſtion concerning Accidents [I]. He had been expelled his Epiſcopal Church, if we believe Eraſmus, who adds, that this baniſhment procured him a Cardinal's Hat (k). He wrote a great many books [K], ſome of which have never yet been printed [L]. He likewiſe wrote Verſes in his mother tongue [M]. Conſult the Authors quoted by Moreri, and inſtead of Friſſart, to whom he refers, read Froiſſard.

(k) Petrum Aliacenſem Cameracenſis Civitas Epiſcopum ejecit; Roma ex exule fecit Cardinalem. Eraſm. de ratione conſcrib. Epiſtol. Epiſt. conſolat.

of this Cardinal De Emendatione Eccleſiæ," i. e. "Of reforming the Church." What I have ſaid concerning the leſſening the number of Monks, does not agree with what was told to Thevet, that he wrote a book entitled The Buckler of Poverty, in which he makes an apology for the Mendicant Friars (31).

(31) Thevet, Hommes Illuſt. p. 90.

[I] The Carteſians conſider him alſo as a fore-runner of their ſect with regard to the Queſtion of Accidents.] A Profeſſor of Louvain one of the moſt reſolute oppoſers of Des Cartes, became one of his moſt zealous followers, after he had found in the moſt approved authors of the Church his opinion concerning Tranſubſtantiation, which was almoſt the only point, that was an obſtacle to him. Some time after this he inſerted in his Theſes of Divinity an extract from a book, which Cardinal d'Ailli, Biſhop of Cambray, wrote upon the Maſter of Sentences, in order to ſhew, that the Cardinal held the ſame opinion as Des Cartes, touching the Accidents of the Euchariſt, and reconciled it with the definition of the general Council of Conſtance (32).

(32) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 4. p. 522.

[K] He wrote a great many books.] His Commentaries upon the Maſter of Sentences, and the four Treatiſes, which are inſerted in the Appendix to the Faſciculus rerum expetendarum, were printed at Straſbourg in 1490. There was likewiſe publiſhed at the ſame place, and at the ſame time a volume of his Tracts and Sermons. Part of theſe Tracts was reprinted at Doway in 1634 under the direction of Leander de St. Martin, Profeſſor of Hebrew at Doway. Thevet aſſures us, that there is a book of Peter d'Ailli, printed in the year 1410, the twelfth of Auguſt, at the firſt riſe of Printing in France, in which there is a great number of mathematical figures (33). This is impoſſible; for Printing was not invented till about the year 1440. He might have ſaid, that there was printed at Louvain in 1487 the Sacramentale of this author, and at Paris in 1488 (34) his Quæſtiones in ſphæram mundi Joannis de Sacroboſco cum Commentariis Petri Cirveli Daronenſis Hiſpani. His Diſcourſes upon Meteors were printed at Straſbourg in 1504, and at Vienna in Auſtria in 1509. His Life of Pope Celeſtin V, was printed at Paris in 1539 (35), and is inſerted in the Lives of the Saints compiled by Surius. The title of that book affords ſome difficulty, becauſe it gives our author the character of Confeſſor to Charles V; but it is much more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that by a miſtake Charles V was put inſtead of Charles VI, than to ſay, that there was another Peter d'Ailli. Poſſevin, who imagined this, is much miſtaken. I can find no ſubject, that this Cardinal was ſo fond of, as Aſtrology; for, beſides the ſcheme for correcting the Calendar which he preſented to the Council of Conſtance, he wrote the following books: Tractatus de vero Cyclo Lunari: Vigintilogium de Concordantiâ aſtronomicæ veritatis cum Theologiâ: Tractatus de Concordia aſtronomicæ veritatis & narrationis hiſtoricæ (36): Tractatus elucidarius aſtronomicæ concordiæ cum theologia & cum hiſtorica narratione: Apologetica defenſio aſtronomicæ veritatis (37): Alia ſecunda apologetica defenſio ejuſdem (38): Tractatus de concordia diſcordantium aſtronomorum. The Sieur du Peyrat aſſures us (39), that Bodin in his Preface to his Demonomanie des Sorciers, mentions a book compoſed by Cardinal d'Ailli, wherein he aſſerts, that there is not one concluſive demonſtration in Ariſtotle, except that, by which he proves there is but one God. There are two ſmall objections againſt this; for Bodin does not ſay, as du Peyrat inſinuates, that Peter d'Ailli wrote a particular Treatiſe upon that ſubject; and he tells us, that this author obſerved in Ariſtotle ſome other demonſtrations, tho' but a few (40).

(33) Thevet, Hommes Illuſt. tom. 7. p. 89.

(34) According to Geſner, Biblioth. fol. 547 verſo, it was in the year 1468.

(35) All this is taken from Mr. de Launoi, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navar. p. 476, & ſeq. or from Father Labbe de Script. Eccleſ. p. 180.

(36) He wrote it at Baſil in 1418.

(37) He wrote this at Cologne in Sept. 1418.

(38) Written at Cologne in Oct. 1418.

(39) In his Antiquitez de la Chapelle du Roi de France, p. 345.

[L] Some of which have never yet been printed.] They are in the Library of the college of Navarre (41). Mr. de Launoi gives a Catalogue of them. Some of them contain anſwers to ſeveral curious queſtions; as for inſtance, Utrum eſſe tria ſuppoſita unius naturæ ſit perfectio; that is, "Whether "three perſons ſubſiſting in one nature, be a "perfection:" Utrum libertas creaturæ rationalis ante & poſt lapſum intrinſicè ſit æqualis; that is, "Whether the liberty of a rational creature be- "fore and ſince the fall is intrinſically equal:" Utrum creaturæ rationalis conſcientia erronea ejus actum excuſare poſſit; i. e. "Whether an erroneous "conſcience of a rational creature can excuſe its "act." This laſt queſtion put me in mind of ſeveral writings, which appeared in Holland ſome time ſince upon the Rights of an erroneous conſcience. It was proved in ſo demonſtrative a manner, that every action done contrary to the light of conſcience, is eſſentially evil, and that ſuch an action ought abſolutely and indiſpenſably to be avoided, that thoſe, who oppoſed this doctrine, hurried themſelves into this ſhocking poſition, that we ought not always to act according to the conviction of conſcience; from whence it follows, that we do ſometimes a good action by acting againſt our conſcience. This is a monſtrous doctrine, which deſtroys the foundation of all morality; and in compariſon of this the moſt extravagant notion of the Jeſuits about probability is innocent and modeſt. But what is moſt extraordinary in this affair, is, that they are a ſet of fanatics and enthuſiaſts, who have run themſelves upon this precipice; people, who above all others have the moſt intereſt in maintaining the ſovereign rights of conſcience.

(40) Bodin, Preface de la Demonomanie, p. 14.

(41) There is ſome part of them at Cambridge in Emmanuel College. Oudin, Supplem. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 690.

[M] He wrote Verſes in his mother-tongue.] I quote my author in the margin, who aſſures us, that Peter d'Ailli wrote a great many French Verſes in that ſort of number, which was uſed at that time; they were tranſlated into Latin Verſe by Nicholas de Clemangis. I have ſeen ſome of them, ſays he (42), printed above a hundred years ago. He adds, that the ſame author wrote in French a book intitled, The ſeven Degrees of the Scale of Penitence figured and ſhewn upon the ſeven penitential Pſalms, printed at Paris. I apprehend that La Croix du Maine is miſtaken with reſpect to the laſt piece; for Mr. de Launoi obſerves expreſly, that Anthony Belard tranſlated into French a Latin Treatiſe of Peter d'Ailli, upon the ſeven Penitential Pſalms; and that Dennis de Harſi printed that Tranſlation at Lyons in 1544 in 16mo (43).

(42) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franc. p. 381.

(43) Launoi, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navarræ, pag. 479.

The following is a Supplement to this: "The "French Verſes of Peter d'Ailli, which la Croix du "Maine ſpeaks of, are but thirty two in number, "and contain a ſhort Deſcription of the life of a ty- "rant. Nicholas de Clemangis made a Paraphraſe "upon them in Latin Hexameters, printed with the "French Original of Peter d'Ailli at the end of a "book intitled The Contempt of the Court, tranſlat- "ed from the Spaniſh of Guevara, into French, Ita- "lian, and High-Dutch, printed at Geneva in 16mo, "by John de Tournes, in 1605. The Paraphraſe "of Clemangis is likewiſe printed at the end of his "Epiſtles, p. 355 of the Leyden Edition. As for "the Tranſlation of Anthony Belard, we are told "by Anthony du Verdier, p. 51 of his Bibliotheque, "that it was printed in 1542, by Denys de Harſi, "in 16mo, at Lyons (44).

(44) Mr. de la Monnoie's MS. Remarks.

☞AILLI (PETER D'). We ſhall add ſome circumſtances relating to this great man, omitted or not known to Mr. Bayle. Mr. Lenfant informs us (a), that his father was a butcher (ex patre Lanione) (b); which is ſo far from any reflection upon the Cardinal, that it is the greateſt compliment to his merit, which raiſed him above all the

(a) Hiſt. du Concile de Conſtance, tom. 1. l. 1. p. 54. edit. Amſterdam. 1727.

(b) This is affirmed by Leonard Pipart Advocate at Cambray, who ſaw at Compiegne the Epitaph of the Cardinal's father.

the diſadvantages, that his low circumſtances at firſt laid him under. Some writers indeed have ſaid, that he was of the noble and ancient family of the Ailli's in Picardy; but this is a miſtake, as the Count d'Ailli aſſured one of the Plenipotentiaries of Great Britain at Cambray (c). He was made Archbiſhop of Cambray in 1391. In 1411 John XXIII made him a Cardinal Prieſt of the title of St. Chryſogonus. The ſame Pope ſent him Legate into Germany, and particularly Mentz, Cologne, Treves, Saltzbourg, and Prague, and the Dioceſe of Cambray, which belonged then to the Province of Rheims. During his Legateſhip he wrote ſeveral works, as well as at the Council of Conſtance, where he acted with the utmoſt zeal for the reformation of the church. He died in the year 1419 or 1420, and not in 1425 or 1426, as Onuphrius, Ciaconius and Bellarmin have aſſerted (d). Mr. Bayle is miſtaken in ſaying, that it was in 1425. Mr. de Launoi obſerves (e), that there was about the ſame time in the Univerſity of Paris another Peter d'Ailli; but it is not known whether he was related to the former. He aſſerted in the Council of Conſtance, that ſeveral general councils had erred, not only in point of fact, but even in right, and what is ſtill more, in faith (f). His Sermon before that Council concerning the duty of the Emperor, the Pope, and other members of the Council in the affair of the union and reformation of the Church, is very remarkable [A]. He expreſly maintained, that a general Council was ſuperior to a Pope [B]. He endeavoured to confound

(c) See Lenfant, ubi ſupra.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navar. tom. 1. p. 99, 100. and Von der Hardt Vit. Petr. de Alliac. tom. 1. p. 450. quoted by Mr. Lenfant.

(f) Lenfant, vol. 1. p. 72.

[A] His Sermon before that Council . . . is very remarkable.] His Text from St. Luke (1), And there ſhall be ſigns in the Sun, and in the Moon, and in the Stars. He told the Council, that the Pope is the Sun, the Emperor the Moon, becauſe he preſides over the night, that is, in temporal affairs, and the Stars the different orders of Eccleſiaſtics. With regard to the Signs or Wonders he found them in the Council, which he conſidered as the Heaven, in which were the Sun, Moon and Stars, and which ought to preſent the world with the agreeable proſpect of the reformation and union of the church. Quæ ſint iſta ſigna cæleſtia, quæ verba prædicta nobis futura prænunciant. Pro quo penſandum nobis eſt, quod in Cælo ſpiritualiter intellecto, hoc eſt in hoc ſacro generali Concilio, quo univerſalis repræſentatur Eccleſia, in Sole, Lunâ, & Stellis apparere incipiunt ſigna multa, ſigna magna, ſigna utique cæleſtia, ſua multitudine ſtupenda, ſua magnitudine miranda, ſuâ novitate jucunda, quæ plurimis retroactis temporibus fuerunt abſcondita, fueruntque triſtia ſigna illis omnino contraria (2). He then proceeds to affirm, that there can be no reformation of the church without an union, nor any union without a reformation of it. And ing repreſented what qualifications were neceſſary to a Pope in order to be the Sun of the Church, he aſſerts, that a Pope without them is not a Pope, but a mere phantom and idol of one. " If, for inſtance, " ſays he, a Pope enters unlawfully into the Church " through a criminal ambition; if his morals are vi- " cious and ſcandalous; if he governs in too neg- " ligent or tyrannical a manner, he can never poſſi- " bly be conſidered as the Sun of the Church. I " wiſh, continues he, the holy Trinity would break " to pieces thoſe three Statues, which have raiſed " themſelves in the Church. I have ſaid long ago, " that however adorable a Trinity of Perſons may be " in the Godhead, a Trinity of Popes is equally abo- " minable." His manner of explaining the Emperor's duty with regard to the affairs of the Council, is as follows. " The Emperor, ſays he, is come here, not " to preſide over us, but to be uſeful to us; not to " determine authoritatively concerning Eccleſiaſtical " and ſpiritual affairs, but to ſupport by his power " whatever ſhall be reſolved by the Council; not " that he would interpoſe in forming decrees or con- " firming them, but rather in obſerving them religi- " ouſly himſelf, and repreſſing and ſubduing the " rebellious and diſobedient with the temporal ſword. " He reduces to three heads, all that was neceſſary " for the Council to deliberate upon; that is, the re- " formation of the church, the union, and the " good government of it, and ſome proper precauti- " ons to prevent ſchiſms and other diſorders. As he " is of opinion, that nothing but a general Council " can reduce the church to ſuch a ſtate, he concludes, " that it is a pernicious error of the flatterers of the " Pope, when they have the confidence to detract ſo " far from the authority of the Council, as to ſay, " that the Pope is not obliged to follow their reſolu- " tions, and that his judgment is to be followed, tho' " it be contrary to that of the Council. This opi- " nion, ſays he, is founded upon nothing but ſome " decretals (3), which are miſunderſtood, and ſome " poſitive laws, which have been introduced in op- " poſition to the law of Nature and of God, and to " the prejudice of the Church (4).

(1) Ch. xxi. ver. 25.

(2) Von der Hardt, tom. 1. p. 437. apud Lenfant, ubi ſupra l. 1. p. 77, 78.

(3) Von der Hardt, tom. 1. p. 449, 450.

(4) See Lenfant, ubi ſupra.

[B] That a general Council was ſuperior to a Pope.] In the ſixth Seſſion of the Council of Conſtance there was a diſpute whether Wickliff's doctrine ſhould be condemned in the Pope's name, or only in that of the Council, without mentioning the Pope. Ailli maintained the latter opinion, becauſe the Council was above the Pope, who only made a part of the Council; nay, he carried this ſuperiority of the Council ſo far, that he affirmed they had a right of depoſing him. The Divines, who were of the contrary ſentiments, informed John XXIII of this; upon which Ailli wrote to him, that he would juſtify his conduct and opinion to the Cardinals and Divines aſſembled in council. This he did in a Memorial, inſerted in the Treatiſe which he wrote at Conſtance, concerning the Authority of the Council over the Pope; and he ſupports his opinion by theſe reaſons (5), " 1. Becauſe ſeveral decrees of Councils, " and even thoſe of divers Popes, are expreſſed in " this manner, The Council ordains or decrees; as " for inſtance the Council of Jeruſalem, which ſpeaks " in the name of the whole aſſembly, and not of St. " Peter in particular. 2. That Pope Gregory having " ſaid that he revered the four general Councils as " the four Goſpels, for this reaſon, becauſe they " were eſtabliſhed by univerſal conſent, it follows " evidently enough from thence, that it belongs to " general Councils to determine upon matters of " faith. 3. That the authority of the Council over " the Pope takes place, eſpecially in thoſe caſes, " where the point is to judge between Popes, who " are competitors, as it happened in the Schiſm be- " tween Symmachus and Laurentius, when the Bi- " ſhops, who were called together by Theodoric, " ſpoke in the name of the Council, and not of the " Pope. 4. That it is an error, and even, according " to ſome, an hereſy to maintain, as ſeveral perſons " do, that the Council has no authority of itſelf, but " only from the Pope, who is the head; becauſe it " would follow from thence that the Council of Piſa " had no authority, as it was not called by any Pope, " and conſequently John XXIII was not lawfully " elected, ſince he ſucceeded Alexander V. who was " choſen by that Council. 5. That the ſame Coun- " cil was ſuperior to the Pope, becauſe they depoſed " two Popes, and that every other general Council " may do the ſame. 6. That ſince the Council with " the Pope, when he is preſent, conſtitutes but one " and the ſame myſtical body, of which the Pope is " the head, it cannot poſſibly be ſaid, that one ſingle " member ſhould have more authority than the " whole body. 7. That we may conclude in ſhort " from hence how falſe that opinion of ſome Law- " yers is, who pretend, that none but the Pope has " a right of determining in the Council; that the " Council has no right but to adviſe; that the Pope " has a liberty of rejecting the advice and conſultation " of

(5) Von der Hardt. tom. 5. p. 60. and Oper. Gerſon. part II. p. 950. apud Lenfant, l. 2. p. 189.

found John Hus in a diſpute concerning Tranſubſtantiation by a very peculiar ſubtlety from Metaphyſics [C]. He wrote a little before the Council was called, A Treatiſe concerning the Neceſſity of a Reformation of the Church, with reſpect to the Head and Members of it [D]. He declared his opinion, that it was neceſſary to leſſen the number of Monaſteries

" the Council, whereas his deciſion muſt always be " followed, though it be contrary to the judgment of " the Council. To ſhew the falſity of this opinion, " the Cardinal aſſerts, that the univerſal Church, and " conſequently the Council which repreſents it, has " received from Jeſus Chriſt, and not from the Pope, " the privilege of infallibility in point of faith, a " privilege which the Pope does not enjoy, becauſe " he is liable to error.

[C] A very peculiar ſubtlety from Metaphyſics.] Hus was charged with maintaining, that the material bread continued in the Sacrament after conſecration and the pronunciation of the words. He anſwered this article by appealing to God, that he had never advanced or believed that propoſition. He only acknowledged, that the Archbiſhop of Prague having forbid him to uſe the word Bread, he could not comply with his injunction, becauſe in the ſixth chapter of St. John's Goſpel Chriſt is called ſeveral times the Bread of Angels, which came down from heaven (6), to give life to the world; but that he had never ſpoken of material bread. Cardinal d'Ailli holding a paper in his hand, which he ſaid he had received the day before, asked him whether he believed the Univerſale à parte rei; which is a mere ſubtlety of Metaphyſics, and is generally exploded now by the beſt Philoſophers as a diſpute about words only. Hus declaring that he believed it, becauſe it was the doctrine of St. Anſelm, and ſome other Doctors, the Cardinal preſſed him with a Dilemma, in order to ſhew, that he muſt either renounce the Univerſale à parte rei, or elſe believe, that the material bread continues after conſecration. Hus extricated himſelf out of this difficulty, by ſaying, that Tranſubſtantiation was a miracle (7), which could never be drawn into a conſequence with regard to natural things; juſt in the ſame manner as ſome of the beſt Philoſophers of the preſent age act, when they are urged with conſequences drawn from their own principles againſt the real Preſence and Tranſubſtantiation. In ſhort, Ailli's objection affected Hus no more than it did all the Scotiſts, who believed the Univerſale à parte rei; and it muſt be owned, that this conduct of the Cardinal in this point was a piece of art unworthy of his character, ſince inſtead of being ſatisfied with Hus's expreſs declaration, he endeavoured to extort hereſy from him by the ſubtleties of the ſchools (8).

(6) He means the Bread of Heaven, and the Bread of Life. See his Treatiſe Of the Body of Chriſt, fol. 163.

(7) Definit quidem eſſe in hoc ſingulari pane materiali, ſtante tali Tranſubſtantiatione, cum ille tunc mutatur, vel tranſit in corpus Chriſti, vel tranſubſtantiatur, ſed nihilominus in aliis ſingularibus ſubjectatur. Oper. Hus. fol. 12. 2.

(8) Lenfant, tom. 1. lib. 3. pag. 309, 310.

[D] A Treatiſe concerning the Neceſſity of a Reformation of the Church, with reſpect to the Head and Members of it.] This Treatiſe was firſt publiſhed from a manuſcript at Vienna by Dr. Von der Hardt, who divided it into thirty chapters. The firſt chapter contains a general repreſentation of the corruption of the Church, and a confutation of the pretended infallibility of the Pope. " We are not to imagine, " ſays Ailli, that St. Peter by receiving the Keys " of the Church became exempt from the poſſibi- " lity of ſinning, ſince the whole time that he " continued upon earth, it was in his power to err " and ſin, according to the uſe, that he made of " his liberty. It is a miſtake to ſay, that when a " man is choſen Pope, he becomes a Saint upon " that very account, as the Canoniſts ſay, who pre- " tend that the Papal See finds the Pope a Saint, or " makes him ſo. We read that there have been " Popes who were heretics, necromancers, covetous, " proud, or criminal in other reſpects; ſo that it is a " great Paradox to ſay, that their election to the See " confers ſanctity upon them." In the ſecond chapter he ſhews, that in order to reſtore peace to the church, it was neceſſary to oblige the three competitors to agree, that he, who ſhould be choſen afterwards, ought to be a man of prudence and underſtanding, and of an exemplary life, and capable of executing that function. That ſuch a choice might be well managed, he was of the ſame opinion with Gerſon, that the whole affair was not to be committed to the Cardinals alone, but that the ableſt Prelates ſhould be joined with them; becauſe if the Cardinals had the election entirely in their power, they would certainly chooſe one of themſelves to the great ſcandal of the Church. I wiſh, ſays he, at the end of this chapter, that I could but ſee the three Popes, who are competitors, in their pontifical habits, acting each of them like Popes, and officiating pontifically at the ſame time! I am very certain that they would be ſo confounded to ſee themſelves altogether in this ſtation, that they would not heſitate a moment about reuniting the Church under one ſingle Head. The third chapter is againſt reſervations, and other ſimoniacal practices. He affirms, that the Church had been about 800 years without the leaſt mention of reſervations. In the fourth chapter he declares, that the Pope ſhould be obliged to obey the Decrees of the Council; otherwiſe the Archbiſhops and Biſhops ſhould be authorized to pay no longer any regard to him, and to reject his Bulls. In the fifth chapter he ſays, that the Pope ought not to be allowed to give the management of the patrimony of the Church of Rome to his nephews or relations, but to thoſe Cardinals, whoſe prudence and honeſty are well known, and who ſhould be choſen by the conſent of their whole College. He maintains in the ſixth chapter, that if this patrimony is well adminiſtred, it will be ſufficient to maintain the Pope in a very noble manner, without any occaſion for his reſerving the eccleſiaſtical benefices, to the prejudice of the Churches, and the Paſtors of them. In the ſame chapter he likewiſe repreſents very ſtrongly, that it is a great abuſe to give archbiſhoprics, biſhoprics, and abbeys in commendam to Cardinals, becauſe they commit them to the care of Mercenaries, who neglect the flock. Is it neceſſary, ſays he, that Cardinals ſhould live in ſo much pomp and ſplendor, and that a man, who was ſeen yeſterday walking in the ſtreets attended only with one Clergyman, as ſoon as ever he is made Cardinal, (FORTUNA ANNUENTE, i. e. " BY THE " FAVOUR OF FORTUNE,)" ſhould take up ſo much room, that the world is ſcarce capable of holding him, and ſhould be followed by as great a train, as if he was at the head of an army, juſt ready to join battle. In this manner the Cardinal ſpeaks of his brethren. The other chapters are employed in the firſt place againſt the reſervations, the original of which he aſcribes to Boniface VIII, John XXII, Benedict XII, Clement VI, and his Succeſſor; next, againſt ſimony, and the incapacity and unworthineſs of thoſe, who are raiſed to places in the church; and then againſt titular Biſhops, and thoſe, who do not take Orders; which abuſes were very frequent in Germany. He propoſes in the thirteenth chapter an aſſociation between the Emperor and the Pope, by which they engage to aſſiſt each other with their forces and authority, in order to recover the eſtates which have been wreſted both from the Empire and the Church in Italy and other Countries. In the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters he ſpeaks firſt of engaging the Turkiſh and Pagan Princes, who are converted to Chriſtianity, to ſwear ſolemnly to the Pope and the Emperor, that they will not make any treaty with Infidels and Schiſmatics; next he propoſes to mark out a general paſſage (9), in order to go and conquer the Holy Land, as it was executed under Pope Urban II, and the Emperor Henry V, at the time of a ſchiſm, and to raiſe for that purpoſe tenths throughout all Chriſtendom for the ſpace of three years. He pretends, that ſuch an expedition would extremely promote the union, becauſe it would purge Chriſtianity of a great number of bad ſubjects, who diſturb and divide it. It is much better, ſays he, to raiſe the tenths for a pious undertaking, than to grant them, as the Popes do, to Chriſtian Princes, in order that they might make war upon each other. We have two remarks of Ailli in the ſeventh and ninth chapters, which deſerve to be taken notice of; the firſt is, that the Popes by their reſervations had alienated ſeveral kingdoms from the Church of Rome, as Sicily, Bohemia, Hungary, England, Sweden, and Denmark; becauſe ſince the time of Boniface IX, the Clergy never

(9) Paſſagium generale.

Monaſteries and Monks [E], and to ſuffer people to work upon Feſtivals after ſervice was over [F]. He ſhewed himſelf favourable to the Jews [G].

never went out of thoſe kingdoms to the Court of Rome, in order to procure benefices. The other remark is, that as it was the ſimony of John XXIII, which had raiſed John Hus, and occaſioned all the troubles in Bohemia, there was no manner of hopes of appeaſing theſe diſorders, but by the reformation of the Court of Rome (10).

(10) Lenfant, tom. 2. l. 7. p. 295, & ſeq.

[E] Neceſſary to leſſen the number of Monaſteries and Monks.] He objected particularly againſt the Mendicant-Friars, who were very numerous and chargeable to the Public, and injurious to the real objects of charity; and he thought it extremely proper to prevent ſuch a great variety of orders, which muſt inevitably give occaſion to diſtinctions of vanity and pride and contention amongſt them. His words are as follow: Videtur mihi quod tanta religioſorum numeroſitas & varietas non expediat, quæ inducit ad varietatem morum, & quandoque ad contrarietatem & repugnantiam obſervationum, & ſæpe ad ſingularitatem & ad ſuperbiam & vanam extollentiam unius ſtatus ſuper alium. Et maximè videtur neceſſarium, ut diminuerentur Ordines Mendicantium, quia tot ſunt & in numero conventuum & in numero ſuppoſitorum, ut eorum ſtatus ſit oneroſus hominibus, damnoſus leproſis, hoſpitalibus ac aliis verè pauperibus, quibus convenit jus & verus titulus mendicandi, ipſis quoque curatis parochialibus, & ſi benè conſideretur, etiam præjudicialis omnibus eccleſiæ ſtatibus (11).

(11) Alliac. ap. Gerſon. tom. 2. p. 911.

[F] To work upon feſtivals after the ſervice was over.] The great number of holy-days was complained of at that time. Ailli expreſſed himſelf very ſtrongly upon this ſubject in his Treatiſe of Reformation, as well as upon the prodigious number of images and paintings in the churches. "Except on "Sundays and the great Feaſts of the Church, the "people ſhould be permitted to work on Feſtivals, "when the offices of the Church are over, as well "on account of the debauchery and exceſs, in "which the greateſt part of them ſpend thoſe days, "as from regard to the working people, who have "occaſion for their whole time, in order to maintain "themſelves (12)."

(12) Ibid. p. 91. and Lenfant, tom. 2. l. 7. pag. 357.

[G] Favourable to the Jews.] The Jews had been all along expoſed to the utmoſt ſeverities and perſecutions; they were baniſhed from England in 1291 (13) from France in 1295, and from ſeveral parts of Germany in 1298. Innocent III, and Clement V, iſſued out Bulls, in order to diſcover thoſe Jews, who had exerciſed uſury, and to oblige them to refund the intereſt of the money, which they had lent to the Chriſtians. In ſhort they were very often maſſacred upon the pretence of crucifying Chriſtian children, and ſtealing and tearing to pieces the hoſt. But Ailli and Henry of Heſſe, a famous Doctor, who was contemporary with him, expreſſed themſelves in favour of the Jews; the former in his Treatiſe of Reformation, and the latter in his Counſel of Peace (14). Ailli declares, that the Jews, who were converted, ought to be left in poſſeſſion of their eſtates, leſt being preſſed by poverty they ſhould turn apoſtates, and accuſe the Chriſtians of impiety. Item ut Judæorum converſorum bona non rapiant, ſed ad vitæ neceſſitatem eis poſſidere permittant, ne egeſtate compulſi apoſtatent, & Chriſtianos impietatis arguant (15). However the regulation of the College of Reformation at Conſtance was not extended very far with regard to the Jews. It was only determined, that when a Jew was inclined to become a convert, he ſhould be obliged to give up but half his goods as well moveable as immoveable, by way of reſtitution for his uſury among Chriſtians, and that the other half ſhould be left him by way of Alms, for the ſupport of himſelf and his family. The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to ſee ſo equitable a Decree of that Council in the original Latin. Quia, ut expertum, quam plurimi Judæi utriuſque ſexus homines, per uſuram acquiſita reſtituere metuentes, ad Chriſtianiſmum ſuſcipiendum aliàs ſatis inclinati, ſeorſim abierunt, in ſuâ perfidiâ tanquam deſperati remanentes. Ideo hæc Synodus ſacroſancta decernit & ordinat, quod Judæus ad fidem Catholicam venire volens, non niſi in quantum medietas ejus ſubſtantiæ, tam in mobilibus quàm immobilibus ſe extendit, eis à quibus uſuras, ſi ſuperſint, recepit, alioquin hæredibus ſecundùm proportionem uſurarum receptarum, reſtituere teneatur; reliquâ medietate ſibi & ſuis liberis abſque mendicitate educandis in modum eleemoſynæ miſericorditer derelicta (16).

(13) Cave, Hiſt. Litt. p. 667. ed. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(14) Apud Gerſon. tom. 2. pag. 838.

(15) Alliac. apud Gerſon. tom. 2. p. 915.

(16) See Lenfant, tom. 2. l. 7. p. 361, 562.

T.

☞AILRED, ÆLRED, EALRED, or ETHELRED, a Monk of the Ciſtercian Order, was Abbot of Riveſby in Lincolnſhire (a). He flouriſhed about the year 1150. He was educated in Scotland with Henry the ſon of David King of Scots; after which he returned to England, where he retired to the Monaſtery abovementioned, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the extraordinary ſanctity of his life, and the extent of his learning, for he was a maſter of every branch of Literature. His merit alone raiſed him to the dignity of Abbot of that Convent, where he wrote ſeveral pieces [A]. He was highly eſteemed

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Litt. Sæc. xii. p. 585. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

[A] He wrote ſeveral pieces.] Hiſtoria de Vita & Miraculis S. Edwardi Regis & Confeſſoris; That is, "The Hiſtory of the Life and Miracles of St. Ed"ward the King and Confeſſor;" printed among the Engliſh writers publiſhed by Twiſden at London 1652 (1). The Life of St. Edward the King dedicated to Laurence Abbot of Weſtminſter, and written in Elegiac Verſe, is extant in Manuſcript in Genvil and Caius College at Cambridge (2). Genealogia Regum Anglorum, i. e. "The Genealogy of the Kings "of England," printed in Twiſden's Collection (3). De Bello Standardii tempore Stephani Regis, anno 1138 (4). i. e. "Of the Standard War in the time "of King Stephen in the year 1138." Hiſtoria de Sanctimoniali de Watthun (5). i. e. "The Hiſtory "of the Nun of Watthun." Sermones de tempore & Sanctis. i. e. "Sermons upon Time and the "Saints." In Iſaiam Prophetam Sermones XXXI. i. e. "Thirty one Sermons upon the Prophet Iſaiah." Speculum Charitatis Libris III. cum Compendio ejuſdem. i. e. "The Mirror of Charity in three Books, "with an Abridgment of it." Tractatus de puero Jeſu duodecenni in illud Luc. II, cum factus eſſet Jeſus &c. i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning the child "Jeſus when he was twelve years old, upon that "paſſage of St. Luke ii. when he was twelve years "old, &c." publiſhed by David Camerarius (6). De Spirituali Amicitia Lib. III. i. e. "Of Spiritual Friend"ſhip, in three Books." Theſe five laſt pieces were publiſhed by Richard Gibbons a Jeſuit at Doway 1631, and in the Bibliotheca Ciſtercienſis (7), and in the Bibliotheca Patrum (8). Regula ad Incluſas ſeu Moniales; i. e. "Rules for the Nuns", falſely aſcribed to St. Auſtin, but printed in Ailred's name in Holſtenius's Collection of Rules (9). Tractatus de Dominica infra Octavas Epiphaniæ, & Sermones XI de Oneribus Eſaiæ; i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning the "Sunday before the Octaves of Epiphany, and ele"ven Sermons upon Iſaiah's Burdens," printed among St. Bernard's works. The reader will find in Bale and Pits an account of his other works, which are not now extant, or were never publiſhed; and a very exact catalogue of thoſe writings of his, which are ſtill in Manuſcript, with the Libraries where they are to be found, in Oudin (10). His Speculum Charitatis, is an excellent work, and full of noble maxims concerning the love of God, and other Chriſtian virtues; and his Treatiſe De Spirituali Amicitia is written in the manner of a Dialogue, wherein he endeavours to ſhew, that there can be no true and ſolid friendſhip, but between Chriſtians and Men of Virtue.

(1) Pag. 369.

(2) Claſs B. Codice 52.

(3) P. 347.

(4) Ibid. p. 337.

(5) Ibid. p. 415.

(6) De Sectorum Fortitudine, l. 3. c. 41. Pariſ. 1631.

(7) Tom. 5. p. 16.

(8) Tom. 23. p. 1.

(9) Part 3. pag. 109.

(10) Ubi ſupra, Col. 1488, 1489, 1490, 1491, 1492.

T.

esteemed during the reigns of King Stephen and Henry II; and he was canonized on account of the miracles which he is said to have performed after his death. Leland, who gives this account of him (b), supposes that he was born in Scotland, and afterwards came into England; but Dr. Cave is of opinion that he was born in England, and educated in Scotland, where he refused a Bishoprick that was offered him, and returned to England. This point is accurately discussed in Dempster (c). He died the 12th of January 1166 (d). He applied himself to a devotional kind of writing, and endeavoured to imitate St. Bernard in his manner.

(b) In a Manuscript life of him quoted by Oudin, Comment. de Scriptor. & Scriptis Eccles. tom. 2. Sæc. 12. Col. 1487. edit. Lipsiæ 1722.

(c) In Apparatu ad Historiam Scoticam, in Menologio die 5 Jan. & in Hist. Eccles. l. 5. c. 457.

(d) Cave and Oudin, ubi supra.

AIMON Prince of the Ardennes, was the father, it is said (a), of the four Heroes, which our old Romances speak so magnificently of. They are generally called the Four Sons of Aimon. They had but one horse among them all, which was named Bayard. I should not have mentioned a thing, which is considered only as an idle tale, but for the sake of observing, that these grotesque stories of our old Romance-writers, and their Tales of Knights-Errant, have broken in even upon our religion itself. The superstition of the people have brought them into their devotion; and if any one had at first told these impertinent writers, Hæ nugæ seria ducunt in mala (b): i. e. "These trifles will involve us in serious consequences," he would have proved a true Prophet. The History of Luxembourgh, written by John Bartols, Abbot of Epternach, acquaints us, that Renaud, the eldest of these four brothers, suffered martyrdom for the name of Jesus Christ, and was canonized, and that the church observes his feast; and that he had churches dedicated to him, and particularly that of St. Renaud in the territories of Cologne, to which is joined a Convent of Nuns. There is likewise at Cologne a church of the same Saint, near that of St. Maurice, and in it the picture of the four brothers upon the wall. They are all seated upon the same horse, and the eldest of them Renaud had a Diadem [α] round his head, as a mark of his being a Saint. It is pretended, that after he had been a great soldier under Charlemagne, he became a Monk at Cologne (c), and died a Martyr; and that upon the account of the miracles, which he did after his death, he had a church dedicated to him (d).

(a) Johan. Bertols Hist. Luxemb. in Descript. Oppidi Cbimiacbi.

(b) Horat. de Arte Poet.

(c) Ferrarius in in Catal. Sanctor. ad 7 Januar.

(d) See Voetii Disput. Theolog. tom. 3. p. 508.

(α) The common word is Aureole, a Glory, from the Latin Aureola, used in that signification, but ironically, by the University of Cracow, in the following passage, published in pag. 585 of the 1st Tome (2d edit. Amster. 1726) of the History of the Council of Constance, by Mr. Lenfant. Si fines inclyti Regni Poloniæ tanquam Vulpeculæ ..... subintrare satagerent (Hussitæ) non ignius apud nos ac apud vos facibus flammeis vestiti, pro suis dogmatibus ignitas exciperent aureolas. i. e. "If these Hussites, like "Foxes, should attempt to steal into our famous "Kingdom of Poland, we would as carefully seek "them out, as you have done, and commit them to "the flames; so that for their heretical opinions "they should infallibly receive Crowns of Fire." See Menage in the word Aureole in his Dict. Etym. CRIT. REM.

☞ AIRAY (HENRY) an eminent Calvinistical Divine of the Church of England, was born in Westmoreland, and educated in Grammar learning by the care of Bernard Gilpin, who was called The Northern Apostle. He was sent by him in 1579, when he was about nineteen years of age, to St. Edmund's Hall in Oxford, where he was supported by Gilpin's generosity, who likewise left him a legacy in his last will, dated 27th October 1582. Soon after he was translated to Queen's College, where he passed through the lower offices of pauper puer serviens (a), and Tabarder (b), till he took the degree of Master of Arts and was made Fellow in 1586. About the same time he entered into holy orders, and became a frequent and zealous preacher in the University, particularly in the church of St. Peter in the East joining to Queen's College. In 1594 he took the degree of Batchelor of Divinity, and was elected four years after Provost of his College. In 1600 he commenced Doctor of Divinity, and six years after was made Vice-Chancellor of the University. In this office he shewed himself a zealous maintainer of the Calvinistical opinions, which were the current doctrines of the Church of England at that time. He was highly esteemed by those of his own sentiments [A]. He wrote several works [B], and died in Queen's College the tenth of October 1616, being fifty seven years of age, and was buried in the inner chapel of that College. He had two monuments with inscriptions erected to his memory (c). There was likewise another

(a) That is, a poor serving child, who waits on the Fellows in the Common Hall at meals, and in their chambers, and does other servile work in the College.

(b) Tabardus, or Tabardarius, called so because they wore formerly Coats or upper Gowns, very like those of Heralds.

(c) Wood's Athenæ Oxon. vol. 1. Col. 408, 409. 2d edit. 1721.

[A] He was highly esteemed by those of his own sentiments.] They said, that notwithstanding his resolutions to continue in obscurity, and his inclination to a retired and private life, his integrity, learning, and indefatigable pains in the discharge of his ministerial functions were so eminent, that he could not conceal himself from the eye of the world, but was soon brought out of his retirement to the most considerable offices of the university. His care and dexterity in the government of his college were likewise very remarkable; and many persons of distinguished merit in Church and State were formed under his discipline.

[B] He wrote several works.] They were all printed after his death; and are as follows: Lectures upon the whole Epistle of St. Paul to the Philippians. London 1618, 4to. These Lectures were preached in the Church of St. Peter in the East in Oxon, and published after his death by Christopher Potter Fellow of Queen's College. The just and necessary Apology touching his suit in law for the Rectory of Charlton on Otmore in Oxfordshire. London 1621, 8vo, published by Potter. A Treatise against bowing at the Name of Jesus. Mr. Wood does not mention when it was printed. This point of bowing at the name of Jesus was much controverted between the old Puritans and some members of the Church of England; and divers pieces were written on both sides. Tho. Beacon, an old Calvinist, had long before wrote upon that subject; and Dr. William Whitaker, and Dr. Andrew Willet, two famous Divines, who were contemporaries with our author, published Tracts to the same purpose.

another author of the ſame name, Chriſtopher Airy, born at Clifton in Weſtmorland, who became a ſtudent in Queen's College in Michaelmas Term 1621, and at laſt Fellow and Maſter of Arts. He took the degrees of Batchelor of Divinity in 1642, and was made Vicar of Milford in Hampſhire. He died the 18th of October 1670, being ſixty nine years of age, and was buried in the Chancel of the Church of Milford. He wrote beſides other things not mentioned by Mr. Wood a piece intitled, Faſciculus præceptorum Logicalium in gratiam Juventutis Academiæ compoſitus; i. e. "A Collection of "of the Rules of Logic for the Uſe of the Students of the Univerſity." Oxon. 1660, 2d ed. 8vo (d). We ſhall give his Epitaph below [C].

(d) Wood, Vol. 2. Col. 470.

[C] We ſhall give his Epitaph below.] Memoriæ ſacrum Chriſtophori Airay S. T. Bac. olim Colle. Reg. Oxon. Socii, & hujus Eccleſiæ Vicarii vigilantiſſimi, Viri ſummæ integritatis, judicii acerrimi, & ingenii literarum omnium capacis; qui difficillimo ſeculo inter æſtuantes rerum fluctus clavum rectum tenuit. Mortalitatem tandem exuit 18 Oct. annos natus 69, &c. That is, "Sacred to the memory of Chriſtopher Airay Batchelor of Divinity, formerly Fellow of "Queen's College, and the very vigilant Vicar of this "Church; a Man of the moſt exemplary integrity, "and penetrating judgment, and of a genius capable "of all kinds of learning; who in the moſt difficult times, amidſt all the ſtorms, which agitated "the kingdom, ſtill kept himſelf firm and reſolved "in the right courſe. He put off mortality the 18th "of October, being 69 years of age, &c." T.

☞AISTULPHUS the twenty ſecond King of the Lombards (a), ſucceeded his brother Rachid, who had retired into a Monaſtery, A. D. 750 (b). The Emperors of Conſtantinople had then already loſt whatever they poſſeſſed in Italy except the Exarchate of Ravenna; Rome with its Duchy, including part of Tuſcany and Campania, revolting in the year 726, became a free State under the Government of the Senate of the City. At that time the Lombards alſo being zealous for the worſhip of Images, and pretending to favour the cauſe of the Pope, invaded the Cities of the Exarchate, and at length A. D. 752, Aiſtulphus, King of Lombardy, took the city of Ravenna and put an end to the Exarchate (c). The Popes were not pleaſed to ſee that country in the hands of Lombards, they thought it would have been much better if they had been themſelves poſſeſſed of it; and as long as it belonged to the Emperors they were in hopes of getting it, becauſe the Emperors reſiding at Conſtantinople could not eaſily defend thoſe countries they ſtill poſſeſſed in Italy. Therefore Pope Stephen III. knowing better how to deal with the Greek Emperor, as Sir Iſaac Newton ſays (d), than with the Lombards, went to Aiſtulphus and intreated him to return the Exarchate to the Emperor [A]. But this not ſucceeding he went into France*, and perſuaded King Pipin to take the Exarchate and Pentapolis from the Lombards, and give it to St. Peter (e). At that time Aiſtulphus endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of Rome; he had already put the city and the country round about it under contribution, requiring a piece of gold from every perſon at Rome (f): Pipin firſt ſent Embaſſadors to Aiſtulphus, demanding of him not to commit any hoſtilities in the territories of Rome, and to reſtore the cities he had taken, which the Pope claimed as belonging to St. Peter's Patrimony. Aiſtulphus received the Embaſſadors very honourably, but yet he refuſed to comply with their requeſt, and in his turn ſent an Embaſſador to Pipin, no doubt, in order to repreſent his own right to the Provinces which the Pope claimed [B]. The King of France finding that Aiſtulphus would not hearken to his Embaſſadors, entered the next year into Italy, and advanced as far as Maurienne (g). As ſoon as Aiſtulphus was acquainted with it he came with all his forces againſt the French, but

(a) Excerpta Chron. Sancti Vincentii De Vulturno, apud Du Cheſne, Hiſt. Franc. Scriptor. tom. 3. p. 693.

(b) Petav. Rat. Temp. tom. 1. l. 8. cap. 7. pag. 334.

(c) Paul. Diac. Hiſt. Longobar. l. 6. apud Du Cheſne, ibid. tom. 2. pag. 205. Sigon. de Regn. Ital. ad ann. 726, 752. ap. Newton, Obſervat. upon the Prophec. of Daniel, p. 78.

(d) Ibid.

* A. C. 753.

(e) Newton, ib.

(f) Excerpta Chron. St. Vincent. apud Du Cheſne, ubi ſupra, tom. 3. p. 693.

(g) A County in Savoy.

[A] Stephen III knowing better how to treat with the Greek Emperor than with the Lombards, went to Aiſtulphus and entreated him to return the Exarchate to the Emperor.] The cunning Pope, who wanted to encreaſe his power, knew very well that the Emperor being far off, and moreover encompaſſed with enemies on every ſide, could not eaſily maintain his dominions in Italy. Whereas the King of Lombardy being next at hand was in a condition to keep all the conqueſts he could make, and was too hard a match for the Popes. Stephen under pretence of maintaining the Emperor's cauſe, pleaded his own; he was perſuaded, that if once the Exarchate was out of the hands of the Lombards, it would be an eaſy matter for him to become maſter of it. Aiſtulphus was wiſe enough to know that the Popes were already too powerful, and that their tyranny would become inſufferable, if the temporal ſword was added to the ſpiritual, of which he knew how to make uſe with pride and inſolence. But Pipin's ſtupidity is ſurprizing; he knew how powerful the Popes were already, tho' they had not yet any temporal dominions, ſince it was to Pope Zechary he owed the Crown; and how uncontroulable muſt their authority be if they became temporal Princes, yet Pipin, by an untimely gratitude laboured to forge chains, by which he himſelf might be enſlaved. It is to him the Popes are indebted for their dower, which in a little time they improved to ſuch a degree, that they really reigned over all the ſovereign Princes of Europe.

[B] Aiſtulphus ſent an Embaſſador to Pipin, in order to repreſent his own right &c.] This Embaſſador was Carloman Pipin's own brother, a Benedictine Monk. He had orders to anſwer the arguments, which the Pope's Embaſſadors might alledge, and to oppoſe all their efforts. But his endeavours were all in vain; for the King having detected Aiſtulphus's craft, was the more confirmed in his reſolution to ſupport the cauſe of God's Church and of the Pope. It is worth while to ſee in what manner the author, who tells us this circumſtance, expreſſes himſelf. Nefandiſſimus Aiſtulphus, ſays he (1), Carolomannum fratrem benigniſſimi Pipini Regis in Monaſterio beati Benedicti, in quo devotè per evolutum temporis ſpacium monachicè degebat, diabolicis eum ſuaſionibus ſuadens, Franciæ provinciam ad objiciendum atque averſandum cauſæ redemptionis ſanctæ Dei Eccleſiæ, & Reipublicæ Romanorum, direxit. Dumque illuc conjunxiſſet, nitebatur omninò, & vehementius decertabat. Sanctæ Dei Eccleſiæ cauſas ſubvertere juxta quod à præfato nec dicendo Aiſtulfo Tyranno fuerat directus. Sed propitiante Domino minimè valuit ſui germani Chriſtianiſſimi Pipini Regis Francorum in hoc firmiſſimum cor inclinare. Potius autem compertâ nequiſſimi Aiſtulfi verſutiâ, totâ ſe virtute idem excellentiſſimus Pipinus

(1) Anaſtaſius, Bibliotb. in Vit. Stephani III. ap. Du Cheſne, tom. 2. p. 210.

but his army was routed and himſelf obliged to fly to Pavia, the capital city of his Kingdom. Pipin purſued him cloſely, and pitched his camp very near Pavia, having firſt burnt and laid waſte all the country through which he paſt. Aiſtulphus finding himſelf very much ſtraitened began to propoſe articles of peace; he promiſed never to moleſt the Pope again, to reſtore him whatever belonged to the Church, and never to recede from the allegiance he owed to the King of France. Pipin, who as my Author ſays (b), was a very compaſſionate Prince, accepted Aiſtulphus's propoſals, who ſwore to the promiſes he made, and gave moreover hoſtages to aſcertain the performance of them. Pipin having ſent the Pope with great ſolemnity to Rome, returned into France with a large booty. Aiſtulphus ſoon forgot all his promiſes, which in all likelihood he made only with an intention to break them on the firſt opportunity; for the next year, to revenge himſelf on the Pope, he beſieged the city of Rome [C]. The Pope immediately ſent Letters to Pipin [D], wherein he told him, that if he came not ſpeedily againſt the Lombards, he would excommunicate him, and deprive him of eternal life, according to the power, which was given him; Pro data ſibi potentia alienandum ſore (Regem) a Regno Dei & vitâ æternâ. Pipin fearing a revolt of his ſubjects, and being indebted to the Church of Rome, came ſpeedily with an army into Italy, raiſed the ſiege of Rome, beſieged the Lombards in Pavia, and forced them to ſurrender the Exarchate of Ravenna, and the region of Pentapolis [E] to the Pope for a perpetual poſſeſſion [F] (i); and he ſent Fulrad one of his Counſellors an Abbot and Prieſt to receive all the Cities from Aiſtulphus, to take hoſtages out of every one of them (k), who were delivered into the hands of the Pope, who thus became Lord of Ravenna and the Exarchate, a few cities excepted; and the keys were ſent to Rome and laid upon the confeſſion of St. Peter, that is upon his tomb at the high altar, in ſignum veri & perpetui dominii, ſed pietate Regis gratuita. That is, "As a token of a real and perpetual dominion, but freely granted by the King's piety," as the inſcription of a coin of Pipin has it. This was in the year of Chriſt 755 (l). Aiſtulphus intended to take thoſe

(b) Frederici Scholaſtici Chron. apud Du Cheſne, tom. 1. p. 774.

(i) Newton, ubi ſupra, p. 79.

(k) Anaſtaſius, Bibliotb. ap. Du Cheſne, ubi ſupra, tom. 2. pag. 212.

(l) Newton, ubi ſupra.

Pipinus Francorum Rex profeſſus eſt decertare pro causâ ſanctæ Dei Eccleſiæ, ſicut pridem jam fato beatiſſimo ſpoponderat Pontifici. That is, "The abominable Aiſtulphus has ſent Carloman the moſt gracious King Pipin's brother into France, who has lived for ſome time very devoutly, and as a Monk in the convent of the Benedictines, perſuading him with diabolical reaſons to object againſt and oppoſe the cauſe of the reſtauration of God's holy Church and of the Roman Commonwealth. When he was come he endeavoured and ſtrove with all his might to overthrow the cauſe of the holy Church, according to the direction he had received from the aforeſaid, and not to be named Tyrant Aiſtulphus. But thank God he has not been able to bend that way the moſt firm and unſhaken heart of his brother the moſt Chriſtian Pipin King of the Franks. For having found out the artifice of the moſt wicked Aiſtulphus the ſaid moſt excellent Pipin King of the Franks has declared that he would fight with all his power for the cauſe of God's holy Church, as he had promiſed it to the aforeſaid moſt bleſſed Pontiff." We have tranſlated this paſſage as literally as we could, to give thoſe of our readers, who don't underſtand Latin, a notion of the ſtyle and manner of writing of the monaſtic authors.

[C] He beſieged the city of Rome.] He had raiſed for that purpoſe a very powerful army, and having ſurrounded the city, he aſſaulted it every day during three months: He alſo deſtroyed by fire and ſword the country round about, and did all that lay in his power to take the city. He alſo dug up the holy remains of the Saints, and carried them away to the great damage of his ſoul, Corpora Sanctorum effodiens eorum ſacra Myſteria ad magnum animæ ſuæ detrimentum abſtulit (2). He alſo took again the fort or town of Narni (3), which he had before ſurrendred by Pipin's Embaſſadors, and which of right belonged to St. Peter (4).

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 211.

(3) Situated in Umbria, and now belonging to the ſtate of the Church, or the Pope.

(4) Id. ibid.

[D] The Pope ſent Letters to Pipin.] This is what Sir Iſaac Newton tells us (5) from Sigonius, but another author tells us that he went by ſea into France (6). It may be that the Pope wrote to Pipin before he went to meet him, or perhaps the author quoted in the margin (6), has blended together Aiſtulphus's two wars againſt the Pope. For theſe are his words; Aiſtulfus Longobardorum Rex Ravennam cepit, Romamque obſedit menſibus tribus; quâ ex causâ Pontifex in Franciam ad excellentiſſimum Regem Pipinum ire compulſus eſt. That is, "Aiſtulphus King of the "Lombards took Ravenna and beſieged Rome, for "which reaſon the Pope was obliged to go into "France to the moſt excellent King Pipin." It appears by theſe words, that this author thought the ſiege of Rome immediately followed the taking of Ravenna, whereas there are ſeveral years between theſe two events (7).

(5) Ubi ſupra.

(6) Leo Marſicanus, Chron. Monaſt. Caſſinenſis, ap. eund. tom. 3. p. 645.

[E] The Exarchate of Ravenna, and the Region of Pentapolis.] Aiſtulphus was obliged to ſurrender the following cities and towns, viz. Ravenna, Rimini, Peſaro, Conca (8), Ceſena, Sinigaglia, Fotli, Forlimpopoli, Monfeltro, with the city of Narni (9), and ſeveral other places, which are now ſcarce known, but which were at that time very conſiderable.

(7) Rheginon's Chron. apud Piſtorium, Rer. Germ. Script. edit. 3ª a Bureb. Gotbelf. Struvio An. 1726. tom. 1. part 1. p. 32, 33.

(8) A town which it is thought has been waſhed away by the ſea.

(9) Anaſtaſius, ubi ſupra, p. 212.

[F] To the Pope for a perpetual poſſeſſion.] The Author of a book intituled, The Right of the Emperor over the State of the Church, "Les droits de l'Empereur ſur l'etat Eccleſiaſtique", tranſlated out of Italian into French, and printed in the year 1713 at Utrecht, maintains, that, Pipin did not return the Exarchate to the Pope who had no right to it, but Reipublicæ Romanæ, to the Roman Commonwealth: That afterwards indeed he gave or at leaſt boaſted he had given it to the Pope, but that this gift was unlawful and void (10). That book was dedicated to the Emperor, and written at the time that he and the Pope were at variance concerning the Duchy of Commachio. We muſt obſerve here, that Anaſtaſius, when he ſpeaks of the Exarchate of Ravenna and Pentapolis, expreſſes himſelf in ſuch a manner, as to ſhew that they belonged to the Roman Commonwealth, Jura Reipublicæ, indeed he does almoſt always join the Church to the State, Sanctæ Dei Eccleſiæ ac Reipublicæ Jura. And when Conſtantine Copronyme ſent Embaſſadors to Pipin, to claim for himſelf the City and Exarchate of Ravenna, together with the other cities and territories, which Aiſtulphus had took, Pipin anſwered that theſe cities and territories could by no means be alienated from the power of St. Peter, or from the right of the Roman Church, or of the Biſhop of the Apoſtolick See. Nulla penitus Ratione eaſdem Civitates a poteſtate beati Petri & jure Eccleſiæ Romanæ vel Pontificis Apoſtolicæ ſedis quoquo modo alienari (11). Here indeed the Pope is joined with St. Peter and the Church, but in ſeveral other places no mention is made of the Pope, but only of St. Peter and the Roman Commonwealth. It muſt alſo be obſerved, that the Pope at firſt claimed thoſe Cities, not for himſelf but for the Emperor Conſtantine, which ſhews that he had no right to poſſeſs them; and how could violence and conqueſt give King Pipin any right to diſpoſe of them?

(10) See Les Droits de l'Emp. &c. p. 32, 43.

(11) Anaſtaſius, ubi ſupra.

thoſe cities again by main force, but he was prevented by death, being killed by a fall from his horſe as he was hunting, A. D. 756 (m). The monaſtick writers give him the moſt opprobrious language, and ſpeak of him in the moſt outragious manner; but as they don't relate any particular action that might be the ground of the ill character they give him, we may ſuppoſe that they blackened his reputation only becauſe he oppoſed the ambition and covetouſneſs of the Pope; this was ſufficient to gain him the character of the worſt of tyrants.

(m) Anaſtaſ. ubi ſupra. Sigebert. Gemblacenſ. ad ann. 756. apud Piſtor. ubi ſupra, tom. 1. Part 2. p. 775.

AITZEMA (LEO D') a Gentleman of Friſeland, born at Doccum in the year 1600, was Counſellor to the Hans-Towns, and their Reſident at the Hague. He compiled an Hiſtory of the United Provinces, which has ſold very well, and is of great uſe to thoſe who are employed in political affairs; for we have in that work word for word treaties of peace, inſtructions and memoirs of Ambaſſadors, letters and anſwers of Princes, capitulations of Cities, and other publick acts in their original language, and then tranſlated into Dutch, in which language the hiſtory itſelf is written. There have been two editions of it [A]. Though it is moſt conſiderable on account of the authentic pieces, which the Author has collected with a great deal of patience and application, yet I ſhould not venture to paſs ſuch a judgment upon the reſt as Mr. de Wicquefort has done [B]. I have heard that this Hiſtorian ſpeaks in a very free and unprejudiced manner concerning the diſputes relating to religion. Mr. Arnaud cites him for a circumſtance, which is not very advantageous to the character of the Proteſtants (a). Valerius Andreas mentions one Leo Aetſma, a Friſelander, who publiſhed his Juvenile Latin Poems at Franeker in the year 1617 (b). There are ſome of opinion, that this Poet is the ſame with the Hiſtorian, whom we are ſpeaking of in this Article (c). Leo d'Aitzema died at the Hague the 23d of February 1669, after he had been about forty years Reſident for the Hans-Towns, which place was procured him by Foppius d'Aitzema his uncle, Reſident for Holland at Hambourg [C]. Our Leo was a man of great probity, good-nature and affability, charitable to the poor, and very well verſed in politics. He ſpoke divers languages, the High Dutch, French, Italian and Engliſh. His father was Secretary to the Admiralty in Friſeland (d). It will not be improper to obſerve, that there has been publiſhed a continuation of Aitzema in three volumes in folio; the firſt extends from 1669 to 1679; the ſecond from 1679 to 1687; and the third from 1687 to 1692 (e). A Miniſter named Aitzema, has writ a piece in Dutch concerning the Sibylls.

(a) See l'Apologie pour les Catholiques, Part 2. p. 267.

(b) Valerius Andr. Bib. Belgica, p. 623.

(c) Konig, Bibliotb. p. 19.

(d) The Admiralty reſided then at Doccum, but at preſent at Harlingen.

(e) Theſe volumes are printed at Amſterdam, the firſt in 1685, the ſecond in 1688, and the third in 1698.

[A] There have been two editions of his Hiſtory.] The firſt contains fifteen volumes in 4°, which were printed one after another; the firſt in 1657, and the laſt in 1671. The firſt begins with the ceſſation of the truce, which was concluded between Spain and the United Provinces by the mediation of Henry the Great, and extends from the year 1621 to the year 1625. The laſt contains the Hiſtory of the year 1668. The ſecond edition is in ſeven volumes in folio, which were printed in 1669 and 1671. The laſt volume contains a general table of the other ſix, with an Account of the Peace of Munſter, and a Treatiſe entitled, Le Lion retabli, or The Lion reſtored, which contains an account of affairs in the United Provinces in 1650, and 1651, with regard to ſeveral important offices, which were then filled up. This Treatiſe was publiſhed before in the year 1652, in 4to. The Account of the Peace of Munſter was publiſhed in Latin in 1654.

[B] As Mr. de Wicquefort has done.] It is Aitzema, whom he ſpeaks of in the following words. "The Hiſtory, or Account of Affairs of State and War, "which was written in Holland in fourteen or fifteen volumes, contains ſeveral Treaties, Reſolutions, and other authentic pieces; ſo that it may "ſerve as a treaſury for thoſe, who have not acceſs "to the Records of State; but what the author gives "us of his own, is not worth a Gazette, in what"ever light you conſider it. He has no manner of "ſtyle; his language is abſolutely barbarous; and "the compoſition of his work is a mere chaos. He "has this in common with the greateſt part of thoſe, "who attempt to write Hiſtory without any proper "authority or permiſſion, and generally without "judgment or veracity (1)." We muſt confeſs this judgment is very ſevere and offenſive to a great many perſons.

(1) Wicquefort. de l'Ambaſſadeur, tom. 1. p. 172. See likewiſe p. 446.

[C] Foppius d'Aitzema his uncle, Reſident for Holland at Hambourg.] I find a paſſage relating to him in one of the volumes of Puffendorf, I obſerve there, that in 1636 this Foppius, then Envoy from the United Provinces to the Emperor, affirmed at Ratisbon, Salvius had written that the Swedes were willing to begin to negotiate a peace at the Court of Vienna; and that Salvius denied this (2). However Foppius was very earneſt to negotiate a peace; but the Swede did not think him proper for ſuch a work; and it was thought ridiculous, that he ſhould intermeddle in ſo great a deſign, when it was evident, that ſince he was gone over to the Romiſh Communion, he took every method imaginable to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of the Emperor. Nec Aitzema idoneus tantæ rei autor habebatur, omnibus, qui hominem nôrant, irridentibus, quod iſte heicſe ingerere non dubitaret; quem præſertim poſt ſuſcepta ſacra Romana gratiæ Cæſaris omnibus modis adrepere conſtabat (3).

(2) Puffendorf, de Rebus Suecicis, lib. 9. p. 296. num. 53. ad ann. 1637.

(3) Idem, ibid.

AKAKIA (MARTIN) Profeſſor of Phyſick in the Univerſity of Paris in the ſixteenth Century, was born at Chalons in Champagne [A]. He was named Sans-Malice, that is, without Malice; but according to the cuſtom of that age he changed his name to that of Akakia [B], which ſignifies in Greek the ſame as Sans-Malice in French.

[A] He was born at Châlons in Champagne.] Moreri, not underſtanding the meaning of Catanenſis, imagined ſeriouſly that Akakia was a Catalan. He was of Catalonia, ſays he; and to compleat his blunder, he refers us to Quenſtedt, who tells us poſitively, that this Phyſician was of Châlons, a city, whoſe Biſhop calls himſelf a Count and Peer of France (1).

(1) Quenſtedt de Patriis Viror. Erud. p. 51.

[B] He was named Sans-malice; but he changed his name to that of Akakia.] This is teſtified by René Moreau in his Life of Sylvius, and by Gabriel Naudè in his Judgment upon Auguſtin Niphus (2). See likewiſe la Mothe le Vayer p. 277 of the xiith tome of his works; and Mr. Menage in his Origines de la Langue Françoiſe (3). Father Labbe is of opinion, that

(2) Fol. 3.

(3) Pag. 4. of the Paris edition in 1694 in folio.

French. He tranſmitted this name down to his deſcendants, who bear it to this day. He made a very conſiderable progreſs at Paris under Profeſſor Peter Briſſot (a), and he learned from him the greateſt part of what he afterwards publiſhed upon Galen [C]. He was made Doctor of the Faculty of Phyſick at Paris in 1526. Francis I, one of whoſe chief Phyſicians he was, had a great eſteem for him. I cannot tell in what year he was made Profeſſor of Phyſick, but he was ſo, when Geſner publiſhed his Bibliotheca, that is, in 1545. He died in 1551. His arms were Gules with a Croſſet d'or and four Cubes of the ſame, and this Motto; Quæcunque ferat fortuna, ferenda eſt; that is, "We muſt bear whatever fortune brings." He married Mary Chauveau widow of Silvain de Monthelon, by whom he had one ſon, who was Profeſſor of Phyſick, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Almoſt all his deſcendants have followed the ſame courſe of life; but there was one who applied himſelf to ſomething elſe than Phyſick [D]. Thoſe who have placed the death of our Martin Akakia in 1605, are ſtrangely miſtaken [E]. Marot ſpeaks of him with commendation; what he ſays is quoted by Mr. Menage (b).

(a) Moreau in Vitâ Briſſoti.

(b) Menage, Orig. de la Langue Franҫiſe, p. 4.

that this is only ex poſt facto, or a pretty alluſion, or rather a nick-name, which was given him, and which afterwards became the common name of the family (4). He founds this opinion upon two reaſons; the firſt is, that Ἀκακία ſignifies not a man, who is free from all malice, but a freedom from malice in the abſtract. The ſecond is, that this Phyſician of Francis I would have written it ACACIA, or ACAKIA, if he had aſſumed a name derived from the Greek. To confirm the former reaſon, he adds, that this Phyſician, if he had been before called Sans-malice, would with greater propriety have quitted the feminine Ἀκακία, and taken up a more maſculine name, and one nearer to Ἀκάκιος, Acacius, words, which were very common amongſt the Greeks and Latins. Who could forbear laughing at his ſimplicity, who, when his family-name was BALD, or VIRTUOUS, ſhould turn it into Greek, and call himſelf Ἀλωπικία or Ἀρετή? Theſe arguments are very weak. As for the ſecond, it muſt be confeſſed, that in propriety he ſhould have written either Acacia, or Akakia, but I am of opinion, that this ingenious Phyſician ſigned his name in the latter way. With regard to the other reaſon, it is plain, that Father ſays nothing of any importance; for the maſculine name Ἀκάκιος does not anſwer ſo properly as the feminine Ἀκακία to the French word Sans-malice. The compariſon of Bald and Virtuous is nothing to the purpoſe, ſince it is certain, that Sans-malice has not the nature of a noun adjective; and that if a man, who had the name of Avec-peleure, (with Baldneſs,) had a mind to turn it into Greek, he ought to take that of Synalopecia rather than that of Synalopecius.

(4) Labbe Etymologies des mots Françoiſ, p. 10.

[C] What he publiſhed upon Galen.] He publiſhed in 1538 a Latin Tranſlation of two books of Galen De Ratione Curandi, i. e. "Of the Method of curing," and illuſtrated it with a Commentary (5). After this, he tranſlated the Ars medica, quæ & ars parva of the ſame Galen. This work was printed at Lyons in 1548. He is likewiſe the author of a book printed at Paris in 1555, entitled, Synopſis eorum, quæ quinque prioribus libris Galeni de facultatibus ſimplicium medicamentorum continentur.

(5) Geſner in Biblioth. fol. 500.

[D] One of his deſcendants applied himſelf to ſomething elſe than Phyſick.] A Letter of Guy Patin dated the 22d of July 1664, contains theſe words. "The King has ſent to the Baſtile the brother of Mr. "Akakia, our Collegue, for writing ſomething that diſ- "pleaſed the Prince (of Condé.) He was employed ſome "time ago, in the affair of the marriage of the Duke "of Enguien, and was Secretary to the Embaſſy "in Poland." Every body is acquainted with the complaints, which a friend of the houſe of Auſtria, diſguiſed under the name of Staniſlaus Lyſimachus, a Poliſh Knight, publiſhed in 1683 againſt the correſpondence which was carried on between France and Count Tekeli, by means of Akakia and du Vernai-Boucauld. I have read in a paper entitled, The Journal of Amſterdam (6), that this Akakia had a great ſhare in the intrigues, which were concerted, in order to tranſfer the Crown of Poland upon the Duke of Longueville, by depoſing of King Michael. We are aſſured in that Journal, that the Emperor had complained to the King of France, and named amongſt others Mr. Akakia, as one of the chief Managers of that affair, that Mr. Akakia was committed to the Baſtile, but that he there applied himſelf with more vigour to the intrigues, which he had begun, and had more leiſure to carry on his correſpondences; in ſhort, that his letters and negotiations took the ſame courſe as before, notwithſtanding his impriſonment: and that the affair was ſo far advanced, that nothing but the death of the Duke of Longueville (7) hindered the execution of it. The medals were already ſtruck. This ſecond impriſonment of Mr. Akakia laſted but five or ſix months, if we may believe a perſon, whom I enquired of ſince my reading that Journal. He told me beſides, that Mr. Akakia was ſo pleaſed with being choſen to go and foment the troubles of Hungary, that tho' he was then ſick, he ſoon recovered well enough to enter upon his journey. As he did not care to venture thro' Germany, he went to England, where he embark'd for Sweden, and from thence proceeded by ſea to Riga, and ſo to Poland, where he died. He was a perſon of great intrigue, and was active in concluding the peace of Oliva.

(6) It was publiſhed in Sept. 1693.

(7) He was killed in paſſing the Rhine the 12th of June 1672.

[E] Thoſe who have plac'd his death in 1605, are ſtrangely miſtaken.] The author of the Diarium Biographicum (8) has fallen into this error; for he writes thus under that year: Martinus Akakia, Gallus CATALAUNENSIS, Medicinæ Doctor & Profeſſor Lutetiæ Paris. i. e. "Martin Akakia, a Frenchman of Cha- "lons, Doctor and Profeſſor of Phyſic at Paris." Then he gives the titles of ſeveral of the books, of which Akakia of Chalons is really the author. If they had known that Briſſot, whoſe Scholar our Akakia was, was not in France after the year 1519, they would not have extended the Life of his Scholar to the year 1605; or elſe they ſhould have ſaid ſomething of the prodigious age, which he muſt then have reached to. What probably led the author of the Diarium into this error, was this, that in the year 1605 there died a Phyſician, whoſe name was Akakia. He was grandſon of this Scholar of Briſſot. Guy Patin ſpeaks thus with his uſual cynical freedom: Two Doctors of our Faculty concerned themſelves in an Apology for Theodore Mayerne Turquet, namely, Seguin our elder, who has always ſupported the Quacks, and Akakia his brother-in-law, who died in 1605 of the pox, which he brought from Italy, when he attended Count de Bethune, Ambaſſador at Rome (9). If our Martin Akakia could get ſuch a diſeaſe at the time of this Embaſſy, he muſt have been without diſpute the oldeſt debauchee in Europe.

(8) Henningus Witte, Profeſſor at Riga in Livonia.

(9) Patin. Lett. 8. of the 1ſt edit.

AKAKIA (MARTIN) a Pariſian, ſon to the former, was admitted Doctor of Phyſick of the Faculty of Paris in 1572. Triſtan de Roſtaing, Knight of the King's Order *, and Amiot Biſhop of Auxerre, were his patrons [A], and procured him from Charles IX

* St. Lewis.

[A] Triſtan de Roſtaing and Amiot were his Patrons.] I can give no proof of this more to the purpoſe, than the following paſſage, which I have taken from a Panegyric to Henry the Third: Vix dum (it is Martin Akakia, who ſpeaks) igitur in publica profeſſione, quâ nos Carolus Rex Chriſtianiſſimus Triſtando

IX in the year 1574 the place of firſt Reader, and Regius Profeſſor in Chirurgery. Four years after this, he was made ſecond Phyſician to Henry III (a). But as he was always careful to bring the moſt elaborate Lectures into the Royal Schools, and this took up a great deal of his time, he was apprehenſive that the viſiting of the ſick, and the attendance which he was obliged to pay at court, would be too fatiguing a taſk for him; ſo that in order to eaſe himſelf of this exceſſive burthen, he reſigned his Profeſſorſhip, with the King's permiſſion, to John Martin, a perſon very capable of that function, as his writings teſtify [B]. But this Gentleman having conſidered that it would be incompatible with his other affairs, if he ſhould do juſtice to it, returned it to Martin Akakia. He ſoon diſpoſed of it again to his ſon-in-law Peter Seguin, and died immediately after in 1588, about forty nine years of age. He left two ſons, whom I am going to ſpeak of, and one daughter, who was married to Peter Seguin, one of the moſt learned Phyſicians of the Faculty of Paris, and who exerciſed the profeſſion of his father-in-law in the Royal College from the year 1588 to 1599. The Treatiſe de Morbis Muliebribus, and the Conſilia Medica of our Martin, are ſcarce known to any perſon, but under the falſe ſuppoſition that they came from the ſame hand as the Treatiſes of Martin Akakia of Chalons. I have not ſeen any Bibliographer, who has diſtinguiſhed the writings of the father from thoſe of the ſon. They aſcribe both the one and the other to Martin Akakia Catalaunenſis. I ſhould have been deceived in this point as well as Moreri, if I had not had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of ſome friends [C]. The two books de Morbis Muliebribus were inſerted in the collection, which a Phyſician, named Iſrael Spachius, publiſhed at Straſbourg in 1597, of divers Treatiſes upon the Diſeaſes of Women. And with regard to the Conſilia Medica, we have them in a collection of pieces of the ſame kind, which Scholzius publiſhed at Francfort in 1598. It is very probable that Iſrael Spachius believed, that the two books de Morbis Muliebribus were the work of the Scholar of Briſſot. It was he, without doubt, who gave the title, Martini Akakiæ, Medici Regii, & in Univerſitate Pariſienſi Profeſſoris Medicinæ Doctiſſimi, &c. The work had never been printed; it was handed about in manuſcript. Spachius knew in general, that Martin Akakia wrote it, and he imagined, that this Akakia was the ſame, whoſe works were already publiſhed; upon which account he gave him the title of Akakia of Chalons, and not that of Regius Profeſſor, which the Author would have given himſelf if he had publiſhed his book.

(a) See the Remark [A].

Triſtando Roſtagnite Equite Torquato fortiſſimo, & Jacobo Amyato Altiſſiodorenſium Epiſcopo de nobis referentibus, cohoneſtaverat, quadriennium compleveramus, cum tu nos inter tuos medicos allegiſti & conſcripſiſti. i. e. "I had ſcarce continued four years in the "public Profeſſorſhip, which the Moſt Chriſtian "King Charles honoured me with, at the recommendation of Triſtan de Roſtaing, a moſt valiant "Knight, and James Amyot Biſhop of Auxerre, "when you did me the honour to chooſe me for "one of your Phyſicians." This Panegyric was printed at Paris in 1578 with the following title; Martini Akakiæ, Regii & Medici & Profeſſoris, ob ſuam in ordinem Medicorum cooptationem Panegyricus Henrico Valeſio Regi Chriſtianiſſimo dictus.

[B] The Writings of J. Martin ſhew his capacity.] René Moreau publiſhed two pieces of this author; Prælectiones in Librum Hippocratis Coi de Morbis internis, at Paris in 1637; Prælectiones in Librum Hippocratis Coi de Aere, Aquis, & Locis, at Paris in 1646. He has given the Elogium of the author before the former. And to the latter are prefixed ſeveral Latin Verſes of Anthony Mornac in praiſe of the ſame Martin, who was one of the Commiſſioners at the famous conference held between du Perron and du Pleſſis.

[C] I had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of ſome friends.] Monſieur Drelincourt the Profeſſor was ſo good as to acquaint me, that Martin Akakia, author of the Treatiſe de Morbis Muliebribus, quotes not only Fernelius and Amatus Luſitanus, but likewiſe the work of Scaliger againſt Cardan, and the Coſmocritice of Cornelius Gemma. Fernelius dedicates his books to Henry II, who came to the Crown but in the year 1547. Amatus Luſitanus wrote his II Century (1) at Rome in 1551 (2); whither he was ſent for by Pope Julius III. Scaliger's Book againſt Cardan was not printed till 1557. That of Cornelius Gemma was written on occaſion of the Star in 1572, and not printed till 1575. It follows then, that this Martin Akakia muſt have been living in 1575. The Remarks of Mr. Drelincourt abovementioned prove this to demonſtration. Now as I had read, that Martin Akakia was Regius Profeſſor of Phyſic from the year 1577, and that Peter Seguin was put into his place the 20th of September 1594 (3), I deſired to know what William Du Val ſays upon this in his Catalogue of the Profeſſors of the Royal College. This I knew at laſt by means of Mr. Pinſſon des Riolles (4), who took the pains in the moſt obliging manner imaginable to ſend me ſeveral particulars relating to the Akakia's. He acquainted me amongſt other things, I, That Martin Akakia of Châlons, Phyſician to Francis I, died in 1551. From this fact and the remarks of Mr. Drelincourt, it follows neceſſarily, that the author of the book De Morbis Muliebribus is not Martin Akakia Catalaunenſis. II, That it is true indeed, that Peter Seguin had the place of the King's Reader in Chirurgery by the reſignation of Martin Akakia his father-in law, from the year 1588; but that he had occaſion to take out a new Patent in 1594. The reaſon was this: During the civil wars the number of the Royal Readers encreaſed more than the foundation admitted; for ſeveral perſons had clandeſtinely procured that office for themſelves. Henry IV expelled part of theſe Readers in 1594, and gave new Patents to thoſe, whom he retained. Peter Seguin was of that number. It was upon this account, that this promotion was fixed in the year 1594 by the author of the Antiquitez de Paris; but if that author had been exact, he would not have ſatisfied himſelf with ſaying, that Peter Seguin ſucceeded Martin Akakia in his place the 20th of September 1594. He would have been cautious, leſt his readers might have imagined, that Martin Akakia died that year, and that Peter Seguin was then firſt choſen Regius Profeſſor. Now whoever ſays, thus would give us two egregious falſities.

(3) du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, p. 568.

(4) Advocate of the Parliament of Paris.

(1) It is this which Akakia quotes, though without ſpecifying it particularly; but what he quotes is in the Centur. ii Curatione xxxix. p. 187.

(2) He ſays ſo himſelf, p. 236.

AKAKIA (MARTIN) ſon to the latter, was admitted Doctor of Phyſick at Paris, the firſt year of his being a Licentiate, in 1598. He became Regius Profeſſor of Chirurgery the year after, upon the reſignation of Peter Seguin his brother-in-law (a). He took a journey to Rome; and died of ſickneſs at Paris, without leaving any iſſue, (a) He reſigned his place, having been made the Royal Lecturer in Phyſic the tenth of Sept. 1599, by the reſignation of Joan Duret.

iſſue, in 1605. He was interred with his father at St. Germain de l'Auxerrois. His brother John Akakia, promoted to the degree of Doctor of Phyſick at Paris the firſt year of his being a Licentiate 1612, was Phyſician to Lewis XIII, and died in Savoy in 1620. He left ſeveral children [A].

[A] John Akakia left ſeveral children.] I. Martin Akakia, Royal Profeſſor in Chirurgery (1), which place he reſigned in favour of Mathurin Denyan, and died ſome time after, in 1677, leaving behind him a ſon, who was Clerk to the Controller General of the Finances, and a daughter married to Mr. le Vayer de Boutigni, Counſellor of the Parliament of Paris. II. Roger Akakia, who was the man of intrigue, mentioned above in the remark [D] of the firſt Akakia. III. Charles Akakia, a very pious Clergyman, attached to the Society of Port-Royal. IV. Simon Akakia, call'd du Pleſſis, Agent for the Ladies of Port-Royal. V. N. Akakia known by the name of Mr. du Lac. He takes care of the late Mr. du Saci's writings upon the Scripture. There were likewiſe other children of John Akakia beſides theſe five.

(1) He was already ſo, when William du Val publiſhed his Catalogue in 1644.

AKIBA, a famous Rabbin, flouriſhed a little after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus. He was a Jew only by the mother's ſide; and it is pretended that his father was deſcended from Sifera, General of the army of Jabin King of Tyre. Akiba lived in the country till the fortieth year of his age, where he had no very honourable employment, for he kept the flocks of Calba Schwa, a rich citizen of Jeruſalem. At laſt he began to ſtudy, at the deſire of his maſter's daughter, who promiſed to marry him, if he ſhould make any conſiderable progreſs in the ſciences. He applied himſelf ſo vigorouſly to his ſtudies during the four and twenty years, which he paſſed in the Academies, that afterwards he was attended by a prodigious number of ſcholars, as one of the greateſt maſters in Iſrael. He had twenty four thouſand ſcholars. He declared himſelf for the impoſtor Bar-cochebas (a), and aſſerted, that it was of him that we muſt underſtand the words of Balaam, A Star ſhall riſe out of Jacob, and that in him they had the true Meſſiah (b). He was not contented with doing for him what Samuel did for the two firſt Kings of the Jews, that is, anointing him (c): he was reſolved to proceed further, and take upon himſelf the office of Maſter of the Horſe (d) to him. The troops which the Emperor Hadrian ſent againſt the Jews, who under the conduct of this falſe Meſſiah had committed horrid maſſacres, exterminated this faction. Akiba was taken and put to death with great cruelty (e). They tore his fleſh with iron-combs, in ſuch a manner as to protract the torment, and at laſt he was burnt to death with a ſlow fire (f). He lived a hundred and twenty years, and was buried with his wife in a cave upon a mountain not far from Tiberias. His twenty four thouſand ſcholars were buried round about him upon the ſame mountain (g). I relate theſe things, without pretending that they all ought to be believed. It is imagined, that he invented a ſuppoſititious work under the name of the Patriarch Abraham [A]. Some charge him with a more heinous impoſture than this, which is, that he altered the Hebrew text of the Bible [B], in order to anſwer an objection of the Chriſtians [C]. The

(a) This word ſignifies in Hebrew, a ſon of the Star.

(b) See Joh. a Lent Schediaſma Hiſtorico Philologicum de Judæorum Pſeudo Meſſiis, p. 9.

(c) Ibid. p. 14.

(d) Ibid. p. 9 and 15.

(e) Ibid. p. 14. ex Tractatu Talmudico Eruſ. fol. 21.

(f) Ibid. p. 15, ex Tractatu Talmudico BERACHOS, fol. 61.

(g) Ibid. p. 15. ex Auctore Libelli DE CIPPIS, ab HOTTINGERO editi, & Latine tranſlati.

[A] It is imagined, that he invented a ſuppoſititious work under the name of the Patriarch Abraham.] This book is intitled Sepher Jezirah, that is, the Book of the Creation. See the remark [E] of the article ABRAHAM, and add to it the following Supplement. Lambecius was miſtaken in ſaying, that this Book of the Creation was printed at Mantua firſt (1); for the edition of Mantua in 4to, with the Commentary of Abraham Ben-Dier, and that of ſeveral other Rabbins, whoſe names we have mentioned in pag. 536 of the Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament, was preceded by the Paris Edition in 1552, in 8vo. The ſame book was printed at Baſil in folio in 1587, with ſeveral others of the ſame ſtamp. It is of great authority with the Cabaliſts; they performed wonders with it, as they pretend (2).

(1) Lambecii Hiſt. Literariæ Prodrom. p. 53. apud Placcium de Pſeudonymis. p. 134.

(2) Placcius, ib.

[B] He is accuſed of having altered the Hebrew Text of the Bible.] This alteration relates to the age of the Patriarchs, when their children were born. Every one knows, that in that year they are repreſented as much older by the verſion of the Septuagint, than in the Hebrew text. Adam, for inſtance, if we follow the Hebrew text, was an hundred and thirty years old, when his wife bore Seth; but according to the Septuagint, he was then in his two hundred and thirtieth year. The majority of Divines prefer the Hebrew text to the Greek. Thoſe, who are of a different opinion, are but few in number; but to atone for that, they are generally the moſt finiſh'd Scholars. Father Dom Paul Pezron, a Monk of the ſtrict Order of the Ciſtertians, and Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, is among this minority. He tells us, amongſt other things, that the Jews altered the Hebrew Text during the interval between the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus, and the twelfth year of the Emperor Hadrian (3). He proves this from the verſion of Aquila, publiſh'd in the ſame year of that Emperor, which is very conformable to the preſent Hebrew Text. Now as this Aquila, by abandoning Chriſtianity for Judaiſm, placed himſelf under the diſcipline of Akiba, it appears very probable to Father Pezron, that we muſt impute this alteration of the Scripture to that Rabbin. It is certain, that Akiba was then in great eſteem amongſt the Jews, eſpecially thoſe of Paleſtine; for he was about forty years Maſter of the College, which they had at Jabné, or Tiberias, near the lake of Gennezareth (4)... He had a great number of Scholars, and was conſidered as the moſt learned man among the Jews; and had ſo much authority and influence over them, that it was he, who declared Bar-chochebas to be the Meſſiah (5).

(3) Pezron de l'Antiquité de Tems, ch. xvi. p. 289 edit. de Paris in 1687 in 4to.

(4) Ibid. p. 290.

(5) Ibid p. 291.

[C] In order to anſwer an objection of the Chriſtians.] "The Chriſtians never diſputed againſt the "Jews with more force, than at that time, ſays the "ſame author (6); and they never attacked them "with greater advantage. For they had nothing to "do, but to ſhew them on the one hand the Goſ"pels, and on the other the ruins of Jeruſalem, "which were before their eyes, in order to con"vince them that Jeſus Chriſt, who had ſo clearly "foretold that deſtruction, was the Prophet pro"mis'd by Moſes.... But they preſſed them very "ſtrongly with their own traditions, which intimat"ed, that the Meſſiah would manifeſt himſelf after "the courſe of about ſix thouſand years, by ſhew"ing them, that this number of years was accom"pliſhed. This confounded them ſtrangely; and "this is without doubt the reaſon, why it is ſaid in "the Talmud, that Akiba and Samſai reckoned the "years, (7), from whence ſuch ſtrong arguments "were drawn againſt them." It is certain, that the Jews might anſwer the objection concerning the ſix thouſand years, if the Bible was then as it is now; for it is plain, that it does not give this number of years from Adam to Jeſus Chriſt.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Talmud in Tractatu de Synedrio

The Jews give him great elogiums [D], and conſider him as one who had taught them all the unwritten Law [E]. The remark, which we ſhall make below, will contain ſome particulars of his life. If we are to judge of his Lectures upon other ſubjects by his precepts relating to the Houſe of Office [F], we muſt undoubtedly think them very ridiculous.

(8) See Jo. a Lent di Pſeudo-Meſſiis p. 9.
(9) Zachatus in Juchaſin, p. 66. apud Lent, pag. 19.
(10) Konig. Biblioth. p. 19.
(11) Intitled, Defenſe de l'Antiquite des Tems,
(12) Pag. 61.
(13) P. 63. ex Tzemach David, p. 99.
(14) The Jews pretend that Rabbi Juda, who compiled it, was born the ſame day that Akiba died. R. Juda princeps natus eſt illo die, quo obiit R. Akiba, de quo aiunt, Sol exortus eſt & Sol occidit. See Pezron Defenſe &c. p. 76.
(15) Nerva permitted the Jews to chooſe a Patriarch of their nation.
(16) Ex Hieronymo in cap. 8. Iſaiæ.

[D] The Jews give him great Elogiums.] They call him Sethumtaah (8), that is, Authentic. It would require a whole volume, ſays one of them (9), to ſpeak fully of his merit. His name, ſays another, has diffuſed itſelf over the world, and from his mouth we have received all the oral Law: Hujus nomen, (inquit autor libri Zemach David) exiit ab uno extremo mundi uſque ad aliud, atque totam legem oralem ex ejus ore accepimus (10).

[E] And they conſider him as one, who has taught them all the unwritten Law.] See the paſſage, which I quoted above, and the book, which Father Pezron publiſhed at Paris in 1691 (11). We find there (12), that Rabbi Akiba, the ſon of Joſeph, was the firſt compiler of the Deuteroſes, or Jewiſh Traditions; and the Head of the Traditionaries; that he collected the Traditions, which Hillel, Simeon, and other ancient Doctors invented; that he added others of his own invention; that they were all together received the end of the fifth Century, when they added others, of which the Talmûd is compoſed, that Akiba (13) made uſe of Rabbi Meir, the moſt famous of all his Scolars, to digeſt in writing part of thoſe Traditions, of which the Miſna was afterwards compoſed (14); that he was Aſſeſſor to the Patriarch (15), and the Maſter of Aquila and Rabbi Joſe, who was the author of the great Chronicle of the Jews (16); that he became the Head of the Jewiſh Schools the ſame year that Joſeph finiſhed his Antiquities; that he kept that poſt forty years; that he is frequently quoted in the Pirke-Eliezer; and that he wiſhed eternal damnation to all thoſe, who ſhould read the Writings of the Chriſtians.

[F] His precepti relating to the houſe of office.] The Jewiſh Nation has been given up to ſuch a ſpirit of childiſh and chimerical obſervances, that even their greateſt Doctors have extended their ritual to the machinal actions, as particularly of going to ſtool. Unhappy for them, who know not where the Eaſt is; for the four cardinal points of the Horizon are not all equally favourable. I can give an account in Latin only of the reſt of their ridiculous ſuperſtitions. Dixit R. Akiba, ingreſſus ſum aliquando poſt Rabbi Joſuam in ſedis ſecretæ locum, & tria ab eo didici. Didici 1, quod non verſus Orientem, & Occidentem, ſed verſus Septentrionem & Auſtrum, convertere nos debeamus. Didici 2, quod non in pedes erectum, ſed jam conſidentem ſe retegere liceat. Didici 3, quod podex non dextrâ ſed ſiniſtrâ manu abſtergendus ſit. Ad hæc objecit ibi Ben Haſas; uſque adeo verè perfricuiſti frontem erga Magiſtrum tuum, ut cacantem obſervares? Reſpondit ille, Legis hæc arcana ſunt, ad quæ diſcenda id neceſſario mihi agendum fuit (17)? This is a wonderful Doctor, who can even upon the cloſe-ſtool explain the myſteries of the Law without ſpeaking a word.

(17) Ex Baraïtha in Maſſech. Berachos, fol. 62, apud Lent, p. 101

ALABASTER (WILLIAM) an Engliſh Divine, was born at Hadley in the county of Suffolk. He was one of the Doctors of Trinity College in Cambridge; and he attended the Earl of Eſſex as his Chaplain in the expedition to Cadiz in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is ſaid, that his firſt reſolutions of changing his religion were occaſioned by his ſeeing the pomp of the Churches of the Roman Communion, and the reſpect with which the Prieſts ſeemed to be treated amongſt them; and appearing thus to waver in his mind, he ſoon found perſons who took advantage of this diſpoſition of his, and of the complaints which he made of not being advanced according to his deſerts in England, in ſuch a manner, that he did not ſcruple to go over to the Popiſh religion, as ſoon as he found that there was no ground to hope for greater encouragement in his own country. However that matter is, he joined himſelf to the Romiſh Communion, but was diſappointed in his expectations. He was ſoon diſpleaſed at this; he could not reconcile himſelf to the diſcipline of that church, which made no conſideration of the degrees which he had taken before. It is probable too that he could not approve of the worſhip of creatures, which Proteſtants are uſed to look upon with horror. Upon this he returned to England, in order to reſume his former Religion. He obtained a Prebend in the Cathedral of St. Paul, and after that the Rectory of Therfield in Hertfordſhire. He was well ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue; but he gave a wrong turn to his genius by ſtudying the Cabala, with which he was ſtrangely infatuated. He gave a proof of this in a Sermon which he preached upon taking his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Cambridge. He took for his text the beginning of the firſt book of Chronicles, Adam, Seth, Enos; and having touched upon the literal ſenſe, he turned immediately to the myſtical, aſſerting, that Adam ſignified Misfortune and Miſery, and ſo of the reſt (a). His method of explaining the Scripture was by no means agreeable to the taſte of the Roman Catholics [A]. I ſhall give an account

(a) Fuller's Worthies of England.

[A] His method of explaining the Scripture was by no means agreeable to the Roman Catholics.] Francis Garaſſe, a Jeſuit, having given an account of a very ſtrange opinion of Iſiodorus of Peluſium (1), goes on thus: "The expoſition of Alabaſter is ſtill more remote from common ſenſe; for he proceeds entirely upon the Rabbinical Fancies, which are pleaſant indeed, if they were as well founded, as they are ſubtilly invented. He ſays in his Apparatus, ch. ix. that Jonas and our Saviour continued exactly three days and three nights, the one in the bowels of the earth, and the other in the whale's belly in the manner following. Jonas, ſays he, was carried to the center of the world, as he relates of himſelf, Ad extrema montium deſcendi, terræ vectæ circumdederunt me, i. e. I went down to the bottoms of the mountains; the bars of the earth encompaſſed me. Now as he was in that place, he had day and night at the ſame time; for if we regard our Hemiſpere, he had the day in his face, and the night at his back; and the next morning, the reverſe of this. So that tho' he continued but a day and a half, he continued three whole days, ſince we muſt double the ſpace of time, becauſe he had at once what we have ſucceſſively. Thus our Saviour being in the bowels of the earth, had like Jonas day and night all at once, ſince his ſoul went down to the center of the earth, that it might have day on one ſide, and night on the other; and by this means he compleated the term of his continuance without violating the ſtrictneſs of truth, ſo impatient was he not to leave his Diſciples comfortleſs." I ſay, "that this invention does an injury to the holy Scripture, as it is ſo forced and ſophiſtical, and ſo exactly account in the Remarks of what they thought of it, and how he managed the objection which is urged concerning the three days and three nights which Jesus Christ was to continue in the bowels of the earth, as Jonas did in the whale's belly (b). I must not omit to mention that his verses were greatly esteemed. He wrote a Latin Tragedy, intitled Roxana, which when it was acted in a College at Cambridge, was attended with a very remarkable accident (c). There was a Lady who was so terrified at the last word of the Tragedy, Sequar, Sequar, which was pronounced with a very shocking tone, that she lost her senses all her life-time after. Alabaster was living in 1630. His Apparatus in Revelationem Jesu Christi was printed at Antwerp in 1607. As for his Spiraculum tubarum, seu fons Spiritualium Expositionum ex æquivocis Pentaglotti (d) significationibus, and his Ecce Sponsus venit, seu tuba pulchritudinis, hoc est demonstratio quod non sit illicitum nec impossibile computare durationem mundi & tempus secundi adventus Christi, they are printed at London (e). We may judge from these titles what the taste and genius of the author was; but we shall judge better from the words of Andrew Rivet, which I shall quote [B]. I must not forget to mention his Lexicon Hebraicum in folio. I have not spoken of the Motives of his Conversion, which he published after he had embraced the Catholic Religion. We know well enough, that it is the general custom of those who change their religion. That custom was even more in vogue

(1) You will find it at the end of this Remark.

(b) See Remark [A].

(c) Fuller's Worthies.

(d) It is thus in the Catalogue of Oxford. It should have been Pentateuchi.

(e) See the Catalogue of the Library at Oxford.

" resembles the chimera's of the Rabbins. And " therefore this book of Alabaster was justly con- " demned at Rome. But he was so great an idolizer " of his own inventions, that he did even worse " than Heliodorus, since he quitted his Religion, " that he might not be obliged to quit his danger- " ous and extravagant notions, with which he pro- " faned the Scripture (2)." Let us add the judgment of a Jesuit of the Low-Countries to this of the French Jesuit. Bonfrerius having condemned those, who after the manner of the Cabala find every thing in every passage of Scripture, goes on thus: Quod nuper fecit insulsè nimis irreligiosè Gulielmus Alabaster, qui in illo suo Apparatu ex inanibus hujusmodi fundamentis, ne dicam quisquiliis, conatus est nobis suam mysticam theologiam, & (ita ipse vocat) interiorem Scripturæ sensum ad medullam (re ipsa aliud nihil quàm deliramenta & somnia) exprimere. Quâ ex re malè audiit, & Romæ censoriam Ecclesiæ virgulam merito expertus est. Quis enim ferat quempiam in re tam seriâ, Scripturæ, inquam, interpretatione, pro probatis mercibus vendere, quæ ipse parùm sano cerebro delirârit (3)? i. e. " This, says he, has been " lately done by William Alabaster very absurdly and " irreligiously, who in his Apparatus has endeavour- " ed from these chimerical grounds, or rather trifles " to raise a scheme of mystical Divinity, or (as he " calls it) the internal sense of the Scripture, which " in reality is nothing else than his own whims and " dreams. Upon which account he has been gene- " rally condemned, and deservedly suffered at Rome " the censure of the Church. For who could bear, " that a man in so serious a subject as the interpre- " tation of the holy Scripture, should obtrude his " own chimerical imaginations and reveries for " sound doctrine?" He gives us then some instances of his extravagant explications.

(2) Garasse, Doctrine curieuse, printed at Paris, by Chapelet in 1623 in 4to, p. 593, 594.

(3) Bonfrerius in his Prolegomena to his Commentary upon the Pentateuch, printed in 1625 in fol.

We shall see presently a Protestant, who reproaches the Roman Catholics with having tolerated the visionary schemes of Alabaster.

I have been advertised by an ingenious Gentleman, that readers do not approve, that one should tell them in general, that such and such a person advanced a chimerical opinion. This raises their curiosity; they would have it satisfied upon the spot, and sometimes even without being obliged to the trouble of consulting another book, which they have in their study. This Gentleman therefore thinks, that I should either have said nothing of Isidorus of Pelusium, or having observed in general, that his opinion was extravagant, given an account of it, because the book of Garasse in particular is to be found in few private Libraries. I have made use of this advice; I know the reasonableness of it by experience; and for that reason, upon several other occasions I have chose rather to add a Supplement to my Commentaries, than to raise the curiosity of the reader in vain. Isidorus of Pelusium, in order to make out the compleat number, supposes that the darkness at the Passion of our Saviour ought to be taken for one night, and the return of the light till sun-set for one day. Read what follows: " I answer, that it is " true, that this passage (4) has given a great deal of " trouble, in order to reconcile it with the truth of the " History; and this was one of the chief arguments, " by which Julian the Apostate endeavoured to o- " verthrow the credit of the Gospel; but it is not " so desperate, but that we may give a true and na- " tural explication of it, without having recourse to " fancy and invention, as several authors have done, " as we have shewn above concerning the hour of the " Resurrection. St. Isidore of Pelusium in his first " book of Epistles, Ep. cxiv, gives a new explicati- " on in these words: Sic habeto, sextâ horâ Paras- " ceves in crucem actus est Dominus, ab hac horâ us- " que ad nonam tenebræ extiterunt; has tu noctem " intellige: Rursus horâ nonâ lux, hæc tu pro die " habe; nox rursum Paraseeves; tum dies Sabbathi, " tum nox Sabbathi Domini diei. According to this " explication, it is true that Jesus Christ continued " three days and three nights in the bowels of the " earth; but these are days and nights reduced to a " very short measure (5)."

(4) That of the xiith chap. of St. Matth. where it is said, that Christ was to remain in the bowels of the earth three days and three nights.

(5) Garasse, Doctrine curieuse, p. 592, 593.

[B] We shall judge what the taste and genius of this author was from the words of Andrew Rivet, which I shall quote.] Anno 1607, says he (6), quidam Pontificius Anglus, Guilielmus Alabastrus, edidit Antwerpiæ librum, cui titulum fecit: Apparatus in Revelationem Christi, in quo profitetur se novam & admirabilem rationem afferre investigandi prophetiarum mysteria ex Scripturâ se ipsam interpretante. Ibi novam Cabbalam instituit, ex qua quidlibet ex quolibet educit, & mutatis vel inversis aut separatis & disjunctis Ebræorum vocabulorum literis aut syllabis, vel etiam in iisdem variorum numerorum ratione excogitata, novis etiam significationibus contra grammaticæ rationem assignatis, diversis nominibus aut verbis omnia pervertit, & ipsi adeo commentum placet, ut quamvis sæpè excipiat se nolle præjudicare Latinæ versioni, cum tamen videat ex eâ nullis fidiculis sensum, quem sibi proponit, posse erui, non veretur dicere, p. 61, Deum, Christi & Religionis Christianæ mysteria per illam verborum formam in Ebræo legis codice expressisse, quæ sensum carnalem & à divina mente alienum lectori prima fronte offerret, atque ita voluisse, ut in Ecclesia Christiana nulla passim legeretur versio, quam quæ secundùm Ebræorum verborum corticem conciperetur, ut hoc modo sapientia divina non esset cuivis obvia prophano. Sed postea idem, per totum illud opus ita sapientiam illam divinam ex Scripturæ, si Deo placet, penetralibus hausit, ut ne ulli quidem hactenus ex patribus sanctissimis, vel unius loci talis interpretatio in mentem unquam venerit, ne ipsis quidem omniscits Pontificibus. i. e. " In the year " 1607 an English Papist, one William Alabaster, " published at Antwerp a book intitled, An Appa- " ratus upon the Revelation of Christ, in which he " professes to discover a new and admirable method of " unravelling the mysteries of the Prophecies by ex- " plaining the Scripture by itself. He there at- " tempts a new Cabala, by which he deduces any " thing from every thing, and by changing, or in- " verting, or separating and disjoining the letters or " syllables of the Hebrew, or by inventing a new " method of numbers in them, and giving a sense " contrary to the rules of Grammar, by different " names vogue at that time than now. The public had not then ſo many occaſions of being tired with ſuch kind of writings. That of Alabaſter was anſwered by Roger Fenton (f).

(6) Riveti Isagoge ad Scripturam Sacram, cap. 15. Operum tom. 2. p. 917.

(f) His anſwer is intitled, An Anſwer to W. Alabaſter's Motives, London 1599, in 4to.

" names and words he perverts the whole Scrip" ture. And he is ſo fond of this invention, that " tho' he frequently profeſſes, that he does not de-
" ſign to prejudice the Latin Tranſlation, yet when
" he ſees, that his own ſenſe cannot be extorted
" from it by any means, he is not afraid to ſay in " plain words, p. 61, that God has expreſſed the my-
" ſteries of Chriſt and the Chriſtian Religion in the " Hebrew Text under ſuch a form of expreſſion, as " offers to the reader at firſt ſight a carnal ſenſe, and
" ſuch as is foreign to the divine mind; and that God
" would have it thus, that no Tranſlation ſhould be read
" in the Chriſtian Church, but what was formed up-
" on the letter of the Hebrew Text, that by this " means divine knowledge might not be obvious to
" every profane perſon. But afterwards the ſame
" author thro' his whole work endeavours to give
" ſuch a ſcheme of this divine knowledge from the " internal ſenſe of the Scripture, as he pretends,
" that neither the holy Fathers, nor even the Papiſts
" themſelves, who know every thing, ever thought
" of ſuch an explanation of any paſſage in the Bi" ble." Mr. Rivet having given two inſtances of the extravagance of this writer (7), proceeds thus: Alia hujus farinæ multa p. 57 & ſeqq. afferuntur à nugatore blaſphemo, quibus ſyllabas unius nominis & verbi ſeorſim accipiens, & à ſua radice divellens, omnia ſurſum deorſum vertit. Et tamen in regno Pontificio toleratur hæc novitas, ubi ſimplex ſcripturæ ex ipſa ſcriptura interpretatio hæreſeos inſimulatur. Sed de his hactenus. Videant Pontificii an ſuo Alabaſtro non debeant nigrum præfigere theta: nos hominis inſolentiſſimam audaciam deteſtamur, etſi eum Jeſuita Poſſevinus ſuis Catholicis Scriptoribus inſeruerit, App. Sacr. Tomo primo. i. e. " There are a great many " things of this kind ſaid by this blaſphemous trifler
" p. 57, &c. where by ſeparating and disjoining the " ſyllables of a name or word, he throws every " thing into confuſion. And yet this innovation
" and abſurdity are tolerated in a Popiſh country,
" where the ſimple interpretation of Scripture from " itſelf is repreſented as heretick. But ſo much for " this. Let the Papiſts ſee, whether they ought " not to ſtigmatize this author of theirs; we Pro-
" teſtants deteſt his intolerable boldneſs, tho' the Je-
" ſuit Poſſevin ranks him among the Catholic Wri" ters, Tom. 1. of his Appar. Sacr." We may obſerve I, that the work, from which this is taken, was publiſhed firſt in 1626, and that the edition in folio, which I have made uſe of, printed in 1652, was reviſed, corrected, and enlarged by the author: II, That the book of Alabaſter was condemned at Rome the 30th of January 1610, and that the author returned to the Church of England long before the firſt edition of Mr. Rivet's book. See what the congregation of the Index Expurgatorius ſays; I quote their own words, becauſe it might poſſibly be inferred from thence, that the Apparatus of Alabaſter was reprinted at Rome with alterations and corrections: Apparatus in Revelationem Jeſu Chriſti, auctore Gulielmo Alabaſtro Anglo, Antverpiæ 1607: Et Antitheſis Benedicti à Benedictis Veneti, contra Gulielmum Witackerum, niſi fuerint EX CORRECTIS AB AUCTORIBUS ET ROMÆ IMPRESSIS, cum approbatione P. Mag. Sacri Palatii. But perhaps they meant only, that in caſe theſe authors ſhould correct their works, and get them printed at Rome, with the approbation of the Maſter of the ſacred palace, then it might be permitted to read that new edition. I believe this is the true meaning. Samuel Andreas, a German Divine, has written a book (8) againſt the Cabala of Henry More (9), wherein he gives ſeveral inſtances of Alabaſter's Chimera's (10).

(7) One is upon the 9th verſe of the 37th chapter of Geneſis; the other upon the 8th verſe of the 22d of the ſame book.

(8) See the Index Librorum prohibitorum, printed at Rome under Alexander VII. p. 206.

(9) It is intitled, Examen Cabbalæ Henr. Mori.

(10) Andr. Examen Cabb. Mori, p. 55.

☞ALAIN CHARTIER or CHARRETIER, Secretary to Charles VII King of France, was famous for ſeveral works, which he wrote both in proſe and verſe [A]. He was born in the year 1386 (a). His moſt conſiderable performance was his Chronicle of King Charles VII, which contains an ample account of the reign of that Prince, who upon his coming to the crown found his Kingdom involved in the moſt dreadful confuſion, which he afterwards entirely ſettled by his admirable conduct. Bernard de Girard (b) in the Preface to his Hiſtory of France ſtiles him an excellent Hiſtorian, who has given an account of all the affairs, particulars, ceremonies, ſpeeches, anſwers and circumſtances at which he was preſent himſelf, or had information of. We have a remarkable ſtory of him told by Giles Corrozet (c) [B]. Paſquier

(a) Eſtienne Paſquier Recherches de la France, l. 5. c. 18. p. 609. edit. de Paris 1611.

(b) Quoted by Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. p. 17. edit. Lyon 1585.

(c) See Du Verdier, ibid.

[A] Several works which he wrote both in proſe and verſe.] We have of him in proſe Le Curial; Le Quadrilogue; La Genealogie des Roys de France, deſpuis S. Louys, & l'extinction du faux Droict pretendu ſur le Royaume de France par les Anglois. i. e. " The Genealogy of the Kings of France from St.
" Lewis's time, and the Extinction of the falſe claim " to the kingdom of France pretended to by the " Engliſh; Demandes & Reſponſes d'Amours; i. e.
" Queſtions and Anſwers of Love:" In verſe we have theſe; Libelle de Paix; Le Breviaire des Nobles; La Dame ſans Mercy, complainte envoyée aux Dames par les purſuivans; Le Livre des quatre temps; L'Hoſpital d'Amours, Regret d'un Amoureux, Balades, le Debat du gras & du maigre; Morale de Raiſon, Entendement & de l'Acteur. Theſe pieces were printed in a volume in 8vo at Paris by Galiot du Prè in the year 1529. His Chroniques du Roy Charles VII, contenans les Faicts & Geſtes du dit Sieur, lequel trouva ſon Royaume en grand Trouble, & neantmoins le laiſſa paiſible, was printed at Paris in folio by Francis Regnard in 1528. This chronicle begins with the year 1402.

[B] We have a remarkable ſtory of him told by Giles Corrozet.] This author, in his Collection of divers memorable expreſſions of noble and illuſtrious perſons in Chriſtendom, tells us, that Margaret daughter to the King of Scotland, and wife to the Dauphin, who was afterwards King Lewis XI, paſſing once thro' an hall, where Alain Chartier, who was Secretary to Charles VIII, and a man of great learning, a famous Poet and Orator, and eminent for his politeneſs in the French language, lay aſleep upon a bench; ſhe went, and kiſſed his mouth before all the Company, which attended her. Some of them telling her, that it was ſtrange ſhe ſhould be induc'd to kiſs a man, who had ſo few charms in his perſon; ſhe replied, I did not kiſs the man, but that mouth, from whence proceeded ſo many excellent ſayings, ſo many wiſe diſcourſes, and ſo many elegant expreſſions. This ſhews, that this Princeſs was of opinion, that the accompliſhments of the mind are infinitely ſuperior to thoſe of the body; a maxim, which it would be of great advantage to the Ladies, if they would regulate themſelves upon. For if Adam himſelf in Milton obſerved, that Eve was even before the fall,

In outward ſhew
Elaborate, of inward leſs exact (1);

(1) Paradiſe Loſt, Book 8.

How much leſs exact muſt her daughters be now, who labour under ſo many diſadvantages from a defective education, and imbibe ſuch prejudices, as make them leſs amiable, even when they have all the charms of youth and beauty about them; but neceſſarily reduce them to contempt, when age has once blaſted their external ornament and perfection? Mr. Fontenelle among his Dialogues of the Dead has a very agreeable one upon the incident abovementioned, between the Princeſs Margaret and Plato.

Paſquier has given a noble character of him [C].

(2) Ubi ſupra.

[C] Paſquier has given a noble character of him.] He tells us (2), that he was a great Poet, and a greater Orator, as appears from his Curial and Quadrilogue, which works are ſufficient to immortalize his memory; and that he was raiſed to be the King's Secretary by the intereſt of ſeveral great Men, who valued him for his eloquence. And he compares him to Seneca on account of the infinite number of beautiful ſentences, which are interſperſ'd every where in his writings, many of which are quoted by Paſquier in the chapter abovementioned. T.

ALAIS, a city of France in the Sevennes and Dioceſe of Nimes, about five leagues from Uſes (a), is the capital of an antient Lordſhip, which was erected into a County, and poſſeſſed by Charles de Valois Duke of Angoulême, natural ſon of Charles IX. It was under the name of the Count d'Alais, that Lewis Emanuel de Valois (b), Colonel General of the Light Horſe of France, and Governor of Provence, ſon to this Duke of Angoulême, and father of Frances Mary de Valois, wife of Lewis of Lorrain Duke de Joyeuſe, was ſo long known. By this marriage the county of Alais fell to the Houſe of Lorrain ſettled in France; for from the marriage of the Duke de Joyeuſe with Frances Mary de Valois came Lewis Joſeph de Lorrain, Duke of Guiſe, who died at Paris of the Small Pox the 30th of July 1671, in the twenty firſt year of his age (c).

(a) Ex Baudrandi Lexico Geograph.

(b) It is he whom Gaſſendi ſpeaks ſo often of, and wrote ſo many letters to, Ludovico Valeſio.

(c) Father Anſelme, Genealogie de la Maiſon de France. p. 175, 176.

The city of Alais is become Epiſcopal ſince the revocation of the edict of Nantes [A]. Some are of opinion, that it is the Aleſia deſcribed by Julius Cæſar in the ſeventh book of his Commentaries. Mr. de Mandajors, who is Mayor of it, has wrote a Diſſertation upon that ſubject. See the Journal des Savans of the ninth of May 1695, p. 321 of the Holland edition.

[A] The city of Alais is become Epiſcopal ſince the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1).] It is not without cauſe that I mark this period; for it is certain, that the ſuppreſſion of this Edict gave occaſion to the erecting of this new biſhoprick. This country was filled with Proteſtants, who were obliged by the Dragoon Miſſionaries to ſign a Popiſh Formulary. It was thought proper therefore, that they ſhould not be at ſuch a diſtance from their Biſhop, as they muſt have been, if they had been under the dioceſe of Nimes. This new Epiſcopal church is compoſed of two collegiate churches, that of Pſalmodi, and that of the town of Alez, and has twenty three Canons and twelve Prebendaries. Its firſt Biſhop, Francis Chevalier de Saulx, Abbot of Pſalmodi, and Doctor of Sorbonne, was conſecrated by Cardinal de Bonzi, Archbiſhop of Narbonne, in the church of the Nuns of the Viſitation of Montpelier, the 29th of Auguſt 1694. He is ſprung from one of the moſt ancient and noble families of Poitou (2). See the Letter, which Mr. Pontier wrote to him, and which he publiſhed at Paris in 1695. The Journal des Savans mentions it (3).

(1) In the year 1685.

(2) Journal des Savans of the 9th of May 1695, p. 322 of the Holland edition.

(3) Ibid. p. 321.

ALALCOMENIUM a little city in Bœotia. It was called ſo, either on account of Alalcomeneus the foſter-father of Minerva, according to ſome writers (a), or of Alalcomenia one of the daughters of Ogyges, who nurſed Minerva [A], according to others (b). This Goddeſs was born here (c), and had a temple and image of ivory, extremely reverenced by the people (d). This reverence paid to her was the cauſe, as Strabo relates, that Alalcomenium, though very eaſy to be taken, was never plundered; and that no perſon ever attempted to uſe violence againſt it (e). But Pauſanias aſſures us, that the image of Minerva was carried away by Sylla, and afterwards the temple began to be diſregarded. He adds, that in his time the walls were cleft by a large ivy-tree's thruſting its branches between the ſtones. Among the Epithets of Minerva, that of Alalcomenian, Ἀλαλκομενηΐς, which Homer gives her, is not the leaſt remarkable (f). Plutarch tells us, that Ulyſſes being born at Alalcomenium, gave the ſame name to a city of Ithaca, in order to preſerve the memory of the place where he was born (g). Stephanus Byzantinus ſays nothing of this, when he ſpeaks of Alalcomenium, and he calls a city of Ithaca Alalcomenium. What Moreri ſays, that Alalcomenium was remarkable for the tomb of Tireſias, and that according to Plutarch it had afterwards the name of Ithaca, is falſe (h). Mr. Hofman has committed ſtill more errors [B].

(a) Steph. Byzant. voce Ἀλαλκομένιον. Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 308.

(b) Pauſan. l. 9. p. 308, according to the interpretation of Scaliger in Euſeb. num. 229.

(c) Strabo, lib. 9. p. 285.

(d) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 308.

(e) Ἀπόρθητος αἰεὶ διετέλεσεν ἡ πόλις... τὴν δὲ θεὸν σεβόμενοι πάντες ἀπείχοντο πάσης βίας. Nunquam vaſtata eſt ob reverentiam Deæ, omnibus omnem vim abſtinentibus. Strabo lib. 9. p. 285.

(f) Homer. Il. Δ, ver. 8. Stat. Theb. lib. 7. ver. 330.

(g) Plutarch. Quæſtion. Græc. p. 301.

(h) See the Article TIRESIAS.

[A] Alalcomenia .... nurſed Minerva.] Scaliger pretends, I, that Pauſanias acknowledges, that ſeveral writers have aſcribed the education of Minerva to Alalcomenia, daughter of Ogyges; but this is rather conjecturing what it is imagined Pauſanias ſhould or would have ſaid, than keeping to the letter of his text, as thoſe muſt confeſs, who examine the original: II, That Stephanus of Byzantium mentions this daughter of Ogyges (1); but this is not to be found in the place, where that author ſpeaks of the city Alalcomenium.

[B] Mr. Hofman has committed ſtill more errors.] He ſays, I, that Alalcomenium was a city of Bœotia, which took its name from Alalcomenæum of the Bœotians, denominata à Bœotorum Alalcomenæo. It is plain, that he takes this laſt word, after Mr. Lloyd, not for the name of a man but of a city (2). Mr. Lloyd has ſome reaſon for this; for here is what he ſays: Alalcomenæ, urbs Ithacæ, denominata à Bœotorum Alalcomenæo, ut Plut. in Hellen. refert, pag. 337, Edit. Steph. afferens ſimul cauſam nominis: i. e. "Alalcomenæ, a city of Ithaca, call'd ſo from "Alalcomenium of the Bœotians, as Plutarch tells "us in Hellen. p. 537. of Stephens's Edition, and "gives us the reaſon of that name." All this is true; but as Mr. Hofman has put inſtead of theſe words of Mr. Lloyd, Urbs Ithacæ, "a city of "Ithaca," Urbs Bœotiæ, "a city of Bœotia," and has kept what follows without any alteration, he has fallen into a double error; on the one hand he aſſures us, that a city of Bœotia took its name from itſelf, and on the other, that it is Plutarch, who ſays this. II, He falſely imputes to Plutarch, that he aſſerts in page 537, that the tomb of Tireſias and the temple of Minerva made this city of Bœotia famous, from whence the Poet calls that Goddeſs Ἀλαλκομενὶς Ἀθήνη.

(1) Scaliger in Euſeb. num. 229. p. 21.

(2) This city is ſometimes expreſſed in the neuter gender. Ἀλαλκομένιον, and ſometimes in the feminine in the ſingular number Ἀλαλκομενία, and at other times in the plural Ἀλαλκομεναὶ. See Berkelius upon Stephen Byzant. p. 89. He forgot to mention that Plutarch. Quæſt. Græc. p. 301, calls it Ἀλαλκομένιον.

ALAMANDUS (LEWIS) in French Aleman, Archbiſhop of Arles, and Cardinal of St. Cecilia, was one of the greateſt men of the fifteenth Century. Thoſe who write of the affairs in which he was engaged, generally call him the Cardinal of Arles. He was not a Burgundian, as ſome tell us, though he was almoſt one, for the country of Bugei gave him birth. This appears from Guichenon in his Hiſtory of Breſſe as Moreri has obſerved. To avoid a repetition of what he has ſaid, I ſhall confine my ſelf to other particulars relating to him. The Cardinal of Arles preſided in the council of Baſil, which depoſed Eugenius IV, and elected the Antipope Felix V (a). He is much commended by Æneas Sylvius, as a man extremely well formed for preſiding in ſuch aſſemblies, firm and vigorous, illuſtrious by his virtue, learned, and of an admirable memory in recapitulating all that the Orators and Diſputants had ſaid (b). One day, when he harangued againſt the ſuperiority of the Pope over the council, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch an eminent manner, that ſeveral perſons went to kiſs him, while others preſſed even to kiſs his robe. They extolled to the ſkies his abilities and genius, which had raiſed him, though a Frenchman, to a ſuperiority over the Italians, notwithſtanding all their natural ſubtlety and fineſſe (c). He knew very well how to employ all the engines of devotion to his own advantage; for one day of the Seſſion, he ordered the Prieſts to bring into the council all the reliques which could be found at Baſil, and to lay them in the place of the abſent Biſhops. This produced ſuch an effect, that when they came, according to cuſtom, to invoke the Holy Ghoſt, every one was diſſolved into tears. He drew tears likewiſe from the aſſiſtants, when he officiated at Maſs another day of the Seſſion, and with his bald head all bare diſtributed the Communion to thoſe who offered themſelves, gave them the Pax to kiſs, and exhorted them to communicate worthily (d). He was inflexible to every thing, while the plague raged in the city; the death of part of his domeſtics, and the prayers of others, could not prevail with him to leave it; he choſe rather to ſave the council at the peril of his life by his preſence, than to ſave his life at the peril of the council by his abſence (e). He was extremely laborious, and ſo temperate, that there were ſome of the Conclaviſts, who could not bear that the example of this Cardinal ſhould be urged to them, when their expences were retrenched. The anſwer of a Polander upon this occaſion deſerves to be mentioned [A]. There is no need of aſking, whether Pope Eugenius thundered againſt the preſident of a council, which depoſed him. He deprived him of all his dignities, and treated him as a ſon of iniquity [B]. However, notwithſtanding this Lewis Alamandus died in the odour of ſanctity [C], and performed ſo many miracles

(a) He was Duke of Savoy, and named Amadeus.

(b) Æneas Sylvius de Geſtis Baſilenſis Concilii, lib. 1.

(c) Prudentiam ejus magnopere commendabant, qui licet origine eſſet Gallicus, Italos tamen hac die, ſummâ hominis aſtutiâ ſuperaſſet. Æneas Silvius de Geſtis Concilii Baſil. lib. 1.

(d) Idem, lib. 2.

(e) Idem, ibid. I ſhall give his own Latin words in the Remark [A].

'Αλάμ. Mr. Lloyd aſcribes all theſe particulars to Plutarch, except that relatiag to the tomb of Tireſias. III, Mr. Hofman gives us as another diſtinct city, that, which he calls Alalcomenium, op. Bœotiæ, ad lacum Copaidem inter Haliartum & Coronæam, templo Minervæ clarum. i. e. "Alalcomenium, a town "of Bœotia, upon the lake Copais, between Haliar- "tus and Coronæa, famous for the temple of Mi- "nerva." This is multiplying of beings without any neceſſity. I believe, that none of the authors quoted by Moreri give any account, that Prince Alalcomenius placed in the city of that name the ſtatue of Venus.

[A] The anſwer ... of a Polander deſerves to be mentioned.] "What a compariſon is that! ſaid he, "when they propoſed to him the example of Lewis "Alamandus. You ſpeak to me of a Frenchman, "who is extremely temperate, and has no belly, or "to ſpeak more properly, who is not a man. I can "ſee thro' the curtain, which ſeparates us, all that "he does; I never ſaw him either eat or drink; he "ſleeps neither night nor day; he is perpetually "reading, or buſy; he thinks of nothing leſs than "his belly; he is no man for me; I have nothing in "my conſtitution, that is common with perſons of his "character." Quos inter (theſe are the words of Æneas Silvius upon the ſubject of diminiſhing the ordinary proviſion of thoſe, who belonged to the Conclave,) Cracovienſis Archidiaconus diminutionem (cibariorum) tulit. Cui cum aves & arietinæ carnes afferrentur, ſubſtractæ aviculæ ſunt, orante in porta famulo, ut quod plus eſſet, id Domino dimitteretur; ſperabat namque ex ariete partem, ex avibus autem non ſperabat: Dominus tamen aviculum præoptaſſet. Ideoque cum ſpolium ſenſit, utique conqueſtus eſt publiceque teſtatus, nunquam ſe diem, poſtquam ſacerdos fuit, tuliſſe pejorem. At cum rogaretur ne admirationem haberet, quoniam id obtigiſſet Cardinali (Aretalenſi,) "Proh! inquit, Cardinalem mihi æquiparas, "hominem Gallicum, parcum, eventrem, aut, ut ve- "rius loquar, non hominem. Ego apud eum meo in- "fortunio ſum locatus; omnia, quæ facit, perillu- "ſtris mihi cortina indicat, nec adhuc bibere eum, aut co- "medere vidi; &, quod mihi moleſtius eſt, inſomnes noc- "tes inſomneſque dies ducit, (quanquam nulla eſt apud "nos dies,) aut legit ſemper, aut negotiatur. Nulla ei "minor quam ventris eſt cura: mihi nihil cum eo "commune eſt (1)." Such is the condition of thoſe, who in the greateſt affairs are capable of ſurmounting the moſt invincible obſtacles. This requires perſons, who are patient of labour, diſengaged from the pleaſures of ſenſe, and intrepid in their conduct. I ſhall give in Latin the teſtimony of Lewis Alamandus's firmneſs againſt the fear of the plague. Neque illum preces, neque domeſticorum funera, flectere potuerunt, volentem potius cum vitæ periculo ſalvare Concilium, quàm cum periculo Concilii ſalvare vitam; ſciebat enim, quoniam ſe recedente pauci remanſiſſent, facileque committi fraus in ejus abſentia potuiſſet (2).

(1) Æneas Silvius de Geſtis Baſilenſis Concilii, lib. 2.

(2) Idem, ibid.

[B] He was treated as a ſon of hell.] In a Bull dated at Florence in the year 1442, he is called iniquitatis filius, rebellionum & facinorum multorum reus, i. e. "a ſon of iniquity, and guilty of rebellion "and many other crimes;" and it is ſaid there, that the Councils of Ferrara and Florence had condemn'd and deprived him of all his dignities, à Ferrarienſi & Florentino Conciliis damnatum & univerſis dignitatibus privatum fuiſſe (3).

(3) See Launoi- um Epiſt. xi. Part. 1. num. 45. p. 80.

[C] However notwithſtanding this he died in the Odour of Sanctity.] This inſtance, and that of Peter of Luxemburg, beatified by the ſame Bull of Clement VII (4), very much embarraſs the controvertiſts of the Romiſh party; for in ſhort, if, according to their pretences, every man, who is not united to the Pope, is out of the Pale of the Church, how is it poſſible, that he ſhall not only be ſaved in the two obediences, but even merit the honour of a Saint? The beſt anſwer that can be given to this, is to ſay, that the power of diſtinguiſhing between a true Pope and a falſe one being above the ability of particular perſons, and a mere queſtion of fact, the error is invincible, and conſequently ought not to be any prejudice to thoſe, who were ſincere with regard miracles after his death, that at the requeſt of the Canons and Celeſtin-Monks of Avignon, and the ſollicitation of the Cardinal of Clermont, Legate a latere of Clement VII, he was beatified by that Pope in the year 1527 (f). Oderic Reynaldus pretends, that he repented of every thing that he had done in the council of Baſil; but there is no proof of this repentance (g), and nothing can be urged to contradict this matter of fact, that a year before his death (h), he was one of thoſe who, at the council of Lauſanne, ſpoke of the council of Baſil, as a ſacred aſſembly (i). He died at the age of ſixty years (k), on the ſixteenth of September 1450 (l). Some ſay it was in Savoy at the Abby of Hautecombe, where the Monks built a chapel to him, and invoked him at the celebration of the Maſs (m). Others ſay that he died at Salon (n). His body lies at Arles: the Bull of Clement VII permits the removal of it from the moiſt places under ground to any other convenient part of the ſame church. I find ſome writers who aſſure us after Jacobus Philippus Bergamenſis (o), that Lewis Alamandus publiſhed ſeveral little Tracts worthy of himſelf; but I find none who give us the titles of theſe Tracts, nor mention the Library where they are.

(4) See Claude, Defenſe de la Reformation, 3d Part towards the end.

The Janſeniſts, who have criticiſed upon Oderic Raynaldus, on the affair of the pretended repentance of our Lewis Alamandus, have expoſed themſelves to ſome cenſure [D].

(f) See the Bull in Laun. Epiſt. xi. part 1. p. 79, 80. edit. Cantan. 1689, in fol.
(g) Launoius, ibid. p. 81.
(h) It was in the year 1449.
(i) Sacri Baſilenſis Concilii. Diploma Concilii Lauſanenſis, apud Raynaldi Annal. Eccleſiaſt. ad annum 1449.
(k) See the Bull of Clement VII, in Laun. Epiſt. p. 79, 80.
(l) From his Epitaph.
(m) Petrus Monodus in Amedeo Pacifico, cap. 86 (it ſhould be 79) apud Laun. Epiſt. p. 81.
(n) Moreri.
(o) Jacobus Philippus Bergam. Chronic. lib. 15.

to the queſtion of right. But how ſhall they anſwer to the replies and to the conſequences, which may be drawn from this notion, and which may be applied in favour of other errors.

[D] The Janſeniſts, who have criticized upon Raynaldus . . . have expoſed themſelves to ſome Cenſure.] They alledge firſt the reproach, which this continuer of Baronius caſts upon the memory of the Cardinal of Arles, and then obſerve, that he has been obliged to confeſs in two ſeveral places, under the year 1426, num. 26, and the year 1450, num. 20. that God gave teſtimony to the ſanctity of this Cardinal by miracles ſo viſible and ſo well atteſted, that Clement VII placed him in the number of the beatified . . . (5). The manner in which that author extricates himſelf from this Dilemma, ſay they, is very ſhocking, "and can "only be founded upon a very pernicious maxim, "which is this, that men guilty of public crimes "may become Saints, and be acknowledged as ſuch "by the Church, without having given any marks "of repentance, and tho' every thing on the contrary ſhews, that they perſiſted in their crimes. "For if the Cardinal of Arles was guilty of any "crime, and ought to be eſteemed a very ill man "for what he did in the Council of Baſil, never any man was more obſtinate in his crimes "than he; for when the Fathers of the Council "of Baſil, in which he preſided, reunited themſelves to Nicholas V, this was not in any way of "acknowledgment that they had done amiſs in reſiſting or depoſing Eugenius, or electing Amadeus; but on the contrary it was a proteſtation, "that they had done nothing but for the good of "the Church, and that they did not unite themſelves to Nicholas V, but only in chooſing him "again after the voluntary reſignation of Felix. "And that this union was made without any obligation upon them, to diſavow any thing, which "they had done; but on the contrary it was Nicholas V, who confirmed what had been done at "Baſil. So that if all, that the Cardinal of Arles "did in that Council was criminal, never any man "ſhewed more obſtinacy in his crime than he. It "follows from hence, that if this did not prevent "his being a Saint, we muſt allow, that perſiſting "even in the greateſt crimes does not hinder a "perſon's becoming a Saint; which is a very ſhocking thought. And yet it is a neceſſary reſult "from what Raynaldus ſays under the year 1450, n. "20. Hoc anno, ſays he, Ludovicum Alamandum Archiepiſcopum Aretalenſem . . . vita ceſſiſſe tradunt, atque miraculis poſt mortem coruſcaſſe affirmant, eumque Clemens VII veluti beatum coli permiſit, exarato diplomate Pontificio 9 Apr. ann. 1527. Itaque adoranda eſt divina miſeritordia, quæ exiguo temporis fluxu Ludovicum ipſum nefandi & perniciоſiſſimi ſchiſmatis auctorem, propagatorem hæreſeos, qui ex erronea conſtientia innumera in Dei Eccleſiam mala invexerat, ac tot annorum curſu in pertinaciâ obfirmatus profanaverat ſacramenta, pœnitentem ac reverſum in gremium Eccleſiæ ad ſanctitatis culmen brevi evexit. If this "author had been contented to ſay, that the great "zeal, which this holy perſon was inſpired with "for the reformation of the Church, had carried "him to ſome actions which were too violent, tho' "he did them upon a good motive, this might have "been ſuffered, and would not have been ſo con"trary to the teſtimonies, which God gave of his "ſanctity. But to repreſent him as a wicked per"ſon, an heretic, and an obſtinate ſchiſmatic, who "prophaned the Sacraments by an infinite number "of ſacrilegious actions; and yet to tell us, that "in a year or two he became a Saint worthy of be"ing canonized, without having given any proof "of his repentance of thoſe crimes imputed to "him; this is a very ſtrange idea of ſanctity, or "more properly a conviction, that they had rather "join wickedneſs and holineſs together, than con"feſs that a Pope may err, in declaring a man to be "impious, when even God himſelf has declared him "a Saint. But the Bull of Clement VII for the "beatification of this holy man, given us by Ciaconius, is ſufficient to confound this writer, ſince "the Pope gives him this teſtimony, not that he "repented of the great crimes which he committed, but that he rendred to God his ſoul very "pure and undefiled after he had lived ſixty years."

Theſe Gentlemen very juſtly cenſure Raynaldus with regard to the confidence, with which he aſſerts, that Alamandus repented, and they refute his pretences in a demonſtrative manner. But they do him injuſtice to accuſe him of that ſhocking opinion, which they aggravate with ſo much pomp. It is by no means true, that he joins holineſs and impenitency together; he ſuppoſes on the contrary that the Cardinal repented; and in this caſe he acknowledges the adorable mercy of God.

As for the reſt, if I ſhould obſerve here, that Mr. Claude has reproached the Janſeniſts with having blown hot and cold with regard to Oderic Raynaldus (6); it is only to ſhew, that I am not the only perſon who imputes theſe remarks to them.

(5) Remarques ſur le xvii Tome des Annales Eccleſiaſtiques, pag. 213. Theſe Remarques are printed with the Recueil de diverſes pieces pour la Defenſe des Cenſures de la Faculte de Theologie de Paris, contre un Bref & une Bulle d'Alexandre VII. I make uſe of the Geneva edition (in the title it is, a Munſter chez Barnard Raesfeld) in 1667 in 8vo.

(6) Claude, Preface de la Reponſe à la Perpetuité de la Foi defendue, pag. xxviii, xxix.

☞ALAMANNI (NICHOLAS) a learned man of the ſeventeenth Century, was born of Greek parents, and educated in the Greek College founded by Pope Gregory XIII, where he made a prodigious progreſs in learning, and became eminent for the ſtrength of his genius, and the integrity of his manners. He afterwards entered into holy orders [A]; and his fortune being very inconſiderable, he employed himſelf in teaching

[A] Entered into holy orders.] Erythræus tells us, that he probably had a deſign at firſt to go and ſettle in Greece, which induced him to apply to a Greek Biſhop, who ordained him a Sub-Deacon. But having afterwards teaching the Greek language to ſeveral men of diſtinguiſhed rank, and gained the friendſhip of Scipio Cobellutius, who was at that time Secretary of the brieſs to Pope Paul V, and had a ſtrong deſire to be inſtructed in the Greek learning. This opened a way for him to obtain the poſt of Secretary to Cardinal Borgheſe [B]. He was afterwards made Keeper of the Vatican Library [C], and publiſhed the Hiſtory of Procopius, and a Deſcription of St. John de Lateran. He died of a diſtemper contracted by his cloſe attendance at the erecting of the great altar of the Church of St. Peter at Rome (a) [D].

(a) Jan. Nicius Erythræus, Pinacotheca I. pag. 125, &c. edit. Lipſiæ, 1712.

afterwards greater expectations of advantage in the Romiſh church, he changed his mind, and received the other ſacred orders from the hands of the Biſhops of that church. Dedit etiam cum aliis ſociis de more militiæ Eccleſiaſticæ nomen; & quoniam fortaſſe habebat in animo in Græciam navigare, ibique vitæ ſuæ domicilium conſtituere, a Græco Epiſcopo in ſubdiaconorum ordinem ac numerum adſcribi voluit: ſed poſteaquam a Latinis oris opulentior illi ſpes effulgere viſa eſt, ad id, unde ſecundus rebus ſuis ſtatus oſtendebatur, vela dedit, & ad Latinorum caſtra tranſiit; ab eiſque reliquis ſacris ordinibus initiatus eſt. It appears from this paſſage that the proſpect of intereſt was Alamanni's inducement to join himſelf to the church of Rome, and determined all the controverſies between the Greeks and Latins in favour of the latter. It is a little ſtrange that Erythræus, a zealous Roman Catholic, ſhould mention this circumſtance in his Elogium upon our Author, ſince it does no very great honour to the character of the latter, or to the Romiſh church, whoſe emoluments ſeem to have been the ſtrongeſt argument in its favour.

[B] To obtain the poſt of Secretary to Cardinal Borgheſe.] This Cardinal wanting a perſon to aſſiſt him in writing his Latin Letters, Scipio Cobellutius was deſired by Cardinal Lanfranc Margotius to enquire for a Man of Letters, who was fit for that employment. He neglecting ſeveral of his friends, who were extremely well qualified for that province, pitched upon Alamanni; who having never applied the learning which he had acquired in the ſchools, to buſineſs, proved very inſufficient for that poſt; for he was prodigiouſly defective in the ſtyle and ſentiments of his Letters, and did not at all maintain the dignity of the perſon, in whoſe name he wrote, nor the reſpect due to thoſe, to whom the Letters were addreſſed; and Cardinal Margotius was frequently heard to complain, that he uſed to mix Greek words in his Latin Letters, than which nothing could poſſibly be more abſurd. Qui quoniam, quod in ſcholis didicerat, nunquam ad uſum contulerat, neque in verborum ac ſententiarum gravitate in ſcribendo, neque ejus, qui ſcribebat, neque eorum, ad quos ſcribebatur, honoris ac dignitatis gradum conſervabat, minus ad id munus idoneus habebatur; ac ſæpè auditus eſt queri Lanfrancus, quod ille, in epiſtolis, Latinis verbis Græca miſceret, quo nihil fieri potuit ineptius. This defect in Men of Learning is very common, and has been taken notice of by the ingenious author of ſeveral Letters upon Education, publiſhed in the Spectator, particularly that in the fifth volume N°. 353. He tells us that the want of the method which he propoſes for the education of youth "is very viſible in many learned perſons, who while "they are admiring the ſtyle of Demoſthenes or "Cicero, want Phraſes to expreſs themſelves on the "moſt common occaſions. I have ſeen a Letter "from one of theſe Latin Orators, which would "have been deſervedly laugh'd at by a common At"torney." The ſcheme, which he propoſes, is, that every Schoolmaſter ſhould inſtruct his Scholars in the writing of Letters in their native language. "To this end, ſays he, inſtead of perplexing them "with Latin Epiſtles, Themes, and Verſes, there "might be a punctual correſpondence eſtabliſhed be"tween two boys, who might act in any imagi"nary parts of buſineſs, or be allowed ſometimes to "give a range to their own fancies, and communi"cate to each other whatever trifles they thought "fit, provided neither of them ever failed at the "appointed time to anſwer his correſpondent's Let"ter." Theſe directions are very judicious; and we may obſerve in general, that where the knowledge of the world, of men and of books are joined together, they form a compleat character. Cicero and Pliny the younger, two of the greateſt Men in antiquity, ſhew in their Epiſtles the Philoſopher and the Man of buſineſs at the ſame time, and diſplay an eaſy unaffected eloquence, which is ſuitable to every ſubject, which they write upon. With regard to the objection againſt Alamanni's intermixing Greek with Latin in his Letters, this has been a very common defect among Men of Learning, eſpecially at the firſt reviving of Literature. Henry Stephens takes notice of this (1), and obſerves that Pliny as well as Cicero never introduce any Greek words, unleſs they are extremely proper and expreſſive; whereas, ſays he, many perſons now crowd their writings, and eſpecially their Letters, with Greek words and phraſes, not becauſe they are more proper than the Latin, but becauſe they underſtand them themſelves, and therefore are willing, that other people ſhould ſee, that they are Maſters of ſome Greek; and if they knew more of that language, their Letters would undoubtedly be quite full of it. Cæterum hoc quoque in iis obſervandum eſt, qui linguam Græcam callent, quam aptas voces Græcas, & quam non temerè ſuis Latinis Epiſtolis Plinius immiſceat. Quam cautionem Ciceronem etiam adhibuiſſe videmus; quum hodiè contra plerique in ſua ſcripta ſuaſque præſertim epiſtolas vocabula Græca infarciant, non quod aptiora ſint Latinis, ſed quod ea quum nôrint, etiam nôſſe ſciri velint; quod ſi multa nôſſent, totas illis epiſtolas refarcirent.

(1) Præfat. in Plinii Epiſt. p. 36. edit. Jacobi Stœr, 1620.

[C] Keeper of the Vatican Library.] There being a vacancy, upon the death of Balthaſar Anſideus, who had enjoyed that place, and Cardinal Borgheſe having ſuch a prodigious intereſt at Rome, that no perſon was raiſed to any conſiderable poſt who was not of his family; Alamanni was conſidered as the fitteſt man for that place, on account of his exact knowledge of the Greek and Roman Learning; and accordingly it was given him, and he executed it with great application and applauſe (2).

(2) Jan. Nic. Erythr. ubi ſupra.

[D] Contracted by his cloſe attendance at the erecting of the great altar in the church of St. Peter at Rome.] This altar being deſigned to be adorned with great braſs pillars, and the weight of it conſequently very great, it was neceſſary to dig the foundations very deep; and therefore Alamanni was appointed to take care, that no perſon ſhould carry away any of the earth, which had been ſprinkled with the blood, and mingled with the bones of ſo many Martyrs. But he having attended more ſtrictly upon this charge, than his health permitted, and continued whole days together without ſtirring from thence, was at laſt ſtruck all over by the ſteams or vapours, which aroſe from the earth when it was broken up; this threw him into a diſtemper, of which he died in a little time. But let us hear Nicius Erythræus in his florid and pompous Latin. Cum enim ejus templi ara maxima, æneis columnis, ingenti magnitudine ſummoque artificio elaboratis, ad umbellam eidem impoſitam ſuſtinendam exornanda eſſet, quo paria tanto oneri fundamenta jacerentur neceſſe fuerat, altè circa aram terram effodere; cui operi ille cuſtos eſt additus, ut videlicet daret operam, ne quis ſacrilegus, vel quiſquam alius nimis curiosè religioſus, quidquam ex illâ humo, tot Martyrum cruore imbuta, ſacriſque eorundem oſſibus admiſta ſurriperet: ſed cum illi muneri diligentius quàm ejus ſalutis ratio pateretur incumberet, neque totos dies ſe loco moveret, accidit ut vaporibus qui ex commotâ illâ humo exhalabant, toto corpore conceptis, læthalem in tabem incurreret, ex eaque brevi moreretur. T.

(a) In Italian LUIGI.

☞ALAMANNI (LEWIS) (a) was born at Florence the 28th of Oct. 1495. His father Peter Alamanni and his mother Genevieva Paganelli were both of noble and illuſtrious illuſtrious families, and of the party of the Paleſchi, who favoured the Medici againſt the Poppolani or aſſertors of Liberty (b). He ſtudied in his own country perhaps under James Diacceto, as ſome authors have aſſerted, who yet are probably miſtaken [A]. The friendſhip in which he engaged with Buondelmonte and Diacceto became at laſt fatal to him; for he entered (c) with them into a conſpiracy againſt Julius de Medici [B], but the plot being diſcovered, he was obliged to fly out of his native country; he and Buondelmonte went by different roads to Venice, where Charles Capello a Senator received them in his palace. But Julius de Medici having been choſen Pope the next year under the name of Clement VII, they did not think themſelves ſafe at Venice, and reſolved to retire into France; but paſſing through Breſcia they were there arreſted and put in priſon; for what reaſon is unknown, perhaps it was at the Pope's inſtigation. As ſoon as Capello heard it, he uſed all his intereſt ſo ſucceſsfully in their favour, that they were ſet at liberty. It was perhaps for this ſervice that Capello, being ſome years after Embaſſador at Florence, was very honourably received by the Lords of that city. Alamanni to evade the Pope's reſentment wandered from one place to another, living ſometimes in France, ſometimes at Genoa, waiting for a happy change that might reſtore him to his native country. This change happened in the year 1527, when Charles the Fifth's army having taken Rome, the Pope retired to the Caſtle of St. Angelo, where he was in a manner kept a priſoner. The Florentines who ſided with the people took hold of this opportunity to reſtore the publick liberty; they drove the Medici out of the city, and called back all thoſe that had been baniſhed, and among them Alamanni and Buondelmonte. But the Emperor's army being very ſucceſsful in Italy, Nicholas Capponi, who had been choſen one of the chief Magiſtrates at Florence (d), began to fear ſome new misfortunes, therefore he deſired to enter into an agreement with the Emperor. Several perſons were of his opinion; and having aſſembled the council of the city, Alamanni made a long diſcourſe to ſupport Capponi's opinion. But the credit of thoſe on the other ſide of the queſtion prevailed, and Alamanni became ſuſpicious to the abettors of liberty; for which reaſon he appeared ſeldom at Florence, and lived generally at Genoa. The Commonwealth of Florence having raiſed an army in 1528, Alamanni was choſen Commiſſary General, and his commiſſion was ſent to him to Genoa, where he then was. When he found that the affairs of the French were entirely ruined in Italy, he endeavoured again to engage the Florentines to leave the French and engage with the Emperor; but all his endeavours were to no purpoſe, and ſerved only to render him odious to the people, which obliged him to leave Florence. When a truce had been concluded between the Emperor and Francis I King of France, the Florentines ſent Embaſſadors to the former, in hopes of making peace with him; but he refuſed to treat with them, unleſs they promiſed to reſtore the ſovereign power to the Medici, and upon their refuſing to comply with this, the Emperor and the Pope's armies entered jointly into Tuſcany, took a great part of the Duchy and beſieged Florence. The Florentines in this urgent neceſſity ſent to Francis I, but not finding him diſpoſed to ſend them any ſuccour, they had recourſe to thoſe of their Citizens who were baniſhed. Alamanni, who loved his country, forgetting the ill treatment and injuries he had received, gathered all the money he (b) Biblioth. Ital. tom. 1. p. 263, note (h).

(c) A. D. 1522.

(d) The Florentines ſided at that time with the French againſt the Emperor.

[A] Who are probably miſtaken in this.] Alamanni and Diacceto were almoſt of the ſame age; and Benedict Varchi tells us, that Lewis Alamanni, Zenobio Buondelmonte, James Diacceto, Antony Bruccioli &c. were Francis Cattani de Diacceto's diſciples (1). So that the authors we ſpeak of, miſtook one Diacceto for another: And it muſt be obſerved, that there were three learned men of that name at Florence at the ſame time, two called Francis, and one James. The two Francis's were diſtinguiſhed by the ſurnames or nicknames of Panvonazzo (the Violet or Purple) and Nero (the Black) which were the colours of the clothes they uſed to wear. The firſt of theſe, viz. Diacceto Panvonazzo is the perſon whoſe life Varchi wrote. James, who was much younger than the two former, was diſtinguiſhed by the name of Diaccettino, which is a diminutive of Diacceto. Some authors alſo call him Guiaccetto, but this is not ſurprizing, becauſe the Florentines pronounce Guiacetto and Diacceto after the ſame manner (2). We will obſerve, that Father Niceron is in the right not to be too poſitive here; for tho' Alamanni was about the ſame age with James Diacceto, and ſtudied under the ſame Maſter, yet he might alſo have ſtudied afterwards under James Diacceto; for it happens ſometimes in univerſities, that a young Student has finiſhed his ſtudies and is promoted to a Profeſſorſhip, before his fellow-ſtudent has gone thro' all his courſes; ſo that the latter may come to be a diſciple of the former.

(1) Varchi in the Life of Francis de Diacceto, apud Niceron. Hom. Illuſ. tom. 1. p. 53.

(2) Niceron. ibid.

[B] He entered with them (Buondelmonte and Diacceto) into a conſpiracy againſt Julius de Medici.] His father had been a great Partiſan of the houſe of Medici, and Alamanni himſelf was very much beloved by Julius de Medici, who governed the Commonwealth of Florence at that time. The Cardinal had given ſuch orders that no body ſhould walk in the ſtreet with arms in the night time. Alamanni not thinking that this could regard him neglected to obey theſe orders, and having been found armed one night, he was obliged to undergo ſome puniſhment (3). He look'd upon this as a very great injury, and was ſo much exaſperated at it, that he joined with Buondelmonte and Diaccettino, who were diſpleaſed with the Cardinal; they formed a plot againſt him under pretence of promoting the public happineſs, being in hopes that by killing him they would acquire the honour of having ſaved their country. They thought that the death of Pope Leo X, which happened on the ſecond day of December 1521, was a proper time to execute their deſign, into which they had found means to draw ſome other perſons, amongſt whom was a relation of our Alamanni, who bore the ſame name with him (4), Nicholas Martelli, and Anthony Bruccioli. But their Plot was ſoon diſcovered. James Diaccettino having been impriſoned on ſome ſuſpicion the 22d of May 1522, Bruccioli fled immediately out of Florence, and gave notice to Alamanni who was then in the country; and finding he had no time to loſe he fled into the dukedom of Urbino with ſo much haſte, that he forgot to inform his couſin who was at Arezzo, of what had happened. This forgetfulneſs was the occaſion of his couſin's death, for he was taken

(3) Neither Father Niceron, nor the Authors of the Biblioth. Ital. tell us what ſort of puniſhment it was: I ſuppoſe it was only a fine.

(4) He was not his brother, as the Authors of the Biblioth. Ital. erroneouſly ſay (tom. 1. p. 263) but the ſon of Thomas, his couſin-german, Fratel-cugino, as the Journal of Venice has it, apud Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 55, note (a).

he could [C] to maintain or reſtore the liberty of his fellow citizens; but this was too late; the Florentines were obliged to ſurrender their city the tenth of Auguſt in the year 1530. The conſtitution of the government was immediately altered, and Alexander de Medici was inveſted with the ſovereign authority: the chief of thoſe who ſided with the People were put to death; and Alamanni among others was baniſhed to Provence, but as he did not conform to his ſentence, he was ſummoned to appear, and upon his refuſal was declared a rebel in 1532. Having now loſt all hopes of ever ſeeing his native country again, he went into France, where Francis I became his patron. The happy genius he had for Poetry put him in a way of gaining riches. Francis I loved him very much, and employed him in ſeveral important affairs, and honoured him with the Collar of the Order of St. Michael: Henry Duke of Orleans who ſucceeded Francis in 1547, having married Catherine de Medici in 1533, that Princeſs took our Alamanni into her ſervice, and made him Lord Steward of her Houſhold. Pope Clement VII dying in 1534, and Alexander de Medici having been killed in 1537, the Florentines began to have new hopes of reſtoring the publick liberty and the popular government. They took up arms for that purpoſe, and Alamanni did not fail to encourage them by his letters; it is even probable that he went himſelf to Florence in order to perſuade them more effectually; for it appears by one of his Sonnets, that ſix years after he had retired into France, he went into Italy and returned ſoon after to that Kingdom. About the year 1540 he was admittted a member of the Academy of the Inſiammati (e), which was newly eſtabliſhed at Padua by the care of Daniel Barbaro, and Ugolin Martelli (f). The peace having been concluded in 1544 between the Emperor and the King of France, Alamanni was ſent Embaſſador to Charles the Fifth; in this Embaſſy there happened to him ſomething very remarkable, of which we will give an account in the Remark [D]. After the death of Francis I, Henry II his ſucceſſor ſhewed no leſs favour to Alamanni; he ſent him in 1551 Embaſſador to Genoa, in order to prevail with that Commonwealth to receive the French ſhips in her Ports, and to give a free paſſage to the troops which Henry intended to ſend into Italy. Alamanni was alſo charged, by a ſecret commiſſion, to conſult with thoſe Senators who were attached to the French intereſt, and to raiſe by their means a revolt, which might draw off the Commonwealth from the party of Spain, and make her dependent upon France Alamanni did all that lay in his power to ſucceed in this affair, but in vain. This was the laſt journey he took into Italy, and being returned to France he died at Amboiſe, where the court then was, the 18th of April 1556 [E], being then in the ſixty firſt year of his age. He was twice married, and both his wives were of noble Florentine families. The firſt whom he married at Florence before his baniſhment in the year 1516, was Alexandra Sirriſtori, the ſecond whom he married in France was Magdalen Buonajati, one of the dreſſers to Queen Catharine; after her huſband's death ſhe was married again in 1558 to John Baptiſt de taken priſoner ſoon after and brought to Florence, where he was beheaded with Diaccettino in June following. Our Alamanni and Buondelmonte were proſcribed, and a ſum of money put upon their heads (5). The authors of the Bibliotheque Italique (6) have miſtaken the ſenſe of the following words in the Journal of Venice, E poſto taglia di cinquecento fiorini d'oro per uno, which they tranſlate thus, "They were fined 500 golden florins a piece," inſtead of ſaying 500 golden florins were promiſed for each of them.

(e) Inflamed.

(f) Razzi, in the Life of Varchi, ap. Niceron, Mem. pour ſervir à l'hiſtoire des hommes illuſtres, tom. 13. p. 63.

(5) Niceron, ib. p. 54. 56.
(6) Tom. 1. p. 263.

[C] Alamanni gathered all the money he could.] He found means to get from ſeveral perſons fifteen or twenty thouſand crowns, as Nardi relates it (7), or forty thouſand according to Segni (8), which he ſacrificed for the liberty of his country (9), having carried it from Lions to Genoa, and thence ſent it to Piſa. Benedict Varchi in his manuſcript Hiſtory of Florence (10) fixes this incident in the months of May and June 1530, and relates it in another manner. He tells us, that Alamanni leaving Genoa, where he uſed to live, made a tour to Barcelona, and went afterwards to Florence; and that he had found means by his entreaties and prayers to get twenty two thouſand crowns from the King of France, part of which he ſent to Piſa, and carried the reſt himſelf to Florence. However that be, this was certainly a great proof of his generous principles of liberty and of his love for his country.

(7) Ap. Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 59.
(8) Ap. eund. ib. p. 60.
(9) Biblioth. Ital. tom. 1. p. 264.
(10) Ap. Niceron, ibid.

[D] In this Embaſſy there happened to him ſomething very remarkable.] Among the ſeveral Poems, which he had compoſed in praiſe of Francis I, there was a very ſmart piece againſt the Emperor; in that piece beſides ſeveral other ſatyrical ſtrokes, there was one in which the cock ſaid to the eagle,

——— Aquila Grifagna
Che per ſtu divorar due becchi port.

That is,

" Two crooked bills the ravenous eagle bears
" The better to devour.

The Emperor had read that piece; and when Alamanni appeared before him, and pronounced a fine diſcourſe in his praiſe, beginning every period with the word Aquila, an Eagle, the Emperor, who had heard him very attentively, gave him no other anſwer but the verſes we have related. Alamanni without being in the leaſt out of countenance anſwered immediately, " Sire, ſince your Majeſty has ſeen " theſe verſes, I will not diſown them; but when I " made them, I ſpoke as a Poet who is permitted to uſe " fictions and lies; but now I ſpeak as an Embaſſador, " who is obliged to tell the truth. I ſpoke then as " a young ſpark, but now I ſpeak as an old man. " I was then ſwayed by paſſion and rage, with which " the deſolate condition of my country inſpired me, " but now I am free from paſſion." The Emperor was ſo much pleaſed with this anſwer, that he told Alamanni he ought not to grieve at his baniſhment, ſince he had found a Protector like the King of France, but that Florence ſhould rather be afflicted at the loſs of ſo valuable a ſubject as he was (11).

(11) Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 63, 65. Bibl. Ital. tom. 1. p. 264, 265.

[E] He died at Amboiſe the 18*th of April* 1556.] Jerome Ghillini (12) ſays, he died at Paris and was buried in the church of the Franciſcan Friars; but Luke Anthony Rudolphi his countryman and his friend, who was then in France, and for that reaſon is rather to be believed than Ghillini, ſays (13), he died at Amboiſe. We find in the ſecond book of Peter Aretino's Letters one of that author to our Lewis Alamanni, dated at Venice June the 10th 1562; but this muſt certainly be an error of the preſs (14).

(12) Theatro d' Huomini Illuſt. p. 156.
(13) In his Dialogue intitled Aretiſila, printed at Lions in 1560.
(14) Niceron, ubi ſupra.

de Gondi. Alamanni had ſeveral children, of which the two that are moſt known were probably born of his firſt wife [F]. We will give in the Remarks a catalogue of his works [G] (g).

(g) Niceron, ubi ſupra, p. 53---79. Volpi, Pref. to Alamanni's Coltivazione. The Journal of Venice, tom. 32. p. 230.

ALAMOS

[F] Two of his ſons that are the moſt known were probably born of his firſt wife.] The ground of this aſſertion is as follows: There is a Letter from Annibal Caro to Alamanni written in December 1539, in which Caro ſends compliments to Nicholas and Baptiſt Alamanni's two ſons. Now Nicholas Martelli dedicated his Collection of Letters in 1546 to Magdalen Buonajetti Alamanni's ſecond wife, and told her in that Dedication that ſhe was then but twenty two years of age; therefore in 1539 ſhe could be but fifteen, and conſequently ſhe was then too young, to be the mother of two children, to whom one might ſend compliments. This is confirmed by what the R. FF. de Sainte Marthe ſay of Baptiſt Alamanni in their Gallia Chriſtiana. We find there that he was born in Italy, the 30th of October 1519; that he came into France with his father, and was made Chaplain to Queen Catherine, that in 1555 he was made Biſhop of Bazas; that in 1558 he was tranſlated to the biſhoprick of Mâcon, and died Auguſt the 13th, 1581. F. de Sainte Marthe is miſtaken in the new edition of his Gallia Chriſtiana, when he ſays (15), that the Biſhop of Mâcon was the ſon of Lewis Alamanni, qui pro tuenda Patriæ libertate mortem oppetierat; i. e. "who was put to "death for having maintained the liberty of his "country." He miſtook our Alamanni for his brother who had been beheaded. There are ſome of Baptiſt Alamanni's Letters extant, in one of which, dated from Lions May the 29th 1545, he ſays that the King had given him in March before the abbey of Belleville in the Beaujolois, worth a thouſand crowns. a year. Alamanni's other ſon called Nicholas was Captain of the King of France's guards, and Knight of the Order of St. Michael (16).

(15) Tom. 1. p. 1210.

(16) Niceron, ubi ſupra.

[G] A Catalogue of his works.] I. Opere Toſcane, printed by Stephen Griphius at Lions in 1532, 8°. This is the firſt and moſt beautiful edition of the collection of Alemanni's Italian Poems, ſome of which perhaps had already been printed ſeparately. In his Dedication he ſpeaks after the following manner. "I ſhall "perhaps be blamed for having written in blank "verſe, againſt the common practice of the beſt "Poets who have written in our language. But I "anſwer, that rime does not at all ſuit with thoſe "ſubjects that require to be treated by way of dia- "logue, becauſe it gives it a ridiculous air of affecta- "tion. . . . In ſubjects of a more ſublime nature, "rime which has ſomething in it ſoft and tender, "rather than noble and lofty, deprives a Poem of "that dignity which muſt attend it, . . . it gives the "ſtyle a turn too periodical, it brings in a tireſome "uniformity, it ſtreightens, and if I may ſay ſo, "impriſons the thoughts, and leaves no room for "the nobleneſs, freedom and variety of ideas." It appears by this paſſage, that blank verſe were not yet much in uſe at the time our Alamanni wrote; and it may be diſputed whether he or Triſſino firſt employed them, and as they were contemporaries, it would be difficult to decide this queſtion, if we could not trace the date of their works: but it appears that Triſſino's Sophonisba, which he dedicated to Leo X in 1520, was compoſed before Alamanni's Coltivazione, who wrote that Poem in his old age, and before his Diluvio Romano, in which he gives a deſcription of the overflowing of the Tyber, which happened in 1531. All Alamanni's other pieces were written in France after the year 1522, when he was obliged to leave his native country. So that Triſſino's pieces in blank verſe having been written and publiſhed before thoſe of Alamanni, the glory of the invention ſeems to belong to the former. Several ingenious men look upon Alamanni's Diluvio Romano as more beautiful than Horace's ſecond Ode. His Satyrs according to Bianchini are written in too lofty a ſtyle; his Hymns happily imitate Pindar; his Coltivazione calls to the reader's mind Homer and Virgil, and his Epigrams are in Martial's taſte (17).

(17) Bibliotb. Ital. tom. 1. p. 265, 266.

The firſt volume of his Opere Toſcane contains Elogies, Paſtorals, Sonnets, the Fable of Narciſſus, which is found alſo in a collection intitled, Prima parte delle Stanze di diverſi illuſtri Poëti, raccolti da Ludovico Dolce; in Venegia (at Venice) 1570, 12mo; Il Diluvio Romano; the Fable Atalantis; twelve Satyrs, of which the ſixth, ſeventh, ninth and tenth have been inſerted by Mario de gli Andini in a collection intitled Satire de cinque illuſtri Poëti, at Venice, 1565, 12mo. And Francis Sanſovino has inſerted all Alamanni's Satyrs in a collection of Satyrs containing ſeven books, printed at Venice in 1560, 8vo: and Pſalmi penitentiali, Penitential Pſalms, of which there are ſeven; he compoſed them in imitation of thoſe of David, when he was dangerouſly ill in 1525. Father Francis de Treviſe has printed them in a collection intitled, Salmi ſpirituali di diverſi excellenti autori; con alcune Rime ſpirituali, Venice, 1572, 12mo. They are alſo found in the ſecond volume of the Rime ſpirituali, printed at the ſame place in 1550, in 16mo. II. The ſecond volume of his Opere Toſcane was printed at Lyons in 1533, in 12mo, and contains among other pieces leſs conſiderable, the Fable of Phaeton, and the Tragedy of Antigone tranſlated from Sophocles; this laſt piece is in blank verſe. III. La Coltivazione, at Paris, by Robert Stephens, 1546, in 4to. This edition is very beautiful, and the author himſelf took care of it: that piece was reprinted at Florence in 1546, 1549, 1569, and 1590., always in 8vo. It was afterwards reprinted again by John-Anthoni and Gaetan Volpi with the following title. La Coltivazione di Luigi Alamanni, e le Api di Giovanni Rucellai Gentilhuomini Fiorentini: colle Annotazione di Ruberto Titi ſopra le Api, e con gli Epigrammi Toſcani dell' Alamanni; ſi e aggiunta una dotta Lettera del Sign. Giov. Checozzi Vicentino, in diffeſa del Triſſino, duo copioſe tavole non piu ſtampate, e varie notizie intorno alla vita e agli ſcritti de' due Poëti, Padua 1718, 4to. pp. 355. His Coltivazione had always been printed by itſelf till the year 1590, when the Giunti added to it Le Api di Giovanni Rucellai, and the Remarks of Ruberto Titi. This edition is very imperfect, tho' Haym in his Catalogue of Italian writers calls it Bella e correttiſſima edizione. IV. Gyrone Corteſe, at Paris 1548, 4to, and reprinted at Venice the next year, with additions, as it is ſaid in the title-pages; but theſe additions are only in the title-page, and appear no where in the book. Alamanni compoſed that Poem at the command of the Kings of France, Francis I, and Henry II; but he only tranſlated in Italian verſe a French Romance then in great eſteem, called Gyron le Courtois. He informs us himſelf of this in his Dedication to Henry II, where he alſo gives us an account of the origin and laws of the Knight-Errants in Great-Britain, commonly called the Knights of the Round-Table. V. La Avarchide, at Florence 1570, 4to. Francis Bocchi in hisElogiums of the learned Men of Florence, and Michael Poccianti in his Catalogue of the Florentine writers quote that piece, but the former calls it Varchides, and the latter La Varchide. The ſubject of this Poem is taken from the ancient town of Avaricum, mentioned by Julius Cæſar, and which ſome think is Bourges a city of the province of Berry in France. Alamanni propoſed to imitate Homer's Iliad, and indeed the incidents are almoſt the ſame as in the Greek Poem, ſo that one would think the names are only changed. This Poem was publiſhed by Baptiſt Alamanni the author's ſon. VI. Flora a Comedy, at Florence in 1556 and 1601, both in 8vo. This piece did not pleaſe, becauſe it is written in verſes of thirteen ſyllables; that ſort of verſe having already miſcarried in a Tragedy of Alexander Pazzi call'd Didone. VII. Epigrammi. They have alſo been printed with the Coltivazione in 1590, and have been ſince publiſhed by the Volpi's. Dolce has alſo inſerted a great many of theſe Epigrams in the fifth book of his Rime di diverſi. To theſe Epigrams is prefixed a Dedication to Margaret Dutcheſs of Savoy, dated January the 8th 1546, whence we may ſuſpect that there was an edition of them before that of 1590, and perhaps more complete. VIII. Orazione & Selva. Neither the place nor year are mentioned in that book. The diſcourſe

ALAMOS (BALTHASAR) was born at Medina del Campo in Caſtile. Having ſtudied the Law at Salamanca he entred into the ſervice of Anthony Perez, Secretary of State under King Philip II, and had a great ſhare in the eſteem and confidence of his maſter, upon which account he was impriſoned after the diſgrace of that Miniſter. He was kept in priſon eleven years. Philip III coming to the crown ſet him at liberty agreeably to the orders which his father gave him in his will. Alamos continued to lead a private life till the Conde-Duke of Olivares, the favourite of Philip IV, called him to ſome publick employments. He gave him the place of Advocate-General in the Court of Criminal Cauſes, and in the Council of War; after this he was made Counſellor in the Council of the Indies, and then of the Council of the King's Patrimony. He was a Knight of St. James, and a man of wit and judgment, whoſe pen was much ſuperior to his tongue. He lived eighty eight years, and left only ſome daughters behind him. His Spaniſh Tranſlation of Tacitus, and the Political Aphoriſms which he has given in the margin, gained him a great reputation, though the judgment of the world is divided upon them [A]. This work, publiſhed at Madrid in 1614, was to have been followed by a Commentary [B], which has never yet been printed, that I know of. The Author compoſed the whole during his impriſonment, in which condition he likewiſe endeavoured to obtain a privilege for printing diſcourſe is that, which Alamanni made in 1529 to the Militia of Florence. Varchi, who mentions it in the eighth book of his Hiſtory, tells us that Alamanni having a very feeble voice could ſcarce be heard by the aſſembly, for which reaſon his Diſcourſe was ſoon after printed; ſo that it muſt have been printed the firſt time in 1529, or at leaſt in 1530. The Selva joined to it is the third in the ſecond volume of his Opere Toſcane. IX. Rime, Verſes. They are printed in ſeveral collections of Italian Poems. X. Lettera alla Marcheſe di Peſcara, printed in the firſt book of the Nuova Scelta di Lettere di diverſi, di Bernardino Pino, at Venice, in 1582, 8vo; and in the Idea del Secretario di Bartolomeo Zucchi, Parte II. Venice, 1606, 4to. Lettera à Pietro Aretino, in the firſt book of the Letters written to Peter Aretino. XII. Orazione, inſerted in Varchi's Hiſtory, and in the Journal of Venice, T. 32. p. 252. It is the diſcourſe which he made tō engage the Florentines to enter into an agreement with Charles V. XIII. Canzone, printed in the Journal of Venice, T. 32. p. 364. XIV. We have alſo ſome notes of his upon Homer's Iliad and Odyſſea; the former were printed firſt in the Cambridge edition of Homer in 1689, 4to; and Joſhuah Barnes has alſo printed them with thoſe on the Odyſſea in his fine edition of Homer, publiſhed in 1711, 4to. XV. Delle lodi di Filippo Saſſetti. This Diſcourſe is inſerted in a collection intitled Proſe Fiorentine, at Florence, 1720, 8vo, Vol. the fourth (18). P.

(18) Taken from Niceron, ubi ſupra.

[A] The judgment of the world is divided upon his Tacitus.] This difference of opinion relates more to the aphoriſms, than to his tranſlation, as will appear from the following quotations. "With regard "to the aphoriſms of Alamos, they are quite diffe- "rent from what one would imagine; for you will "find nothing like an aphoriſm, or that comes near "the force of what is expreſſed in the text of the "tranſlation. Inſtead of the aphoriſm's being more "conciſe and ſententious than the text, the words "of the text are always more ſententious than the "aphoriſm. In ſhort, the aphoriſm is generally no- "thing but a paraphraſtical verſion of the verſion "itſelf; which is a very tedious and inſipid thing "to readers, who have any ſenſe and delicacy. This "being granted I ſhall venture to ſay, that the "tranſlation of Alamos is much ſuperior to his a- "phoriſms. And this judgment was made before "me by the author of the Hiſtorico-Political Bib- "liographi in the article of the Latin Hiſtorians. "The Tacitus illuſtrated, ſays he, (that is the title "of Alamos's tranſlation) is very much eſteemed by "our travellers; but to ſpeak impartially, the "notes are not worth more than the impertinent "Penſées nouvelles, or New Thoughts of Lewis "d'Orleans upon this author, or than the Court "and Political Remarks of Count Hannibal Scoti of "Placentia, which Juſtus Lipſius juſtly calls Leaden "Notes. However a certain Spaniſh Secretary, "named Juan Oñate, has taken the pains to range "theſe aphoriſms under their proper heads in an "alphabetical order, and even ventured to intitle "them, Alma de Cornelio Tacito; and beſides this "one Jerome Canni has tranſlated them into Ita- "lian, and joined them to the Italian tranſlation of "Adriano Politi, as ſomething of great importance "and excellence, as appears from the title; Opere "di Corn. Tacito, illuſtrate con NOTABILISSIMI A- "FORISMI del Signore D. Baldaſſor Alamo (1)."

Here are two authors, who ſpeak with contempt of theſe aphoriſms, and two on the other hand, who put a great value upon them. We ſhall be leſs ſurprized at this difference of their ſentiments, if we obſerve, that in the year 1683 Mr. Amelot had not the ſame opinion of them, as that which he publiſhed in 1686 and 1690. Let us ſee the Preface to his Tiberius (2). It is very true, ſays he, that Alamos has not only tranſlated Tacitus, but likewiſe made a great many remarks upon him, which he calls Aphoriſms, and which Anthony de Covarruvias, who gave his approbation of it, ſays are the chief part of his work. †..... I confeſs that his performance is excellent, whether we regard his tranſlation, which is as clear as the original is obſcure, or the Aphoriſms, which are in all the margins, and are for the moſt part properly paraphraſes and verſions of the ſentences of Tacitus, and the reſt moral or political concluſions drawn from the events, which he relates. But whatever applauſe this book has met with in the world, I have ſome hopes, that mine will be well received by thoſe, who are capable of judging in this point, and ſo much the rather, becauſe what I have done is a great deal more difficult, than what Alamos has done. For all his Aphoriſms ... are ſo many diſtinct pieces, and as the proverb ſays, Sand without lime and without mortar; whereas in my chapters I make a continued diſcourſe of all the Latin quotations, which are in the margin, and even an uniform body of all the different pieces. In ſuch a ſcheme as this Juſtus Lipſius tells us, that we muſt attempt it, before we can know how difficult a task it is. The words of Lipſius, as they are quoted by Mr. Amelot, are as follows: Nec vero nudas aut ſparſas ſententias dedimus, ne diffluerent, & eſſet, quod dicitur, Arena ſine calce; ſed eas aut inter ſe haud indecenter vinximus, aut interdum velut cæmento quodam commiſimus noſtrorum verborum è mille aliquot particulis uniforme hoc & cohærens corpus formantes. Hoc totum quam arduum mihi fuerit, fruſtra dixerim apud non expertum .... eo major mihi moleſtia, quod per hæc aliena veſtigia ſic iverim, tanquam in liberrimo ingenii curſu *.

(1) Amelot de la Houſaye, Diſc. Critique, before his Tranſlation of Tacitus's Annals, printed at Paris in 1690. This Diſcourſe was publiſhed before with his Morale de Tacite in 1686. It is ſomewhat enlarged in the edition of the Annals.

(2) Printed at Amſterdam in 1683.

† Aun es la principal parte, y de mas momento deſtra Obra.

* Lipſius, Prælatione Doct. Civil.

[B] This work was to have been followed by a Commentary.] The King's Privilege expreſly mentions this Commentary. Anthony Covarruvias ſpeaks of it as of a book, which he had read, and gives us an account of its form, and principal parts. This is in the Approbation, which he gave to Alamos's work, printed before the tranſlation. Another Licenſer of Books mentions this Commentary by name. Alamos in his Prefaces ſpeaks of it more than once, and promiſes to explain the obſcure paſſages in Tacitus. And yet Nicholas Antonio does not ſay one word of it; and, what is more ſtrange, ſays nothing even of the tranſlation; but only that Alamos wrote aphoriſms upon the works of Tacitus.

printing it [C]. He left ſeveral other works which have never been printed; Advertiementos al govierno, addreſſed to the Duke of Lerma about the beginning of the reign of Philip III; El Conquiſtador, containing inſtructions relating to the conqueſts which were to be made in the new world; Puntos politicos o de Eſtado; Don Garſias Tellode de Sandoval, Knight of Calatrava, ſon-in-law to Alamos, gave an account of theſe manuſcripts to Don Nicholas Antonio (a), from whom I have taken the greateſt part of this Article.

(v) See Biblioth. Script. Hiſpaniæ, tom. 1. p. 141.

[C] He endeavoured in priſon to obtain a privilege for printing it.] I do not take notice of this, in order to lengthen this article, as ſome readers, who are uſed to be too haſty in their judgments, might imagine. I propoſe to put in a clear light the objections which have been raiſed againſt Don Nicholas Antonio, with a great appearance of reaſon. He pretends that Emanuel Sueiro tranſlated the works of Tacitus into Spaniſh, after Anthony de Herrera had tranſlated a part, and Balthaſar de Alamos and Carlos Coloma had tranſlated the whole: Poſt Antonii de Herrera aliqualem, Balthaſaris de Alamos, & Caroli Coloma, illuſtrium virorum integram operam in hujuſmodi autoris interpretatione poſitam (3). Now he confeſſes that the verſion of Sueiro was printed at Antwerp in 1613; and it is certain, that that of Alamos was printed at Madrid in 1614. This is the date, which Don Nicholas Antonio gives to the aphoriſms of Alamos (4). Beſides Alamos declares in his Preface the reaſons, which induced him to publiſh his Tacitus, tho' Sueiro's tranſlation was then publiſh'd (5). It ſeems therefore impoſſible to vindicate the author of the Bibliotheca Script. Hiſpan. againſt this objection of Mr. Amelot de la Houſſaye: It ſhews, ſays he, quoting what I have quoted above, that Don Nicholas Antonio is miſtaken, when he places the verſion of Emanuel Sueiro after that of Alamos (6). I can ſee but one reaſon to excuſe him; and that is, to ſay that perhaps Sueiro was not ignorant when he undertook this work, that Alamos had already obtained a privilege to publiſh one of the ſame kind, which had been ſeen and approved of by Anthony Covarruvias. The news of it might reach him as far as Antwerp; for after the year 1594 King Philip II had given orders to this Covarruvias to examine all this work of Alamos; and in the year 1603 Philip III gave permiſſion to print it. Alamos relates all this in his Advice to the reader; which by the way overthrows the conjecture of thoſe, who imagine that he wrote his aphoriſms in the margin of his tranſlation only with a deſign to ſurpaſs that of Sueiro (7). The aphoriſms were one of the chief parts of his work even at the time it was approved of by Anthony Covarruvias.

(3) Nich. Anton. Bib. Hiſt. tom. 1. p. 273.
(4) Idem, ibid. p. 140.
(5) Yaunque ayora Salido otro Tacito traduzido per Manuel Sueyro, no quiſe que dexaſſe de publicarſe el mio, &c.
(6) Amelot, Diſc. Crit. prefixed to his Morale de Tacite, and the tranſlation of his Annals.
(7) Amelot, ib.

ALANS, or ALANI, a barbarous people, who contributed very much to the ruin of the Roman Empire. Pliny places them in Europe, beyond the mouth of the Danube (a); but Joſephus fixes their ſituation more exactly; for he places them near the Palus Mæotis and the River Tanais (b). He gives an account of a dreadful irruption which they made into Media and Armenia, under the reign of Veſpaſian. It was then that Vologeſes, King of the Parthians, deſired that Emperor to aſſiſt him againſt the Alans, and to ſend one of his ſons for General; upon which occaſion Domitian endeavoured with all his intereſt to procure that commiſſion (c). This is what perhaps occaſioned Moreri to confound the time a little, and to tell us, that theſe Barbarians began firſt to be known under Domitian. But this want of exactneſs in chronology is nothing when compared with the reſt. He acquaints us, that the Alans joined the Vandals and Suevi, and afterwards the Goths, at the beginning of the fifth Century; that they fought againſt the Francs in the year 505; that they ravaged Gaul; that they had for their General Gonderic ſon of Aodegigilus; that about the year 509 they paſſed into Spain, where they ſettled themſelves, and were defeated by Vallia, King of the Viſigots in 418. It is not eaſy to comprehend how ſuch blunders as theſe can poſſibly eſcape every reader's notice; for to tell us of a people who were conquered in 418 in a country, which they did not take poſſeſſion till about the year 509, muſt inevitably excite the attention of the moſt careleſs reader. The truth is, Moreri has committed an anachroniſm of an hundred years. The Alans advanced in 406 from the banks of the Danube to the Rhine, without meeting any oppoſition, and being joined by the Vandals who had eſcaped from a battle which they loſt againſt the Francs, they entered Gaul. Their King was called Reſpendial, that of the Vandals Gunderic, who was the ſon of Gondiſigilus, killed in the laſt battle. Several other nations joined themſelves to theſe two, and made a prodigious devaſtation through all Gaul. One part of the Alans under the conduct of Utaces, who ſucceeded Reſpendial, paſſed into Spain in 409, and ſettled themſelves in the Province of Carthagena and Luſitania; the other continued in Gaul under the government of two Kings. The Alans of Spain being defeated by Vallia King of the Viſigoths near Merida in 418, were obliged to ſubmit themſelves to Honorius. Their King Vataces loſt his life in the battle (d). We find again in the year 464 a body of Alans who threw off the yoke of the Huns after the death of Attila, and entered Italy to ſettle themſelves there; but Ricimer marching againſt them with the troops of the Empire, defeated them in ſuch a manner near Bergamo that only a few eſcaped, and their King Biorg was ſlain in the battle. It was long before this that the Huns, having made prodigious deſtruction and ſlaughter in the country of the Alans, joined with thoſe who had eſcaped their fury. It is Ammianus Marcellinus who relates this (e). He gives a long account of the manners of the Alans (f); he ſays, that they were the ſame people which were anciently called the Maſſagetes [A]; he is of opinion, that they inhabited the vaſt deſerts of (a) Plin. Hiſt. Nat. lib. 4. c. 12, and not c. 11, as it is in Moreri.

(b) Joſeph. de Bello Judaico, lib. 7. cap. 29.
(c) Cum Vologeſes Parthorum Rex auxilia adverſus Alanos ducemque alterum ex Veſpaſiani liberis depoposciſſet, omni ope contendit, ut ipſe potiſſimum mitteretur. Suet. in Domit. c. 11.
(d) Cordemoi, Hiſt. de France, under the years mentioned here.
(e) Amm. Marcell. lib. 30. c. 3.
(f) See the Remark [B].

[A] They were the ſame people, which were anciently called the Maſſagetes.] There are two paſſages to this purpoſe in Ammianus Marcellinus (1). The firſt is in the vth Chap. of the xxiiid Book, which is very plain: Lucullus per Albanos & Maſſagetas, quos Alanos nunc appellamus, hac quoque natione

(1) Moreri quotes the firſt book, which is laſt.

of Scythia, and gave their name to the neighbouring nations which they conquered, and ſo extended it as far as the Ganges. Though he repreſents them as cruel and ſavage [B], yet he does not make them equal in point of brutality to the Huns; and he obſerves, that they carried their incurſions and ravages as far as the Palus Mæotis, and into Media and Armenia.

natione perruptâ vidit Caſpios Lacus. i. e. "Lucul-
"lus paſſing thro' the Albani and Maſſagetæ, whom
"we now call the Alans, and which country he
"forc'd his way thro', ſaw the Caſpian Sea." The other is in the II Chap. of the xxxi Book, in a place, where the manuſcripts are ſo perplexed, that we muſt have recourſe to critical conjectures to find the meaning, which I have aſcribed to Marcellinus. We muſt therefore follow the conjecture of the learned Valeſius, in reading that paſſage of the Hiſtorian thus, ad uſque Alanos pervenit, veteres Maſſagetas; i. e. "he came to the Alans, who are the ancient
"Maſſagetæ." Now as the firſt paſſage evidently proves, that Marcellinus placed the Alans in Aſia, it ſeems to me, that the explication may be conteſted, which that learned Commentator gives to theſe words of the text. Hiſter advenarum magnitudine fluente Sauromatas prætermeat aduſque Tanaim pertinentes, qui Aſiam terminat ab Europa. Hoc tranſito in immenſum extentas Scythiæ ſolitudines Alani inhabitant (2). Valeſius inſiſts, that Hoc tranſito relates to the Danube, and not to the Tanais; and he alledges to that purpoſe Pliny, Dionyſius Characenus, Oroſius, and Tzetzes, who place the Alans in Sarmatia, and beyond the Danube; but we are not examining what others have ſaid; the queſtion is only concerning the opinion of Marcellinus; and upon that foot it ſeems to me, that Hoc tranſito ought to be referred to the Tanais, ſince beſides that the Maſſagetæ never inhabited between the Tanais and the Danube, we find, that this Hiſtorian places the Alans near the Amazons, and repreſents them as making their incurſions, on the one ſide into Media and Armenia, on the other as far as the Palus Mæotis and the Cimmerian Boſphorus. Parte aliâ prope Amazonum ſedes Alani ſunt Orienti adclines, diffuſi per populoſas gentes & amplas, Aſiaticas vergentes in tractus, quos dilatari ad uſque Gangem accepi fluvium (3) . . . latrocinando & venando ad uſque Mæotica ſtagna & Cimmerium Boſporum itidemque Armenios diſcurrentes & Mediam (4). Theſe things ſhew evidently, that he did not follow the opinion of thoſe authors, who place the Alans in European Sarmatia; for who would ever repreſent it as a remarkable thing, that robbers, who were ſeated in that country, ſhould make incurſions not only into Media and Armenia, but alſo as far as the Palus Mæotis? Marcellinus would not be the only writer, who places thoſe Barbarians in Aſia. Does not Valeſius quote Procopius (5), who fixes them between the Caucaſus and the Caſpian Straights *? But what does Moreri mean by theſe words; Pliny places them in European Sarmatia, where Lithuania is now? He would ſay without doubt, if he could have expreſſed himſelf clearly, that the Sarmatia of the ancients is the modern Lithuania; but this is falſe, for Lithuania is only a ſmall part of the ancient European Sarmatia. We may obſerve, that Ptolomy mentions two ſorts of Alans, the one in Europe, and the other in Aſia.

[B] They are repreſented as cruel and ſavage.] They had no other houſes than their waggons. It was in theſe that they begot and brought up their children; and they ſtaid in the ſame place no longer than they found paſture; fleſh and milk were their only food, and they did not cultivate the earth. Nec enim ulla ſunt illis tuguria, aut verſandi vomeris cura; ſed carne & copia victitant lactis, plauſtris ſuperſidentes . . . abſumptiſque pabulis vel ut carpentis civitates impoſitas vehunt, mareſque ſupra cum feminis coeunt, & naſcuntur in his & educantur infantes (6). They were very early accuſtomed to riding, and they conſidered it as very mean to travel on foot. They were ſo fond of war, that they eſteemed thoſe happy, who loſt their lives in it; and loaded thoſe with abuſive language and reproaches of cowardice, who died of age or ſickneſs. There was nothing that they valued themſelves ſo much upon, as having killed a man. They cut off the heads of thoſe, whom they killed; and pulled off their ſkins, which they uſed for ornaments to their horſes. They had no temple among them; and they paid their worſhip only to a naked ſword fix'd in the ground. This was their God Mars, the Patron of the countries which they inhabited. Their divinations were performed by means of rods choſen with proper charms. Judicatur ibi beatus, qui in prælio profuderit animam; ſeneſcentes enim & fortuitis mortibus mundo digreſſos, ut degeneros & ignavos conviciis atrocibus inſectantur; nec quidquam eſt quod elatius jactent, quam homine quolibet occiſo; proque exuviis glorioſis, interfectorum avulſis capitibus detractas pelles pro Phaleris jumentis accommodant bellatoriis. Nec templum apud eos viſitur, aut delubrum, &c. (7). This is the deſcription which Marcellinus gives us of thoſe Barbarians; and it is very proper to repreſent to thoſe, who only ſee civilized Nations, that there are others ſo ſavage, that they may be rather taken for brute beaſts, than a part of mankind. This may ſuggeſt to us a great many reflections as well phyſical as moral, and make us admire the infinite turns and habits, which our nature is capable of, and of which for one good there are above an hundred thouſand bad.

(2) Ammian. Marcellin. l. 31. ap. 2.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Henr. Valeſius in Marcell. lib. 21. cap. 2.
* Between the Caſpian Mountains and the Caſpian Sea.

(6) Amm. Marcell. lib. 31. c. 2.

(7) Ibid.

☞ALARIC or ALRIC King of the Swedes lived about the time of Julius Cæſar, if we may credit John Magnus (a), ſucceeded his Uncle Lindorm, being choſen by the Noblemen of Sweden, without waiting for the conſent of the Goths; who thinking they were ſlighted or neglected [A], reſolved to be revenged on the Swedes, but thought fit to wait for a proper opportunity to ſhew their reſentment. Alaric in the mean time uſed all his endeavours to perſuade his ſubjects that he intended to promote the publick happineſs to the utmoſt of his power. He turned his arms againſt Norway, and having taken part of the country he made his ſon Gauthon King thereof. He then ſent Governors into the principal places of his new dominions, charging them to govern with ſo much juſtice and moderation that they might give no occaſion to the conquered nations to revolt, and to have more regard to virtue and merit, than to wealth and lucre, that every body might be convinced he was a moſt indulgent Prince, the father of his ſubjects and not their deſtroyer. He took afterwards all poſſible care to ſoften the hearts of the Goths, who were exaſperated againſt him, and to reſtore the ancient union between them and the Swedes. But the hatred of the former

(a) Jo. Magn. Goth. & Sueon. Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 14. p. 145.

[A] The Goths thinking they were ſlighted or neglected.] They conſidered that according to ancient cuſtom the Nobles of both kingdoms, Gothland and Sweden, were to concur in the election of a King; therefore they judged that it was an high infringement of their native right, thus to neglect them, or deſpiſe their votes. The Goths are a generous but high-ſpirited nation, who can bear with any thing but contempt: in ſuch a caſe they cannot reſt ſatisfied till they have completely revenged themſelves of the injuries they received (1).

(1) Joan. Magn. Hiſt. Goth. & Sueon. lib. 4. c. 14. p. 146.

former againſt the latter was already grown ſo inveterate, that it was not eaſy to eradicate it. The Goths then thinking they were to have more regard for their own honour than for the wiſhes of the Swedes, had choſen a King for themſelves, who was called Geſtill or Geſtiblind, a perſon deſcended from their ancient Princes: this election, ſays our Author, cauſed then in the northern Kingdoms as violent a commotion as that which was about the ſame time occaſioned at Rome by the death of Julius Cæſar [B]. For Alaric finding that Geſtill was provoked by the Goths againſt him, forgot his former mildneſs and indulgence, and became ſo cruel a Tyrant, that inſtead of being the father of his people, he deſerved to be called the enemy of his country; ſince whilſt he prepared to wage war againſt his enemy he overloaded his ſubjects with new and intolerable taxes, and thus made them his enemies from faithful citizens as they were before. The effect of this was, that it could not eaſily be diſtinguiſhed whether Alaric feared his own ſubjects more than the powerful Goths, who were become formidable, not only by their own ſtrength, but alſo by the alliance in which they entered with Roller King of Norway; Alaric was Roller's kinſman, and expected a powerful aſſiſtance from him; but he was deceived in his hopes, for though Roller did not think fit to aſſiſt the Goths in perſon, becauſe he was not well ſettled in his Kingdom, yet he ſent Geſtill an army under the command of Eric his brother, who was the more willing to undertake this expedition againſt Alaric, that Gauthon his ſon had been unjuſtly made King of that part of Norway, which Alaric had invaded and laid waſte. Eric therefore turned his arms firſt againſt Gauthon, and having killed him in battle, he was in hopes of getting an eaſy victory over the father. Alaric, though much afflicted at the death of his ſon, was not diſcouraged; he raiſed a great army, with which he might have gained the victory over his enemies, if he had entered into a general engagement; but he choſe rather a ſingle combat [C] in which he engaged againſt Eric, and had the misfortune of being killed, though Eric himſelf was very much wounded; however he recovered from his wounds, and became King of Sweden and Gothland after the death of Geſtill (b).

(b) Id. ibid. cap. 14---17. pag. 145-149.

[B] This Election cauſed then in the Northern kingdoms as violent a commotion, as that which was occaſioned at Rome by the death of Julius Cæſar.] Here follows our author's obſervation. "As not only the "city of Rome but all Italy was overflowed and de- "filed by the blood of the Senators and the moſt "worthy Citizens, and the bloody ſword was not "ſheathed till the deſtructive Triumvirate of Antho- "ny Lepidus and Octavius had cruelly revenged "the murther of one man upon the whole Roman "Commonwealth. Thus the Northern kingdoms, "particularly Gothland and Sweden, being over- "thrown by the arms of three powerful Princes, "Alaric, Geſtil, and Eric, were at laſt obliged to "ſubmit to Eric alone; the ſame fate, that after "great bloodſhed, reduced the Roman Common- "wealth under Auguſtus's ſubjection, attending it "ſeems the Northern part of the world (2)."

(2) Id. ibid. cap. 15. p. 147.

[C] He choſe rather a ſingle combat.] He firſt called Eric to him, and endeavoured to draw him off from Geſtill's party, by repreſenting to him that they were nearly related, and that Eric's father and grandfather had always been in alliance with the Kings of Sweden. But Eric's generous heart could not hearken to that advice; he could not be prevailed with to deſert thoſe he was come to aſſiſt. Alaric finding his endeavours unſucceſsful that way, tried another. He begged of Eric that he might fight againſt Geſtill alone, and that the deciſion of their quarrel might depend upon the ſucceſs of that combat. But Eric repreſented, that Geſtill being an old man, and very much broken by age, was not in a condition to undertake ſuch a combat; and beſides that it would not be honourable to himſelf if he declined a duel for that perſon for whom he was come to ſpill his blood; he propoſed therefore to Alaric that they might fight together. Alaric accepted the propoſal and fought againſt Eric with the unhappy ſucceſs we have related (3).

(3) Ibid. cap. 16 P. 148, 149.

☞ALARIC or ALVER ſon of Dager [A] was raiſed to the throne after his father's death, as well for the great and glorious actions he had performed, as for the hopes which the whole nation had conceived of him. He ſent Commiſſioners to the Ruſſians, whom he had already vanquiſhed before he was come to the Crown [B], in order to make them pay the tribute which they were obliged to pay the Swedes: but the Ruſſians having treacherouſly killed the Commiſſioners, ſent Alaric word that henceforth inſtead of paying a tribute, they would make war againſt him. Alaric exaſperated at their perfidiouſneſs, raiſed a powerful army to puniſh them. When they were ready to engage in battle, Hildigern, one of the principal officers amongſt the Swedes, requeſted

[A] Son of Dager.] It is impoſſible to make Puffendorf's account agree with that of John Magnus; the former tells us (1), that Alric, as he calls him, was the ſon of Agnius, and had a brother called Eric; and he applies to Alver, Alric's ſon according to him, what John Magnus relates of our Alaric or Alver. Puffendorf alſo tells us (2), Ingo and Alver were brothers, and that Alver being returned into Sweden after his expedition againſt the Ruſſians, found that Bava his wife held a criminal converſation with his brother; whereupon he run him thro' with a ſword, but his brother, notwithſtanding he had received a mortal wound, ſtruck him in ſuch a manner, that he died on the ſpot, and that they were both buried in a vale called Funewald near Upſal. Here we may obſerve, I. that according to Puffendorf Alric and Alver are two different Kings, father and ſon; whereas, according to John Magnus, they are the ſame perſon. II. According to Puffendorf Alver and Ingo are brothers; but according to Magnus Ingo or Ingemar is Alver or Alaric's ſon. III. Alver is killed by his brother, if we believe Puffendorf; but if we credit John Magnus, Alaric dies peaceably amongſt his friends. It is impoſſible to reconcile ſuch differences, and to trace out truth with regard to the moſt early accounts of all nations, the Romans themſelves not excepted.

(1) Intred. à l'Hiſt. tom. 3. cap. 22. p. 37.

(2) Ib. cap. 23.

[B] He had vanquiſhed the Ruſſians before he came to the Crown.] Having the command of the whole fleet of the Swedes againſt the Ruſſians towards the latter end of his father's reign, he acted with ſo much prudence and bravery, that in a little time he diſperſed his whole army thro' the country of the Ruſſians, and obliged their Prince to ſubmit to the Swedes, and to pay them a tribute (3).

(3) Jo. Magnus Hiſt. Goth. & Sueon. lib. 7. c. 26. p. 251.

requeſted of Alaric that he might challenge the ſtrongeſt and braveſt man among the Ruſſians to fight ſingly againſt him. His requeſt was granted, and accordingly Haldan his own brother was ſent by the Ruſſians againſt him. Hildigern who knew his brother, though he was not known by him, did all he could to wave the combat, without diſcovering himſelf, by pretending Haldan was too young ſtill, and would be too eaſy a match for him. But Haldan having given ſeveral proofs of his courage and ſkill in fighting, Hildigern was at laſt obliged to engage him, and having received a mortal wound, he diſcovered to him that they were brothers [C], and died in a few moments. Alaric, notwithſtanding his champion had been killed, engaged in battle againſt the Ruſſians, and by a complete victory repaired the loſs of his brave officer. The Ruſſians being vanquiſhed could not refuſe any longer to pay a tribute to the Swedes. Alaric returned triumphant into his Kingdom, and paſſed the remaining part of his life in peace, propagating very good laws to maintain union and tranquillity among his ſubjects, and died at laſt in a good old age (a). Hence it appears, ſays our Author (b), that Eric of Upſal is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Alaric was killed by his brother Eric, who being impatient to reign, ſlew him with a bridle and bit (c), finding no other arms near at hand. Alaric was ſucceeded by Ingo or Ingemar his eldeſt ſon.

(a) Joan. Mag. Hiſt. Goth. & Sueon. lib. 7. c. 27--29. p. 252--254.

(b) Joan. Mag. ibid. cap. 29. p. 254.

(c) Puffendorf ſays the ſame; but ſee the Remark [A].

[C] He diſcovered to him that they were brothers.] This ſtory has ſomething in it ſo peculiar and moving, that we don't doubt, but our readers will be pleaſed to meet with it here. Their mother Drott or Drotha was the daughter of Regnald King of Norway, who was ſlain in battle by Gannon or Gannar King of the Goths; Gannon after his victory married Drotha and got Hildigern by her, to whom he gave the kingdom of Norway when he was grown up: But he governing his ſubjects tyrannically was baniſhed by his father and fled into Sweden (4), where he ſerved in the armies under Alaric. The Goths being afterwards tired with their King, Gannon revolted under the conduct of Burchar the ſon of a Prince or Governor of the iſland of Schonen (5), who murthered the King, and married Drotha his widow, by whom he had Haldan. This Prince, who was very young at the time we ſpeak of, was lately come from Denmark into Ruſſia, to ſerve perhaps as a volunteer in the armies. When Hildigernus found it was his own brother, with whom he muſt fight, he refuſed to engage againſt him; the pretence he made uſe of was, that this man was too young, and not yet skilled in military affairs; "For my part, "ſaid he, I have made myſelf famous by killing "ſeventy of the ſtrongeſt warriors; but Haldan has "but juſt begun to learn his exerciſes. Let him "firſt try his ſtrength againſt his equals, and then, "if he dares I will engage againſt him. Haldan not "being in the leaſt moved at theſe reproaches, replied, If I appear too young or too weak to thee, "let any one amongſt you come and fight me." Accordingly one was ſent, whom he eaſily killed. Then two men came together againſt him, afterwards three, all whom he killed, at laſt he fought againſt eleven men at once, and gained the victory over them. Hildigern finding Haldan had now acquired a glory almoſt equal to his own, could no longer refuſe to engage againſt him; and having received a mortal wound threw away his arms, and ſpoke thus to Haldan; "O Haldan, I am thy brother by the "mother's ſide; Drotha, whoſe breaſt thou haſt "ſucked, has alſo brought me into the world; "but alas! under what different Stars: thou art "born for happineſs and proſperity, and I to be "thus unhappily cut off in the bloom of my youth." Haldan aſtoniſhed and overwhelm'd with grief anſwered, "O my brother, when thou kneweſt me, "why didſt thou keep wretched ſilence? If I had "known thee, I would have turned my ſword againſt "myſelf rather than againſt thee; nay I would have "willingly ſpent the very laſt drop of my blood "to ſave thy life. O could I now die with thee! "could I enjoy the ſame grave with thee! It is thy "fault, O brother; by thy ſilence thou haſt made "me a wretched parricide. Unhappy as I am, I "will lament you while I live." Hildigern pleaded for excuſe that he did not diſcover himſelf leſt he might be thought to decline the engagement, or, which is worſe, unnatural and cruel, ſince he was reſolved to fight againſt his own brother. Having ſaid thus, he expired (6).

(4) Id. p. 252. and Puffendorf, ubi ſupra, p. 38.

(5) Satrapæ Schoningiani filius.

(6) Joan. Magn. ubi ſupra.

P.

☞ALARIC the famous King, or rather General of the Goths, entered Thrace at the head of two hundred thouſand men (a), and laid waſte all the country through which he paſſed. We muſt however obſerve, that Alaric had no great authority over his Goths; for it appears by what Zoſimus tells us (b), that he had been one of Theodoſius's Generals againſt the tyranny of Eugenius [A], and that he took it very ill, that he was not made General of the whole army, but only commanded the few Barbarians, with whom he had fought againſt Eugenius, ſo that he began to murmur and to ſhake off the Emperor's authority. Rufinus knowing the diſpoſition he was in, invited

(a) Joan. Magn. Hiſt. Goth. and Sueon. lib. 15. c. 8. p. 486.

(b) Lib. 5. pag. 292. edit. Oxon. 1679, 8vo.

[A] Zoſimus tells us that he had been one of Theodoſius's Generals againſt the Tyranny of Eugenius.] Here follow Zoſimus's words: Ἠγανάκτει ὅτι μὴ στρατιωτικῶν ἠγεῖτο δυνάμιων, ἀλλὰ μόνης εἶχε τῆς Βαρβάρης, ἃς Θεοδόσιος ἔτυχεν αὐτῷ παραδὼς, ὅτε σὺν αὐτῷ τὴν Εὐγενίε Τυραννίδα καθεῖλε. That is, "He was very angry "that he was not put at the head of the army, but "only commanded thoſe Barbarians, which Theodo- "ſius had given him, when he ſuppreſſed Eugenius's "tyranny." But Socrates ſays (1), that Alaric was in alliance with the Romans, and aſſiſted Theodoſius in the war againſt the tyrant Eugenius. Ἀλάριχος ὑπόσπονδος ὢν Ῥωμαίοις ἐπὶ τῷ βασιλεῖ Θεοδοσίῳ εἰς τὸν κατὰ Εὐγενίου τοῦ τυράννου πόλεμον συμμαχήσας. Whereupon Valeſius obſerves (2), "That Zoſimus "in his fifth book writes, that Alaric, after the expedition againſt Eugenius the tyrant, in which he "had been of great advantage to the Romans, had no "command over any Roman troops, but returned into "Thrace, with thoſe Barbarians only WHICH HE HAD "BROUGHT WITH HIM." It is eaſy to ſee how different theſe words are from thoſe of Zoſimus, whom Valeſius pretends to quote; but that the reader may not think we miſtake him, we'll give here his own words: Zoſimus in libro quinto ſcribit, Alaricum poſt expeditionem adverſus Eugenium Tyrannum, in qua egregiam operam navaverat, nullis Romanorum copiis præfectum fuiſſe, ſed in Thraciam reverſum ſolos QUOS DUCTAVERAT Barbaros retinuiſſe. Socrates adds (3), that Alaric was honoured with the Roman dignities, on account of the timely aſſiſtance he gave Theodoſius.

(1) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 7. cap. 10. p. 355. ed. Reading. Cambridge 1720. fol.

(2) Ap. Socratem, ib. n. 1.

(3) Ubi ſupra.

vited him to advance with all his Barbarians farther into the country [B]. Alaric accordingly went out of Thrace, and entered Macedonia and Theſſaly, ſlaying all that oppoſed his march (c); but the Theſſalians reſiſted him near the mouth of the river Peneas (d), and having engaged in battle againſt him, they killed about three thouſand men of his army (e). However he advanced into Greece, laying the whole country waſte; but he did not take Thebes, partly becauſe he thought it too ſtrong, or becauſe he would make haſte to take Athens, being in hopes that it would be an eaſy prey for him; but he was miſtaken, if we may believe Zoſimus [C], though it appears from St. Jerom (f) that Athens was taken by Alaric; and Claudian ſays (g), that Th' Athenian mothers drew the fatal chains; and Eunapius tells Maximus (h), that the overthrow of the temples and ſacred things in Attica had been foretold by Biſhop Eleuſinius, which prediction, adds he, was fulfilled when Alaric entered Greece. Alaric having ravaged the whole country, returned into Epirus loaded with immenſe ſpoils. Stilicho reſolved to come to the aſſiſtance of Greece; he landed with his army in Peloponneſus (now Morea) upon which Attila with his barbarians fled to Mount Pholoe (i), where they would ſoon have been vanquiſhed with hunger and want, if Stilicho, inſtead of giving himſelf up to pleaſure and diſſoluteneſs, had beſieged them cloſely. But whilſt he diverted himſelf with pantomimes and lewd women, he ſuffered his ſoldiers to plunder whatever the barbarians had left, and was at laſt obliged to retire again into Italy, having encreaſed the miſeries of Greece by his own ſoldiers. This is the account which Zoſimus gives us (k); but Claudian relates this in a very different manner [D]. Alaric having ſtaid five years in Epirus, reſolved at laſt to turn his arms towards the Weſt [E]. He marched through Pannonia, and finding but little reſiſtance he entered Italy, under the Conſulſhip of Stilicho and Aurelianus (l), A. D. 400 (m). He did not perform any memorable action for two years, engaging only in little

(c) Zoſimus, ib.

(d) A great River in Theſſaly, called alſo Salampria.

(e) Socrates, Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 7. c. 10. p. 355.

(f) Ep. 3. ad Helvid.

(g) Claudian. 2. in Ruf. ver. 191.

(h) Ap. Sigonium, in Imp. Occident. Oper. tom. 1. part 2. edit. a Phil. Argelato, Mediol. 1732. Col. 351. not. 16.

(i) A Mountain in Morea, now called Xiria.

(k) Ubi ſupra, p. 295, 296.

(l) Jornandes de Reb. Get. apud Sigon. ubi ſupra, Col. 362. not. 56.

(m) Petav. Rat. Temp. tom. 2. part 2. p. 112.

(b) Ap. eund. ibid.

[B] Rufinus invited him to advance with his Barbarians &c.] Stilicho and Rufinus were left Guardians to Arcadius and Honorius by Theodoſius father of theſe Emperors (4). They were ſo powerful that whatever either of them commanded was looked upon as a law (5). But Stilicho pretending that the late Emperor had committed to him alone the care of the two young Princes, endeavoured to ſupplant Rufinus, of whom he was jealous, becauſe he was as powerful in the Eaſt, as he himſelf was in the Weſt; he intended therefore to go to Arcadius, who was at Conſtantinople, being in hopes of getting alone the whole power into his own hands. Rufinus to prevent his journey, employed all the arts he could to weaken Arcadius's forces, and for that purpoſe he ſent ſuch Governors into the Eaſtern provinces, eſpecially Greece, as he knew would not withſtand the enemy. He then invited Alaric to invade Greece, acquainting him, that he might eaſily conquer it (6). Thus the ambition and jealouſy of two great men occaſioned the ruin of the Empire, the deſolation of whole countries, and the death of a million of people.

(4) Suidas in voce Ῥυφῖνος.

(5) Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 287.

(6) Zoſimus, ib.

[C] He was miſtaken, if we may believe Zoſimus.] He tells us that Alaric, as he was approaching the city with all his forces, ſaw Minerva the Protectrix (τὴν πρόμαχον Ἀθηνᾶν) walking round the city, in the ſame attitude, in which ſhe is uſually drawn by Painters, that is to ſay, ready armed, and ſhewing as tho' ſhe were juſt going to attack an enemy. He alſo ſaw Achilles ſtanding before the gate of Athens, juſt as he is repreſented in Homer, when inflamed with rage he was going to revenge Patroclus's death on the Trojans. Alaric not being able to behold that ſight, forbore aſſaulting the city; and having made an agreement with the inhabitants, and confirmed it upon oath, he entered Athens with a few attendants only; the Athenians received him very kindly, he dined with the Chief of them, who made him ſeveral preſents; afterwards he left the city and the whole country of Attica without having committed there any act of hoſtility (7) This is Zoſimus's account, which as we have ſeen in the text of this article (8) is contradicted by other authors, and the learned and reverend Januarius Salinas (9) is of opinion, that the whole ſtory related by Zoſimus had been invented by him, to ſupport, if poſſible, by fictitious miracles, the declining condition of Paganiſm.

(7) Id. ibid. 293, 294.

(8) Quotat. (f), (g), (b).

(9) In notis ad Sigon. de Imp. Occid. edit. a Phil. Argelato, tom. 1. pag. 1. Col. 351. not. 16.

[D] Claudian relates this in a very different manner.] He tells us, that upon Stilicho's arrival Alaric being frightened aſſembled all his ſoldiers who were plundering the country, and intrenched his army within a camp ſurrounded by a ditch: But that Stilicho approaching with his army, and intending to fight him, Alaric was obliged to draw his ſoldiers out of the camp: both armies were juſt ready to engage, when Stilicho received a letter from Arcadius written at Rufinus's inſtigation, in which the Emperor charged him not to meddle with the military affairs in the Eaſt. Theſe orders obliged him to return into Italy; whereas if he had gained the victory over Alaric, as it is probable he might, this would have prevented the miſeries which afterwards befel Italy (10). How different ſoever this account ſeems to be, from that which Zoſimus gives us, it may in a manner be reconciled to it, if we ſuppoſe with Oroſius, who was contemporary with Rufinus and Stilicho, that the latter connived at Alaric's invaſion. Here follow Oroſius's words: Quid uterque (Rufinus and Stilicho) egerit, quidve agere conatus ſit, exitus utriuſque docuit; cum alius ſibi, alius filio affectans regale faſtigium, ut rebus repente turbatis, neceſſitas Reipublicæ ſcelus ambitûs tegeret, gentes barbaras ille immiſit, hic fovit (11). That is, "What both theſe "men (Rufinus and Stilicho) have done, and what "they intended, the event has ſhewn; one affecting "the Regal power for himſelf, the other for his "ſon. And being in hopes that if the public affairs were ſuddenly embroiled, the neceſſity of "the State would eaſily hide their criminal ambition, the former (Rufinus) called in the Barbarians, "and the latter (Stilicho) ſupported them." If Stilicho ſupported the Barbarians, we may very well believe, that being in Peloponneſus he did not care to fight againſt Alaric, or to vanquiſh him; and that therefore he left his ſoldiers to live in a diſſolute manner, to give Alaric an opportunity to eſcape; or at leaſt that he was glad the Emperor's Letter authorized him not to attack the Barbarians.

(10) Ex Claudiano, ap. Sigon. ibid. Col. 352.

(11) Oroſ. l. 7. c. 37. apud Sigon. ibid. not. (18).

[E] Alaric having ſtaid five years in Epirus, reſolved at laſt to turn his arms towards the Weſt.] Valeſius (12) tells us, that after Alaric had laid all Greece waſte, he was made General of the Horſe in Illyricum; and Claudian is quoted for this, who ſays,

Vaſtator Achivæ
Gentis & Epirum nuper populatus inultam,
Præſidet Illyricis. Jam quos obſedit amicus
Ingreditur muros, illis reſponſa daturus,
Quorum conjugibus potitur, natoſque peremit.
Sic hoſtes penſare ſolent (13).

That is,

"He, that all Greece laid waſte, and in Epirus
"Did all deſtroy unpuniſh'd, does now rule
"Th' Illyrians, now he as a peaceful friend
"Enters the cities, which he ſtormed before.
"There he bears ſway, and judges uncontroul'd

(12) In Notis ad Socratis Hiſt. Eccl. l. 7. c. 10. not. 1. p. 355. edit. Reading.

(13) Claudianus, in Eutrop. l. 2.

"The

little ſkirmiſhes with the Emperor's troops, and he began already to repent of his undertaking; but in the year 402, his army being encamped near Polenzo (n). Stilicho came againſt him [F] with a powerful army, and attacked him all of a ſudden on Eaſter-day (o), being in hopes that the Goths would not defend themſelves on ſo holy a day; or that a great part of them would be drinking and diverting themſelves (p), and ſo be eaſily vanquiſhed. But he was diſappointed in his hopes; for though Alaric ſtill entreated the enemy for Chriſt's ſake to put off the fight till the next day, and though a great many Goths were ſlain in the beginning of the battle, yet at laſt they took up their arms, and fell ſo furiouſly upon the Emperor's army that they entirely routed it, took their camp, and got an immenſe booty, if we believe John Magnus, who is ſupported in this by Caſſiodorus (q), Jornandus (r), and Oroſius (s). On the contrary, Claudian and Prudentius (t) ſay the Goths were entirely defeated. But if we may judge of this fact by the conſequences, it will appear that Alaric was ſo far from being intirely defeated, that a little time after he engaged again againſt Stilicho, and that it was not till after ſeveral defeats, and when a great many of his Goths had deſerted, that he was obliged to retire into Pannonia (u). Stilicho himſelf was accuſed of having favoured his retreat [G]. This was the ſucceſs of the firſt invaſion of the Barbarians, of which Zoſimus does not ſay a word; and Paul the Deacon (w) gives a very dark and confuſed account of it, in which he has miſled thoſe that have followed him (x). Whilſt Alaric was in Pannonia Stilicho concluded publickly a peace with him, on condition that he ſhould retire into Epirus, which he did accordingly, expecting that Stilicho, purſuant to his promiſe, would endeavour to add Illyricum to the Weſtern Empire, which belonged to Honorius (y). But finding that he did not keep his word, he returned into Pannonia, whence he ſent Embaſſadors to Stilicho, who was at Ravenna, demanding money to indemnify him for the time he had loſt in Epirus, and threatning to invade Italy again, if he was not ſatisfied. Stilicho having heard the Embaſſadors left them at Ravenna, and went immediately to Rome to the Emperor, to conſult what anſwer it was proper to give Alaric. The Senate being aſſembled, the majority were of opinion not to comply with Alaric's demand, and to make war againſt him; Stilicho with ſome of his dependants only were of a contrary opinion, which however prevailed [H], and it was reſolved to give Attila forty thouſand pounds to conclude a peace with him (z). Stilicho having been killed ſome time after, the ſoldiers in Italy murthered the wives and children of all the barbarians they could meet (aa), and plundered their goods; whereupon theſe went to Alaric, and preſſed him to make war againſt the Romans; but he being willing to keep the peace which he had made with Stilicho, ſent Embaſſadors to Honorius, to demand ſome money of him, and at the ſame time that Aëtius and Jaſon [I] be ſent him as hoſtages, promiſing that he would alſo ſend ſome of his Noblemen as hoſtages to the Emperor, and that (n) Anciently a city in Liguria, but now only a village in Piedmont.

(o) The ſixth of April.

(p) Joh. Magn. ubi ſupra. cap. 9. p. 487.

(q) In Chron.

(r) De Reb. Get. cap. 30. p. 653.

(s) Lib. 7. c. 37.

(t) Ap. Sigon. ubi ſupra, col. 371.

(u) Vide Sigon. ibid.

(w) Paulus Diac. de Geſtis Roman. lib. 13.

(x) Sigon. ubi ſupra, Col. 373, & in Not. num. 89.

(y) Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 330, &c.

(z) Id. ibid. p. 334, &c.

(aa) There were a great many Alani, Vandals, Goths, &c. ſettled in Italy at that time.

> " The childleſs father, or the wretched husband
> " Whoſe wife he raviſh'd, or whoſe child he kill'd.
> " Thus foes do make amends ———.

That Alaric had ſome power in Illyricum appears indeed by theſe verſes, but I doubt whether Præſidere Illyricis, can ſignify to be Magiſter Equitum, General of the Horſe. However Sozomen ſays expreſly (14), that Stilicho obtained from Honorius the poſt of General of the Horſe for Alaric.

(14) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 8. cap. 25.

[F] Stilicho came againſt him.] Oroſius (15) ſays, there was a certain Jew named Saul, who commanded the Alani, and to whom Stilicho had left the whole management of the battle, and that it was he, who firſt adviſed to attack the Goths on Eaſter-day: and John Magnus (16) tells us Stilicho had given that order himſelf; and went to Rome in the mean time, ſo that according to the laſt mentioned author, he did not command the army. This is alſo confirmed by the teſtimony of Claudian (17), Caſſiodorus (18), Prudentius (19), and Paul the Deacon (20).

(15) Lib. 7. cap. 25.

(16) Hiſt. Goth. & Suevn. l. 15. c. 10. p. 488.

(17) De Bello Get.

(18) In Chron.

(19) In Sym. lib. 2. p. 243.

(20) Paulus Diac. lib. 13. p. 355.

[G] Stilicho himſelf was accuſed of having favoured his retreat.] It is ſaid, he would keep the State always diſturbed and in an unſettled condition, that he might the eaſier compleat his deſign, which was to raiſe his ſon to the purple. However that be, it is certain that Oroſius (21) charges him with what we have ſaid; here follow his own words: Alarichum, cunctamque Gothorum Gentem, pro pace optima & quibuſcunque ſedibus, ſuppliciter & ſimpliciter orantem, occulto fœdere fovens (Stilicho) publicè autem & belli & pacis copia negata, ad terendam terrendamque Rempublicam reſervavit. That is, " Stilicho ſupported Alaric and the whole Gothic Nation, in order " to keep the Commonwealth in awe, and to rend " and deſtroy it: and entered ſecretly into an alli- " ance with them, tho' publicly he ſeemed unwil- " ling to make any treaty with them, notwithſtanding they earneſtly begged for peace, and only deſir- " ed that a place be granted them in which they " might ſettle."

(21) Lib. 7. cap. 37.

[H] Stilicho's opinion prevailed.] They who were for war, asked him for what reaſon he adviſed a diſhonourable peace, which they were obliged to buy. He anſwered, that it was for the good of the Emperor, that Alaric had ſtaid ſo long in Epirus, with an intention to join Honorius's army, and to draw off the Illyrians from the Eaſtern Emperor and ſubject them to Honorius. He added that he intended himſelf to go into the Eaſt and head the army, but that he had been prevented by a Letter which Honorius wrote to him; and thereupon he ſhewed the Letter, and imputed the dropping of that deſign to Serena his wife, who was willing to maintain the peace and friendſhip between the two Emperors (22). Thoſe of the Senators, who came over to Stilicho's opinion, did it out of fear, as Zoſimus obſerves; and Lampadius being aſhamed of the Romans baſeneſs, cried out, This is not a peace, but a treaty of ſlavery. Non eſt iſta pax, ſed pactio ſervitutis; and having ſaid thus, he took ſanctuary in a church (23).

(22) Arcadius in the Eaſt, and Honorius in the Weſt.

(23) Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 335, 336.

[I] Aëtius and Jaſon.] Sigonius calls them (24) the ſons of Gaudentius and Jovius, Aëtium & Jaſonem Gaudentii & Jovii filios; whence we muſt naturally underſtand, that the former was Gaudentius's ſon, and the latter Jovius's. But the reverend Januarius Salinas obſerves upon this place (25), that Aëtius was Jovius's ſon, and quotes Zoſimus for this, who ſays (26), Αἴτιον καὶ Ἰάσονα, τὸν μὲν, Ἰοβίου γενόμενον παῖδα, τὸν δὲ Γαυδεντίου; but I ſuppoſe that learned Father looked only upon the Latin tranſlation of theſe words, which has miſled him, for it is inaccurate, the words being, Aëtium & Jaſonem, ILLUM Jovii, HUNC Gaudentii filium. Illum relating here to Aëtius, and hunc to Jaſon. But the Greek words

(24) Lib. 10. de Occident. Imp. Col. 392.

(25) Ibid. Not. 165.

(26) Ubi ſupra, p. 347.

that on theſe conditions he would maintain the peace, and return with his army into Pannonia. But upon the Emperor's refuſal [K] Alaric reſolved to enter again into Italy; he ſent to Ataulphus his wife's brother who was in upper Pannonia, and invited him to advance with all the Huns and Goths that were with him. He then marched with his own army without ſtaying for his brother-in-law, and came as far as the River Po without meeting any enemy; and having paſſed that river he continued his march and turned directly towards Rome, taking all the forts and towns he met in his way; and being arrived near that capital city of the world, he ſurrounded it with his army; this ſiege became fatal to Serena Stilicho's widow, for ſhe was killed by order of the Senate, they being afraid leſt ſhe ſhould betray them, and deliver up the city to Alaric; they alſo thought that after her death Alaric would loſe all hopes of taking the city by treachery. But they were miſtaken, for he beſieged the city more cloſely, and having made himſelf maſter of the Tiber, he prevented any proviſions from being carried to Rome. The inhabitants nevertheleſs were reſolved to ſtand out the ſiege, tho' they began already to want the neceſſaries of life, being in hopes that the Emperor, who was at Ravenna would come to their aſſiſtance, or ſend an army to relieve them: but finding that the Emperor entirely neglected them, and being reduced to the laſt extremity, they ſent Embaſſadors to the enemy, (ſtill thinking that Alaric was not there in perſon). When the Embaſſadors were introduced to Alaric, he received them in a very haughty manner, and propoſed to them ſuch hard terms [L], that they did not think fit to accept them, without having firſt communicated them to the Senate; for which reaſon they deſired a ceſſation of arms for ſome time, which being granted, they returned to Rome, and declared what conditions Alaric had propoſed. The Romans, having firſt ſacrificed to the Gods after the manner of the ancient Heathens [M], ſent the Embaſſadors back to Alaric, who at laſt conſented to the following conditions; that the city ſhould pay him five thouſand pounds of gold, thirty thouſand pounds of ſilver, four thouſand ſilk veſts, three thouſand ſcarlet fleeces, and three thouſand pounds of pepper: Alaric demanded the ſons of perſons of the firſt rank for hoſtages; on theſe conditions he promiſed not only that he would make peace with the Romans, but alſo enter into an alliance with them againſt whoever ſhould attack them. The Romans having acquainted Honorius with this, he ſubmitted to theſe conditions, and the peace was concluded. Alaric then withdrew his army from the neighbourhood of Rome, and marched to Tuſcany, where he pitched his camp (bb). Some time after Ataulphus, whom Alaric had invited to come into Italy, as we have ſaid above, arrived at the head of an army. Honorius having notice of this gathered all the troops he could, and ſent them againſt Ataulphus, expreſly charging them to prevent his joining with Alaric. The Emperor's troops having met Ataulphus's army, they engaged in battle, and the latter had eleven hundred (cc) men killed, the former loſing only ſeventeen. Alaric looked probably upon this as an hoſtility, by which the peace lately concluded was broke; for we find that Jovius General of the Guards (dd) ſent him ſome perſons to adviſe him to advance near Ravenna, in order to treat about the peace; whence it is plain that the peace concluded at the ſiege of Rome had been broke. Alaric came as far as Rimini, about thirty miles diſtant from Ravenna, where Jovius met him to hear the conditions he propoſed, which were, that a certain ſum of money ſhould be paid him, and a certain quantity of proviſions ſent yearly, and that he ſhould be permitted to may at leaſt ſignifie that Aëtius was Gaudentius's ſon; and thus, I ſuppoſe, Sigonius underſtood them. But if they be equivocal, it muſt be obſerved, that Gregory of Tours (27) and Jornandes (28) expreſly tell us, Aëtius was Gaudentius's ſon; ſo that Father Salinas muſt be miſtaken.

(bb) Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 347--358.

(cc) Sigonius ſays fifteen hundred, though he follows here, Zoſimus, who ſpeaks but of eleven hundred, ἑκατὸν καὶ χιλίους. ibid. p. 363.

(dd) Præfectus Prætorio.

(27) Gregor. Turon. Hiſt. Franc. lib. 2. ap. Du Cheſne, Hiſt. Franc. Script. Coetan. tom. 1. p. 277.
(28) De Getic. Gent. Orig. & Reb. Geſt. apud eund. ib. p. 225.
(29) Lib. 5. p. 348.

[K] The Emperor's refuſal.] Zoſimus (29) obſerves, that the terms propoſed by Alaric were very equitable, and that the Emperor acted with the utmoſt imprudence, when he rejected them. For he ſhould either have put off the war, and purchaſed a truce for a little money; or, if he choſe war, he ſhould have aſſembled all the legions he could, and have poſted them in all the avenues, thro' which the enemy could paſs, to prevent his entering into Italy; he ſhould have choſen an able and experienced Generals, who could keep the enemy in awe. But the Emperor neither accepted the peace propoſed to him by Alaric, nor acted prudently in the choice of his General, having choſen ſuch as could not but be deſpiſed by the enemy. Thus Honorius became himſelf the author of all the calamities which befel Italy.

[L] He received them in a very haughty manner, and propoſed hard terms to them.] The Embaſſadors told him, that the Romans were ready to ſubmit, provided they could obtain tolerable terms; but that if once they had took up arms, nothing could deter them from fighting. Alaric anſwered to theſe laſt words, that the cloſer hay was preſſed, the eaſier it could be cut; intimating thereby, that tho' the Romans joined all in a body, they would fall an eaſy prey to him, and having ſaid thus, he inſulted the Embaſſadors by laughing loudly at them. He added that he would not raiſe the ſiege, unleſs the Romans delivered to him all their gold and ſilver, with all their houſhold-goods and wearing apparel, and all the Barbarian ſlaves they had. Whereupon the Embaſſadors asked him, what he was then reſolved to leave them, he anſwered briskly, their lives (30).

(30) Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 254, 255.

[M] The Romans ſacrificed to the Gods after the manner of the ancient Heathens.] Zoſimus tells us (31) on this occaſion a circumſtance, which if it be true, is ſomewhat ſurprizing. He ſays, that Pompejanus Governor of the city, intending to perform the rites uſed anciently in Italy, thought fit to conſult the Biſhop, who was then Pope Innocent I, who preferring the preſervation of the city, to his own private opinion, conſented ſecretly to the obſervation of all the religious ceremonies, which ſhould be thought neceſſary to practiſe. But Sigonius ſeems to doubt of the truth of this fact (32), and Father Salinas in his note upon this place of Sigonius (33) obſerves that Sozomen, who was a Novatian (34), and conſequently ſomewhat angry with Pope Innocent, who had baniſhed the Novatians out of the city, does not mention that fact, tho' he gives an account of this ſiege (35). If he had any thing to charge the Pope with, it is probable he would not have omitted it.

(31) Ib. p. 256.
(32) Ubi ſupra, Col. 397.
(33) Ibid. not. 179.
(34) Socrates, Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 7. cap. 9.
(35) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 9. cap. 6. p. 371, 372, edit. Reading.

to ſettle with his Goths in Venetia (ee), Dalmatia, and the country now called Bavaria (ff). Jovius wrote to the Emperor Alaric's conditions, and requeſted at the ſame time that Alaric might be made General of the armies (gg), that by this honour he might recede a little from the conditions he propoſed, and conclude a peace on more moderate terms. The Emperor blamed Jovius's forwardneſs, and anſwered him, that with regard to what money and proviſions could be granted to Alaric, he might order it as he pleaſed, that being within his province, as General of the Guards, and knowing in what condition the publick treaſure was. But as to the dignity of a General he would never grant it to Alaric nor to any perſon of his nation. Jovius read that letter to Alaric, who was highly offended at it, and looked upon his being denied the honour of being General as an injury not only to himſelf, but alſo to his whole nation; and to be revenged for it, he immediately ordered his barbarians to march directly to Rome. But he ſoon after relented again; and being willing to maintain a good underſtanding with the Emperor, he ſent ſome Biſhops to him as his Embaſſadors, whom he charged at the ſame time to repreſent to the Emperor, not to expoſe the city of Rome to the rage of the barbarians, but rather to accept a peace on the moderate terms that were propoſed to him: for Alaric began now to abate of his former pretenſions; he did not inſiſt upon his being made General, and inſtead of all the Provinces he demanded at firſt, he would now be ſatisfied with that part of Bavaria which bordered upon Iſtria; and he repreſented that this would be no great loſs to the Emperor, ſince that country being often plundered by the neighbouring nations, yielded but a very ſmall income to the Treaſury. He alſo gave up his pretenſion to the tribute he had aſked, and declared that he was willing to enter into an alliance with the Romans againſt all their enemies. This being repreſented to the Senate, they all wondered at Alaric's moderation. But Jovius ſaid, that even that which he aſked could not be granted, becauſe they had all ſwore never to make peace with him [N]. Alaric finding himſelf thus deſpiſed and diſappointed, marched with all his troops againſt Rome, being firmly reſolved to beſiege it to the laſt extremity. When he arrived before it, he acquainted the inhabitants with Honorius's perfidiouſneſs, and told them that he would ſtorm the city, unleſs they joined with him againſt the Emperor. But they declining to anſwer him, he made himſelf maſter of the Port upon the Tyber, and by that means deprived the Romans of all neceſſary proviſions; this obliged them at laſt to ſubmit to his conditions, and to receive him (bb) in the city (ii). Alaric went immediately to the palace, and there he made Attalus, who was Governor of the city, Emperor, who in his turn promoted Alaric to all the military honours. Alaric having ſupported Attalus ſometime againſt Honorius, depoſed him again, and reduced him to a private life; however, he kept him with him, till he had concluded a peace with the Emperor, in which it was ſtipulated that Attalus ſhould be ſafe and ſecure from any harm (kk). The conditions of this peace with regard to Alaric were, that he ſhould be in alliance with the Emperor; that he ſhould ſettle in Gaul with his Goths, and there make war againſt Honorius's enemies. But this peace did not laſt long, for one Sarus a General of ſome barbarians, and who was exaſperated againſt Ataulphus Alaric's brother-in-law, attacked the Goths unawares, in order to embroil the ſtate in a new war, becauſe the peace with the Goths was not favourable to his ambitious projects. Alaric, to revenge this injury, returned to Rome, took it by treachery, and permitted his ſoldiers to plunder it, giving yet ſtrict orders that thoſe, who ſhould fly for ſanctuary into the churches, ſhould there be ſecure (ll). This happened in the year of Chriſt 409, according to Anthony Pagi (mm). Alaric having laid waſte a great part of Italy, intended to paſs into Sicily, but a ſtorm having obliged him to land again, he beſieged the city of Coſenza, and having took it he died there in the year 411 (nn), eleven years after he firſt entered Italy. The Goths, in order to bury him, diverted the courſe of the river Baſſento which runs near Coſenza, and interred him in the channel of it, and then turned the river into its channel again; and that the place where he lay might never be known, they killed all the ſlaves who might have obſerved it, and then choſe Ataulphus his wife's brother to ſucceed him (oo).

(ee) Venetia contained anciently the March of Trevigiano, the Duchy of Venice, Padouano, Vicentino, the weſtern part of Friuli, with part of Ferrareeſe.

(ff) Noricum.

(gg) Δυνάμεως στρατηγὸν, Magiſtrum utriuſque Militiæ.

(bb) A. D. 408. Ant. Pagi, ad h. ann.

(ii) Zoſimus, lib. 5, 6. p. 363--377.

(kk) Ibid. l. 6. p. 382, 383.

(ll) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 9. cap. 9.

(mm) Ad hunc ann.

(nn) Ant. Pagi, ad h. ann.

(oo) Joan. Magnus, ubi ſupra, p. 490, 491. Sigonius, ubi ſupra, Col. 408--413.

[N] They had all ſworn never to make peace with him.] Jovius had made the Emperor ſwear, he would never make peace with Alaric. He himſelf took the ſame oath by putting his hand on the Emperor's head, and obliged all thoſe, who had any civil or military employments, to follow his example. Whereupon Zoſimus obſerves, that if they had ſworn by God, perhaps they might have been at liberty to break their oath, in hopes that God who is a benevolent and merciful Being might forgive their impiety; but as they had ſworn by the Emperor's head, they were no longer at liberty to act againſt their oath (36). (36) Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 368, 369.

P.

☞ALAVA (DIEGO ESQUIVEL DE) a famous Spaniſh Biſhop lived in the ſixteenth Century; he was born at Vitoria a city of the little country of Alava in the Province of Biſcay in Spain. He ſtudied the Civil and Canon Law at Salamanca, and made ſuch conſiderable progreſs, that having been admitted one of the Judges in ſeveral Courts of Judicature, he was at laſt made Preſident of the Council of Granada. And having entered into holy orders he was made Biſhop of Aſtorga, and aſſiſted at the Council of Trent (a). Before the opening of the Council, he propoſed in a general meeting of the Biſhops who were at Trent, that the Pope's Bull, which contained the power with which he had inveſted his Legates, might be publickly read. But Cardinal de Sainte Croix, one of the Legates, fearing, that if the Bull was known it might give ſome Biſhops an handle to abridge the power of the Legates, thought fit to keep the Bull ſecret, in order to make uſe of it at a proper opportunity: and to elude Alava's propoſitions, he anſwered, that all the Biſhops together compoſing but one body, if the Pope's Bull concerning the Legates was to be read, they ought to read alſo the Bulls by which every Prelate was eſtabliſhed in his Biſhoprick, which would be endleſs; ſince at the arrival of every Biſhop they would be obliged to read all the Bulls over again. By this evaſion the Cardinal prevented the Council from knowing with what power the Legates were inveſted (b). And indeed he had reaſon to fear that the Council would be offended at the power of the Legates, for it was unlimited and exceſſive [A]. After the opening of the Council, when the affair of the Plurality of Livings came to be debated, Alava, finding that the Fathers of the Council could not agree about the lawfulneſs of diſpenſations, propoſed that all commendams be prohibited, and that two or more livings be never united and given to one perſon, though this union ſhould laſt only during that perſon's life, ſince commendams and united livings were only pretences made uſe of to cover a criminal plurality, and a modern invention proper only to ſatisfy the covetouſneſs and ambition of the Clergy, to the great ſcandal of the whole world; he added, that it was a ſhame to ſuffer any longer ſo dangerous an abuſe. But the Italian Biſhops, who held united livings and fat benefices in commendam, could not be pleaſed with ſuch a reformation (c). We don't find that Alava is any more mentioned in Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, and N. Antonio ſays (d), that he aſſiſted at that Council only from the fifth Seſſion to the ninth, but he muſt be miſtaken, ſince it appears, from what we have ſaid above, that Alava was at Trent before the opening of the Council. Being returned to Spain in the year 1548, he was tranſlated to the Biſhoprick of Avila (e), with which he kept the place of Preſident of the Council of Granada; he was afterwards made Biſhop of Cordova (f), and died March the 17th 1562. Martin Aſpilcueta, a Doctor of Divinity, who quotes him, calls him Alba (g), if it be not an error of the preſs. Alava publiſhed a learned book intitled, De Conciliis Univerſalibus, ac de his, quæ ad Religionis, & Reipublicæ Chriſtianæ reformationem inſtituenda videntur. That is, "Of General Councils, and of the regulations that ſeem neceſſary to reform the Religion and State of the Chriſtians," printed at Granada in 1582 folio (h), conſequently after the author's death. N. Antonio mentions ſome other perſons called Alava, of whom we will give a ſhort account in the Remark [B].

(a) Nic. Antonio, Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 1. p. 203.

(b) Fra. Paole, Hiſt. de Concil. de Trent. l. 2. pag. 119, 120. of the French Tranſlation.

(c) Id. ib. p. 236.

(d) Ubi ſupra.

(e) In Old Caſtile.

(f) Or Corduba, a City of Andaluſia in Spain.

(g) In cap. Novit. num. 104. de Reſcriptis.

(h) Nic. Anton. ubi ſupra.

[A] The power of the Legates --- was unlimited and exceſſive.] Here follows the ſubſtance of the Pope's Bull. Paul III ſaid, "He ſent his Legates to Trent "as Angels of peace to preſide over the Council, "to make all the decrees and canons which would be "proper, and to publiſh them in the Seſſions of the "Council according to cuſtom. To propoſe, con"clude, and execute whatever would be neceſſary "to extirpate all errors, and to recall the wandering "nations, and ſubject them again to the holy See, "and to reſtore the liberty of the Clergy: To de"cide and dermine in matters of hereſy, and in all "others relating to the Catholic Faith: To reform the "Church in all its member, either regular, or ſecu"lar: To reſtore the peace between the Chriſtian "Princes: To perform and order whatever they "ſhould judge proper to promote the glory of God, "and to propagate the Chriſtian Faith: To reſtrain "by eccleſiaſtical cenſures and puniſhments all ob"ſtinate and rebellious perſons, of whatſoever "rank or dignity they were, even Kings or Pre"lates (1)." It is no wonder that Sainte Croix ſcrupled to publiſh this Bull, ſince it deprived the Council of all manner of power, and rendered it abſolutely uſeleſs; for tho' the Pope ſaid in his Bull, that the Legates were to act in every thing with the conſent of the Council; this was a mere compliment, which did not render leſs ſhocking, the power, with which he inveſted his Legates.

(1) Fra. Paolo, Hiſt. de Conc. de Trente, l. 2. p. 103, 104.

[B] Some other perſons called Alava.] I. D. Diego de Alava y Beaumont born in Biſcay, of an illuſtrious family; for his father Francis de Alava was a Member of the Council of War and Maſter of the Ordnance to the King of Spain. Diego having ſtudied Latin, Greek, Philoſophy and the Law, applied himſelf to the Mathematics, and having acquired a great ſkill in that ſcience, he ſtudied by himſelf without any Maſter the military ſciences with ſo much ſucceſs, that he acquired a perfect knowledge of all the duties of a General; of which he gave a ſpecimen in a book he publiſhed, intitled, El perfecto Capitan inſtruido en la diſciplina militar, y nueva cientia de la Artilleria. That is, "The perfect Captain inſtruct"ed in the military ſcience, and the new art of for"tification;" dedicated to King Philip II, and printed at Madrid in 1590, folio; with the approbation of the learned Francis Sanctius, then a famous Profeſſor at Salamanca (2). II. Francis Ruis de Vergara y Alava, a man of eminent virtue and probity as well as learning; after he had taken his degrees of Doctor in the univerſity of Salamanca was there made Profeſſor of Law: afterwards he was admitted to the Council of Granada, and then raiſed to the honour of a Knight of St. James, and Member of the great Council of Caſtile, which poſt he ſtill held, when N. Antonio wrote his Bibliotheca Hiſpana, or Spaniſh Library. He publiſhed La Hiſtoria del Colegio de San Bartolome major de la Univerſidad de Salamanca. That is, "The Hiſtory of the College of "St. Bartholomew the Elder in the Univerſity of Sala"manca," printed at Madrid, as N. Antonio believes. He alſo took care, by order of Philip IV, of the laſt edition of De la Regla y eſtablecimientos nuevos de la orden y Cavalleria del Apoſtolo San-Iago. That is, "Of the Statutes and new Regulations of "the Order of the Knights of St. James;" printed at Madrid in 1655, folio (3). III. Leo de Alava, a Licentiate in Divinity and friend to Cardinal Colonna, publiſhed Orationes tres, in urbe habitas, ad ſixtum V duas, ad Gregorium XIII unam. That is, "Three Harangues or Diſcourſes made at Rome, "two to Sixtus V, and one to Gregory XIII;" printed at Rome in 1591, 4to (4).

(2) Nic. Ant. Biblioth. Hiſp. tom. 1. p. 203.

(3) Id. ibid. in Append. p. 324.

(4) Ibid. p. 332.

P.

☞ALBANI (FRANCIS) was born in Bologna, March 17 1578 (a). His father trafficked in ſilk, and intended to bring him up to his buſineſs, but Albani having a ſtrong ſtrong inclination to painting [A], devoted himſelf entirely, when but twelve years of age, to that Art, immediately after his father's death, to the diſſatisfaction of his relations. He firſt ſtudied under Denys Calvert, together with Guido [B] (b), with whom he contracted a very intimate friendſhip, and followed him to the ſchool of the Carraches (c). Howevèr their friendſhip afterwards broke quite off [C]. Albani went to Rome, where he continued many years, and married in that city, but his wife dying in childbed, he, at the earneſt requeſt of his relations, returned to Bologna, where, at the ſollicitation of his brothers (who afterwards impoſed upon him) he entered again into the ſtate of wedlock (d). The motives which induced him to marry a ſecond time are entertaining [D]. He was well verſed in ſome branches of polite Literature, but did not underſtand

(a) Felſina Pittrice, Vite de Pittori Bologneſi. tom. 2. p. 224. in Bologna 1678, 4to.

(b) The Art of Painting, by Charles du Freſnoy, engliſhed by Dryden, p. 348, London, printed for B. Lintott, 2d edit. 1716, 8°.

(c) Sandraart, Academia Picturæ eruditæ, p. 182. Norimbergæ. 1683, fol.

(d) Felſina Pittrice, p. 229, & ſeq.

[A] Albani having a ſtrong inclination to painting.] Auguſtin Albani his father intended to give him a liberal education, but finding he made very little progreſs in Grammar, he had him taught Arithmetic, in order that he might be qualified to ſucceed him in his buſineſs. However, Francis improved but very little in Accompts; and his father obſerving his ſtrong propenſion to painting, asked ſome mean Painters who were come to work in his houſe, whether he ſhould devote his ſon to their art? They anſwered that as his ſon might be ſo uſeful to him in his buſineſs, he would not do well to let him demean himſelf ſo far as to take up the pencil. The father byaſſed by theſe ſilly people, would have diverted him, if poſſible, from drawing; but dying ſome time after, Albani was left at full liberty to follow the bent of his genius (1).

(1) Felſina Pittrice, tom. 2. p. 224.

[B] Studied under Denys Calvert with Guido.] Albani reap'd very great benefit from Guido Rheni's friendſhip, who had already made conſiderable advances in painting when Albani put himſelf under Calvert. The Maſter drew but one profil for Albani to copy, afterwards left him entirely to the care of Guido, under whom he made a very great improvement, he inſtructing his fellow-diſciple Albani with the utmoſt humanity and good humour, whilſt Calvert on the other ſide, by the ſeverity of his temper, made Albani very uneaſy; ſo that he at laſt left his Maſter (upon pretence that he did not deſign to exerciſe the pencil any longer) and followed his friend Guido to the ſchool of the Carraches (2), where he improved very much. Albani's compoſitions ſhew a great genius and an admirable ſweetneſs, he having beſides all the parts of an excellent Painter (3).

(2) Idem, p. 225. and Sandraart, Academia Picturæ, p. 18. fol.

(3) Painting Illuſtrated, in three Dialogues, by Wm Aglionby, p. 89. London, printed for John Gain, 1685, 4°.

[C] Their friendſhip afterwards broke quite off.] Guido and Albani ſeem'd overjoyed to find themſelves under Ludovico Carrache, but a little after their amity began to cool, whether this were owing to the pride of Albani, who perhaps could not bear to ſee Guido ſurpaſs him; or to the jealouſy of Guido, at finding Albani make ſo ſwift a progreſs. However this be, it is certain they afterwards endeavoured to eclipſe one another, tho' Albani ſeems to have been much the moſt in fault; for when Guido ſet up a beautiful altar piece, his competitor would oppoſe to it ſome fine picture of his. Thus did they behave for ſome time, and yet ſpake of each other with the higheſt eſteem and veneration (4). Our two Artiſts ſeemed to have had the perfect ſpirit of Courtiers by ſo highly applauding one another in public, and at the ſame time doing their utmoſt to prejudice each other's reputation. Envy is ſometimes but too predominant in Poets, Painters, Sculptors, and others who cultivate the polite arts with ſucceſs. Fired with ambition, they not only endeavour to riſe as high as they poſſibly can, by ſtudy and application, in the ſciences, but ſtrive with all their might to pull down thoſe who alſo excel in them. How far this principle can make even the beſt-natured men ſwerve from the dictates of tenderneſs and humanity is particularly viſible in Albani; who is generally related to have been endowed with the utmoſt ſweetneſs of temper, and to have poſſeſſed all the virtues which endear a man to ſociety. He had received the higheſt favours from Guido, who taught him with the moſt affectionate care. And yet he afterwards envies the eminence to which he was aſcended. The polite Arts, one would imagine, ſhould inſpire their votaries with complacency and love, and yet we find they often have a quite different effect, and not only cancel the higheſt obligations, but even create the utmoſt averſion to a benefactor. How many Writers and Artiſts are fired with envy and detraction! With what ſecret, and ſometimes open, ſatisfaction, do they hear their rivals aſperſed! How eagerly do they ſeek after ſtories which are prejudicial to the reputation of their competitors, and are often the inventors of them! They ſeem to image themſelves and their rivals as a pair of ſcales; that one muſt neceſſarily fall in proportion as the other riſes. However, it muſt be confeſſed that this detracting ſpirit prevails infinitely leſs in perſons of exalted genius and talents, than in thoſe who have none; for detraction ſeems to be the chief characteriſtic of the latter, incapable of acquiring fame by their own productions, they endeavour to make themſelves eminent, (at a very cheap and eaſy rate) by railing at thoſe of eminent perſons. As a great genius in one art or ſcience, cannot be equally conſpicuous in all, the little fry of Artiſts are ſure to attack him in ſomething he does not pretend to excell in, or endeavour to leſſen the merit even of that talent for which he is moſt famous: Talk to theſe witlings of Mr. Pope, they'll tell you that he has an excellent knack at verſifying; but that --- take away his jingle --- and nothing remains. The ſame they affirm of Dryden and all thoſe Poets, whoſe works are the greateſt honour to our Nation. On the other ſide, if you ſpeak of the great poetic merit of theſe Writers, they immediately cry that they are no Scholars, by which word is frequently underſtood, the ſtuffing one's head with a thouſand things which a man of true genius would not deſire to know. Be this ſaid however without derogating from the merits of the true Scholar, who to a vaſt erudition joins the fineſt taſte. Such a one is the higheſt honour to Literature, and ought to be had in great veneration, as ſo very few are found of this character.

(4) Idem, ibid. and 226.

[D] The motives which induced him to marry a ſecond time &c.] His ſecond wife (Doralice) was well deſcended, being of the honourable family of the Fiorovanti, but had very little fortune; but this Albani diſregarded, ſo ſtrongly was he captivated with her beauty, good ſenſe and merit. We find that eminent Poets, Painters &c. generally make choice of handſome women for their wives or miſtreſſes, eſpecially of the latter. Being ſo very converſant in beauty, and able to ſtrike out the loveliеſt creatures on the canvas, it is natural they themſelves ſhould be affected with ſuch living ones only, as are beautiful. Albani fancied this match would be advantageous to him, ſince, beſides the ſatisfaction of poſſeſſing a moſt accompliſhed wife, ſhe would ſerve him as a beautiful model, ſo that he would have no occaſion to make uſe of any other woman, whenever he ſhould paint a Venus, the Graces, Nymphs, and other Deities, whom it was his delight to repreſent. Albani was ſucceſsful in his choice, and his wife anſwered his purpoſe admirably well; for beſides her bloom of youth and the beauty of her perſon, he diſcovered in her ſo much modeſty, ſo many graces and perfections, ſo well adapted to painting, that it would have been impoſſible for him to have met with a more finiſh'd woman. And indeed he often repreſented her as a Venus. She afterwards brought him a conſiderable number of boys, who were all ſo beautiful and ſo finely proportioned, that it is from them thoſe excellent ſculptors Francis Flamand and Algardi modell'd their little Cupids. So that Albani's wife and children were the originals of his moſt agreeable and moſt graceful compoſitions. His wife was ſo conformable to his intentions, understand Latin, to his very great regret, but supplied this defect by the perusal of the best Italian Translations of such of the Classicks as are of service to his Art. When he came to years of discretion he was very fond of reading, and particularly Tasso's Jerusalem, which was always in his painting room, he desiring such of his friends as came to visit him, to read some parts of it to him, whilst he was exercising the pencil (e). He excelled in all the parts of Painting, but was particularly admired for his performances in little, tho' he himself was very much dissatisfied, that equal notice was not taken of his great pieces, of which he had painted many for Altars. As he delighted very much in drawing the Fair-sex [E], he has represented them with wonderful beauty, but is not very happy in his imitation of Men (f). Notwithstanding Albani's fondness for painting Nudities, for which he had a particular genius, and especially women, he himself was very chaste [F] (g). He sometimes represented divine stories, but his compositions on love-subjects were so eagerly

(e) Id. p. 234.

(f) Idem, p. 276 and 277. Felibien Vies des Peintres, tom. 3. p. 525.

(g) Academia Picturæ, p. 182.

that she took a pleasure in setting their children in different attitudes, and in holding them, naked, and sometimes suspended by strings, when Albani would draw them in a thousand different ways (5). But let us hear Malvasia. Tale per ogni parte riuscì la Moglie... Trasformandosi tutta nel gusto e nel genio del marito, ingegnavasi ella stessa d'accommodar que' Bambini nelle desiate posture ferme non solo e posanti, ma nelle attitudini, & ne' scorti più difficili, e vivaci sapendo giudiciosamente farglili veder sospesi, con pannolini, & bende accommodandoli, e sostenendoli, sin' a che il bramato effetto ben' osservato n'avesse, & colto. Malvasia observes, that it is no wonder Albani's Cupids are very beautiful, since his own children, who were his models on this occasion, were exquisitely so. His wife was very fruitful, insomuch that they had twelve children alive at the same time. A great character is given of her, for she not only carefully instilled the principles of virtue into their minds, but also taught them to read and put the best books into their hands, she herself being a woman of such excellent taste, that her husband used to consult her often on his own compositions, and never without receiving the greatest benefit from her hints. All this, the Historian informs us, did not prevent her taking the utmost care of their domestic affairs, and not only of those which relate immediately to the wife, but even of such as are commonly the province of the husband, viz. paying, receiving &c. (6). Such a wife must be a treasure to a man of Letters, since few are found of this character. If a woman is very careful of her domestic affairs, she generally has little inclination for the Muses; on the contrary if she is smitten with the love of those bewitching creatures, she commonly has no manner of talent for houshold affairs, is either a coquet or slovenly in her person, her dress, her house, and every thing about her, to the everlasting disgust of her husband if cleanliness be his delight. But how many excellent characters unite in Albani's wife, that of the lover, the scholar, the friend, the steward, the housewife &c. Were all women so well accomplished, wedlock so far from being a burthen to the Literati and Artists, would on the contrary be of the highest advantage to them. It is however with great regret we inform our reader, that the haughtiness of Albani's wife gave him afterwards the highest uneasiness.

(5) Felsina Pittrice, tom. 2. p. 230. and Felibien Vies des Peintres, tom. 3. p. 524.

(6) Idem, ibid.

[E] As he delighted very much in painting the fair sex.] This inclination which he received from nature, continued to the end of his life, as he confessed in a Letter to his friend, a year before he died. He therein declares, that were he younger, he would act in a different manner from what he had done; finding himself inspired not only with a numberless multitude of noble ideas, but that he took much more delight, and had a much greater facility than ever to represent divine and human beauties, particularly nymphs, children, and diverting and agreeable actions. He then imagined, that his genius and great practice would alone enable him to strike out the noblest compositions; blaming the Carraches, for having been too diffident of their own strength, and observed, that as they had devoted so many years to study, instead of giving a scope to their genius, they by that means were always poor. To support his argument, or rather justify his own negligence, and his conduct so opposite to theirs, he observed in the abovementioned Letter that Hannibal Carrache having began to paint from idea a dead Christ lying on the knees of the Virgin Mary, he drew a wonderful and divine figure; but that afterwards having retouched the body of his Christ from a model, he changed that first production of his mind; and from too great a distrust of his own strength, spoilt his picture by his last touches (7). Sandraart takes particular notice of a Phaeton fallen from his chariot of Albani's painting, and declares it to be a capital piece (8).

(7) Felsina Pittrice, tom. 2. p. 275. and Felibien, Vies des Peintres, tom. 3. p. 526.

(8) Academia Picturæ, p. 182.

[F] Notwithstanding his fondness for painting Nudities, and especially women, he himself was very chaste.] He was so very modest, that when his wife was no longer of an age to serve him for a model, and that he was obliged to make use of others, he always, (after the decent custom of Ludovico Carrache and Guido) had only their arms, breast, and legs uncovered, and always sent them away the moment he had done (9); not but his enemies were for ever reproaching him and his disciples, who perhaps were not so reserved as their Master, with being immodest. Una fede così esatta al santo matrimonio, che più tosto s'auria eletto il morire; che il far torto alla sua Dorattice (a circumstance a little extraordinary) che però, non potendosi più di essa servire per modello, valendosi di quelle femmine che li trouava Lampietro, non aver mai perduto conorato costume di veder solo quelle parti, che non cagionan rossore &c. (10). It was a great happiness for Albani, that his wife was as a Venus to him (in beauty) till age began to lessen the force of her charms, a proof that she still was dear to him, since had it been otherwise, she could not have been so lovely in his eye. His long affection for her contradicts the reflection in Cato;

(9) Felsina Pittrice, tom. 2. p. 266.

(10) Idem, ibid.

Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover,
Fades in the eye, and palls upon the sense.

and is not agreeable to what so many wags have written, that possession never fails to cloy; nor to the story which is related of Henry IV, who being dissuaded by his Confessor from engaging in such a variety of amours, and advised to keep to his Queen only; answered the ghostly Father no otherwise than by ordering partridges to be set before him perpetually. For the first day or two the birds were found excellent, but in a little time they began to satiate, which the confessor declaring, the King drew an inference from thence with regard to his own Ladies. The story of the Painter is well known, who being ordered by a Gentleman in love, to draw Hymen for him; represented that Deity to the greatest advantage, with the utmost sweetness in his countenance, the brightest fire in his eyes, and his whole person inchanting. The picture being finished was sent home to the amorous Gentleman, who surveying it found it too languid and not handsome enough for that lovely God; so obliged the Artist to take it back in order to mend it. The Painter having got the picture home, did not alter a stroke in it: But the Gentleman having been married some months, sent again for the piece, when Hymen was found too sprightly and too beautiful, and thereupon the purchaser would have the Painter alter it a second time: However, this the Artist refused to do, assuring him that his eye, not the picture was altered... But tho' many find marriage as this Gentleman did, yet to others (who' perhaps are fewer in number) it is a most delightful state, and a wife, the greatest blessing.

eagerly ſought after [G], that he was obliged to get ſeveral copies of them painted. Though he met with a great many diſappointments in life, and private diſcontents in his family, yet ſo happy was his temper, that nothing could ruffle or diſconcert him [H]. He was a modeſt, worthy man, and had a moſt tender affection for his diſciples, (and ſeveral of them were excellent Painters) to whom he revealed all the difficulties of Painting. He died October 4 (b) 1660, aged eighty two years and a half, to the great grief of all his friends [I]. Such as deſire to ſee Albani's life at length, may peruſe the Felſina Pittrice, Vol. 2.

(b) Sandraart in his Academia Picturæ, p 182, ſays he died about 1658, but Malvaſia, (from whom we may ſuppoſe the reſt have copied) the author of Abedario Pittorico, and Felibien De Piles Graham, fix it to 1660.

☞ALBERIC

All other goods by Fortune's hand are given,
A wife is the peculiar gift of heav'n;
Vain Fortune's favours, never at a ſtay,
Like flitting ſhadows, paſs and glide away;
One ſolid comfort our eternal wife,
Abundantly ſupplies us all our life.
Pope from Chaucer.

[G] His compoſitions on love ſubjects were ſo eagerly ſought after, &c.] To his ſtudy and obſervations on nature, (he copying from his wife and children, as was obſerved before) was owing his great ſucceſs in repreſenting Cupid's playing and hovering up and down; when forming to himſelf a thouſand images of delicious abodes, he painted Venus attended by the Graces and Nymphs, and in theſe he has particularly diſplayed the beauty of his genius. He did not, ſays Malvaſia, feign Cupid heavy and ſleeping, as Guido did, but repreſented him ſeated majeſtically on a throne; now directing the ſportive exerciſes of the little Loves, ſhooting at a heart, which was fixed on the trunk of a tree; now preſiding over their ſprightly dances, round the marble monument of Flora crowned with a chaplet of blooming flowers; now ſurveying the conqueſt of the little winged boys over the rural Satyrs and Fauns. If he repreſented the dead Adonis bewailed, he always introduced a band of Loves on that occaſion, ſome of which, viewing the cruel wound, drew back in the utmoſt fear; while others exaſperated, brake to pieces their bows and arrows, as being no longer of uſe to them ſince Adonis was no more; and others again who, running behind the fierce wild boar, brandiſhed their darts, with an air of vengeance. Se finſe Amore, non ſonnachioſo e dormiente, com' è quel di Guido ce'l fè vedere, ma nel ſuo trono, ed in maeſtà aſſiſo, aſſiſtere hora all' eſercizio, ed alla gara dè gli Amoretti minori in berſagliare un cuore ad un tronco appeſo e pendente: hora alle liete danze e carole colte, e miſurate da que' teneri piedì attorno al ſimulacro marmoreo dell' inghirlandata Flora: hora alla vittorioſa ſconfitta dè Satiretti e de Fauni ſelvaggi, da gli alati Fanciulli ſottomeſſi ed oppreſſi. Se d'un Adone ucciſo fece piangere ne' pinti ſuoi rami il lugubre caſo, accompagnato anche lo volte dal corteggio d'Amorini, altri de quali mirando la crudel piaga, ſpaventato s'arretraſſe; altri che adiratoſene, l'arco ſpezzaſſe & le quadrella, arneſi reſi inutili per la morte dell' infelice; altri che imbrandilo il dardo, dietto al fievro unghiale correndo, ne minacciaſſe la vendetta (11). To heighten theſe ideas, and cheriſh the inclination he had to repreſent fabulous ſubjects, he uſed to read all kinds of Poetry, and to reſort often to the country, where the verdure of the fields and groves, the gentle murmurs of chryſtal rivulets, the harmony of the winged choriſters, the agreeable ſtilneſs of the air, could not but inſpire a fancy like his; and indeed Malvaſia is of opinion, that Albani was the happieſt Artiſt that ever lived for repreſenting of love-ſubjects. Invaghirlo, ſays he of Albani, (il mondo) queſti cò piu laſcivi vezzi, che giammai meditaſſe pennello (12). This made a learned author (13) ſay, (where he imagines himſelf conducted into the garden of the Poets at Bologna by the genius of Raphael Urbino) that that beautiful ſpot recalled to his remembrance the pictures of Albani; on which occaſion that author is ſuppoſed to ſpeak thus to the genius, "It muſt be "confeſſed that the paintings of this great Artiſt "(Albani) ſeem naturally adapted to ſuch delightful "places as theſe. Moſt of his compoſitions being "ſo gayly beautiful, that they naturally inſpire ſa"tisfaction and joy, and conſequently ſuppreſs all "dark and melancholy ideas." The genius anſwers. "You ſay right: for Albani was inclined by nature to repreſent delightful ſubjects, ſuch as cele"ſtial Deities, Loves, Nymphs, and Solitudes (14)." This made him ſo fond of the country, that he generally uſed to paſs the ſummer in it, there to enjoy

(11) Felſina Pittrice, Vol. 2. p. 232, 233.

(12) Felſina Pittrice, tom. 2. p. 234.

(13) Girupeno.

(14) Felſina Pittrice Vol. 2. p. 234.

That calm repoſe and peace of mind,
Which none in crowds nor courts can find.
The flowery meads, where purling ſtreams
Soften the ſoul to pleaſing dreams;
The woods that ſhelter, ſoft, from heat,
Where birds their various ſongs repeat;
The riſing hills, and winding vales,
And ev'ning's ſweet refreſhing gales,
Thoſe coy receſſes of the grove,
Thoſe ſeats of innocence and love (15)!

(15) From the Tale intitled Woman in Dryden's Miſcellanies, Vol. 6. pag. 149. London printed for J. Tonſon 1716, 12°.

[H] So happy was his temper that nothing could ruffle it.] Sue tele (ſays Malvaſia) -- non ſpirano altro mai, che gioie, che allegrie, che contenti. Vincitore d'ogni contraſto, e ſuperiore ad ogni contrario deſtino, non ſapea col ſuo poetico pennello, che paſſegiar mai ſempre per i delizioſi giardini di Peſti, per le amene pendici di Paſo, & di Citera: Che calcare anche talora le rupi del Permeſſo, ed arrivare a ſtanziar felicemente con Apollo e le Muſe; onde di lui ben' anche dir ſi poteſſe ciò che Freſnoy cantò del gran Giulio Romano, che,

A puero Muſarum edoctus in antris
Aonias reſeravit opes, Graphicaque Poeſi,
Quæ non viſa prius, ſed tantum audita Poetis,
Ante oculos ſpectanda dedit ſacraria Phœbi (16).

(16) Felſina Pittrice, Vol. 2. p. 232.

That is, "His paintings breathe nothing but con"tent and joy. Happy in a force of mind that con"quered every kind of uneaſineſs, his poetic pencil car"ried him thro' the moſt agreeable gardens, to Pa"phos and Citheræa, thoſe delightful ſcenes brought "him over the lofty Parnaſſus, to the delicious "abodes of Apollo and the Muſes with whom he re"ſided; whence, what du Freſnoy ſays of the cele"brated Giulio Romano, may be juſtly applied to "Albano. Things never ſeen till then, and only "mentioned by Poets.

"Taught from a child in the bright Muſe's grots,
"He open'd all the treaſures of Parnaſſus;
"And in the lovely Poetry of painting
"The myſteries of Apollo has reveal'd.

[I] He died ... to the great grief of all his friends.] Albani had always applied himſelf very diligently to painting, and his aſſiduity continued to the laſt. In the ſickneſs which was fatal to him, he could refrain from taking up the pencil, whenever he enjoyed a little interval of eaſe (17). At laſt his ſtrength being quite gone, and having received the Sacraments, he turned to his wife and children, and beſought heaven to beſtow his choiceſt bleſſings upon them. Several of his Diſciples aſſiſted him till he breathed his laſt, (he loving them tenderly) (18), and particularly Philip Merizani, who never ſtirred from him day nor night, but poured forth floods of tears. The whole city of Bologna grieved at his death, which they conſidered as a great loſs, his houſe having been free to all Virtuoſi, and his converſation eaſy, facetious and learned. He was very famous in his life time (19); had been viſited by the greateſt Painters, and had been favoured with letters from Pouſſin, Mignard, Lanfrank, Salvator Roſa, and many more equally eminent Artiſts, who uſed to call him their Father and Maſter. Several Princes honoured him with letters, and among the reſt King Charles I, who invited him to come into England, by a Letter ſigned with his own hand (20). As many

(17) Idem 281.

(18) Abecedario Pittorico, p. 160, in Bologna 1719, 4to.

(19) Academia Picturæ, p. 182.

(20) Idem pag. 282.

☞ALBERIC born in France lived in the twelfth Century. Having been a Monk in the Monaſtery of Clugni he was made Prior of St. Martin's at Paris, and afterwards Abbot of Vezelay (a) about the year 1124; and in 1138 Pope Innocent II made him Cardinal and Biſhop of Oſtia, and ſent him Legate into England and Scotland (b). The Engliſh Clergy were not very well pleaſed with this [A]; however after ſome objections Alberic was admitted (c), becauſe King Stephen being not yet well enough ſettled on the throne, durſt not diſoblige the Court of Rome (d). It muſt alſo be obſerved that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury always uſed to act as the Pope's Legate in England; but that See being then vacant, the Biſhop of Wincheſter the King's brother had flattered himſelf that he ſhould be the Pope's Legate during the vacancy of the See of Canterbury, and both he and the King were diſpleaſed to ſee a foreigner inveſted with that power and dignity (e), but they were obliged to ſubmit. Alberic intending to convoke a national Council of the Engliſh Clergy took a journey through England in order to acquaint himſelf with the grievances and abuſes that required to be redreſſed. And the time of holding the Council drawing near, the Legate ſummoned the Biſhops and Clergy to repair to London, intending to hold the Council in the Abbey of Weſtminſter. In his letter to the Prior and Clergy of Canterbury, he acquaints them, that he would conſecrate the newly elected Biſhop of Exeter, and adviſes them to chuſe for their Archbiſhop a perſon duly qualified, and againſt whom the King could have nothing to object: He alſo commands them, by his Apoſtolic Authority (Apoſtolica Authoritate præcipimus) to ſend their deputies to the Council, and deſires they may come before the opening of it, becauſe he wanted to conſult with them about ſome particular affairs that were to come before the Council (f). But we are not told what theſe affairs were. We may perhaps ſuppoſe that the Legate had a mind to form his party, and to ſecure a ſufficient number of votes for what he had a mind the Council ſhould decree. For the Pope's authority not being yet well eſtabliſhed in England, the Court of Rome left no ſtone unturned to gain ground there. The Council met the 13th of December (g) 1138 (b), and was compoſed of ſeventeen Biſhops, and of about thirty Abbots, beſides a great number of Clergymen and other people (Cleri & Populi multitudine numeroſa (i); though by the (populi multitudo numeroſa) great number of people, we are not perhaps to underſtand, that Laymen were permitted to vote in the Council, but only to be witneſſes of what was there tranſacted. That Council made ſeventeen Canons,

(a) A little city in the Duchy of Nivernois in France.

(b) Ricardus Haguſtaldenſis Hiſt. de Geſtis Reg. Stephani, in Hiſt. Angl. Script. Decem, edit. a Rog. Twiſden, tom. 1. Col. 324.

(c) Gervaſii Chron. ap. Twyſden, ib. tom. 1. Col. 1344.

(d) Rapin, Hiſt. d' Anglet. tom. 2. l. 6. p. 154.

(e) Gervaſii Chron. ubi ſupra.

(f) Ibid. Col. 1345, 1347.

(g) Idus Decembris, id. ibid.

(b) Ricardus Haguſtald. ibid. Col. 326.

(i) Gervaſii Chron. ubi ſupra.

many of the famous Bologneze Painters had been buried with great pomp, Albani's friends were greatly diſpleaſed not to find the ſame honours paid to him; and therefore ſeveral of them were reſolved to have this done, at their own labour and expence, in St. Gregory's church, and had made prodigious preparations for that purpoſe, when the envy of the other School quite put a ſtop to this noble deſign, thoſe declaring that the honours they intended Albani were fit only for a crowned Head (21). Albani's memory was celebrated both in proſe and verſe, by ſeveral very eminent Writers (22). Malvaſia has preſerved an Ode in praiſe of Albani written by Signior Paolo Moſcardini, and ſome Verſes of Franciſco de Lemene; among which are the following intended for his monument:

(21) Idem 284, 285.

(22) Idem, pag. 290.

Per l'Eſſequie di Franceſco Albani,
Queſti di giara tomba illuſtri horrori
Chiudon del grande Alban la ſpoglia frale,
Che al fin troprìo con lividi pallori
Lui, che diè vita a l'ombra, ombra mortale.
Prodigio ancora, a la ſua mano equale,
Non addita la terra in frà i maggiori,
A quella man famoſa, ed immortale,
Che diè colori a l'alma, alma a i colori.
Prometeo ſol con ſovrhuman penſiero,
Mentre di morto fango un' huomo adombra,
Poteo dar vita al nobil magiſtero.
Mà ſtupor non bugiardo hor più n'ingombra;
Finto Prometeo fù, l'Alban fù vero,
Quei diè vita col Sol, queſti con l'Ombra.

The ſenſe of which is, That the mortal remains of the illuſtrious Albani, he who gave life to ſhade, lie interred in this tomb. The earth never brought forth ſo wonderful an Artiſt, or a hand equal to his immortal one, which gave colours to the ſoul, and a ſoul to colours (23). Prometheus animated dead clay, and gave life by means of the Sun, but Albano animated meerly by the aſſiſtance of ſhade.

(23) This thought and the laſt will hardly be found juſt.

[A] The Engliſh Clergy were not very pleaſed with this.] Rapin obſerves (1), that one of the expedients, which the Popes employed, to eſtabliſh their power and authority in England, was the frequent ſending of Legates. We meet but with few Legates under the Saxon and Daniſh Kings. And tho' even at that time the Popes had formed the deſign of making themſelves abſolute in the Church, yet they had not yet hit upon the method of ſending Legates; perhaps they were afraid of offending the Metropolitans. For in England the Archbiſhop of Canterbury as Primate of the Church, was look'd upon as the born Legate of the Pope, and was uſually charged with executing the orders of the Court of Rome. But as he had affairs of a different and often inconſiſtent nature to manage, I mean, the intereſt of the Church of England, and that of the Pope, it happened ſometimes that he preferred the former to the latter. For this reaſon the Popes took hold of all opportunities, to ſend ſuch Legates, as might be engaged in no other party but that of Rome. Thus, when under King Offa the Biſhoprick of Lichfield was to be erected into an Archbiſhoprick, it was not proper to give the commiſſion for it to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſince he was to loſe a great deal of his power and juriſdiction by it; therefore the Pope did not let this opportunity eſcape; he eaſily prevailed with the King to admit Italian Legates for the intended deſign (2). When under Henry I the Pope ſent Guy Archbiſhop of Vienna *, to reſide in England as Legate over all Great Britain, the Clergy of England look'd upon it as a great infringement of their liberties; and tho' there were ſome inſtances of ſuch Legates, yet the King and his Council would not permit Guy to exerciſe any of his functions. Alford the Jeſuit, who wrote the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, finding how difficult it is to make this refuſal agree with the Pope's authority, thought to avoid this difficulty by a ſubtle invention; he ſays, that the Legate's commiſſion was not accepted, becauſe they had neglected to inſert the following words in it, viz. Notwithſtanding the privileges of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but as he does not quote any authority for this, we are not obliged to believe him upon his bare word. Cardinal Baronius has found out a more artful method to get rid of this difficulty, which is, not to ſpeak a word of the whole affair. In the

(1) Hiſt. de Ang. tom. 2. l. 6. pag. 151.

(2) Rapin, ibid.

* In France.

nons, ſome of which deſerve particularly to be taken notice of [B]. The Council being ended, and Theobald having been elected Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he was conſecrated January the 8th 1139 by Alberic, who then returned into Italy, and was afterwards ſent Legate by the Pope to Sicily, then to the Eaſt, and at laſt to France. He died in 1147 (k). Richard Prior of Hexham (l) ſays of him, that he was famous for divine and human learning, had a great ſkill in Eccleſiaſtical affairs; was eloquent, prudent, wiſe, of a very ſweet and mild temper, and above all, exceedingly devout and religious (m). How far a Monk devoted to the Pope is to be credited in this we leave our readers to judge.

(k) Baron. ad b. Ann.
(l) In Northumberland.
(m) Richardus Hagustald. ubi ſupra.

year 1116 Abbot Anſelm having preſented to the ſame King Henry the Commiſſion, by which the Pope appointed him his Legate in England, the King would not permit him to execute it; and the Engliſh Biſhops, whom he conſulted on this affair, anſwered unanimouſly, that this Legateſhip was inconſiſtent with the privileges of the Church of England (3). So that we muſt not wonder, that Alberic was not eaſily admitted, ſince the Engliſh Clergy did not care to ſubmit to the Court of Rome, and the Biſhops could not be pleaſed to ſee their power and authority abridged by foreigners.

(3) Rapin, ibid. p. 152, 153.

[B] Some of which (Canons) deſerve particularly to be taken notice of.] By the firſt it is decreed, that no Prieſt ſhould receive any price or money for chriſm, holy oil, baptiſm, penance, marrying, viſiting of the ſick, adminiſtring of the Body of Chriſt, or burying the dead, and whoever acted againſt this Canon, was to be excommunicated (4). The fifth prohibits every one from accepting any Church or Eccleſiaſtical preferment from a Lay-man: and obliges all Clergymen, when inducted into their livings by the Biſhop, to ſwear upon the Goſpels, that they have neither given nor promiſed any thing themſelves, or by any other perſon, for ſuch preferment; and if it be diſcovered that they have, the only penalty is deprivation (5), which is but a ſmall puniſhment for perjury. The ſeventh deprives all Clergymen that are married, or keep concubines, of their preferments, and forbids all perſons to hear Maſs ſaid by them (6). Richard of Hexham gives us another Canon, omitted by Gervaſe, in which it is decreed, that no one perſon ſhall claim any Church or Eccleſiaſtical preferment by right of inheritance; nor name his ſucceſſor to any benefice; and if any ſuch thing happened, it was to be void, according to what the Pſalmiſt ſays (7). O my God, make them like unto a wheel, who ſay, let us take to ourſelves the houſes of God in poſſeſſion (8). It is manifeſt from theſe Canons, not only that Clergymen were married at leaſt in England in the twelfth Century, ſince the Council was obliged to make a Canon againſt it, but alſo that they diſpoſed of their livings by their laſt will.

(4) Gervaſii Chron. ubi ſupra, Col. 1347.
(5) Ibid.
(6) Ibid.
(7) Pſ. lxxxiii. 12, 13.
(8) Ricardi Hagustaldenſis, De Geſt. Reg. Steph. Col. 327.

P.

☞ALBERTET, a famous Mathematician and Poet, was a Gentleman of Provence, born at Siſteron, and flouriſhed about the year 1290. Other writers ſay, that he was of Taraſcon, of the family of Maleſpine (a). But it is very probable, that he only lived in the latter of theſe towns. He was a man of a ſoft temper, very fond of polite literature, and extremely devoted to the Fair-ſex. And as gallantry was at that time the chief employment of men of quality, who uſed to dedicate themſelves to the ſervice of the Ladies, and make them the ſubject of Poetry, our Author, in compliance with this cuſtom and his own natural inclination, choſe for the object of his Devoirs the Marchioneſs of Maleſpine, who was the moſt accompliſhed Lady of Provence in that age [A]. He died at Taraſcon: he wrote a book intitled Lou petrach de Venus, and ſeveral Treatiſes of the Mathematics, which he dedicated to the Marchioneſs of Maleſpine, the Counteſs of Provence, and the Marchioneſs of Saluces (b).

(a) Du Verdier Vau-privas, Biblioth. p. 19, 20. edit. Lyon, 1585.
(b) Du Verdier, p. 20. See likewiſe Noſtradamus, Vies des poetes Provinceaux, & la Croix du Maine.

[A] Choſe for the object of his devoirs the Marchioneſs of MALESPINE, who was the moſt accompliſh'd Lady of Provence in that age.] He wrote ſeveral Poems and Sonnets in her praiſe, which pleaſed her ſo highly, that ſhe privately preſented him in return with horſes, jewels and money. However finding that his gallantry to her had occaſioned ſome imputations upon her character, ſhe deſired him by Letters to ſuſpend his public addreſſes to her for ſome time. He obeyed this command with reluctance; but ſent her a Sonnet in the manner of a dialogue, between the Marchioneſs and himſelf, which begins thus:

Deportas vous Amy d'aqueſt amour per aras.
That is,
"Suſpend a while the efforts of your love."

And in another Stanza he ſays thus:

Mais comma faray yeu (diz' yeu) mas amours caras
My poder deſportar d'aqueſt' affection?
Car certes yeu endury en eſta paſſion.
Per vous ingratament, moutas doulours amaras.

That is,
"But how can I, thou charmer of my ſoul,
"Suppreſs the ardent motions of my love?
"Siez'd as I am with a vain fruitleſs paſſion,
"I ſtill muſt love, yet feel no kind return."

Le Monge des Iſles d'Or (1) tells us, that he died of grief at Taraſcon, and that he delivered his Poems to his intimate friend Peyre de Valieras or Valernas, in order to be preſented to the Marchioneſs: But Peyre was ſo far from executing Albertet's deſire, that he ſold them to Faber d'Uzes a Lyric Poet, who had the vanity and aſſurance to publiſh them as his own. However the fraud was diſcovered, and d'Uzes was ſeized and obliged to ſuffer the puniſhment of whipping, for his Plagiariſm, agreeably to the Law eſtabliſh'd by the Emperors againſt that crime.

(1) Quoted by Du Verdier, ubi ſupra.

T.

ALBERTUS MAGNUS, a Dominican Friar, Biſhop of Ratiſbon, and one of the moſt famous Doctors of the thirteenth Century, was born at Lawingen on the Danube in Suabia, in 1193 or 1205 [A]. In Moreri's Dictionary may be ſeen his various employments, and with what ſucceſs he taught in ſeveral cities (a). I ſhall chiefly take notice of ſome falſe reports which have been ſpread concerning him. He is ſaid to

(a) See alſo Bullart, Academie des Sciences, t. 2. p. 145, and hereunder the note [H].

[A] He was born in 1193 or 1205.] Voſſius juſtly cenſures Nicholas Reuſnerus, who has placed the birth of Albertus in 1203, and his death in 1382; this is beginning his book with a blunder. Quæ magna eſt ἀνεσφησία peccantis in ipſo operis ingreſſu, velut cantherius in portâ, ut dici ſolet, nam ab hoc Alberto to have followed the buſineſs of a Midwife; and ſome have been much offended, that one of his profeſſion ſhould ſet himſelf up in ſuch an employment (b). What gave birth to this ſtory is, that a book was handed about under the name of Albertus Magnus, in which there are ſeveral inſtructions for Midwives, and ſo much ſkill in their art, that one would think the author could never have arrived at it, without having practiſed it. But the vindicators of Albertus Magnus maintain that he is not the Author of this book [B], nor of that de Secretis Mulierum [C], in which are many things that could not be expreſſed without low and ſmutty phraſes, which has raiſed a great cry againſt him, who was taken for the Author of it. His Vindicators cannot always deny the fact; they acknowledge that there are in his Comment upon the Maſter of the Sentences ſome queſtions concerning the practice of Conjugal Duty [D], in which he was obliged to uſe ſome words that are a little ſhocking to chaſte ears (c); but they alledge what he uſed to ſay himſelf in his juſtification, that one came to the knowledge of ſo many monſtrous things at confeſſion, that it was impoſſible to avoid touching upon theſe queſtions. It is certain that Albertus Magnus was the moſt curious man in the world; and this has been the cauſe of his lying alſo under other accuſations. They ſay he laboured for the Philoſopher's Stone [E]; that he was alſo a great Magician [F]; berto Icones & Elogia ſua auſpicatur (1). i. e. "Which "is a great blunder in Hiſtory, a ſtumble at the very "treſhold of his work, for he begins his Figures "and Elogies with this Albertus." Thus ſaid Voſſius, without calling to mind that he had committed no leſs a fault in page 62, in placing the flouriſhing ſtate of Albertus in 1160 and his death in the 87th year of his age, in 1208; which made him contemporary with Urban IV, and the Emperor Rodolphus.

(b) See Theophili Raynaud Hoploth. Sect. 2. Serm. 3. cap. 10. p. 361.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(1) Voſſius de Scient. Mathem. p. 362.

[B] He is not the author of the book of Midwifery.] This work is intitled De Naturâ Rerum, and treats largely and particularly of the buſineſs of Midwives. The author maintains that this office may very well be annexed to the function of monaſtic perſons, becauſe the ignorance of Midwives cauſes abundance of children to periſh, and deprives them for ever of celeſtial happineſs. Petrus de Pruſſia a Dominican, affirms that this book De Naturâ Rerum was writ by Thomas de Cantopré, a Scholar of Albertus; and does not deny there are ſeveral precepts about procuring a ſafe delivery, which cannot be expreſſed without obſcene words: but they are not ſo in themſelves, but only thro' men's ſenſuality (2). Admodum ſuccenſet in blaterones illos, qui Alberto impoſuerunt, quod egiſſet obſtetricem: faſſus tamen Cantipratanum ad inſtructionem obſtetricum in opere perperam ſuppoſito præceptori ejus Alberto tradidiſſe modos & vias felicis obſtetricationis, cujus præcepta chartis committi nec voce tradi poſſunt abſque expreſſione multorum quæ libido non natura fœdavit (3). It muſt have been ſomething very extraordinary to ſee Albertus undertaking the office of a Midwife, and putting his hand to the work. See the note [A] of the article HIEROPHILUS.

(2) Petrus de Pruſſiâ in Alberti Magni Vitâ, cap. 18.

(3) Theoph. Raynaudi Hoploth. Sect. 2. Ser. 3. cap. 10. p. 361.

[C] Nor of that De Secretis Mulierum.] Naudé makes uſe of theſe two proofs. I. Albertus has not ſet his name at the beginning of this work: he that has commented tells a falſity, when he affirms the contrary. II. Albertus's authority is often cited in this book: whence we muſt conclude that the author lived ſome time after him (4). Theſe two proofs are of no force; and the conſequence drawn from the ſecond is nothing. There are a hundred reaſons for people not to put their names at the beginning of a book: there are no authors more ready to quote themſelves, than thoſe who ſuppreſs their names; nothing is more common, than to quote contemporary authors. See below the note [K].

(4) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes, p. 524.

[D] He has handled ſome queſtions concerning the practice of conjugal duty.] Petrus de Pruſſia, not being able to diſpute the fact, intrenches himſelf within the juſtice of it, and ſhews in the xviiith chapter of his book (5), that it is advantageous and neceſſary to know natural things, not excepting even the obſcene; and that ſo Albertus Magnus, and ſome other Caſuiſts were in the right to take pains about ſubjects of that nature; for, without that, the Confeſſors would not have it in their power to cure the diſorders of their penitents. Qualia item multa ab Alberto de Uſu Conjugii, in 4. S. d. 31. ſub finem, ſcripto comprehenſa fatetur, illud ex ipſo Alberto ibidem præfatus [dicendum primo, quod hujuſmodi turpes quæſtiones, nunquam tractari deberent niſi illa cogerent monſtra quæ his temporibus in confeſſione audiuntur,] ne ergo Confeſſarii rudes ſint medicinæ quam facere debent adeo frequentibus morbis, juſtum cenſuit Albertus, in illud oletum ſtylum demittere (6). i. e. "Many ſuch things alſo he confeſſes "to be in Albertus's book On the uſe of Wedlock, "premiſing this out of Albertus himſelf [that ſuch "ſhameful queſtions ought never to have been han-"dled if the monſtrous things which are now a days "heard at confeſſion had not made it neceſſary] leſt "therefore the Confeſſors ſhould be ignorant of "the phyſic which they ought to apply to ſuch "frequent diſeaſes, Albertus thought it right to ſtoop "to that indecent ſtyle." It were to be wiſhed, ſays one, that only Confeſſors were to feed their minds with theſe filthy writings; but there is no being without books, wherein one may find the reſolution of caſes of conſcience which concern this unclean ſubject. Neceſſarium eſt enodationem ſolidam atque legitimam dubiorum circa fœditates illas emergentium proſtare alicubi apud probatos Doctores, cujuſmodi fuit Albertus, qui proinde reprehenſione vacat, etiamſi illum veluti ſcriptionis putorem ſuis commentariis immiſerit (7). i. e. "It is neceſſary that a ſolid and legi-"timate ſolution of the doubts concerning thoſe "indecencies ſhould be found in approved Doc-"tors, ſuch as was Albertus, who is therefore "not to be cenſured, tho' he ſeems in his Com-"mentaries to be a very foul writer." But it would ſtill be more neceſſary to aboliſh what renders this ſort of writings neceſſary; for how good ſoever the intention of the authors may be, we may apply to books of this nature, better than to a hundred others the peccare docentes hiſtorias (8).

(5) The Title of this chapter is, Quod ſcire naturalia etiam impudica utile ſit & neceſſarium.

(6) Theoph. Raynaudi Hop. Sect. 2. Serm. 3. cap. 10. p. 361.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Horat. Od. 7. lib. 3. ver. 19.

Tales that are bawds to vice. Creech.

[E] They ſay he laboured for the Philoſopher's Stone.] Naudé informs us that Mayer, the great favourer of the Alchymiſts, was not aſhamed to affirm in his ſymbols of the table of gold of the twelve nations * that St. Dominick was the firſt that knew the Philoſopher's ſtone; and that thoſe to whom he had left it communicated it to Albertus Magnus, who by the help of it paid all the debts of his biſhoprick of Ratisbon in leſs than three years (9). Mayer founds this upon three books of Chymiſtry, which he attributes to Albertus Magnus. To this it is anſwered, that he is to blame to attribute them to him (10); both becauſe there is not one of them collected in his works, or ſpecified by Trithemius, and that the Quintæ Eſſentiæ have been falſly attributed to him by Picus †. To prove this laſt fact, they do not follow Velcurion ††, and Guibert §, who have affirmed that Albertus Magnus laughed at the Alchymiſts and their pretended tranſmutation in his third book of Minerals : there is no occaſion to make uſe of this proof ſeeing a quite contrary opinion is there maintained; but it is ſhewn that the author of the Quintæ Eſſentiæ makes himſelf a Monk of the Order of St. Francis, and ſays he compoſed it when he was in priſon. Theſe two circumſtances muſt undoubtedly relate to Johannes de Rupeſciſſa.

* Lib. 6.

(9) Naudé Apologie des grands Hommes, p. 519.

(10) Ib. p. 520.

† Lib. 3. de Auro.

†† Lib. 3. Phyſic. cap. 13.

§ Alchym. impugnatæ lib. 2. cap. 7.

 Tractatu 1. cap. 9.

Magician [F]; and that he made a machine in the ſhape of a man, which was an Oracle to him, and explained all the difficulties that he propoſed. I could eaſily believe, that as he underſtood the Mathematicks, he had made a head, with ſprings that were capable of forming articulate ſounds; but how ridiculous is it to found an accuſation of Magick upon this? Some pretend that a great miracle ſpake for his juſtification [G]. Though he was as capable as another of inventing fire-arms, yet we have reaſon to [F] They ſay .... that he was alſo a great Magician.] Trithemius long ago endeavoured to vindicate him from this accuſation; as appears by theſe words: Non ſurrexit poſt eum vir ſimilis ei, qui in omnibus literis, ſcientiis & rebus tam doctus, eruditus, & expertus fuerit. Quod autem de Necromantia accuſatur, injuriam patitur vir Deo dilectus (11). i. e. "There never aroſe ſuch another man after him, "who was ſo skilful in all kinds of learning, ſci- "ences and things. But when they accuſe him of "necromancy, they injure a man that was beloved "of God." Naudé pretends, that this accuſation could not be founded upon any thing but two works, which have gone under the name of Albertus Magnus, and upon the Androïde. Here then are the two proofs: let us hear what he ſays of each.

(11) Trithem. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 195.

I. The firſt of the two writings is that De Mirabilibus, the other is The Mirror of Aſtrology; wherein is treated of the allowed and prohibited authors, that have writ of this ſcience (12). Picus * and Martinus Delrio †, agree that it is doing Albertus Magnus a great injury to ſuppoſe him the author of the books De Mirabilibus; and the laſt of them acquits him in theſe expreſs terms: Alberto Magno tributus liber de Mirabilibus, vanitate & ſuperſtitione refertus eſt, ſed magno Doctori partus ſuppoſititius. The book De Mirabilibus aſcribed to Albertus Magnus is full of trifles and ſuperſtition, but it is a ſpurious off-ſpring of that great Doctor. The Mirror of Aſtrology has been condemned by Gerſon  and Agrippa ††, as the heighth of ſuperſtition, and by Picus § and many others, becauſe the author of it maintains a moſt erroneous opinion in favour of the books of Magick, which he affirms, ſaving better advice, ought to be carefully preſerved, becauſe the time draws near, when for certain cauſes, which he does not ſpecify, people will be obliged to turn them over and make uſe of them on ſome occaſions (13). It ſeems then, that if our Albertus had compoſed ſuch a book, we muſt have looked upon him as a magician; but Naudé does not admit this conſequence, ſeeing Vaſquez the Jeſuit ſays plainly , that the books of Magick are neceſſary, and the Magicians permitted by God, to the end that Libertines may be reclaimed from Atheiſm (14). Naudé relates beſides as a matter of fact, that Roger Bacon was the author of this work, as Picus affirms in his firſt book againſt the Aſtrologers (15). So much for the firſt proof of the accuſation: let us ſee now what is anſwered to the ſecond.

(12) Naudé Apologie des grands Hommes, p. 523, 524.
* Lib. 7. de Præſt. cap. 7.
† Diſquiſit. Mag. lib. 1. c. 3.
 Libro de Libris Aſtrolog. non tolerandis, Propoſit 3.
†† In Epiſtolis.
§ Lib. 7. de Præſt. cap. 2.
(13) Naudé Apologie pour les grands Hommes, p. 525.
 Part 1. Quæſt. 2. Art. 3. Diſput. xx. cap. 4. in princip.
(14) Naudé Apologie pour les grands Hommes, p. 527.
(15) Ib. p. 526.

II. There are ſome, who have believed it poſſible to make brazen heads under certain conſtellations, and to obtain anſwers from them, to conduct us in all our affairs. One Yepes relates ‡, that Henry de Vileina had made one at Madrid, which was broken to pieces at the command of John II, King of Caſtile. Virgil, Pope Silveſter, Robert of Linçoln, and Roger Bacon, have had ſuch heads, if we may believe ſome writers (16). Albertus Magnus was thought a more able man; for they pretend that he had compoſed an entire man after this manner, having laboured thirty years without interruption, in forming him under different aſpects and conſtellations, the eyes for example .... when the Sun was in that ſign of the Zodiack which anſwered to ſuch a part, which he founded of metals mixt together, and mark'd with characters of the ſame ſigns and planets, and of their different and neceſſary aſpects: and ſo the head, neck, ſhoulders, thighs and legs, faſhioned at different times, and mounted and faſtned together in form of a man, had the ingenuity to reveal to the ſaid Albertus the ſolution of all his principal difficulties (17). This is what they call the Androïde of Albertus Magnus. It was broken, they ſay, by Thomas Aquinas, who could not endure its too great prattling. Henry of Aſſia and Bartholomew Sibille affirm, that it was compoſed of fleſh and bones; not by nature but by art: which being always judged impoſſible by modern authors, and the virtue of images, rings and planetary ſigils being in great vogue, it has been thought ever ſince, ... that ſuch figures were made of copper or ſome other metal, and work'd under the influence of the conſtellations and planets (18). On this footing it is that Naudé refutes the accuſers of Albertus: that is, on the ſuppoſition that the pretended Androïde was made of metal. He ſhews by very ſtrong reaſons, that it could neither underſtand, nor ſpeak, nor ſerve as an inſtrument to the Devil to ſpeak by: and that if the Devil had ſpoken in this machine, he would have done it without the concourſe of metallic organs. It was unneceſſary therefore to employ ſo much time and ſo many ceremonies in forming this machine: a bottle or a trumpet would have been no leſs fit to ſolve all the difficulties of Albertus Magnus. Laſtly, Naudé obſerves, that thoſe who ſpeak of this Androïde bring no proof of the fact. Toſtatus, notwithſtanding all his wit and learning, was very credulous: ſo his authority is of no force. If one had a mind to affirm that ſuch a tradition as this muſt have ſome foundation, Naudé gives us a very probable ſolution of it (19): that Albertus Magnus might have in his cabinet a head, or a ſtatue of a man, like Boetius's machines of which Caſſiodorus has ſaid *: Metalla mugiunt, Diomedis in ære grues buccinant, æneus anguis inſibilat, aves ſimulatæ fritinniunt, & quæ propriam vocem neſciunt ab ære dulcedinem probantur emittere cantilenæ. i. e. "Metals lowe, the birds of Diomedes trumpet "in braſs, a brazen ſerpent hiſſes, counterfeited "ſwallows chatter, and thoſe which have no proper "note are taught by braſs to utter the ſweetneſs of "muſick."]

(16) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes, p. 528.
(17) Ibid. pag. 529, 530.
‡ In Emanuel de Moura, Sect. 2. cap. 15. Art. 6.
(18) Ib. p. 531, 532. He quotes Pereg. Qu. 3. Decad. cap. 2. Qu. 3.
(19) Ibid. pag. 539, 540.
* Lib. 1. variarum Epiſt. 45.

[G] A great miracle ſpake for his juſtification.] According to Father Theophilus Raynaud, the accuſers of Albertus ſay that once on the Epiphany he treated William Earl of Holland, and King of the Romans, as he was paſſing thro' Cologne; and that, to make his entertainment remarkable, he turned the winter into a ſummer abounding with flowers and fruits. Horridam hyemem in florigeram fructiferamque æſtatem vertit, ut ſcribit Trithemius in Chron. Spanh. anno 1254 (20). It is true, Trithemius relates it. They add to this, the ſpeaking head, the book De Mirabilibus, and that De Secretis Mulierum. Father Theophilus does not amuſe himſelf with oppoſing to ſuch accuſations as theſe the Elogies which ſeveral Hiſtorians beſtow on the virtue of the accuſed. He has recourſe to the teſtimony given by God himſelf to the ſanctity of Albertus by ſeveral miraculous works, and by preſerving his body free from corruption to his time: Teſtimonium quod ejus ſanctitati Deus perhibuit, patratis in ejus gratiam miris pleriſque operibus, & ipſius Alberti corpore ad hunc uſque diem à tabe & putrefactione exempto. This Apologiſt adds, that the metamorphoſis of winter into ſummer, and the ſpeaking head are two great lies, and that the two books in queſtion have been falſly aſcribed to Albertus Magnus; and that St. Thomas does not acknowledge †, that he broke this ſpeaking head at his Maſter's houſe. Hyems in veris amœnitatem verſa, & caput æneum articulatè loquens, ad Deum fabulinum ſunt ableganda tanquam conficta & falſo jactata de tanto viro. ... Libri autem magici qui Alberto affingebantur ſunt ſuppoſititii (21). See what this Jeſuit relates concerning ſome machines that utter very harmonious ſounds. He will have it that Albertus had a head ſo artificially compoſed that the air blown into it was capable of the modifications requiſite to form a human voice. As for the exemption from putrefaction, this is what I have read of it in Thevet. "Our Albertus, after having lived "87 years, died in the year of our Lord 1280, at "Cologne, whither he was retired to ſtudy; and "there his corps was interred in the middle of the "choir of the Jacobins Convent, and his entrails "were carried to Ratisbon, which, in the time

(20) Theoph. Raynaudi Hoplotb. Sect. 2. Serm. 1. cap. 14. pag. 149.
† III Contra Gent. cap. 104.
(21) Th. Raynaudi Hoplotb. p. 150.

to believe that thoſe who attribute the invention of it to him are miſtaken [H]. It is related (d), that he was naturally very dull, and ſo incapable of inſtruction, that he was upon the point of going out of the Cloiſter, becauſe he deſpaired of learning what his habit required; but that the holy Virgin appeared to him, and aſked him in what he chiefly deſired to excel, whether in Philoſophy or Divinity; that he choſe Philoſophy; that the holy Virgin aſſured him that he ſhould become incomparable in it; and that by way of puniſhment for not having choſen Divinity, he ſhould relapſe before his death into his former ſtupidity. It is added, that after this apparition, he had an infinite deal of wit, and that he improved in all the Sciences, with a quickneſs that aſtoniſhed all the Maſters; but that three years before his death he forgot ſuddenly all his knowledge, and that ſtopping ſhort in reading a Divinity Lecture at Cologne, and having endeavoured in vain to recall his ideas, he found that the prediction was accompliſhed. It has been ſaid therefore, that by miraculous means he had been metamorphoſed from an Aſs into a Philoſopher, and from a Philoſopher into an Aſs again. It would be very unneceſſary to obſerve that theſe are fables; thoſe who would believe me in it have no occaſion to be told, and would judge in the ſame manner of their own accord; and as for thoſe who think otherwiſe, they would not change their opinion by reading in this place that I am not of their taſte. Our Albertus was a very little man [I]. He died at Cologne Nov. 15, 1280, being either eighty ſeven or ſeventy five years old. He has writ ſuch a prodigious number of books, that they amount to twenty one volumes in folio in the Lyons edition of 1651. Peter Jammy, a Jacobin of Grenoble was the editor of it.

(d) See the firſt volume of the Annals of Bzovius.

Mr. de la Monnoie has communicated two or three particulars, which may be ſeen below [K].

" of the Emperor Charles V, was ſtill entire, and was " taken up by his order, and afterwards put again " into its firſt monument (22)." Raderus the Jeſuit has made ſome Latin Verſes on the incorruption of this body (23); they end thus:

(22) Thévet, Hiſtoire des Hommes illuſtres, tom. 2. p. 87.
(23) Bullart relates them, Academie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 149.
(24) That is Ariſtotle's.

Illius (24) doctas mirentur ſæcula chartas,
Miror ego ſalvas poſt tria ſæcla manus.

" His learned works let ev'ry age admire;
" I praiſe the hands, three ages ſav'd entire.

Moreri, inſtead of three hundred years, puts but two hundred. It is neither his cuſtom, nor his inclination to leſſen things of this nature.

[H] Thoſe who attribute the invention of fire-arms to him are miſtaken.] " Joannes Matthæus de Luna " *, who lived above ſix ſcore years ago (25), af- " firms, contrary to the opinion of Polydore Virgil, " Magius, Mayer, Pancirolus, Flurence Rivault, Be- " zoldus, and all the authors that have written about " fire-arms, that it was Albertus Magnus that firſt " found the uſe of cannons, muskets, and piſtols " (26); tho' I have not obſerved in all theſe authors " any thing that can come near this opinion, ex- " cept that ſuch machines were put in practice in " his time, and by a German Monk, whom they " call Berthold Schwartz, or by a Chymiſt, who ac- " cording to the opinion of Cornazanus, a pretty " old author, lived in the city of Cologne, in which " it is certain that Albertus Magnus reſided conſtantly " after he had taken the habit of a Jacobin." Thus does Naudé confute his Joannes Matthæus de Luna. The laſt thing that he affirms is falſe; for thoſe who have writ the Hiſtory of Albertus Magnus ſay, that he entred into the Order of St. Dominick in 1222; that after his Superiors had ſent him to Cologne, to teach Divinity and Philoſophy, and he had acquitted himſelf of this function to the aſtoniſhment of his auditors, he went to make himſelf admired at Hildeſheim, Fribourg, Ratisbon, and Straſburg; that he returned to Cologne in 1240; that he had there, amongſt other Diſciples, Thomas Aquinas, to whom he quitted his chair, when he went to be Profeſſor at Paris; that after he had taught there three years, he returned to Cologne; that he was made Provincial of his Order in 1254; that he viſited the Provinces on foot; that he went to Rome by order of Alexander IV; that he there executed the office of Maſter of the ſacred Palace; that he there read Lectures in Divinity; that he returned to Germany in 1260; that he was there choſen Biſhop of Ratiſbon; that at the end of three years, he obtained leave to quit his biſhoprick; that he returned to his cell at Cologne; that the Pope commanded him ſoon afterwards to preach the Cruſade throughout all Germany and Bohemia; that in 1274, he was at the Council of Lyons; that he there had the character of the Emperor's Embaſſador; and that he returned at laſt to Cologne (27). How could Naudé, who had read ſo much, be ignorant of all theſe things concerning Albertus Magnus.

* Libro de Rerum Inventorib. cap. 12. fol. 10.
(25) Theſe are Naudé's words, p. 518 of the Apologie des grands Hommes, printed at Paris in 1625, in 8vo.
(26) Moreri, inſtead of that, ſpeaks only of Gun-powder, of which Naudé ſays nothing.
(27) See Bullart, Academie des Sciences tom. 2. p. 146, &c.

[I] Our Albertus was a very little man.] " Some " write, that as he was kiſſing the feet of his Holi- " neſs, when he came to Rome, the Pope command- " ed him to ariſe, thinking him to be ſtill on his " knees, tho' he ſtood upright (28)." They tell the ſame ſtory of ſeveral other perſons. See the note [H] of the article JOANNES ANDREAS: and remember the diſtinction of the Logicians between quantitas molis, and quantitas virtutis. The little Albert the Great made me think of it (29).

(28) Ib. p. 145.
(29) In another order, the non eſt in tanto corpore mica ſalis contains the ſame diſtinction.

[K] Two or three particulars . . . may be ſeen below.] " The book De Secretis Mulierum, falſly at- " tributed to Albertus Magnus, is the work of one " of his Diſciples named Henricus de Saxonia, un- " der whoſe name it has been printed more than " once. Theſe are the words of Simler: Henrici de " Saxonia, Alberti Magni diſcipuli, liber De Secre- " tis Mulierum, impreſſus Auguſtæ anno Dom. 1498, " per Antonium Sorg (30). And in Thuanus's Cata- " logue you will find, Henrici de Saxonia de ſecretis " mulierum, de virtutibus herbarum, lapidum, quo- " rundam animalium, aliorumque, in 12°. Francof. " 1615 (31). It is evident the name of Albertus be- " ing more famous than that of Henry cauſed the " ſuppoſition. . . . . Joannes Picus de Mirandola ſays " that Albertus Magnus, when he was of riper " years condemned the books of Magic which he had " writ when he was young. . . . . Androïde is not " the word uſed when Albertus's artificial man is " ſpoken of. It is a word abſolutely unknown, and " purely the invention of Naudé who has uſed it " boldly as if it had been eſtabliſhed."

(30) Simler, Epit. Bibliot. Geſneri, p. 332.
(31) Page 156 of the 2d Part of the Catal. Bibliot. Thuan.

☞ALBERTUS [A] Archbiſhop of Mentz the firſt of that name, was deſcended from

[A] ALBERTUS.] Otto Friſingenſis, St. Bernard, and ſeveral other authors call him Adelbertus, or Adalbertus; but Dodechin and other writers, among whom is the learned Aventinus, call him Albertus, and, which is the beſt authority we can have, he himſelf writes his name thus, as appears by an oath he made, which we ſhall have occaſion to quote hereafter, and which is cited by Serrarius (1).

(1) Rer. Moguntiac. lib. 5. pag. 534. Col. 2. num. 5.

from a noble and antient family in Lorrain (a) [B]. Being but in Prieſt orders, he was made Secretary or Chancellor to Prince Henry ſon of the Emperor Henry the Fourth (b), and became one of the chief promoters of that Prince's revolt againſt his father, in order, as he pretended, to reſtore the Pope's authority, which Henry IV endeavoured to leſſen (c); by which it appears that Albertus ſeemed at that time to adhere to the Pope's intereſt; but whether he was ſincere in this, or only intended to ingratiate himſelf into the Prince's favour, will beſt appear by the account we are going to give of him. When Henry V was ſettled on the throne, Albertus, who was then probably his Chancellor [C], enjoyed great credit under him. He was ſent ſeveral times Embaſſador to the Pope (d); firſt in the year 1106, when a conference was appointed at Chalons in Champagne to put an end to the miſunderſtanding that had laſted a long time between the Emperors and the Popes, concerning the right the former claimed of inveſting the Prelates of the Empire with the Croſier and Ring [D]. Albertus hearing the Pope would be preſent at theſe conferences, refuſed to aſſiſt there himſelf, and left the whole management of the affair to his Collegues, thinking it inconſiſtent with the honour and dignity of the Emperor whom he repreſented, if he ſhould yield to the Pope, whom he ſtill looked upon as a vaſſal of the Empire. The Pope refuſing to acknowledge the Emperor's right of inveſting the Prelates, and the Embaſſadors having ſtrict orders not to give up that point, the Aſſembly broke up ſuddenly, without coming to any concluſion (e). In the year 1109 Albertus was again ſent

(a) Nic. Serrarii Rer. Moguntiac. lib. 5. edit. a Geor. Chriſtiano Joannis, Francof. 1732. tom. 1. p. 533.

(b) Otto Friſing. (apud Serr. ibid.) ſays, Cancellarium; but Aventinus (Annal. Boior. lib. 5. p. 365) calls him Magiſtrum Epiſtolarum.

(c) Aventinus, ibid.

(d) Paſcal. II.

(e) Heiſs, Hiſt. de l'Empire, tom. 1. lib. 2. p. 387. Paris ed. 1731.

[B] From a noble and ancient family in Lorrain.] Bruſchius ſays (2), he was Duke of Lorrain, and quotes Otto Friſingenſis for this, who ſays only that Albertus was Natione Lotharingius (3), originally come from Lorrain. He was indeed deſcended from the Princes of Lorrain, ſince his anceſtors were Counts of Sarbruck (4). He was the ſon of Sigebert or Sigehart, brother of Frederic, who married Giſel, by whom he had Adelbertus or Albertus the ſecond, who ſucceeded our Albertus in the Archiepiſcopal See of Mentz; George Chriſtian Joannis, who tells us this in his notes upon Serrarius's Life of Albertus, refers us for the proof of it to F. Anſelmus's Hiſtory of the Families of France, T. II. p. 1325, and to his own Appendix to the Palatine Hiſtory of Pareus, p. 433.

(2) Apud Serrarium, ibid. pag. 533.

(3) Lib. 7. cap. 14. apud eund. ibid.

(4) In Latin Sarbrukenſes or Saræpontani Comites. The County of Sarbruck is ſituated near Lorrain, and was anciently included in it.

[C] Who was then probably his Chancellor.] When we ſpeak thus in a doubtful manner, it is only becauſe Aventinus, whom we quoted above (5), calling him only Henry's Secretary, we dare not be too poſitive. However Albert is called the Emperor's Chancellor by ſeveral writers, and he enjoyed that high poſt as ſoon as the year 1106 (6), when Henry IV died.

(5) Quot. (b).

(6) Ap. Serrar. ubi ſupra, p. 534. not. 2.

[D] The right of inveſting the Prelates of the Empire with the croſier and ring.] The miſunderſtanding occaſioned by this between the Emperors and the Popes began under Henry IV. Cardinal Hildebrand, who had been employed in ſeveral nogotiations by Pope Alexander II, and ſome of his Predeceſſors, uſed all poſſible intrigues to deprive the Emperors of the right of inveſting their Prelates, which they had enjoyed ever ſince the time of Charles the Great: And that the reader may form a juſt notion of that diſpute, we will lay the whole matter before him, as we find in Heiſs's Hiſtory of the Empire (7). When the place, which Judas had left vacant among the Apoſtles, was to be filled up, the aſſembly of the Chriſtians, which conſiſted then only of about an hundred and twenty perſons (8) propoſed Barſabas and Matthias to the Apoſtles; and when they were to chuſe Deacons, the aſſembly then much more numerous, elected ſeven perſons, whom they preſented to the Apoſtles, who after having prayed lay their hands on the elected perſons (9). Now we may diſtinguiſh two things in theſe elections; firſt the preſentation of the elected perſons made by the faithful to the Apoſtles, ſecondly the ordination or laying on of hands by the Apoſtles themſelves. The preſentation was entirely ſecular as being made by lay-men. The impoſition of hands was a ſacred thing, being a viſible ſign of the inviſible communication of the Holy Ghoſt, and conſequently could not be performed but by holy and ſacred perſons. The preſentation is then what we may call the Inveſtiture; ſince the people firſt choſe ſuch perſons, as they judged well qualified, and by that means inveſted them, as much as lay in their power, with the office, for which they were elected, and theſe perſons were afterwards to be ordained by Biſhops. This was the practice of the primitive Church, when the Chriſtians were ſtill united by the bonds of peace and love. Since that time Emperors and other wealthy Perſons having endowed the churches with large eſtates, ambitious and covetous men began to covet the Eccleſiaſtical preferments, more for the ſake of the wealth and power annexed to them, than for the ſake of the ſouls committed to their charge. This ſoon occaſioned ſuch factions, corruption, and ſimony, as often ended in ſeditions and murmurs: The Emperors, to put an end to theſe abuſes, took into their own hands the power of preſenting to the Eccleſiaſtical preferments, and to inveſt with them whom they pleaſed. And it is obſerved, that thoſe who had been choſen by Princes, were generally men of worth and merit; whereas thoſe, who came to preferments by other methods, did not always behave in a manner worthy of their holy function. This is what Heiſs ſays, but how far this obſervation will be confirmed by the Prelates of a certain country not far off, we leave our readers to judge. He adds, that two reaſons ſhew the undoubted right of the Princes to inveſt the Biſhops and other Clergymen. The firſt is, that all the temporalities originally come from the Princes, theſe eſtates being as ſo many fiefs held in Capite by the Prelates from the Sovereign. The ſecond is, that the Prelates being the ſubjects of the Princes, and moreover their Vaſſals, it is neceſſary for the good of the State, that the Sovereign ſhould have ſome ſecurity for the loyalty and good behaviour of his ſubjects and Vaſſals; and to deprive the Sovereign of this right, would be to oppoſe what God himſelf has ordained, ſince Princes are by him obliged to take care of the peace and welfare of their ſubjects. The Emperors were uſed to inveſt the Prelates by delivering to them a croſier and ring, as they uſed to inveſt Lay-men with other fiefs, by delivering to them a ſcepter and crown, or ſometimes a ſtandard. This was a ceremony by which it was ſignified, that the power with which ſuch perſons were inveſted, was derived entirely from the Emperor. For there is no reaſon to ſay, that becauſe a Biſhop's croſier may repreſent the crook by which he is to guide his flock, and the ring his marriage with the Church, theſe two marks muſt relate to his ſpiritual power. The Emperors had anciently the right of inveſting not only the Biſhops of the Empire, but even the Popes themſelves, who began to diſown that right in the Emperors under the reign of Henry IV, pretending that it was a ſacrilege in Lay-men to make Biſhops, who are ſacred perſons, and ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles; but this was only a pretence they made uſe of to become independent from the Emperors; for they took care never to diſtinguiſh between the temporalities and ſpiritualities of the Church; but confounding and blending together theſe two things, they knew very well that this would give them a handle to ſtir up the zeal of the Laity againſt the danger of the Church; and ſo furniſh them with a proper opportunity to ſhake off entirely the yoke of the civil power.

(7) Tom. 1. l. 1. p. 334, &c.

(8) Act. i. ver. 15.

(9) Ibid. ch. 6.

ſent Embaſſador to the Pope, who was then at Rome, to treat with him concerning the coronation of the Emperor, and having finiſhed his commiſſion [E], he returned into Germany (f). Richard Archbiſhop of Mentz dying that ſame year, the Emperor appointed Albertus to ſucceed him (g), though he was not conſecrated till ſome years after (h). That ſame year he followed the Emperor into Italy, and was the chief of thoſe who were choſen to negotiate an agreement between Henry V and the Pope, concerning the claim abovementioned. Albertus was at that time ſo ſtrenuous an aſſertor of the Emperor's right, that he adviſed him not only never to give up his pretenſions, but even to impriſon the Pope himſelf. The Emperor followed that advice, and by that means forced at laſt the haughty Pope to ſubmit [F], and to enter again into a Treaty, which had been often concluded and broken, but was at laſt ratified the 11th of April 1111 (i). The next year the Emperor being returned into Germany inſtalled Albertus into the Archbiſhoprick of Mentz, by delivering to him the Croſier and Ring (k). But he ſoon forgot the favours which Henry had beſtowed upon him, and entered that very year into a conſpiracy againſt him [G] with Luther Duke of Saxony, Rudolf a Markgrave, and Frederic a Count Palatine; but having been taken he was put in priſon, where he remained about four years, from 1112 to 1115, when the Emperor being at Mentz, the inhabitants, who had a great love for Albertus, obliged (f) Annal. Hildeſheim. p. 737. apud Serrar. ubi ſupra, p. 537. n. 3.

(g) Dodochini Append. ad Mar. Scot. ad an. 1109. ap. Piſtorium, Rer. Germ. Scriptor. tom. 1. Part 2. p. 668.

(b) Serrar. ubi ſupra, p. 334. n. 1. ad § 4.

(i) Heiſs, ubi ſupra, p. 396.

(k) Abbas Uſpergenſ. apud Serrar. ubi ſupra.

[E] Having finiſhed his commiſſion.] Here follow Serrarius's own words (10), Anno 1109 --- Romam miſſus eſt, ut cum Pontifice de Henrico Romæ coronando ageret. Quâ re expeditâ, anno ſequenti 1110 in Germaniam reventit, ac Leodii Henrico Papæ reſponſum retulit. That is, "He was ſent to Rome in the "year 1109, to treat with the Pope concerning Hen- "ry's Coronation to be performed at Rome, and "having finiſhed this affair, he returned the next "year 1110 into Germany, and communicated the "Pope's anſwer to Henry at Liege." But we are not told whether the Pope conſented to crown the Emperor, nor what time he appointed for it. There is reaſon to believe, that he would not do it, but on condition that the Emperor ſhould give up the affair of the Inveſtitures. See the Remark [F].

(10) Rer. Moguntiacar. lib. 5. pag. 534. § 4.

[F] The Emperor forced at laſt the haughty Pope to ſubmit.] The Emperor being at Florence in the latter end of the year 1110, ſent Embaſſadors to the Pope, to aſſure him of his great regard and ſubmiſſion to the holy See. The Pope ſent alſo his Legates to the Emperor. A conference was afterwards held at Sutry, in which the Commiſſioners on the Pope's ſide granted the Emperor all his pretenſions and even more. But he ſoon found the Pope intended only to impoſe upon him; for at the ſame time that he pretended to ſign a treaty with Henry, he left no ſtone unturned to create jealouſies and diviſions between the ſpiritual and temporal Princes of the Empire. And the very day of the Emperor's ſolemn entry into Rome his ſoldiers were plundered and murdered if they did but in the leaſt leave their rank. And tho' the Emperor was highly offended at it, yet he diſſembled for ſome time, and continued his march. Before the beginning of the coronation, the late treaty between the Emperor and the Pope being read, in preſence of the Princes of Germany and the Italian Prelates, the latter objected againſt it, as the Pope very well knew they would do, and the conteſt laſted till night. The Emperor finding himſelf thus illuded, and that the Pope had broke his promiſe, and violated his oath, ordered him to be impriſoned (11). Otto Friſingenſis ſays, that Albertus was thought to have inſpired the Emperor with this wicked reſolution, Hujus peſſimi ſceleris auctor fuiſſe dicitur Albertus (12). As ſoon as the ſoldiers, who waited at the city gates, heard the order of ſeizing the Pope, they entered the church in which the aſſembly was, thinking it was the intention of the Emperor and of the Princes of the Empire that they ſhould fall alſo upon the Cardinals and other Prelates: This occaſioned a great fight in the city, in which ſo much blood was ſhed, that the Tiber was tainted with it. Several Cardinals and Biſhops, with ſome of the principal Citizens of Rome were alſo taken priſoners. Three days after the Emperor left Rome, and incamped near that city, keeping the Pope and Cardinals cloſe priſoners during the whole Lent and the Eaſter holy-days, tho' he took care that his Holineſs was always treated with great reſpect. The Prelates that were in priſon with the Pope, entreated him very earneſtly to give up the point of the Inveſtitures to the Emperor, and to crown him, that he might recover his own liberty as well as theirs; but Paſcal was not in the leaſt diſpoſed to renounce thoſe rights and privileges which he pretended his predeceſſors had juſtly gained for the holy See, and he ſaid, he would maintain them even at the peril of his life. The Emperor ſeeing with ſorrow the ſtubbornneſs of the Pope, gave orders, that the Cardinals, who were priſoners with him, ſhould be immediately beheaded. This order was juſt going to be performed, when the Pope, filled with compaſſion for his fellow-priſoners, promiſed to give the Emperor an entire ſatisfaction. In the treaty he made with him it was ſtipulated, that the Emperor ſhould inveſt with the croſier and ring ſuch perſons, as ſhould have been canonically elected with his conſent, and that afterwards they ſhould be conſecrated, but that no perſon ſhould be conſecrated before he had been inveſted by the Emperor. That the Pope ſhould never excommunicate the Emperor, nor recede under any pretence whatſoever from the conditions of this treaty. This the Pope with ſeventeen Cardinals ſwore upon the Goſpels. The Emperor on the other ſide, promiſed to reſtore to the holy See whatever had been taken from it, and to pay to the Pope that obedience, which the Chriſtian Emperors had done before him, ſaving however the honour and dignity of the Empire. The Emperor ſwore to this with four Biſhops, his Chancellor (Albertus) and eight Princes of the Empire (13). But if we may credit Baronius (14), Albertus had taken before that time a very different oath, in which he promiſed, never in fact or by advice to be inſtrumental in any harm Pope Paſcal II might receive from the Emperor, either in loſing the Papacy or his life, or ſo much as a limb; nor to promote his being taken priſoner; and he added, that if the Emperor (15) did not keep this oath, or did not perform whatever was contained in his treaty with the Pope, he would turn to the latter, and adhere to the Church of Rome. He alſo promiſed to be ſincerely obedient to the Pope in caſe the Pope kept his engagements with the Emperor. This oath is dated from Sutri February the 7th 1111. So that it muſt have been made immediately after the firſt treaty mentioned in this remark (16), and juſt before the Emperor's entry into Rome, which was February the 12th, when the Pope and the Italian Prelates received him ſo ill. It is ſomewhat ſurprizing that Albertus ſhould adviſe the Emperor to impriſon the Pope, if he had taken the oath which Baronius relates. But an intelligent reader, who has a little knowledge of the world, will eaſily reconcile theſe ſeeming inconſiſtencies.

(11) Heiſs, ubi ſupra, p. 392--394.

(12) Lib. 6. cap. 14. ap. Serr. ubi ſupra, p. 533. § 3.

(13) Heiſs, ubi ſupra. P. 394, 397.

(14) Ad. An. 1111. § 4.

(15) He means the Emperor.

(16) Above the Quotation (11).

[G] He entered into a conſpiracy againſt him.] As ſoon as the Emperor had left Italy, the Pope aſſembled a Council at Rome, in which all that he had been obliged to yield to the Emperor concerning the Inveſtitures was pronounced void, as tho' the Pope had not then been at liberty, but had been forced to conclude with the Emperor the treaty we have mentioned. This occaſioned new broils between the Emperor and the Pope, in which Albertus thought fit to follow the latter, preferring, ſays Serrarius (17), the opinion obliged Henry to promiſe that he ſhould be releaſed; for they roſe in arms and threatened to kill the Emperor, if he would not reſtore them their Biſhop, who was accordingly ſet at liberty, though under ſecurities [H]. He went that ſame year to Cologne, where he was at laſt conſecrated by Otto Biſhop of Bamberg (l). Henry having been excommunicated by the Pope, Albertus, who was now entirely in the latter's intereſt, confirmed the ſentence pronounced againſt the Emperor by Pope Calixtus II, Gelaſius II and Paſchal II's ſucceſſor, of which he had been himſelf the chief promoter, if we may believe Otto Friſingenſis (m); his words are, Sententia excommunicationis a Calixto, qui Paſcali & Gelaſio ſucceſſit, ſuadente Alberto Moguntino——in eum datur. Albertus roſe afterwards openly in arms againſt his lawful Sovereign, and would not ſubmit till the Emperor, finding himſelf abandoned by almoſt the whole Empire, ſubmitted to the Pope, and gave up the right of the inveſtitures. Albertus drew afterwards upon him the arms of the Thuringians, becauſe he exacted the payment of his tythes with too much rigour, having ſent his ſoldiers againſt them, who killed or took priſoner thoſe who refuſed. Henry Earl of Thuringe came againſt him (n) with an army of twenty thouſand men, and he would not eaſily have eſcaped them, if by his prudence and wiſdom he had not ſatisfied and appeaſed them (o). We don't find that after the death of Henry V (p) Albertus made any great figure at the court of his ſucceſſor Lotharius, except that in a Council held at Mentz A. D. 1131, in which he preſided with the Pope's Legate, he excommunicated Conrad Duke of Suabia (q), who had been choſen King of the Romans, and crowned at Milan by the Biſhop of that City (r). Albertus died June the 23d A. D. 1137. After the account we have given of him, we need not deſcribe his character here; we will only ſay, after Otto Friſingenſis, that he was very rich, powerful, and had a worldly prudence. Vir ad ſæculum prudens, & potens, locupletiſſimuſque (s). He was ſucceeded by his brother's ſon Albertus or Adelbertus II.

(17) Ubi ſupra, P. 535. § 5.

(l) Serrarius, ubi ſupra, p. 536. & in notis.

(m) Ap. eund. p. 539. § 14.

(n) Addition. ad Lambert. Schafnaburg. ap. Piſtorium, ubi ſupra, tom. 1. Part 1. p. 427.

(o) Ap. Serrar. ubi ſupra, pag. 543. n. 4.

(p) A. D. 1125.

(q) Thus he is called in a MS. quoted by Serrarius, ubi ſupra, p. 545. but Heiſs (ubi ſupra, pag. 415) calls him, Duke of Francozia.

(r) Heiſs, ibid. p. 419.

(s) Ap. Serrar. ubi ſupra, pag. 549.

on of the Council and of the Pope, to the Emperor's favour. This was perhaps the effect of the oath we mentioned in the foregoing remark; or we may think, that Albertus being now inveſted with the temporalities of his archbiſhoprick (18), he thought he had no more occaſion for the Emperor's favour, and would be better able to ſupport his power and authority by the Pope's intereſt, than by that of his temporal Prince, who perhaps might be willing to abridge the power of his own Clergy, as he had endeavoured to do that of the Pope. However this be, it appears that Albertus joined againſt the Emperor, with notorious rebels, and even exhorted them to riſe againſt the Emperor, as he did ſeveral Princes of Saxony, if we may credit Helmoldus (19), whoſe words it is proper to quote here. Inter præcipuos (rebelles) erat famoſus ille Adalbertus (thus he calls our Albertus) Moguntinus Epiſcopus, ſociatis ſibi quamplurimis, maximè verò Saxonum Principibus, quos ad defectionem partim neceſſitas, partim etiam rebellionum vetus conſuetudo illexerat. The ſame author ſays a little lower, that Albertus was the author and ringleader of the rebellion (20).

(18) See the Text of this Article quot. (i).

(19) In Chron. Slaven. cap. 11. Sect. 2. p. 573. ap. Serrar. ubi ſupra, p. 535. n. 1.

(20) Ap. eund. ibid. n. 2.

[H] Albertus was ſet at liberty tho' under ſecurities.] The inhabitants having beſieged the Emperor in the palace or the town-houſe of Mentz, he was himſelf obliged to give them ſureties, that he would releaſe the Archbiſhop, otherwiſe he would have been cruelly murdered, with all his attendants. The conditions on which Albertus was ſet free were as follows; 1. That within a year he would give the Emperor full ſatisfaction for the breaking of his oath; and if he failed he promiſed to return directly into priſon willingly of his own accord, without ſtaying till he was forced to it. And if he did not perform this promiſe, the inhabitants of Mentz declared they would ſend ſome of their chief Citizens, whom they named, in his ſtead, which they confirmed upon oath. They alſo promiſed, that if the Archbiſhop ſhould ever create new broils and diviſions, they would look upon it as a violation of the treaty he had made with the Emperor, and immediately expel him the city. It appears by Henry V's letters, that Albertus brought him his ſureties at Spire; but this did not prevent his joining the Emperor's enemies ſoon after, as we have ſeen in the text of this article (21). We muſt not forget to ſay, that he had been very ill treated in priſon, ſo that his bones ſcarce hung together, ut oſſibus vix hæſerit, ſays Helmoldus (22). Another author tells us, that he ſhewed what he had ſuffered not ſo much by the ill conſtitution of his body, as by the bitterneſs of his revenge, quantas mortes in captivitate pertulerit, non tam exeſi corporis ſpecie, quàm ultionis expreſſerit acerbitate (23).

(21) Serrar. ibid. p. 536. n. 4.

(22) In Chron. cap. 11. Sect. 6. apud eund. ibid. n. 1.

(23) Chronograph. Halberſtadenſis, p. 132. ap. eund. ibid.

P.

ALBRET, a family. It has been one of the moſt illuſtrious families of France for ſome ages, on account of the great men it has produced, whoſe merit has ſhined in the moſt eminent poſts of the Kingdom. Every body knows it has poſſeſſed Navarre and Bearn. Moreri ſpeaks of it at length: to whom I refer my readers, and do not examine whether all he ſays of it be correct. I will obſerve only one thing that he does not ſay; that there remains never a male of this great family, ſince the Marquis d'Albret (a) was killed in Picardy, in the houſe of the Marquis de Buſſi-Lamet. He had married the only daughter of the Marechal d'Albret his uncle in 1662; but he had no iſſue by this marriage. Probably, the Marechal conſulted the intereſts of his family more than the inclination of the young couple; for they ſay there was no good underſtanding between the huſband and wife. She married again with the Comte de Marſan, one of the ſons of the Comte d'Harcourt. The Marquis d'Albret, her firſt huſband was capable of arriving to the firſt commands in the army. He was already Marechal de Camp, and was to have finiſhed the campaign of 1678, under the Marechal de Schomberg, who was ſent upon the frontiers of Champagne, in the beginning of Auguſt. Whilſt his flying camp drew near to Charleville, the Marquis d'Albret aſked leave to be abſent for ſome days, as is ſuppoſed on ſome affair of gallantry. Be that as it will, he was killed at the Gentleman's abovementioned, who got himſelf very well out of the ſcrape, by proving he was elſewhere (b). On ſuch a bed of honour periſhed the only offſpring that remained of ſo many Heroes. His family deſerved to have been

(a) His name was Charles Armanjeu d'Albret.

(b) See the cxxth Letter of Buſſi-Rabutin, Part 1. p. 262 of the Dutch edition.

been extinguiſhed on a more glorious occaſion. The Marechal d'Albret died Governor of Guienne, two years before. He had obtained in 1653 the Staff of Marechal of France; thoſe who have ſaid that he deſerved it, for having ſecured the perſon of the Prince of Condé, are not well acquainted with the affair. It was not he that arreſted him (it was Mr. de Guitaud) (c); he only conducted the Princes to the wood of Vincennes. He commanded at that time the Gendarmes of the Guard. He had learnt the art of war in Holland, and went by the name of the Comte de Mioſſens. It was under that name that he received abundance of praiſes in a work of Mr. de St. Evremont (d). He was made Knight of the Holy Ghoſt, the firſt of January 1662, and Governor of Guienne in November 1670. He married in 1645 Magdalen de Guenegaud, younger daughter of Gabriel de Guenegaud the King's Treaſurer (e). He was one of Scarron's Heroes, as appears clearly in the works of that Writer.

(c) See Benjaminus Priolus, de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 5. cap. 3.

(d) See the works of St. Evremont, tom. 2. p. 71 and 77, &c. of the Dutch edition, in 1693.

(e) See F. Anſelme, tom. 2. p. 285.

☞ALBRICIUS an Engliſhman was born at London, and lived in the eleventh Century: He ſtudied firſt in the Univerſities of Cambridge and Oxford, and went afterwards to foreign countries to make a farther progreſs in learning. He was a great Philoſopher, a learned and able Phyſician, and very well verſed in all the branches of polite Literature. He had a happy genius, born for the Sciences, as appears by the excellent books he wrote [A]. Bale ſays he happened to ſee only the following; 1. De Origine Deorum, "Of the Origin of the Gods." 2. De Ratione Veneni; "Of the Nature of "Poiſon." 3. Virtutes Antiquorum; "The Virtues of the Antients." 4. Canones Speculativi; "Abſtract or Metaphyſical Rules." He wrote divers other books of Philoſophy and Phyſick, which are diſperſed in ſeveral Libraries in England. In his book concerning the virtues of the Ancients, he gives us the character of ſeveral Philoſophers and Governors of Provinces (a). Perhaps the encomium Bale beſtows upon him muſt be underſtood with regard to the time in which Albricius lived.

(a) Balæus, Illuſtr. Maj. Britan. Scrip. Cent. II. fol. 74. verſo.

[A] The excellent books he wrote.] If thoſe learned Antiquaries, who publiſh old Manuſcripts, full of fictitious miracles and ſtrange ſtories, invented to ſupport the pretended grants made to monaſteries, would enquire for books like thoſe of our Albricius, they would perhaps be more ſerviceable to the Republick of Letters: if it were no more than to let us know in what ſtate learning was, in thoſe commonly called dark ages, that preceded the Reformation, and what notions the learned Men in thoſe times entertained of virtue. P.

ALBUNEA, a famous place near Tibur (a) in Italy. See the laſt note of the article TIBUR.

(a) Now called Tivoli.

ALBUTIUS SILUS (CAIUS) a famous Orator in the time of Auguſtus, was a native of Novarre, he was advanced to the office of Ædile; but he left it on account of an inſult offered him by ſome perſons that had loſt their ſuit. It was he that had been their Judge, andwhen he pronounced their ſentence, they at the ſame time threw him out of his Tribunal, dragging him by the feet. This affront obliged him to leave his country immediately, and go to Rome, where he aſſociated himſelf with Munacius Plancus the Orator. Emulation having ſet them at variance, he formed a ſeparate auditory, and at laſt ventured to plead cauſes. But he met with ſome diſgraces at the bar [A], which obliged him to renounce it. Being old and afflicted with an Abſceſs, he returned to Novarre, where having called the people together, he repreſented to them in a long harangue the reaſons that hindred him from deſiring to live, and ſo ſtarved himſelf to death (a). Seneca the Father, who had heard him ſometimes, ſpeaks largely of him, and relates ſeveral extracts of his harangues (b). He gives him the commendation of having never been able either to bear or offer any injury, which he calls a great probity, Homo ſummæ probitatis, qui nec facere injuriam, nec pati ſciret. Seneca the Philoſopher would have given a better definition of the nature of probity. Albutius compoſed a Treatiſe of Rhetorick, as one may eaſily gather from a paſſage in Quintilian (c).

(a) Sueton. de claris Rhetoribus, cap. 6.

(b) Seneca, Præfatione, lib. 3. Controv. & alibi paſſim.

(c) Albutius non obſcurus Profeſſor, atque autor, ſcientiam bene dicendi eſſe conſentit (Rhetoricam) Quint. Inſtit. lib. 2. cap. 5.

[A] He met with ſome diſgrates at the bar.] He thought one day to alledge only a fine common place, by ſaying to his adverſary, Swear by the aſhes and by the memory of your father, and you ſhall gain your cauſe. After he had amplified this thought the beſt he could, the Advocate of the oppoſite ſide anſwered, We accept the condition. Albutius replied that he did not offer it, that he had ſpoken it only as a figure of Rhetoric, and that figures muſt be quite baniſhed, if people catched hold in ſuch a manner of the letter of an expreſſion. The other Advocate replied, that one might live without theſe figures, and that they might periſh if they had a mind. The Judges admitted the oath; and ſo Albutius loſt his cauſe, by amuſing himſelf with the falſe glitter of a declamation. He was ſo much vexed at it, that he renounced his trade (1). Theſe are Suetonius's words: Cum in lite quadam centumvirali ab adverſario, quem ut impium erga parentes inceſſebat, jusjurandum quaſi per figuram ſic obtuliſſet: "Jura per patris ma-" triſque cineres, qui inconditi jacent," & alia in hunc modum, arripiente eo conditionem, nec judicibus aſpernantibus, non ſine magna ſui invidia negotium afflixit (2). From that time, the Maſters adviſed their Scholars not to uſe theſe figures improperly (3).

(1) Seneca, Præfatione, l. 3. Controv.

(2) Sueton. de claris Rhetorib. cap. 6.

(3) Quintil. l. 9. cap. 2.

ALBUTIUS (TITUS) a Philoſopher of the Sect of Epicurus, went from Rome to Athens when he was very young, and took ſuch a liking to the manners of the Greeks, that he choſe rather to paſs for a Greek than for a Roman (a), which gave occaſion

(a) Cicero in Bruto cap. 26 and 35.

occaſion to a joke of Scævola [A], to which Lucilius gave an ill-natured turn in one of his Satires; as we learn from Cicero (b). We learn alſo from this Author, I. That Albutius was a paſſionate Epicurean (c), and that he had been a better Orator if he had been leſs attached to the Sect of Epicurus (d); II. That he underſtood the Greek (e) learning very well, and that he had publiſhed ſome declamations (f); III, That he had born office in the Commonwealth; that he had governed Sardinia in quality of Pro-prætor (g); and that he did not obtain of the Senate the proceſſion [B] which he had aſked to be made for a thankſgiving to the Gods for his exploits; that he was accuſed of bribery [C], and (b) Idem, lib. 1. de Finibus, c. 3.

(c) Idem, lib. 1. de Natura Deorum, cap. 33.
(d) Idem. in Bruto, cap. 26 and 35.
(e) Idem, in Bruto. ibid.
(f) Ibid.

(g) Idem, de Provinc. Conſular. cap. 7. and in Piſonem p. 38.

[A] The liking he took in the manners of the Greeks gave occaſion to a joke of Scævola.] It was this; when he received Albutius's viſit at Athens, he ſaluted him in Greek, and cauſed him to be ſaluted in Greek by all his attendants. One cannot perceive the ridicule of this, without conſidering the action itſelf. Cicero expreſſes it thus: Res vero bonas verbis electis graviter ornatéque dictatas quis non legat, niſi qui ſe planè Græcum dici velit, ut à Scævola eſt Prætor ſalutatus Athenis Albutius, quem quidem locum cum multa venuſtate & omni ſale idem Lucilius, apud quem præclarè Scævola,

Græcum te, Albuti quàm Romanum atque Sabinum
Municipem Ponti, Titii, Anni, Centurionum
Præclarorum hominum ac primorum ſigniferumque,
Maluiſti dici. Græcè ergo Prætor Athenis,
Id quod maluiſti, te, cum ad me accedi' ſaluto:
Χαῖρε, inquam, Tite: lictores, turma omni', cohorſque,
Χαῖρε. Hinc hoſtis muti Albutius, hinc inimicus (1).

(1) Cicero de Fin. lib. 1. c. 3.

That is, "But who would not read a good ſubject "expreſſed in good and proper Latin except one "who would be taken for nothing but a Greek him-"ſelf, as Albutius the Prætor was ſaluted by Scævola "at Athens, as Lucilius has related with much ele-"gance and wit, who makes Scævola to ſay:

"Since you a Greek to me, Albutius, came,
"Slighting the Roman and the Sabine name:
"I who am Prætor here at Athens ſpeak
"Your fav'rite language, and ſalute in Greek.
"Their high reſpects in Greek my ſervants ſhew,
"For this Albutius is become my foe."

Thus Cicero, who ſays poſitively that Albutius was at that time Prætor at Athens; and yet Lucilius's verſes teſtify that Albutius making a viſit to Scævola, was ſaluted in Greek, in a ſneering manner, which offended him, and made him Scævola's enemy. Is it not as clear as the light, that according to Lucilius, it was Scævola and not Albutius, that exerciſed the Prætorſhip? If Albutius had been Prætor, he would have received the viſit, and not have made it; and if he had made it, no one would have dared to receive him with a ſtinging jeſt. I am ſurprized therefore, either that Cicero has given the Prætorſhip to Albutius; or if he has given it to Scævola, as is very plain, that this fault, which has crept into the text, has not been corrected in the editions of this author, We ought to read, ut à Scævola eſt Prætore ſalutatus Athenis Albutius (2), i. e. "as "Albutius was ſaluted at Athens by Scævola the "Prætor," and not, ut à Scævola eſt Prætor ſalutatus Athenis Albutius, i. e. "as Albutius the Prætor "was ſaluted by Scævola at Athens." Mr. Dacier quotes theſe verſes of Lucilius, and tranſlates them ſo as to declare that Scævola was Prætor at Athens, when he ridiculed Albutius, who came to pay his compliments to him (3). Corradus is opinion that Albutius ſtudied at Athens, and that Scævola came thither, in his way to Rhodes, which is mentioned in his firſt book of the Orator (4).

(2) Corradus in Brutum Cicer. p. 189, would have it be corrected in this manner. Other Criticks are of the ſame opinion. See Gronovius's Cicero.

(3) Dacier upon Horace Sat. II. Book II. p. 121 of the Dutch edition.

(4) Corrad. in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 189.

[B] He did not obtain of the Senate the proceſſion &c.] Cicero mentions it, in order to take from the friends of Gabinius and Piſo the comfort they drew from it. He ſhews them that the caſes were not parallel. Hac conſolatione utuntur etiam T. Albutio ſupplicationem hunc ordinem denegaſſe, quod eſt primum diſſimile; res in Sardinia cum maſtrucatis latrunculis à Proprætore, una cohorte auxiliari geſta, & bellum cum maximis Syriæ gentibus ac tyrannis conſulari exercitu imperioque confectum. Deinde Albutius, quod à Senatu petebat, ipſe ſibi in Sardinia ante decreverat: conſtabat enim, Græcum hominem ac levem in ipſa provincia quaſi triumphaſſe. Itaque hanc ejus temeritatem Senatus ſupplicatione denegata notavit (5). i. e. "They comfort them-"ſelves with this, that this order denied the ſup-"plication alſo of Titus Albutius, which is a very "different caſe: the ſubduing ſome paltry thieves "in Sardinia by a Proprætor, with one auxiliary co-"hort, and a war with the greateſt nations of Syria "brought to an end with a conſular army and com-"mand. Beſides, what Albutius asked of the Se-"nate, he had decreed for himſelf before in Sardi-"nia; for it appeared, that that Greekiſh, trifling "man had triumphed in a manner in the very pro-"vince. Therefore the Senate ſet a mark on his "temerity by denying his ſupplication." It is thought that Albutius commanded in Sardinia in the 649th year of Rome (6).

(5) Cicero de Provinc. Conſular. d. l.

(6) Prouſt, Commentario in uſum Delphini, in Ciceronem de claris Oratoribus.

[C] He was accuſed of bribery.] There is no doubting of that, after having read theſe words: Mutius autem Augur, quod pro ſe opus erat, ipſe dicebat, ut de pecuniis repetundis contra T. Albutium. Is oratorum in numero non fuit, juris civilis intelligentia, atque omni prudentiæ genere præſtitit (7). i. e. "But Mutius the Augur, when he had occaſion, "ſpake for himſelf, as when he accuſed Titus Albu-"tius of bribery. He was no Orator, but excelled "in the Civil Law, and all ſorts of knowledge." It is not ſo certain that Mutius Scævola was the accuſer; I had rather ſay he only found himſelf affected in this cauſe, and obliged to clear up or maintain ſomething that concerned him and added to the load of the accuſed. He had eloquence enough for an affair of this nature; but otherwiſe he was no Orator; as we read plainly enough in the words I have quoted. Some Critics like this reading better; Mutius autem Augur, quod opus erat, per ſe ipſe dicebat (8): i. e. "But Mutius the Augur ſpake himſelf, when "he had occaſion." I am not much concerned about it; for this reading does not deprive me of the conjecture that Scævola did but intervene in this cauſe and ſpeak upon ſome incident. This conjecture, of which I ſhall ſpeak again in the note [E], is ſtrongly confirmed by a reaſon that Cicero alledged againſt the perſon, who diſputed with him the office of accuſing Verres. He ſays that Caïus Julius, having a like diſpute with Cneius Pompeius, in the affair of Albutius, made uſe of two arguments: one that Pompey had been Albutius's Quæſtor; the other, that the inhabitants of Sardinia had deſired him to accuſe Albutius (9). It was judged that Pompey ſhould not be the accuſer. We may conclude then, that this office remained with Caïus Julius. The reader, who does not know it, will learn here, by the way, that they did not like at Rome that a ſuperior Magiſtrate ſhould be accuſed by his ſubaltern. Neque fere unquam venit in contentionem de accuſando qui Quæſtor fuiſſet, quin repudiaretur. Itaque, neque L. Philoni in C. Servilium nominis deferendi poteſtas eſt data, neque M. Aurelio Scauro in L. Flaccum, neque Cn. Pompeio, in T. Albutium: quorum nemo propter indignitatem repudiatus eſt, ſed ne libido violandæ neceſſitudinis autoritate judicum comprobaretur (10). i. e. "Whenever it was conteſted whe-"ther a Quæſtor ſhould accuſe, it was denied. "Therefore L. Philo was refuſed the accuſation of "C. Servilius, M. Aurelius Scaurus that of L. Flaccus, "and Cn. Pompeius that of T. Albutius: none of "whom was rejected for inſufficiency, but for fear the "luſt of violating friendſhip ſhould be approved "by the authority of the Judges." Apuleius indeed ſhakes a little what I have been endeavouring to eſtabliſh; for he ſays in his ſecond Apology, that C. Mutius accuſed A. Albutius. But it is eaſy to anſwer this objection; ſince on one ſide the perſons of whom Apuleius ſpeaks have not the ſame names

(7) Cicero in Bruto d. c.

(8) Corrad. in Brutum Ciceronis, p. 189. Douza in Lucilium, pag. 99.

(9) Cicero, Divinatione in Verrem, cap. 19.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(b) Cicero, Tuſcul V. cap. 37.

and baniſhed [D], and went to philoſophiſe at Athens (b). Scævola's joke was a ſeed of enmity between them [E]. The Dictionaries are not free from faults in this article [F].

with thoſe whom we are mentioning, and on the other ſide we cannot apply to the Scævola here in queſtion what Apuleius obſerves of his C. Mutius. It is certain that our Albutius's name was Titus and not Aulus; and that our Scævola's name was Quintus Mucius: and as he was an augur, he was often deſcribed by that office, Quintus Mucius Scævola Augur. The accuſer of whom Apuleius ſpeaks was a young man, that was making his firſt attempt, to introduce himſelf into the world, and make himſelf known at the bar. Neque autem gloriæ cauſa me accuſat ut M. Antonius Cn. Carbonem, C. Mutius A. Albutium . . . quippe homines eruditiſſimi, juvenes laudis gratia primum hoc rudimentum forenſis operæ ſubibant, ut aliquo inſigni judicio civibus ſuis noſcerentur, qui mos incipientibus adoleſcentibus ad illuſtrandum ingenii florem apud antiquos conceſſus, diu exolevit (11). i. e. "But neither does he accuſe me for the ſake of "glory, as M. Antonius accuſed Cn. Carbo, and C. "Mutius A. Albutius . . . for thoſe moſt learned men "undertook the firſt rudiments of pleading when they "were very young for the ſake of praiſe, that they "might be made known to their Citizens by ſome "remarkable cauſe, which practice was granted a-"mongſt the ancients to young beginners, to give "them an opportunity of ſhewing their genius, but "has now been a long time out of uſe." This does not agree with our Mutius Scævola; he was Conſul in the 636th of Rome (12). He was old when Cicero was but eighteen years of age: that is in the 665th year of Rome: and Albutius was not accuſed till after his return from Sardinia, where he was Pro-Prætor in the year 649. It is poſſible that the Tranſcribers of Apuleius have by degrees, and going from one fault to another, converted C. Julius into C. Mutius. It is certain that C. Julius was the accuſer of Albutius; and if Apuleius had named him, he would have been ſo far right; but we cannot juſtify him in advancing, that all the accuſers that he has named, were young adventurers, who were ſeeking to ſignalize their entrance into the world by ſome famous cauſe. He borrows all theſe examples from Cicero, as the celebrated Mr. Græ-vius has judiciouſly obſerved (13), why then ſhould he reduce them all to one ſort, when Cicero has made ſeveral claſſes of them (14)? Is it not becauſe they would not have ſerved his purpoſe, if they had been divided? Here then is a very fruitful reaſon for falſifying matters of fact. When one does not find them juſt as one could wiſh, it is but twiſting and turning them as one has occaſion.

(11) Apul. Apolog. II.

(12) Cicero, in Lælio, init.

(13) Græv. Notis in Cicer. de Offic. lib. 2. cap. 14.

(14) He gives his accuſation of Verres for an example; whence it appears that he did not intend to quote thoſe only who had been accuſers when they were very young.

[D] He was baniſhed.] We do not find this in the ſame places of Cicero, where Albutius's trial is ſpoken of, and it is no wonder; for when one does not write a man's life, one is contented to ſay of him only what concerns the preſent ſubject. When Cicero ſaid any thing of Albutius's trial, he had nothing in view but the perſons that had ſpoken, or were to ſpeak, againſt the accuſed: there was no neceſſity therefore for him to touch upon the iſſue of this cauſe. When he ſpake of Albutius's baniſhment, he had nothing in view but to ſhew the uſe one might make of baniſhment; he had no occaſion therefore to take notice why Albutius was baniſhed. It lies upon us to weave theſe different paſſages together; and, by this means we ſhall find that Albutius, having been accuſed of bribery, was condemned and baniſhed. Albutius CUM in Sardinia triumphaſſet, Romæ damnatus eſt (15). i. e. "When Albutius "had triumphed in Sardinia, he was condemned at "Rome." Quid T. Albutius, nonne animo æquiſſimo Athenis exul philoſophabatur? cui tamen illud ipſum non accidiſſet, ſi in republica quieſcens, Epicuri legibus paruiſſet (16). i. e. "What did T. Albutius, "did not he philoſophize with the greateſt evenneſs "of mind when he was in exile at Athens? to "whom however even that would not have happen-"ed, if he had kept himſelf quiet in the Common-"wealth in obedience to the laws of Epicurus." Mr. Gaſſendi has quoted this paſſage very ill; for inſtead of ſi in republica . . . paruiſſet, i. e. "if he "had kept himſelf quiet in the Commonwealth," he has ſaid niſi in republica . . . paruiſſet (17), i. e. "un-"leſs he had kept himſelf quiet in the Common-"wealth." Thoſe who would have ſome proof of what I have ſaid, that Albutius was accuſed at the requeſt of the inhabitants of Sardinia, need but read this. Julius hoc ſecum autoritatis ad accuſandum afferebat, quod ut hoc tempore nos ab Siculis, ſic tum ille ab Sardis rogatus ad cauſſam acceſſerat (18). i. e. "Julius brought this authority with him to the ac-"cuſation, that as we are now intreated by the Sici-"lians, ſo at that time he was intreated by the Sar-"dians to undertake their cauſe." Add to this theſe words of the XVI chapter of the II book de Officiis: Aut patrocinio, ut nos pro Siculis, pro Sardis Julius. i. e. "Or by patronage, as we for the Sicilians, and "Julius for the Sardians." We muſt read thus with Lambinus; or with Manutius, pro Sardis, contra Albutium Julius, i. e. "Julius for the Sardians, againſt "Albutius,". See Suetonius (19).

(15) Cicero in Piſon. cap. 38.

(16) Idem, lib. 5. Tuſculan. c. 37.

(17) Gaſſendi, de Vitâ Epic. lib. 2. cap. 6. p. 188. in folio, where the quotations in the margin are very faulty.

(18) Cicero, Divinat. in Verrem, cap. 19.

(19) Sueton. in Julio, cap. 55.

[E] Scævola's joke was a ſeed of enmity between them.] This is what Lucilius took notice of in his Satyrs, Hinc hoſtis Muti Albutius, hinc inimicus. A learned man was of opinion, that they were often appointed adverſaries, and that they were ſo particularly in the cauſe of Granius, accuſed by Albutius, and defended by Mutius. He ſays that Mutius had at leaſt the joy of the acquitment of Granius. He proves it by a paſſage of Cicero, to which he acknowledges that others have given a different interpretation; to wit, that Albutius accuſed Mutius of bribery. Sæpe inter ſe diſſentirent & contenderent, quum Albutius Granium oppugnabat, & Mucius eum defendebat, certè illo abſoluto gaudebat, ut libro ſecundo de Oratore ſcriptum videbis, quamvis aliter alii verba illa ſint interpretati, & putârint ipſum Scævolam ab Albutio de pecuniis repetundis accuſatum fuiſſe, quod ut nos de viro tali credamus adduci non poſſumus (20). i. e. "They often diſſented and con-"tended, as when Albutius oppoſed Granius, and "Mucius defended him, he certainly rejoiced when "he was acquitted, as you will ſee in the ſecond "book de Oratore, tho' others have interpreted the "words otherwiſe, and think that Scævola him-"ſelf was accuſed of bribery by Albutius, which "we can never be brought to believe of ſo great a "Man." I am ſatisfied neither with the ſenſe that this Critic rejects, nor with that which he approves. I had rather believe that Cicero intended to ſay, that Scævola was concerned in the accuſation of bribery laid againſt Albutius; and in ſuch a manner concerned, that from his condemnation would have reſulted Albutius's juſtification. I ſuppoſe, according to this conjecture, that by pleading his cauſe he charged Albutius, and that from thence he paſſed for his accuſer. I ſuppoſe he extricated himſelf fully, which helped to convict Albutius. I ſuppoſe moreover, that this laſt made uſe of Granius's Regiſter, to convince Scævola; and that his proof was judged inſufficient. Granius was very eaſy at Scævola's being acquitted, and was rallied about it, as if he had been glad that the Judges had no regard to his books, or to his verbal proceedings. Theſe are the words of Cicero: Bella etiam eſt familiaris reprehenſio, quaſi errantis, ut quum objurgavit Albius Granium, quod quum ejus tabulis quiddam Albutio probatum videretur, & valde abſoluto Scævola gauderet, neque intelligeret contra ſuas tabulas eſſe judicatum (21). i. e. "There is alſo a "pleaſant and familiar way of charging a man with "being in a miſtake, as when Albius reproved Gra-"nius, becauſe, when ſomething ſeemed to be prov-"ed from his books in behalf of Albutius, and he "was very glad that Scævola was acquitted, he ſeemed "not to underſtand that judgment was given againſt "his own books and writings." If any one deſires more proofs of the enmity between Albutius and Scævola, I could ſay that Lucilius has introduced Scævola laughing at Albutius's ſtyle (22). I ſhould be glad to know whence Father Prouſt has taken that Lucilius's anger againſt our Scævola came from the friendſhip that he had for Albutius, againſt whom Scævola had pleaded (23)? If Lucilius was Albutius's friend, he has verified the maxim, that a joker had rather loſe his friend than his joke (24); for we have ſeen how this ſatyrical Poet diverted himſelf at the expence of Albutius.

(20) Corradus in Brutum Cicer. p. 189.

(21) Cicero, lib. de Oratore, c. 70.

(22) See below, the Note [G].

(23) Prouſt, Comment. in ſum Delphini in Ciceron. de Orat. lib. 1. num. 72.

(24) Dummodo riſum Excutiat ſibi, non hic cuiquam parcet amico. Horat. Sat. 4. lib. 1. ver. 34. i. e. "He ſpares no "friend, he will "abuſe the beſt, "So he may "laugh himſelf "and have his "jeſt.

Creech.

article [F]. I do not think our Titus Albutius is the ſame that Horace ſpeaks of [G] in the 2d Satyr of his 2d Book. We find nothing concerning the Phyſician Albutius, who is mentioned by Pliny amongſt the moſt famous (i).

(i) Plinius, lib. 29. cap. 1.

[F] The Dictionaries are not free from faults in this article.] I. Charles Stephens pretends, that Varro has ſpoken of our T. Albutius, as of a Poet, who had made Satyrs after the manner of Lucilius, Luciliano ſtylo. But when we conſult Varro, we find that he has ſpoken of one Lucius Albutius. Nonne item L. Albutius, homo (ut ſcitis) apprime doctus, cujus Luciliano charactere ſunt libelli, dicebat, in Albano fundum ſuum paſtionibus ſemper vinci à villa, agrum enim minus dena millia reddere, villam plus vicena (25). i. e. " Did not alſo L. Albutius, a " man, you know, of very great learning, who " wrote books in the ſtyle of Lucilius, ſay, that " his farm brought him in more than his paſture " grounds; for his field brought him in ten thou- " ſand, but his farm twenty thouſand." II. It is not true that Lucilius made a jeſt of Albutius, as of a man that mixed Greek words with his Latin: Charles Stephens did not take the ſenſe of this author; he imagined that the χαῖρε belonged to Albutius; when it is to Scævola and his people that we muſt attribute it. Meſſieurs Lloyd and Hofman have not corrected theſe two faults. Take alſo notice that I do not pretend to deny that Albutius did mix Greek with his Latin. III. What Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman ſuppoſe, is very uncertain, that the father of the witch Canidia, who is ſpoken of in the 11 Satyr of the 11 book of Horace, is the ſame Albutius. Mr. Dacier thinks there are two Albutius's (26). IV. Theſe three Dictionary-Writers are miſtaken, when they take the Albutius of the 11 Satyr of the 11 book of Horace for a downright miſer. We ſhall ſee preſently that this is falſe. V. Moreri is miſtaken, when he imagines the Albutius, of whom Cicero ſpeaks at the beginning of the 1 book De Finibus, is not the ſame with him that is mentioned in the 1 book De Natura Deorum, and the v book of Tuſculan Quæſtions. VI. It is not true that Horace ſaid there was an Albutius the moſt covetous of men, who uſed to chaſtiſe his domeſtics before they undertook what he commanded them, for fear, ſaid he, he ſhould forget to do it, if they forgot to execute well what he commanded them. Moreri, who aſcribes all this diſcourſe to Horace, was deceived by Charles Stephens, although this laſt does not formally aſcribe this little tale to Horace. This is what Horace ſaid of it.

(25) Varro de Re Ruſtica, l. 3. cap. 2.

(26) Dacier, Remarq. ſur la Satire 1, du 11 Livre, p. 40.

Mundus erit, qui non offendet ſordidus, atque
In neutram partem cultus miſer: hic neque ſervis
Albuti ſecus exemplo, dum munia didit
Sævus erit: neque, ſicut ſimplex Nævius unctam
Convivis præbebit aquam (27).

(27) Horat. Sat. 2. l. 2. ver. 65.

" — He lives well that keeps the middle ſtate,
" And neither leans too much to this, nor that:
" Such when he bids his ſlaves do this and this,
" And taſks them too, as ev'ry Maſter his,
" Will not be cruel as old Albutius is:
" Nor yet, like Nævius, when he makes a feaſt,
" With coſtly ointment will he waſh his gueſt.
Creech.

He lays down, that a true neatneſs is not extravagant, and that it differs not only from ſlovenlineſs, but alſo from too ſcrupulous and too ſtudied an exactneſs (28). If he had ſeen the exceſſive and ſervile care that they take of the cleanneſs of the houſes in ſome parts of Holland, he would have called it a falſe neatneſs. Albutius and Nævius are the two examples he brings of the vicious extremity: the firſt is the example of too much, and the other of too little ceremony. Some interpreters have taken the quite contrary of this: they have taken Nævius for a prodigal, and Albutius for a miſer (29). But perhaps here is nothing deſigned about avarice and prodigality: perhaps it is about neatneſs and ſlovenlineſs. This laſt fault is ſometimes joined with a ſuperfluous expence. There are perſons who are prodigal in cloaths, and in furniture, and in entertainments, who nevertheleſs have not the character of dreſſing well, or of placing the ornaments of their apartments with a good taſte, or of keeping a good table. Be that as it will, Albutius is not in this place an example of avarice. I conclude, with obſerving that Albutius's barbarity to his ſlaves is not a forgery of Moreri's: he had read it in his patron (30); but he did not know that the original of it is in an ancient Scholiaſt. Aſper in exigenda à ſingulis impenſi ratione caſtigandoque, adeo ut ſervos nonnunquam caſtigaret priùs & cæderet quàm peccaſſent, dicens vereri ſe ne cum peccaſſent, cædere tunc ei non vacaret (31).

(28) See M. Dacier on this paſſage.

(29) The old Commentators Lambinus, Cruquius, &c. d. l.

(30) Charles Stephens.

(31) Vetus Commentator in Horat. d. l.

[G] I do not think our Titus Albutius is the ſame that Horace ſpeaks of.] We ſaw juſt now that Horace's Albutius was extravagantly exact, that he never pardoned his domeſticks, that he would have one do preciſely this, and another that, and that he entred into a pedantick detail on thoſe ſubjects. He, of whom Lucilius ſpeaks, who had ſo ſtrong an affectation for the politeneſs and elegance of the Greeks, that he would be taken for a Grecian (32), was cut out to furniſh Horace with the example, for which he had occaſion: for every man that affects the manners of foreign nations, mixes ſomething forced and exorbitant with it, which renders the thing ridiculous. Do but obſerve how ſome country people, whom Moliere has bantered ſo often, behave with regard to faſhions, in which they never know how to keep the middle way. I can ſcarce believe that Horace brought Albutius the Greek, the Albutius of Lucilius upon the ſtage; but I think it no wonder that Torrentius ſhould believe it. Mr. Dacier chuſes to ſay the Albutius of Horace was the ſon of Lucilius's Albutius. I am of opinion that Albutius's affectation for Greek regarded the language principally, and we know beſides, by Lucilius's raillery, that he loved too ſtudied an affectation. Collocationis eſt componere & ſtruere verba, ſic ut neve aſper eorum concurſus neque hiulcus ſit, ſed quodammodo coagmentatus & lævis. In quo lepide ſoceri (33) perſona luſit, is qui elegantiſſimè id facere potuit, Lucilius,

(32) See M. Dacier Remarques ſur la Satir. 1 du 11 Livre d'Horace.

(33) Mutius the Augur: whence we learn that Lucilius ſometimes made him ſpeak in his Satires.

Quàm lepidè laxeis compoſtæ, ut teſſerulæ omnes
Arte, pavimento, atque emblemate vermiculato.

Quæ cum dixiſſet in Albutium illudens, &c. (34). i. e. It " belongs to the conſtruction to place and put words " together in ſuch a manner, that they may neither be " rough nor gape upon one another, but be well knit " and ſmooth. On which ſubject Lucilius, who " was as capable of it as any man, has been very " witty, ſpeaking in the perſon of Mutius, (34) Cicer. de Oratore, lib. 3. cap. 43. See alſo his Orator, cap. 43, &c.

" Your words in various order, plac'd ſo fine,
" Like ſome moſaic pavement ſeem to ſhine.

" Which when he had ſaid in banter of Albutius " &c." Theſe verſes of Lucilius repreſent a ſort of writing, that may be called inlaid or moſaic work.

ALCASAR (LOUIS DE) a Spaniſh Jeſuit (a) was born at Seville in 1554. He entred among the Jeſuits in 1569, in ſpite of the oppoſition of his family, who were in poſſeſſion of a large eſtate. After he had been a teacher of Philoſophy, he taught Divinity at Cordoua, and at Seville, for above twenty years. He applied himſelf chiefly to ſearch the ſecrets of the Apocalyps, and ſpent no leſs than twenty years in this labour (b). His work is one of the beſt that the Roman Catholicks have produced on the Apocalyps [A]. It is intitled Veſtigatio arcani ſenſus in Apocalypſi, and has been printed

(a) They have made him a Portugueſe in Mr. de Meaux's Index of the Apocalyps.

(b) Sotuel, Bibliotb. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 557.

[A] His work is one of the beſt that the Roman Catholicks have produced on the Apocalyps.] This is what Nicolas Antonio ſays of it. Inſignem poſuit operam in adornando atque illuſtrando Apocalypſis libro printed ſeveral times [B]. It is pretended that Grotius took a good many of his ideas from it (c). This Author affirms that the Apocalyps is perfectly accompliſhed to the xxth chapter; and he finds there the two witneſſes, without ſpeaking either of Elias or Enoch (d). He makes no difficulty of abandoning the antient Fathers; and as all his principal ſtudies tended only to the explication of this book, the other work which we have of his, is only a Comment on the places of the Old Teſtament that regard the Revelations of St. John. It was printed after his death under this title, In eas Veteris Teſtamenti partes, quas reſpicit Apocalypſis, nempe Cantica Canticorum, Pſalmos complures, multa Danielis aliorumque librorum capita, Libri V. So there are two volumes in folio, which, properly ſpeaking, are nothing but a Comment on the Apocalyps; but there is an Appendix to each: that of the firſt volume is a Treatiſe de Sacris Ponderibus & Menſuris; and that of the ſecond, a Treatiſe de Malis Medicis. Alcaſar died at Seville June 16, 1613, being ſixty years old (e). You will find an examination of ſome of his apocalyptick hypotheſes in the work that Mr. Heydegger publiſhed at Leyden in 1687, under the title of Myſterium Babylonis magnæ (f).

(c) Mr. de Meaux, Pref. de l'Apocalypſe, p. 33 of the Dutch edition.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Alegambe made him 63 years old. F. Sotuel has corrected this miſtake.

(f) In the firſt and ſecond Diſſertation.

bro obſcuriſſimo. Edidit namque lucubrationes ſuas ad ipſum, ingenioſas quidem, eruditas, elaborataſque, ut cenſet Cornelius a Lapide. Sed quiſnam ſponſor erit, telo eum quamvis acuto & forti ſcopum tetigiſſe (1)? That is, "He performed a noble work in adorning "and illuſtrating that moſt obſcure book of the Apo- "calyps. For he publiſhed his own lucubrations on "it, which, in the opinion of Cornelius a Lapide, "are ingenious, learned and elaborate. But who "will be ſecurity for him, that with all his acute- "neſs he has hit his point?" I am ſure there is no bankrupt, nor priſoner for debt, but would ſooner find ſomebody in the city to be bound for him, than the expounders on the Apocalyps would find ſecurity, if there was a tribunal on earth, to lay large fines on thoſe who ſhould run in debt with falſe expoſitions. Whilſt we flatter our paſſions with thinking we run no risk, we are credulous; but for the ſecurities that Don Nicolas Antonio requires, it is in vain to look for them.

(1) Nic. Antonii, Bib. Scrip. Hiſp. tom. 2. p. 14.

[B] Printed ſeveral times.] F. Alegambe takes notice only of the edition of Antwerp, by John Keerberge in 1614, and at the ſame time ſays the other volume was poſthumous. If the firſt had been printed but in 1614, it had been poſthumous; and ſo there was no reaſon for that diſtinction. We muſt ſuppoſe then, that the firſt, as Nicolas Antonio obſerves, was printed at Antwerp, for John Keerberge, in 1604; beſide this edition, Nicolas Antonio ſpeaks of that of 1619, Antverpiæ, apud Nutios, and that of Lyons, in 1616. Draudius quotes theſe two laſt editions, and beſides, one at Antwerp, by Keerberge, in 1611 (2). F. Sotuel, beſides the edition of 1614, takes notice only of the two laſt of Nicolas Antonio, and ſays afterwards that the other volume was poſthumous. He did not reviſe Alegambe as exactly as he ought to have done.

(2) Draud. Bib. Claſſica, p. 22.

ALCÆUS, a native of Mitylene, in the Iſland Leſbos, was one of the greateſt Lyrick Poets of Antiquity. Some will have him to be the inventor of this ſort of Poeſy (a). He flouriſhed in the 44th Olympiad (b), at the ſame time with Sappho, who was of Mitylene as well as he. It is maliciouſly reported [A], that Alcæus was pleaſed one day to ask I know not what of Sappho, and that Sappho not being in ſo good a humour as uſual, denied him that day, what perhaps ſhe offered him the next (c). Be that as it will, he meddled with other things beſide Poetry: he would needs give proofs of his courage in war, but was not always ſucceſsful; for he ſaved himſelf only by flight, and dropping his arms, when the Athenians gained a victory over the Leſbians (d): but he found a pleaſing comfort under this diſgrace, for the Conquerors hung up his arms in the Temple of Minerva at Sigæum, which they would not have done in ſo diſtinguiſhed a manner, if they had not eſteemed them a very glorious monument of their victory (e). Alcæus did not forget this circumſtance in the verſes that he made on his misfortune [B]. His Muſe, which he indulged in the midſt of arms, either in drinking ſongs, or love ſongs, and in the praiſe of the perſon he loved (f), who was but [C].

(a) Dic latinum, Barbite, carmen, Lesbio primum modulate civi. Horat. Od. xxxii. lib. 1. and 3. i, e. "Begin, ſweet "harp, a Ro- "man ſtrain, "Thoſe mea- "ſures and thoſe "tunes main- "tain "Firſt ſtruck "by great Al- "cæus noble "hand. Creech.

(b) Euſeb. in Chronic.

(c) Le Fevre, Vie des Poet. Grecs, pag. 27.

(d) Herod. l. 5. cap. 95.

(e) Ibid.

(f) See the quotation from Horace, in the note [C].

[A] It is maliciouſly reported, &c.] I have related Mr. Le Fevre's own words, and am very much miſtaken if he did not take this little ſtory from Ariſtotle's Rhetorick. Ariſtotle cites theſe words of Alcæus;

Θέλω τὶν εἰπεῖν. ἀλλά με κωλύει
Αἰδώς:

And this anſwer of Sappho,

Αἰ δ' ἦχες σ' ἐσλῶν ἵμερος, ἢ καλῶν,
Καὶ μή τι εἰπεῖν γλῶσσ' ἐκύκα κακὸν,
Αἰδώς κε νυ σ' οὐκ ἔιχεν ὄμματ'
Ἀλλ' ἔλεγες περὶ τῶ δικαίω (1).

(1) Ariſt. Rhetoric. l. 1. cap. 9. Obſerve that in placing and accenting this Greek I follow Scaliger on Euſebius, p. 85. ed. 1658.

The ſenſe of theſe verſes is this. Alcæus declares his deſire of ſaying ſomething; but that ſhame hinders him. Sappho anſwers him, that if he had deſired what was good or honeſt, and if his tongue had not been ready to pronounce ſomething amiſs, no ſhame would have riſen in his face, and that ſhe deſired him to make ſome reaſonable offer. Thoſe who have the gift of judging of Mr. Le Fevre's books, ſuch, to uſe his own words in his firſt Journaline, as have a ſoul capable of many forms, and who perceive in half a word the beauty and fineneſs of thoughts and expreſſions, ſee plainly that theſe words of Alcæus are one of thoſe declarations of love which require the happy moment, and that Sappho perfectly underſtood what he meant. Her anſwer is prudent, but perhaps a little too cold according to this ſuppoſition.

[B] He did not forget, ... his misfortune of running away (2).] He who moſt reſembled Alcæus of all the Latin Poets, has confeſſed as well as he, in his Poems, that he had ſaved himſelf from a battle, by throwing down his arms, as uſeleſs things to thoſe that run away.

(2) Herod. l. 5. cap. 95. and Strabo, lib. 13. p. 412, 413.

Tecum Philippos & celerem fugam
Senſi, relicta non bene parmula,
Quum fracta virtus & minaces
Turpe ſolum tetigere mento (3).

(3) Horat. Od. 7. l. 2. ver. 9.

"The bloody wars, Philippi's field,
"Ignobly having loſt my ſhield,
"With thee I ſaw, ſecure from wound,
"I ſaw the flight, when haughty proud
"To Cæſar's ſtronger virtue bow'd,
"And baſely hit the bloody ground. Creech.

Archilochus

but too like him [C]: his Muſe, I ſay, did not keep ſilence on the defeat of the Leſbians. We know beſides, that it did not always trifle, and that it could ſometimes treat graver ſubjects after a noble manner [D], and particularly a fine common place againſt Tyrants. Alcæus at that time followed an inclination ſtrengthened by his own adventures, and perſonal concerns, for he had fallen out with thoſe who would have invaded the liberty of his country, and particularly with Pittacus [E], who became an Uſurper, notwithſtanding he was one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. He reſtored Alcæus to liberty, who was become his priſoner, ſaying it was better to forgive a crime than to puniſh it (g). Some ſay, Alcæus was driven away with many others, but that at laſt he put himſelf at the head of thoſe Exiles, made war on the Tyrants, and drove them away in their turn (b). I find nothing more in Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, but that the inhabitants of Mitylene choſe Pittacus for their Chief, againſt the Poet Alcæus and his adherents, whom they had baniſhed (i). Others would have it, that when he had abuſed the clemency of Pittacus, and did not leave off caballing, and railing againſt him, he ceaſed to protect him (k); and that this is what Ovid meant by theſe words:

(g) Heraclitus, apud Diogenem Laert. in Pittaco, lib. 1. num. 76.
(b) Dacier on the xiiith Ode of the 2d book of Horace.
(i) Dionyſ. Halicarn. Ant. Rom. lib. 5. cap. 82.
(k) Vide Dionyſ. Salvagnium Boeſſium, Comment. in Ibin, p. 102, 103, edit. in 4°.

Utque lyræ vates fertur periiſſe ſeveræ
Cauſa ſit exitii dextera læſa tui.

This Archilochus had ſuch another adventure before Alcæus, and confeſſed it publicly (4). Perhaps Horace would not have been ſo ingenuous in this affair, if he had not had thoſe great examples before his eyes. Chabot is miſtaken, when he affirms that Plutarch has refuted Herodotus concerning the flight of Alcæus (5). Plutarch contented himſelf with ſaying that Herodotus had ſuppreſſed a glorious action of Pittacus, but not the ſhameful one of Alcæus (6).

(4) See the note [H] in this Article.
(5) Chabot. in Horat. Od. xiii. lib. 2.
(6) Plutarc. de Malign. Herodot. p. 858.

[C] The perſon whom he loved was but too like him.] Horace informs us, that Alcæus's miſtreſs was a boy named Lycus, with black eyes and black hair.

Qui ferox bello tamen inter arma,
Sive jactatam religarat udo
Littore navim,
Liberum & Muſas, Veneremque & illi
Semper hærentem puerum canebat
Et Lycum nigris oculis, nigroque
Crine decorum (7).

(7) Horat. Od. xxxii. lib. 1. ver. 6.

" He fierce in arms, yet midſt his cares,
" When dangers preſs'd, and noiſie wars,
" And ſtain'd his charming harp with blood;
" Or when he ſtem'd the angry ſeas,
" Or when arriv'd he ſat at eaſe,
" And laugh'd at all the fury of the flood:
" The Muſes he in ſounding verſe
" Would ſing, and Venus praiſe rehearſe,
" With her attending wanton boy:
" Or Lyco's face, ſurprizing fair,
" With jet-like eyes, and raven hair,
" By nature fitted to entice to joy. Creech.

It is probable it was the ſame that had a mole on his finger, which was a great ornament in the opinion of this Poet. Nævus in articulo pueri delectat Alcæum, ac eſt corporis macula nævus, illi tamen hoc lumen videbatur (8). Cicero ſays in another place, that notwithſtanding Alcæus had ſhewn abundance of courage, he had filled his verſes with an exceſſive love of boys: Fortis vir in ſuâ republicâ cognitus, quæ de juvenum amore ſcripſit Alcæus (9). With regard to his amorouſneſs, he compares himſelf to a hog, that whilſt he is eating one acorn, devours another with his eyes. So, ſays he, it fares with me, whilſt I enjoy one fine girl, I am longing for another. Ἀ ὗς τὰν βάλανον τὰν μὲν ἔχει, τὰν δ' ἔραται, λαβεῖν. Κἀγὼ παῖδα καλὰν τὰν μὲν ἴλω, τὰν δ' ἔραμαι λαβεῖν. Scipio Gentilis relates this in his notes on the Apology of Apuleius, pag. 65.

(8) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 28.
(9) Idem, Tuſcul. Quæſt. iv. c. 33.

[D] His Muſe could ſometimes treat graver ſubjects after a noble manner.] This made Horace ſay:

Et te ſonantem plenius aureo,
Alcæe, plectro, dura navis,
Dura fugæ mala, dura belli,
Utrumque ſacro digna ſilentio
Mirantur umbræ dicere: ſeà magis
Pugnas & exactos tyrannos
Denſum humeris bibit aure vulgus (10).

(10) Horat. Od. xiii. lib. 2. ver. 26.

" Alcæus too, whoſe golden ſtrings
" With manlier ſtrokes ſound greater things;
" He tells the dangers and the fears
" Of flights, of ſailing, and of wars;
" With ſilent rev'rence Ghoſts admire
" The wond'rous fury of his lyre:
" The vulgar ſhades throng moſt to hear
" Of Kings depos'd, of feats of war,
" And drink them with a greedy ear. Creech.

Mr. Dacier obſerves upon theſe words, I. That the ſtyle of Alcæus was noble and ſtrong, and that he treated of ſublimer ſubjects than Sappho, who ſays of him in Ovid,

Nec plus Alcæus conſors patriæque Lyræque
Laudis habet, quamvis grandius ille ſonet,

" Tho' great Alcæus more ſublimely ſings,
" And ſtrikes with bolder rage the ſounding ſtrings,
" No leſs renown attends the moving lyre,
" Which Cupid tunes, and Venus does inſpire.
Pope.

II. That Horace gives him a golden lyre, becauſe he ſpeaks of that part of his works, wherein he deſcribed the civil wars that happened at Mitylene, and the different factions of the tyrants Pittacus, Myrſilus, Megalagyrus, the Cleanactides and ſome others (11), and that theſe Poems were called διχοστασιαστικὰ ποιήματα, i. e. " Poems upon Seditions." He quotes this paſſage of Quintilian: Alcæus in parte operis aureo plectro merito donatur quâ tyrannos inſectatur. Multum etiam moribus confert, in eloquendo brevis, & magnificus, & diligens, plerumque Homero ſimilis, ſed in luſus & amores deſcendit, majoribus tamen aptior (12). i. e. " Alcæus has a golden harp juſtly aſcribed to him, " in that part of his work where he falls upon ty- " rants. He is alſo a great encourager of morality, " conciſe, ſublime, and accurate, generally reſembling " Homer, he ſometimes ſtoops to gaiety and love, " though he is fitted for greater ſubjects." Add to this the epithet of threatning, which has been given to his muſe, & Alcæi Minaces, Steſichorique graves Camœnæ (13). i. e. " The threatning Muſe " of Alcæus, and the grave Muſe of Steſichorus.

(11) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 424.
(12) Quint. l. 10. cap. 1.
(13) Horat. Od. 9. lib. 4. ver. 7.

[E] He fell out with Pittacus.] He abuſed him in the groſſeſt terms; calling him ſplay-foot, fat-guts, &c. as we are told by Suidas, under the word σαράπους, and by Diogenes Laërtius in the Life of Pittacus. The moderation of Pittacus was very commendable, and appeared ſo to Valerius Maximus. Pittaci quoque moderatione pectus inſtructum, qui Alcæum Poëtam & amaritudine odii & viribus ingenii adverſus ſe pertinaciſſimè uſum, tyrannidem à civibus delatam adeptus, tantummodo quid in opprimendo poſſet admonuit (14). i. e. " Pittacus alſo was a man of " moderation, who, when Alcæus the Poet had uſed " him as ill as the bitterneſs of his hatred and the " ſtrength of his wit would let him, yet when the " Citizens conferred the Government upon him, he " only ſhewed what power he had to oppreſs him."

(14) Valer. Maxim. lib. 4. cap. 1. ext.

This is the more probable becauſe Alcæus paſſed for a man that oppoſed innovations: not becauſe they were ſuch, but becauſe others, and not himſelf, introduced them (l). It is a fault he had in common with a great many other people. We have only ſome fragments of his Poems remaining.

(l) Οὐδ' αὐτὸς καθαρεύων τῶν τοιούτων πεπτωκότων. i. e. "Nor "was he free "from ſuch de- "ſires of inno- "vation," Strabo, l. 13. p. 425.

(a) Suidas.

ALCÆUS, an Athenian (a) and Tragic Poet, was, as ſome think, the firſt compoſer of Tragedies. If you will believe Suidas, he is different from Alcæus a Comic Poet, the fifth Author of the ancient Comedy, and ſon of Miccus. It ſeems he renounced his country, which was the city of Mitylene, and called himſelf an Athenian (b). He left ten pieces, one of which was intitled Paſiphae: this was the Piece he produced when he diſputed with Ariſtophanes, in the fourth year of the 97th Olympiad (c). Athenæus quotes ſome of the other pieces. It is not certain whether the Endymion quoted by Pollux belongs to Alcæus the tragic, or Alcæus the comic Poet: but it probable, that the piece intitled Cælum, was written by the firſt, ſince Macrobius quotes it as a Tragedy (d). I find in Plutarch a Poet called Alcæus, different from the former (e), and who perhaps is the ſame perſon that Porphyrius mentions as a compoſer of ſatyrical Iambicks and Epigrams, who had made a Poem on the thefts of Euphorus the Hiſtorian (f). Plutarch's Alcæus lived in the 145th Olympiad, in the year of Rome 555, as appears in the Song he made on the battle that Philip King of Macedon loſt in Theſſaly. In this Song he made Philip fly ſwifter than a Hart, and magnified the number of the dead, that he might render him the more contemptible. Plutarch however aſſures us that Titus Flaminius who had gained this battle was more offended with the verſes of Alcæus than with Philip, becauſe the Song mentions the Ætolians before the Romans, whereby he ſeems to give the Ætolians the chief honour of that victory. Philip defended himſelf againſt this ſong of Alcæus by another ſong [A]. It muſt be owned that Plutarch makes the Roman Conſul extravagantly captious. They alſo mention a Meſſenian Alcæus who lived in the reign of Veſpaſian, and alſo under that of Titus (g). There are ſome of his Epigrams in the Anthology. I know not which of theſe Alcæus's it was who ſuffered for his lewdneſs a very ſingular kind of death [B]. Voſſius in the 42d page of his Notes on Catullus believes it was he that ſatyriſed Philip King of Macedon. He takes him for the comic Poet, but is miſtaken; for this Comic was contemporary with Ariſtophanes.

(b) Μιτυληναῖος, εἶτα Ἀθηναῖος. idem.

(c) Scholiaſt. Ariſtophan. in Argumento Plati.

(d) Macrob. Sat. lib. 5. cap. 20.

(e) Plut. in Flaminio, p. 373.

(f) Porphyr. apud Euſeb. Præpar. Evang. lib. 10. cap. 3. pag. 467.

(g) Tzetzes in Lycophr. apud Gyrald. de Poet. Dial. 10. p. 512. edit. anni 1696.

[A] Philip defended himſelf againſt this ſong of Alcæus by another ſong.] This was the ſubſtance of it:

Sans feuille aucune, & ſans eſcorce auſſi,
Ami paſſant, on a fait ici tendre,
Sur ce coſtau, cete potence-ci,
Expreſſément pour Alcæus y pendre (1).

(1) Thus Amiot tranſlates this Greek: Ἄφλοις καὶ ἄφυλλος, ὀδοιπόρε, τῷ δ' ἐπὶ νώτῳ Ἀλκαίῳ σταυρὸς πήγνυται ἀλίβατος. Plutarch. in Flamin. p. 373.

"This gibbet or this hill, which paſſers by may "mark,
"Was ſet to hang Alcæus up withouten leaves or "bark. Sir Tho. North.

[B] One of theſe Alcæus's . . . ſuffered a ſingular kind of death.] Mr. Voſſius relates (2) this Epitaph taken out of a manuſcript Anthology:

(2) Iſaac Voſſius in Catullum, p. 42.

Ἀλκαίῳ τάφος οὗτος ὃν ἔκλαυσε ἡ πλατύφυλλος
Τιμωρὸς μοιχῶν γῆς θυγάτηρ ῥάφανος

This ſignifies that Alcæus died of the puniſhment inflicted on adulterers, which was a particular manner of empaling. It was thruſting up their fundament one of the biggeſt radiſhes they could meet with. For want of radiſhes they made uſe of a fiſh with a very thick head, as we learn from the Scholiaſt upon Juvenal, on theſe words of the xth Satyr, quoſdam mœchos & mugilis intrat. Hence we may underſtand the meaning of that menace in Catullus:

Ah! tum te miſerum, malique fati,
Quem attractis pedibus, patente porta,
Percurrent raphanique mugileſque (3).

(3) Catul. Epigr. xv. See Parthenius, Muret, and Achilles Statius on this paſſage.

Lucian ſpeaks of this ſort of puniſhment; but he does not decide whether the criminal died of it, and differs much from his Scholiaſt. Both of them ſay that the adulterer uſed to be well beaten; but the Scholiaſt ſays they did not thruſt up the radiſh, till he was ready to expire with the blows he had received. Lucian hints quite the contrary; for the lecher of whom he ſpeaks, after having been well beaten, leaped down from the ſcaffold and ran away with the radiſh ſticking behind. Κατὰ τῦ πίγης ἀλόμενος ὀλίφυγε ῥαφανίδι τὴν πυγὴν βεβυσμένος (4). De tecto deſiliens aufugit natibus raphano oppletis. Voſſius had no reaſon to conclude from this paſſage of Lucian, that the puniſhment was not mortal; for it is very probable, that if the malefactor had not made his eſcape, it would have coſt him his life ſooner or later. The two verſes, that Voſſius quotes, and which he takes for the diſcourſe of an adultereſs, who ſaid to her goſſip, that if inſtead of the radiſh they ſhould make uſe of the croſs to puniſh their gallants, no body would come to them: theſe two verſes, I ſay, are a better proof than the words of Lucian (5). The Commentator on Diogenes Laërtius has very juſtly comprehended what Menedemus glanced at, when he told an inſolent adulterer that the juice of radiſhes was uſeful: Πρὸς δὲ τὸν θρασυνόμενον μοιχὸν, ἀγνοεῖς, ἔφη, ὅτι ὁ μόνον κράμβη χυλὸν ἔχει χρήσιμον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ῥαφανίδες (6). i. e. "He ſaid to a boaſting adulterer, You do not know that not only cole- "worts but alſo radiſhes have a wholeſome juice."

(4) Lucian. de Morte Peregrini.

(5) Ex Heſychio in ῥάφανα ἀγρία. See alſo the Scholiaſt. on the Nubes of Ariſtophanes.

(6) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 128. See Aldobrandinus and Mancinus on the ſame paſſage.

ALCHABITIUS, an Arabian Aſtrologer, compoſed an Introduction to the Knowledge of the celeſtial influences [A]. He has alſo written of the conjunction of the Planets

[A] He compoſed an Introduction to the knowledge of the celeſtial influences.] The title of the book in Geſner and in Simler is Iſagoge ad magiſterium judiciorum aſtrorum, vel ad ſcrutanda ſtellarum magiſteria. Voſſius gives it after another manner, but the ſenſe is the ſame: Iſagoge ad ſcrutanda aſtrorum indicia (1). But Moreri having taken one word for another in Voſſius, initia for indicia, has given us a title incomprehenſible enough. The Introduction to the knowledge of the beginning of the Stars. Voſſius ſeems to have thought it ſhould be read indiciorum where Geſner and Simler have put judiciorum.

(1) Voſſius de Scient. Mathem. pag. 399.

Note that Alchabitius's treatiſe, Of the conjunction of the Planets, has been tranſlated into French by Oronce Finé (2); and that Mr. de la Mare, in his Preface to the works of the four Guiions, quotes the manuſcript notes of Pierre Saumaiſe, Counſellor to the Parliament of Dijon, upon Alchabitius De Inimicitiis Planetarum. I have this from Mr. de la Monnoie.

(2) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoiſe, p. 20.

nets and a Treatiſe of Opticks which was found in a German Convent, and carried to the Author of the book de Lumine Animæ, his Aſtrological works tranſlated by Joannes Hiſpalenſis were printed at Venice in 1491; with the expoſition of Joannes de Saxonia, and in 1521 with the corrections of Anthony de Fantis Phyſician of Treviſe in Italy (a). It is not certainly known in what time Alchabitius lived.

(a) Geſner in Biblioth. ex eo Voſſius de Scient. Mathem. p. 354 and 569.

ALCHINDUS, a Phyſician and Aſtrologer, amongſt the Arabians. Cardan reckons him among the twelve ſublime genius's, whom he looked upon as the firſt of all thoſe who have excelled in the Sciences (a). This is praiſing him more than Albohazen Haly, and Haly Rodoan who have given him to the title of Great Aſtrologer; and more than Raſis and Meſüé, who treat him as a very learned and experienced Phyſician; and more than Averroës and Wimpina who call him a ſubtle Philoſopher. We may judge of his wit and learning by the two printed books we have of his de Temporum Mutationibus, and de gradibus Medicinarum compoſitarum inveſtigandis; there are ſeveral others quoted very often by authors under the title de Ratione ſex quantitatum; de quinque Eſſentiis; de Motu diurno; de Vegetabilibus; and de Theorica Magicarum artium: this laſt work has given occaſion to all the writers upon Sorcerers to ſpeak of Alchindus as of a pernicious Magician. Franciſcus Picus, and Conradus Wimpina, have amply diſcourſed upon the hereſies, blaſphemies, and abſurdities that are obſerved in this book. The famous Joannes Picus does not ſeem to have judged ſo diſadvantageouſly of it, ſince he has ſaid that he had known but three men who had touched upon the natural and lawful Magic, viz. Alchindus, Roger Bacon, and William Biſhop of Paris: What we are moſt ſure of according to Gabriel Naudé, from whom I borrow this article is, Iſt, That this work is full of ſuperſtitions and doctrines quite contrary to our faith, and ſuch as we ought to expect from a Mahometan who writes very freely what he thinks. II. That there is no room to accuſe him of Magick, ſince far from amuſing himſelf with Teürgick or Goëtick Magick, his deſign was no other than to aſcribe to nature thoſe things that had been attributed to good or bad Angels, as Peter d'Apono and Pomponace have done after him (b). Theſe people to ſerve their purpoſe ſuppoſe that ſublunary things entirely depend upon the Heavens, and that they receive all their properties from one another, and that each receive them from the whole by the means of certain corporeal beams, which paſſing from the leaſt to the greateſt, are as they ſay the cauſe of all that is done in nature. We do not certainly know when Alchindus lived, but he cannot be placed below the twelfth Century, ſince Averroës mentions him. There is a JACOBUS ALKINDUS whom ſome confound with him of whom I am ſpeaking [A].

(a) Cardan. de Subtilit. lib. 16. Naudé in his Apolog. des grans Hommes, p. 354, magnifies the teſtimony of Cardan too much.

(b) Naudé ibid. and in the following pages.

[A] Some confound one Jacobus Alkindus with him of whom I am ſpeaking.] Wolfgang Juſtus makes this Jacobus Alkindus live under Pope Eugenius III, in 1145, contemporary with Averroës and Avicenna: he ſays he was an Arabian Phyſician and Philoſopher (1). The Bibliographers aſcribe the ſame books to Alchindus and Jacobus Alkindus. Voſſius ſeems to diſtinguiſh them; for when he ſpeaks of Alchindus, he aſcribes to him only the treatiſe De ſex Quantitatibus, and does not note his age; but he places Jacobus Alkindus in 1235, and aſcribes to him amongſt other books a treatiſe De Radiis Stellarum (2). It is without doubt the ſame book that Geſner mentions under the title De Radiis Stellicis, and which he thinks to be James Alkindus's, tho' the name of James be not joined to that of Alkindus. One might judge by the title alone, that it belongs to him who was ſuſpected of magick.

(1) Ap. Merckinum in Lindenio renovato.

(2) Voſſius de Scient. Mathem. p. 61 and 179.

ALCIAT (ANDREW) a great Lawyer flouriſhed in the ſixteenth Century. He was ſon of a rich Merchant of Milan [A], and was born in that city, in the month of May 1492 (a). They pretend that his mother felt hardly any pain when ſhe was brought to bed of him (b). After having ſtudied humanity under Janus Parrhaſius who taught at Milan (c) he ſtudied the law at Pavia and at Bologna (d), and chiefly followed the Lectures of Jaſon in the firſt of theſe Univerſities, and thoſe of Charles Ruinus in the ſecond (e). After he had taken the degree of Doctor, he applied himſelf to the bar in the city of Milan (f), till he was called to the Law-chair, by the Univerſity of Avignon [B]. He executed that function with ſo much ſkill, that Francis the firſt thought him a fit perſon to make the knowledge of the Law flouriſh in the Univerſity

(a) See the Note [E].
(b) Panzir. de claris Legum Interprat. lib. 2. c. 169. p. 353.
(c) Minos, in vita Alciat.

(d) Teiſſier, Elog. taken from Thuanus, tom. 1. p. 35, quoting Claudius Minos, ſays that Alciat ſtudied at Verona. I have not met with it.
(e) Panzir. de claris Legum Interpret. lib. 2. c. 169.
(f) Minos, in Vita Alciati.

[A] He was a ſon of a rich Merchant at Milan.] I have followed Panzirolus, the only author of thoſe whom I have conſulted, who owns him to be the ſon of a man of this profeſſion: Ex Joanne pecunioſo negotiatore Mediolani fere nullo parentis dolore natus & educatus fuit (1): the reſt make him rather the ſon of a Gentleman of an ancient family: Andreas Alciatus in pago Alciato ſeu Alzato Mediolanenſi natus à nobili Alciatorum familia. Thus Claudius Minos begins (2). It cannot be objected to me that in ſome places the quality of a Merchant and that of a Gentleman are not incompatible; for when they are joined, a Hiſtorian does not ſpeak of the weakeſt without ſpeaking of the ſtrongeſt. Then ſince Panzirolus has ſpoken only of Alciat's father's buſineſs, he ſeems not to have been of Claudius Minos's opinion.

(1) Panzir. de claris Legum Interpret. lib. 2. c. 169. p. 353.
(2) Minos, in Vita Andreæ Alciati, Ghilini, Lorenzo Craſſo, Paul Freher, Bullart, &c. make him deſcend from an ancient and noble family.

[B] He applied himſelf to the bar in the city of Milan, till he was called . . . by the Univerſity of Avignon.] Here I carefully avoid adopting Panzirolus's relation. If I did adopt it, I muſt affirm that Alciat, having been made Doctor in Civil and Canon Law, in 1517, at a little above twenty two years of age, taught firſt at Pavia, and afterwards at Avignon: Primum itaque Ticini profeſſus, poſtea Avenioni docuit (3). If I ſhould ſay that, I ſhould give Alciat himſelf the lie, who, in an Oration that he made at Pavia, declares, that when he obtained ſix hundred crowns pay at Avignon, he had never yet entred the chair: Avenioni cum nunquam ad eam diem cathedram aſcendiſſem ſtipendium ſexcentorum mererer (4). Panzirolus's account is to be ſuſpected of falſhood on other accounts; he ſhews an extreme negligence: it appears there that Alciat was not quite 23 years old in 1517; and yet his epitaph related by Panzirolus three pages afterwards teſtifies that he was near 59 years old in January, 1550: then he muſt

(3) Panzir. de claris Leg. Interpret. p. 353.

(4) See the Comments on his Emblems, p. 612 of the Padua edition in 1661, in 4°.

Univerſity of Bourges. He prevailed with him to ſettle there in 1529 [C], and the next year he doubled his penſion, which before was 600 crowns. Alciat was Profeſſor five years at Bourges, and acquired much glory there, but he made uſe of a ſtratagem to obtain an augmentation of his ſalary [D]. He mixed much polite learning in the explication of the Laws, muſt be 25 in 1517. What Panzirolus affirms, that Alciat publiſhed his Paradoxes and his Diſpunctiones, about the year 1517, cannot be cleared up by Claudius Minos; for never was any chaos of a book more abſurd than the place where this laſt writer has ſpoken of the edition of Alciat's Paradoxes. Duodecim poſt annos, ſays he (5), cum civilis & pontificii Juris profeſſoriis inſignibus donatus eſſet, Paradoxa & Diſpunctiones in publicum emiſit, opus, ut ipſe dicit, elaboratum horis ſucciſivis, & à candidato adhuc & tirone. i. e. "After twelve years, when "he had obtained the honour of the Profeſſorſhip "of Civil and Canon Law, he publiſhed his Para- "doxes and Diſpunctiones, a work, as he ſays, per- "formed at leiſure hours, and by one who was but "a Candidate and a Student." One cannot comprehend to what the term twelve refers; for all that goes before it is the relation of Alciat's different ſtations, and his manner of teaching the Law. If one could underſtand by theſe words of Minos, that Alciat publiſhed his Paradoxes twelve years after his promotion to the Doctorſhip, the whole chaos would ſoon be diſſipated; but then what would become of Panzirolus, who places the edition of this book about the time of his taking the Degree of Doctor, that is, in 1517? What would become of Tiraqueau, who affirms, that "Alciat compoſed a conſiderable work before he was "20 years old (6)? It is that which we have under "the title of Paradoxes du Dröit Civil, which he "divided into ſix books, and dedicated to the Chan- "celier du Prat, being at Bourges, in 1529, twelve "years after having publiſhed it in his own country, "when he received the Doctor's cap; but ſeventeen "or eighteen years after he had compoſed it (7)." The work which I quote ſhews me, that Alciat's firſt Eſſay was the explication and correction of the Greek terms that are found in the Digeſt; that this book appeared firſt in Italy, and ſome years afterwards at Strasburg, in 1515. I have read (8), that the firſt Dedication that Alciat made of his works was in the year 1513, and that it is that of the three laſt books of the Code. It is very certain, that he publiſhed his Paradoxes, dedicated to the Chancellor Antoine du Prat, about the year 1517 (9). He publiſhed his Diſpunctiones about the ſame time, dedicated to John de Selve, Preſident of the Senate of Milan, and his Prætermiſſa, dedicated to James de Minut, Counſellor in the ſame Senate, and formerly Profeſſor of Law at Orleans. He was Profeſſor at Avignon about the year 1521; for in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to his Treatiſe De Verborum Significatione, dated at Bourges the firſt of May, 1529, he ſays that he had dictated to his Scholars for eight years.

I have juſt now learnt that Budé, in a Letter written to Chriſtopher Longueil, in the month of February 1520 (10), has made mention of a viſit that Alciat made him ſome time before at Avignon. It is Mr. de la Monnoie that has communicated this particular to me. I add that they have publiſhed at Utrecht ſome Letters of our Alciat, which teſtify that he was Profeſſor of Law at Avignon about the year 1518 (11); that his ſalary amounted to five hundred crowns, and that he had ſeven hundred auditors. Two years after, he wrote that they gave him ſix hundred crowns, and ſome other gratifications; and that his auditory was compoſed of above eight hundred perſons, amongſt whom might be counted Prelates, Abbots and Counts (12). He quitted this Profeſſion and returned to Milan, about the end of October 1522. Among many other things that engaged him to this retreat, the principal was, that they did not pay him his ſalary quick enough, the city of Avignon having run in debt, by means of a contagious diſtemper: beſides he was given to underſtand, that if the plague ſhould return, he muſt conſent to a diminution of his ſalary. He rejected this propoſal (13). He applied himſelf to the bar in his own country, and found that employment more profitable than he expected (14). He ſtaid in Italy till he had accepted of the Profeſſorſhip that was offered him in the univerſity of Bourges (15).

[C] Francis I. prevailed with him to ſettle at Bourges &c. in 1529.] I chuſe rather to follow Minos and Mr. Catherinot (16), than Panzirolus. This laſt anticipates this vocation a year. Deinde, anno 1528 Bituriges quo magna ſtudioſorum multitudo ad ejus famam confluxit, amplo 1200 aureorum ſtipendio à Rege Franciſco eſt conductus (17). i. e. "Afterwards, in 1528, he was "retained with a large ſtipend of 1200 crowns, by "King Francis, to teach at Bourges, whither his "fame drew a great multitude of Students." I do not object to Panzirolus, that the penſion was at firſt no more than eighteen hundred francs, and that doubling it the year after brought it to the ſum that he has expreſſed: I have greater inaccuracies to tax him with. He ſays, I. that Alciat could live but a few years in France, becauſe Franciſcus Maria Duke of Milan ordered him to return, and threatned the confiſcation of all his eſtate, in caſe of diſobedience; II, that Alciat being returned home, taught ſome years at Pavia, till he went to Bologna on account of the wars in 1532. It is certain that Alciat tarried five years at Bourges, as appears by the verſes he made when he left it.

Urbs Biturix, invitus amans te deſero amantem,
Quinque per æſtates terra habitate mihi (18).

"Dear Bourges, thee unwilling I forſake,
"Where I five ſummers did my dwelling make.

Since then, according to Panzirolus, he had been called to the chair in 1528, he muſt not have quitted it before 1533. How then could he have taught ſome years at Pavia, after his going from Bourges, and go afterwards to Bologna, in 1532? His Diſſertation on Duelling, dedicated to Francis I, is dated from Avignon, March 1ſt, 1529. The Preface to his Paradoxes is dated from Bourges, Auguſt 24th, 1529. This is deciſive againſt Panzirolus. There remain two falſhoods more to remove: one of Moreri, the other of Paul Freher. The firſt ſays, that the liberality of Francis I drew Alciat to France, where he taught at Avignon: according to the other, Alciat went to teach in this city, at his firſt coming out of the ſchool of Parrhaſius (19). It is an abſurd falſhood, to ſay that the liberality of a King of France brought a Profeſſor into another Prince's country; and who does not know, that after Alciat had quitted the ſchool of Parrhaſius, he went to ſtudy at Pavia and at Bologna, and that he was received Doctor in 1517, and that he printed books before his being Profeſſor at Avignon?

[D] He made uſe of a ſtratagem, to obtain an augmentation of his ſalary.] By his intrigues he procured to himſelf the offer of an employment from the Univerſity of Padua. Voſſius, who informs me of that, was afraid, leſt by deferring an anſwer to thoſe who offered him a Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity of Cambridge he might render himſelf ſuſpected of a like management; for, adds he, moſt people do ſo. Quis rerum mearum ignarus, aliud ſibi perſuaderi poſſit, quam diutinam hanc in reſpondendo ceſſationem inde duntaxat, aut potiſſimum ſaltem, promanare, ut vocatione Anglicana, aliquid mihi apud Batavos lucelli acquiram? ſcimus id pleriſque moris eſſe. Nec notam hanc effugit ſummus Juriſconſultus, Andreas Alciatus, cùm Biturigibus Patavium vocaretur. Et ille quidem callide hoc egerat ipſe, ut vocaretur. Mihi, ut ſcis, ne per ſomnium tale quid cogitanti ſponte apud vos profeſſio oblata eſt. Ille item, immane quantum aucto ſtipendio, apud Biturigas remanſit. Ego, uti hoc nunquam egi, ita nec quicquam acceſſionis (quam quidem ſcio mihi minimè invideres) conſequar remanendo, niſi ſimul acceſſio fiat fortè novi laboris (20). i. e. "Who, that is ignorant of my affairs, can "be perſuaded to believe any thing elſe, than "that my long delay in anſwering, muſt only or "at leaſt chiefly ariſe from a deſire of gaining "ſome little profit to my ſelf amongſt the Dutch,

(5) Minos in vita Alciati.

(6) Tiraq. de Jur. Primigen. p. 158, quoted by Baillet, Enfans celebres, pag. 126, where you will find alſo quoted Ghilini, Theatrum Litterat. pag. 1. and Picinell. Athen. Milan. pag. 26, 28.

(7) Baillet. Enfans celebres, pag. 126.

(8) In the Recherches de Paquier, Book 9. ch. 39. p. 901.

(9) See the Preface of the Paradoxes, before the edition of 1529.

(10) Beginning the year with January.

(11) Epiſt. Gudii, &c. p. 76.

(12) Id. p. 78.

(13) Id. p. 96.

(14) Id. ib.

(15) Id. p. 106.

(16) He ſays in the firſt page of his Calviniſme de Berri, that Alciat read his firſt Lecture at Bourges, on Monday April 19, 1529.

(17) Panzirol. de clar. Leg. Interp. l. 2. c. 169.

(18) Minos, in vita Alciati.

(19) Freheri Viror. illuſt. Theatrum, p. 226.

(20) Voſſius, Epiſt. xlviii. pag. 91, 92. It is dated from Leyden, June 1, 1625.

Law, and happily drove out the barbarity of language, which till then had reigned in the Lectures and Writings of Lawyers. Thuanus highly praiſed him for it, Thuanus, I ſay, who in other reſpects was not well acquainted with his Hiſtory [E]. The Oration that this Profeſſor made ex tempore to Francis the Firſt who came to hear him [F] pleaſed that Monarch very much. Francis Sforza Duke of Milan thought himſelf obliged to bring back to his native country a Man who could ſhine ſo much in it; he compaſſed it at laſt, by giving

" by the call to England? We know that this is a cuſtom with moſt people. Nor did the great Lawyer Andrew Alciat eſcape this cenſure, when he was called from Bourges to Padua. And indeed it was out of cunning, that he procured this call for himſelf. But to me, you know, this Profeſſorſhip amongſt you was voluntarily offered, when I did not ſo much as dream of any ſuch thing. He alſo ſtaid at Bourges, with a large increaſe of ſalary. For my part, as I never did this, ſo I ſhall never obtain any addition (which I know you would not envy me) by ſtaying, unleſs there be an addition alſo of new labour." I ſhould feel ſome remorſes of conſcience, if I did not acknowledge in this place, that Mr. de la Monnoie pointed me out this paſſage of Voſſius. Beſides this, he has acquainted me with the following particulars. " It appears by the XIIth Letter of the II Book of Sadolet's Letters, that Alciat, from the firſt year of his ſtaying at Bourges, had or feigned to have a deſign of going to be Law Profeſſor at Bologna. Two Italian Letters of Bembo, one of the 7th of July 1532, and the other of the 23d of February 1533, ſhew a pretty many particulars concerning the deſign that the Republic of Venice had to draw Alciat to Padua (21). The Profeſſors of this Univerſity were in a dreadful apprehenſion of it: in which number was Franceſchin da Corta, in Latin Franciſcus Curtius, who to prevent the coming of ſuch a Collegue, ſpread a report, that the Duke of Milan, Francis Sforza, falſly called Francis Mary by Panzirolus, had forbidden him under very rigorous puniſhments to quit the chair of Pavia, Sotto pena di confiſcatione." That we may not be in too much confuſion, we muſt ſuppoſe, I fancy, that the 23d of February 1533 of Peter Bembus's Letter, belongs to the year 1534, beginning the year with the month of January; for otherwiſe we cannot comprehend that Alciat had been at Pavia, when this Letter was dated; he who had been Profeſſor five years at Bourges, and had not begun to read there till 1529. In conſulting the Latin Letters of the ſame Bembo, I have found that he wrote to our Alciat the 15th of July 1532, to exhort him to come and take poſſeſſion of the chair, that had been offered him in the Univerſity of Padua. He removes the difficulty that kept him in ſuſpenſe, which was that the Republic of Venice, had not promiſed the ſame ſort of crowns that were demanded (22). Bembo ſhews him, that for ſo ſmall a difference, he ought not to diſengage himſelf from his promiſe, and adds, if you come, I engage you ſhall have in a little time the whole ſum you have mentioned, and other advantages. He wrote to him again the 21ſt of April 1534. Alciat was at that time at Pavia, and did not live there to his mind. Bembo declares to him, that for his own part he approves of his excuſes; but that the Curators of the Univerſity of Padua were not ſatisfied with them, and were perſuaded, that his asking a Law-chair amongſt them was founded only upon a motive of intereſt; namely, that Alciat would not have deſired to be Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Padua, but only to make a handle of that ſtation, to procure a larger ſalary from the Duke of Milan. Utinam tam æqui in te judices Præfecti Ludi Patavini eſſent, neque ſibi perſuaſiſſimum haberent, te propterea profitendi Jus Civile hac in urbe locum poſtulaviſſe, ut eo tradito apud Ducem iſtum tuum uterere ad largius atque uberius ab eo ſtipendium promerendum (23).

Alciat had before made uſe of the ſame art, whilſt he was at Avignon. He employed one of his friends (24) to procure a call for him either to Bologna or Padua. He did not intend to accept theſe calls, but only to make a handle of them to encreaſe his ſalary. We know this by the Letters he wrote at that time, and which were printed at Utrecht, in 1697. Si mille mihi aurei Ferrariæ conſtituerentur, eo non irem: & ſatis non poſſum non mirari, qui tibi in mentem venerit, hanc conventionem cum eo tractare; cum de Patavino aut Bononienſi Gymnaſio ſolum tibi mandata dederim: quamvis nec mihi diſpliceant tua iſta conſilia: non quod in has Academias venturus ſim, ſed quod Avenionenſes, ſi ſciverint ab aliis quoque me ſollicitari, ne eos deſeram, timebunt, & augebunt ſtipendia. Quare cum eis potiſſimum velim hæc diſſemines, quos conjectabis idoneos eſſe; ut in Avenionenſem Academiam literas harum rerum indices dent (25). i. e. " If I was to have a thouſand crowns allowed to me at Ferrara, I would not go thither: and I am much ſurprized that you ſhould take it in your head to make this treaty with them; when I gave you commiſſion only for Padua or Bologna: tho' at the ſame time I am not diſpleaſed with what you have done: not that I would go to thoſe Univerſities, but becauſe they of Avignon, if they know that I am ſollicited by others, will be afraid of my leaving them, and will encreaſe my ſalary. Wherefore I deſire you would treat with thoſe chiefly, whom you ſhall judge likely to make a diſcovery of theſe tranſactions by letters to the Univerſity of Avignon." His friend made cabals at Padua, to get the German Students to deſire the Republic of Venice to get Alciat thither (26). They deſired him to ſave himſelf that trouble, ſeeing he was engaged for two years in the city of Avignon. His Letter is dated the 26th of September 1528. What baſeneſs! what ſordid love of gain is here!

(21) Theſe Letters of Bembo are in page 645 and 654 of the collection intitled Lettere di xiii Huomini illuſtri, printed at Venice in 1560, in 8vo. See alſo the xxixth and xxxth Letters, of the vith book of Bembo.

(22) Cum tu nummos aureos, ſolares petieris illa tibi tantum aureos eſt pollicita. Petrus Bembus, Epiſt. xxix. lib. 6. p. 634.

(23) Bembus, Epiſt. xxx. l. 6. pag. 635.

(24) Franciſcus Calvus.

(25) Epiſt. Gudii, &c. p. 79.

(26) Ibid. p. 78.

[E] Thuanus... was not well acquainted with his Hiſtory.] He ſuppoſes, I, that Alciat, after having taught a long time at Bourges, was Profeſſor at Avignon; it is quite the contrary: II, that Alciat went out of France in his declining age; he was but about forty, more or leſs: III, that Alciat, after his return from Italy, read firſt at Bologna, and afterwards at Ferrara; but he read at Padua before he went to Bologna: IV, that Alciat died in 1551, when his epitaph expreſſes the 12th of January 1550. It is true ſome authors relate, that it gives him 58 years, 8 months, and 4 days. But others ſay, it gives him but 57 years, 8 months and 4 days (27). Thuanus's miſtake is leſs than that of Forſterus, followed by Doujat (28), and than that of Imperialis. This laſt places Alciat's death in 1559 (29). Forſterus places it 1548 (30). But let us obſerve principally the falſity of an Aſtrologer, who having ſaid that Alciat died at Ferrara in 1546, adds that it was of a wound of Saturn and Sol. Andreas Alciatus didicit literas Græcas à Pomponio Gaurico Patavii.... obiit Ferrariæ anno 1546, ex Saturno in oppoſitione Horoſcopi, & Sole Martis tetragono ſauciato. In converſione annua non ſolum directiones Aphetarum, ſed annuæ converſiones penitus commaculatæ interimunt (31). i. e. " Alciat learned Greek of Pomponius Gauricus at Padua.... He died at Ferrara in 1546, of Saturn in oppoſition of the Horroſcope, and wounded by a ſquare of Sol and Mars. In the annual converſion not only the directions of the Aphetæ, but the annual converſions being quite commaculated, kill." This is what Lucas Gauricus ſets under the figure of the nativity of our Lawyer. He places his birth on the 8th of May 1492, at one hour and thirty minutes after Sun riſing. Is not this a fine art? it has rules, according to which a man muſt die ſeveral years before his death. I have read a Letter of Alciat, dated September 3, 1530, wherein he affirms he was but juſt entering his 37th year, or that he was ſcarce 37 years old. Vix trigeſimum & ſeptimum annum attingenti (32). That proves he was born in 1494, or 1493.

VARIATIONS in the age of Alciat.

(27) Ghilini, Teatro de Letterati, Parte I. pag. 11.

(28) Doujat, Prænot. Canon. p. 619.

(29) Imper. in Muſæo Hiſtor. p. 52.

(30) Forſteri Hiſtor. Juris Civil. lib. 3. c. 41. p. 542.

(31) Lucas Gauricus in Schematib. fol. 73.

(32) Epiſt. Gudii, &c. p. 106.

[F] He made an ex tempore Oration to Francis I, who came to hear him.] Minos relates this: Panzirolus ſays nothing of it; but, inſtead of that, he affirms that the Dauphin having been at one of Alciat's Lectures, made him a preſent of a medal, worth four hundred crowns. It was that which giving him, beſides a great ſalary, the dignity of Senator. Alciat then went to teach the Law at Pavia, but he went ſoon after to the Univerſity of Bologna (g), and ſtaid there four years. Then he returned to Pavia, from whence he went to Ferrara (h), being drawn thither by the Duke Hercules d'Eſte, who was endeavouring to make his Univerſity famous. It returned to its ſplendor under a Profeſſor that was ſo much followed, but at the end of four years Alciat left it and returned to Pavia, where at laſt he found the true remedy for his inconſtant humour [G], I mean death, on the twelfth of January 1550 (i), he was not full fifty eight years old: Paul III gave him an honourable reception as he paſſed by Ferrara, and offered him a promotion in the Eccleſiaſtick dignities. Alciat was contented with that of Prothonatory, and would not renounce the profeſſion of the Law [H]. The Emperor created him a Count Palatine and a Senator; Philip King of Spain (α) as he paſſed by Pavia, (g) He made his inaugural Oration there the 3d of Nov. 1537.

(h) He made his inaugural Oration there in 1543.

(i) Ex Panziroli de claris Leg. Interpret. lib. 2. cap. 169. See the note [E] at the end, for the time of his death.

the inhabitants had given to the Dauphin. I have already ſaid on other occaſions, that when a fact of this kind is variouſly related by authors, or is not mention'd by the greateſt part of thoſe who make a perſon's encomium, it deſerves to be accounted very doubtful. However we muſt except this from that rule; for we find amongſt Alciat's works (33) the Diſcourſe that he made when Francis I was preſent at one of his Lectures.

(33) In the 4th Vol. p. 870, of the Francfort ed. in 1617.

[G] The true remedy for his inconſtant humour.] If I had been willing to take advantage of all I have met with in authors concerning the different migrations of Alciat, I might have made him appear ſtill more inconſtant than he was; but I made a conſcience of laying any more to his charge. It is ſufficient that he went from Avignon to Bourges, from Bourges to Pavia, from Pavia to Bologna, from Bologna to Pavia, from Pavia to Ferrara, from Ferrara to Pavia; and all this before he was 60 years of age. Thevet is ſo confuſed in what he ſays of this learned Lawyer, that there is none of his readers, but muſt infer that Alciat returned to France, after the Duke of Milan had drawn him from Bourges. We have ſeen that Panzirolus ſends him from Pavia to Avignon. Moreri ſends him from Bourges to Orleans, and from Orleans to Padua. Mr. Teiſſier makes him Profeſſor at Milan (34). He quotes Pâquier, in the xxixth chapter of the ixth book of his Recherches: he ſhould have quoted the xxxixth chapter; but even there we find nothing of Milan. Theſe are Pâquier's words. I heard three or four of Alciat's Lectures in the city of Pavia. Going from thence to the city of Bologna, where Marianus Socinus, the nephew of Bartholomæus read, I found all the Italian Students ſet a greater value on him than on the other. Even thoſe who pleaded, to make ſure of their cauſes, ſought more after Socinus, on this ſole conſideration (ſaid they) that he had never loſt any time in the ſtudy of Humanity, as Alciat had. Mr. Teiſſier, quoting this paſſage, ſays that Bartholomæus Socinus taught Law at Bologna, at the ſame time that Alciat was Profeſſor at Milan. Theſe two facts are not in Paſquier. If I had had a mind to heap all this together, what a weather-cock ſhould I have made of our inconſtant Profeſſor? but I ſhould have been a thouſand times more to blame than the authors of theſe lies, if I had made uſe of them to his prejudice. He was not ignorant of his being blamed for all theſe frequent migrations from one univerſity to another: he would juſtify himſelf this way among many others; that no one is offended with the Sun's running over the whole globe, to animate all things with his heat and rays: he added, that when we praiſe the fixt Stars, we do not intend to condemn the Planets (35). There was an intolerable vanity in ſuch compariſons: it was looking on himſelf as a ſource of light, that was ſucceſſively to run through the whole commonwealth of learning; that ſo by his preſence the darkneſs of barbarity might be driven from all places where it had a mind to entrench itſelf. But let us admit of his compariſon, and tell him that he ought, like the Sun of Copernicus, keep in his own centre, and illuminate all thoſe that approached him. It is much more glorious to draw a great number of Scholars to the place of one's abode, as was done by Abelard the Philoſopher (36), than to tranſport one's ſelf to cities, where there are abundance of Scholars. And, without doubt, if the love of glory was by itſelf alone in a ſoul, if it was not mixed with a love of profit, or with a changeableneſs of humour, that makes one preſently diſreliſh the ſame things, we ſhould not ſee ſo many infected with Alciat's diſeaſe. The proſpect of true glory would inſpire a man with a reſolution, not to go and look for great theatres; but to convert that where he finds himſelf placed, how little ſoever it may be, into a great one; he would recollect the anſwer of Ageſilaus. He was ſeated one day of ceremony in a low place: Εὖγε, ſays he, δείξω γὰρ ὅτι οὐχ' οἱ τόποι τὺς ἄνδρας ἐντίμους, ἀλλ' οἱ ἄνδρες τὺς τόπους ἐπιδοξάζουσι (37). i. e. "It is very well, for I ſhall "ſhew that it is not the place that makes the man "honourable, but the man that ſets off the place." One may ſee under this conſideration, that it is much more noble to do a thing freely, than for wages, and ſo the nearer we approach to a free gift, that is, to a profeſſion without wages, the nearer we approach to the great and the noble; whereas we depart from it, and approach to a low and mercenary ſpirit, in proportion to the augmentation of wages which we extort. It is reducing the profeſſion of the ſciences to a level with the moſt mechanic arts. A ſhoemaker or a hatter, who makes one pay more for his work than another, gets by that means the reputation of a good workman. And when you pretend, that if you have a greater penſion for what you deliver from a chair, that you are a greater Preacher or a more learned Profeſſor, do not you judge of your trade, as one would of that of a ſhoemaker or a hatter? This is the ready way to run down the ſciences, and bring contempt on thoſe that profeſs them; for a falſe taſte of glory joined with avarice is uſually the cauſe of the fault that is cenſured in Alciat: I mean the deſire of running haſtily the round of the univerſities, of which I have ſpoken already in another place (38). It is certainly putting one's learning up to auction, and ſhewing the Public that we will give our ſelves up to the beſt bidder.

A REFLEXION on the humour of running from chair to chair in ſome Teachers.

(37) Plutarch. in Apophth. Laconicis, init. pag. 208.

(38) In the note [A] of the Article of (FRANCIS) ACCARISI.

[H] He would not renounce the profeſſion of the Law.] He rejoices on this account in a Letter that he wrote to Paulus Jovius, whom Pope Paul III had a long time amuſed with fallacious promiſes. I am very glad, ſays he, that I did not ſuffer myſelf to be deceived by this Pope, who, under the promiſe of a great recompence, would have drawn me to Rome. And then ſets forth the ſolid advantages of his profeſſion, and oppoſes them to the imaginary hopes of a Cardinalſhip. Mihi gratulor, quod ab eo, (inveterati aſtus ſene Principe) me decipi non ſum paſſus, quum me, uti ſcis, magnis propoſitis præmiis Ticino, Ferraria atque Bononia, in urbem accerſeret. Tum enim ex jure meo, magis cautus fui, quam tu ex ſapientiæ præceptis prudens philoſophus. Cur enim pro inani aut incerta ſpe purpuræ hos tantum primi ſuggeſtus honores relinquerem, opimis præſertim firmatos ſtipendiis? Cur has tantas contemnerem circumfuſæ juventutis ſalutationes? Et hanc denique tot conſultoribus januam pulſantibus, exiſtimationem magno lucro, & non obſcura cum laude quæſitam, inepte ſtulteque deſererem (39)? Obſerve by the way, that this confutes thoſe who ſay he refuſed the Cardinal's hat, which the Pope offered him (40). This ſtory is an hyperbole, the favourite figure of a vaſt many people. All that is true in this affair had been ſaid, if they had contented themſelves with affirming, that the Pope, to ſucceed the better in drawing Alciat to Rome, gave him to underſtand that it would be the means of opening himſelf a way to the ſacred College. Such a diſcourſe is very far from offering him a Cardinal's hat.

(39) Alciat. Epiſtol. ad Paulum Jovium. It is at the beginning of the firſt volume of Paulus Jovius's Hiſtories, and dated from Pavia the 7th of Oct. 1549.

(40) Teiſſier, Elog. tom. 2. p. 394, edit. 1683, and tom. 1. pag. 34, ed. 1696.

§. (α) Alciat, to whom Philip preſented a golden chain, as they would have it, died in 1550. Now this Prince came to the crown only by the abdication of the Emperor his father, in 1556. If Mr.

(34) Teiſſier, Eloges des Hommes illuſt. tom. 2. p. 395. Geneva edition in 1683.

(35) See the Oration that he made at Ferrara in 1543, Oper. tom. 4. p. 862. and Claude Minos, in his Life.

(36) See the note [A] of the article FOULQUES.

Pavia, preſented him with a gold chain. It is thought that the diſtemper of which he died was occaſioned by too much eating (k); for he not only had the vice of being very covetous, but alſo of being a great eater [I]. He was a fat man and very tall (l). After his mother's death, who died in a very advanced age, he deſigned to employ his wealth in the foundation of a College; but having received an affront from ſome inſolent ſcholars, he laid that deſign aſide, and choſe for his heir FRANCIS ALCIAT, a very hopeful young man that he had brought up (m), though they were very diſtant relations (n). This Francis Alciat ſucceeded Andrew in his eſtate and chair, and made himſelf famous at Pavia by his Law Lectures. Cardinal Barromeo, who had been his diſciple, ſent for him to Rome and brought him into ſuch favour with Pius IV, that he got him a Biſhoprick, the Office of Datary or Chancellor of Rome, and a Cardinal's Hat (o): There are ſome treatiſes of Law of this Cardinal Alciat who died at Rome in April 1580, being a little above fifty years old. See Nicius Erythreus in the xlviith chapter of the ſecond Pinacotheca. Thoſe who ſay that our Andrew paſſed his life in celibacy are miſtaken [K]. He ſet up very ſoon for an Author, as I have obſerved in the note [B]. He has publiſhed a pretty many Law Books, and ſome Notes upon Tacitus, whoſe Latin ſeemed to him extreamly harſh (L]. Muret railed very much againſt this delicacy in one of his harangues (p). Alciat was not at all affected by it, for he was already dead: But other Criticks, and particularly Floridus Sabinus, who attacked him whilſt he was alive, made him throughly feel their teeth and nails (q). His Emblems have been very much eſteemed, and have been thought by three or four learned men worthy to be adorned with their Commentaries [M]. They have praiſed his Poetry too much, as Mr. Baillet has wittilly obſerved in the third Volume of his Judgments on the Poets, Jugemens ſur les poëtes, num. 1286.

(k) Ex cibo quem largiorem ſumere conſueverat morbum contraxit. Id. ib.

(l) Vir fuit corpulentus, proceræ ſtaturæ. Panzir. de claris Legum Interpretibus, l. 2. c. 169. Mr. Teiſſier, tom. 2. p. 394 of his Elogies, gives him however a middling ſtature.

(m) It is not true then, that there was at Naples in 1686, a grandſon of the great Alciat. See Dr. Burnet's Travels, p. 339, of the Rotterdam edition in 1688. He muſt beſides have been very old.

(n) Moreri makes them uncle and nephew.

(o) Panzir. de claris Leg. Interpret. lib. 2. c. 169.

(p) It is the xviith of the 2d volume. See alſo Bodini, Meth. Hiſtor. c. 4. pag. 85.

(q) Cl. Minos, in vita Alciati.

He

Bayle had made this reflexion, he would have ſaid Prince and not King of Spain. However, this little inadvertency is properly Panzirolus's, whom Mr. Bayle does but copy in this place. REM. CRIT.

[I] He was not only covetous, but alſo a great eater.] Panzirolus expreſſes himſelf thus; Avarior habitus eſt, & cibi avidior. He adds, that Alciat having received three hundred crowns for an opinion, and knowing that more had been given to Marianus Socinus for the ſame affair, cried out, that they had found a better Merchant, but not a better Lawyer. Take this by the way for a confirmation of what has been quoted from Pâquier (41). We are going to learn ſome more news of Alciat's covetouſneſs. "He is "accuſed of two articles, one that his method ſa- "voured of I know not what doctoral oſtentation... "The other, that avarice had ſuch power over him, "that his tongue, his pen, and his learning ſeemed "to be at the command of the beſt bidder: And at "the ſame time, I remember that in the Parerga, "ſpeaking of Jaſon, he approves of preaching for "money, commending him, becauſe his ſalary as "a Teacher had been augmented. Of which "Alciat knew very well how to make his ad- "vantage, having drawn from the Univerſity of "Bourges twelve hundred crowns appointment, "beſides his licenſes and Doctor's fees, which he "made full treble, following the example of Doc- "tor Jaſon, who was the firſt, that for the degrees and "honours which he conferred on Lawyers, took fifty "and a hundred crowns, whereas before they uſed "to have them for three or four. It is owing to him, "ſays he, that Decius, Ruinus, and the other Doc- "tors are able to enrich themſelves with theſe fees, "that the ſtudents pay, without being liable to be "blamed. From thence it is not difficult to gather, "that he pleads Jaſon's example, againſt thoſe who "found fault with him for being ſo fond of money, "that a man, in order to have the dignity of Doctor, "Batchelor, or Licentiate conferred upon him, muſt "part with abundance of crowns. What makes me "perſiſt the more in this opinion, is, that in the laſt "chapter of the fifth book of his Parerga, reſum- "ing his ſubject of Jaſon, he complains of the "Princes and Lords, who give ſuch ſmall ſalaries to "learned and underſtanding men, whereas in former "times, particularly in the time of Veſpaſian, (ac- "cording to the relation of Suetonius) that Empe- "ror cauſed to be delivered out of his publick trea- "ſury fifteen hundred crowns to Greek and Latin "Orators and Rhetoricians; he adds at the ſame time "the authority of Eumenius the Rhetorician, who "exerciſed his vocation at Authun, to which, by "the order of the Emperors Diocleſian and Maxi- "mian, a penſion was allowed of fifteen thou- "ſand crowns a year." Theſe are Thevet's words, in the 279th page of the ſeventh Tome of the Hiſtory of Illuſtrious Men.

(41) At the beginning of the note [G], after the quot. (32).

[K] Thoſe who ſay that he paſſed his life in Celibacy, are miſtaken.] See how he ſpeaks in a letter that he wrote to his friend Francis Calvus, after he had withdrawn himſelf from Milan to Avignon. Vice verſa, & ego te rerum mearum admoneo; multis affectum me ærumnis patria exceſſiſſe, Uxorem vivam & ſoſpitem ibi reliquiſſe; cæteros fato functos (42), fortunis pleriſque amiſſis, virtuti ſolum innixum non omnino concidiſſe. Libros & Bibliothecam omnem conſervaſſe. In præſentia Jus Civile Avenione profiteor (43) That is, "On the other hand, I alſo will give "you an account of my affairs; that I went out of "my country afflicted with many troubles; that I "left a wife there alive and ſafe; that the reſt were "dead, and that having loſt all my eſtate, but "confiding in my virtue, I am not entirely o- "verwhelmed." Let us correct then theſe words of Mr. Teiſſier, He paſſed his life in celibacy (44).

(42) He ſays however, in a letter written in 1522, that his mother and uncle were alive, Epiſtolæ Gudii, &c. p. 96.

(43) Ib. p. 75.

(44) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Elog. tom. 1. p. 34.

[L] The Latin of Tacitus ſeemed to him extremely harſh.] It is in a Letter to Paulus Jovius, that this complaint dropped from him: Alciatus non dubitat affirmare dictionem ejus præ illa Pauli Jovii eſſe ſenticeta (45). i. e. "Alciat makes no difficulty to af- "firm that his ſtyle is a mere bramble in compariſon "of that of Paulus Jovius." On another occaſion, he had ſpoken quite otherwiſe: Certat in Tacito ſermonis gravitas cum elegantia (46). i. e. "In Tacitus "there is a gravity mixt with great elegance." I refer the diſcuſſion of this to the article of TACITUS.

(45) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. 1. p. 160.

(46) Vide Canonherii Diſc. Politic. in Tacit. p. 3.

[M] His Emblems have been very much eſteemed.... and adorned with ſeveral Commentaries.] Scaliger the father, who was not prodigal of praiſes, as every one knows, ſpeaks thus of this work: Alciati præter Emblemata nihil mihi videre contigit. Ea vero talia ſunt, ut cum quovis ingenio certare poſſint. Dulcia ſunt, pura ſunt, elegantia ſunt; ſed non ſine nervis: ſententiæ verò tales, ut etiam ad uſus civilis vitæ conferant (47). i. e. "I have not happened to ſee any "thing of Alciat, except his Emblems. And they are "ſuch as may be compared with any work of genius. "They are ſweet, they are pure, they are elegant; "but not without ſtrength: and the thoughts are "ſuch as may be of uſe in civil life." Theſe Emblems have been tranſlated into French, Italian and Spaniſh (48). There are at leaſt three French tranſlations of them; that of Bartholomew Aneau, that of John le Fevre, and that of Claudius Minos (49). This laſt did not content himſelf with tranſlating them, but alſo commented on them. One of the moſt learned Profeſſors of Humanity in Spain (50) thought them worthy

(47) Jul. Cæſar Scalig. de Poëtic. lib. 6.

(48) Joh. Matthæus Toſcan. in Pepło Ital. l. 3.

(49) See the Bib. de la Croix du Maine.

(50) Sanctius, Broſenſ.

He is not one of thoſe who have perſiſted in their firſt ſentiments; for we find in his Parerga, which is a work he publiſhed in his latter days, that he retracted many things which the fire of youth had made him utter precipitately, and when his Diſputationes were reprinted in 1529, he gave to underſtand (r) that in retouching that book, he had not pretended to give his approbation to all that he had put in it in his younger years, nor to deprive himſelf of the liberty of changing his opinion. A like remark was made by an Apologiſt of the Emperor Juſtinian (s). They (t) printed at Leyden in 1695 a letter that Andrew Alciat did not intend for the publick; for he made in it too ſtrong a deſcription of the Abuſes of the Monaſtic Life. He wrote this letter to Bernard Mattius, who had been his Collegue, and who of a ſudden, and without conſulting his friends, became a Monk of the order of St. Francis. His imprudence was learnedly and eloquently repreſented to him. This diſcourſe of Alciat was compoſed in four days; they found it in the cabinet of Scriverius (u): it is dated the ſeventh of June 1553 [N].

(r) See the Preface of the book.

(s) Gabriel Trivorius, Obſervat. Apologet. ad Inſcript. Orationis ad Anteceſſores, p. 187. edit. Pariſ. an. 1631.

(t) Mr. Matthæus, Profeſſor of Law at Leyden.

(u) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Mr. Matthæus.

worthy of a comment of his own. Pignorius, a learned Italian, has had the ſame opinion of them: and after all theſe a Profeſſor of Fribourg (51) has publiſhed them with their notes and his own, and has added at the end thoſe of Frederick Morel. This edition is very good; it is a misfortune that one cannot diſtinguiſh in it what belongs to each Commentator: it was printed at Padua, in 1661, in 4to. I do not ſpeak of Sebaſtian Stockhamerus, whoſe labour was not very much eſteemed. Sebaſtianum Stockhamerum vix Commentatoris nomine dignor, quia in ſolâ Epigrammatis reſolutione occupatur, pauciſſimis, iiſque ſatis vulgatis ſententiis & fabulis additis; ad hæc vix mediam Emblematum partem hoc ſuo more explicat (52). i. e. "I ſcarce think Sebaſtian Stockhamer "worthy of the name of a Commentator, becauſe "he is taken up wholly in the explanation of E-"pigrams, with the addition of a few ſentences and "fables, and thoſe very trite; beſides he explains ſcarce "half the Emblems, and that even after his own man-"ner." Neither do I ſpeak of the Jeſuit, who explain'd theſe very Emblems publicly at Paris (53); but I believe the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee the title Bartholomew Aneau (Bartholomæus Anulus) made uſe of; it runs thus; Les Embleſmes d'André Alciat, traduits vers pour vers jouxte la diction Latine, & ordonnez en lieux communs, avec ſommaires, inſcriptions, ſchemes, & briefves expoſitions epimythiques, ſelon l'allegorie naturelle, morale, ou hiſtoriale. i. e. "The Emblems of An-"drew Alciat, tranſlated verſe for verſe according to "the Latin Diction, and diſpoſed in common places, "with ſummaries, inſcriptions, ſchemes, and brief "epimythick expoſitions, according to the natural, "moral or hiſtorical allegory." The editions of this work of Alciat are innumerable: in that of Thuilius, which I make uſe of, there are 212 Emblems; ſo I am ſurprized that Paulus Freherus ſhould affirm that this book contains but 100 Emblems (54).

(51) Joannes Thuilius, Mariæmontanus Tirol. Phil. & Med. D. atque olim in Archid. Friburg. Briſgoiæ Univerſitate Human. Liter. Profeſſor ordinarius.

(52) Thuilius, in Præf. Claudius Minos gives pretty near the ſame teſtimony in his Preface.

(53) Minos, ibid.

(54) Paul. Freher. in Theatro.

[N] His diſcourſe of the Abuſes of the Monaſtick Life is dated the 7th of June 1553.] If this date be right, we muſt reject all the Authors that place Alciat's death on the 12th of January 1550, or 1551, and quote his epitaph (55). But there is a miſtake in dating this diſcourſe; and I am of opinion it was compoſed before the year 1520, and that it is the ſame piece which Alciat was afraid Eraſmus would get printed. Quod ut facias te quoque ipſe oro: nec minus ut de unguibus Eraſmi reglutines Orationem illam meam ad Matthiam Minoritam, cum id quæſo, ne ſi in cinerariorum iſtorum manus inciderit, parata ſint mihi cum eis æterna bella (56). That is, "Which I deſire you alſo to do; and likewiſe to re-"cue out of Eraſmus's claws that oration of mine "to Matthias Minorita, for if it ſhould fall into the "hands of thoſe ſorry fellows, I ſhould be drawn "into an eternal contention with them." It is thus that he wrote to his friend Franciſcus Calvus the 26th of September 1520. There were publiſhed at Utrecht in 1697, ſome letters of the ſame Lawyer, from whence we learn a great many particulars, and eſpecially the praiſes that he gave himſelf with a bluſtering kind of vanity.

(55) See the note [E].

(56) Epiſt. Gudii, &c. p. 80. See alſo p. 81, 82. and Mr. Burman's Preface.

ALCIAT (JOHN PAUL) a Gentleman of Milan, was one of thoſe Italians who forſook their country in the ſixteenth Century to join with the Proteſtant church, and afterwards amuſed themſelves ſo much in refining on the myſtery of the Trinity, that they formed a new party, no leſs odious to the Proteſtants than to the Catholicks. Alciat had born arms: He began his innovations at Geneva, in concert with a Phyſician named Blandrata, and with a Lawyer named Gribaud, to whom Valentine Gentilis aſſociated himſelf (a). The precautions that were taken againſt them, and the ſevere proceedings that were exerciſed againſt this laſt, made the others more timorous, and even obliged them to ſeek another Theatre to act upon (b). They choſe Poland, where Blandrata and Alciat ſowed their hereſies with pretty good ſucceſs. They drew Gentilis [A] to them, who did not fail to go and join them (c). He was under an obligation

(a) See Aretius, in the Hiſtory of the Condemnation of Gentilis.

(b) Beza in vita Calvini.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] They drew Gentilis to them.] I have followed Aretius, and Theodorus Beza, who agree in relating that Gentilis did not go into Poland till after Blandrata and Alciat had ſpread their opinions there (1); I forſake the author of the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum, who affirms that Alciat and Gentilis went together into Poland, about the year 1562 (2). Staniſlaus Lubienietzki has ſaid pretty near the ſame thing. Valentius iſte, & Paulus Alciatus Pedemontanus, cum Genevæ ob odia Calvini aterrima ſubſiſtere non poſſent, anno 1563 in Poloniam venerant (3). i. e. "That "Valentine, and that Paul Alciat of Piedmont, when "they could ſtay no longer at Geneva, becauſe of "the bitter hatred of Calvin, came to Poland in "1563." But theſe authors are not exact enough, to deſerve the preference. Hornius deſerves it leſs, he, who has ſaid that George Blandrata and Paul Alciat, both Phyſicians, (he is miſtaken with regard to Alciat) eſcaped out of Switzerland into Poland, being terrified by the puniſhment of Servetus and Gentilis. In the ſame page of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, he affirms that they followed the Tritheiſm of Valentine Gentilis (4). But it is certain that Alciat's hereſy was the true Socinianiſm. One cannot better confute Hornius's Chronology, than by a Letter of Peter Martyr, written at Zurich, the 11th of July 1558. He informs Calvin in this Letter, that Gregory the Phyſician had been ſeen, in company with John Paul of Piedmont; that they were exhorted not to break the unity of the Church, and to conform to the Formulary of the Italian Church at Geneva; that this was without effect; and that, by the advice of Bullinger, they were perſuaded to leave the city, which they did; that the Phyſician went into Tranſylvania, and that John Paul withdrew himſelf to Chiavenna. We muſt read in Peter Martyr, not Gregorium Medicum, but Georgium Medicum, who is no other than George Blandrata, as Joannes Paulus Pedemontanus is no other than our Alciat. If Calvin did not ſay expreſly that all

(1) Aretius, in the Hiſtory of the Condemnation of Gentilis. See alſo the 81ſt Letter of Beza.

(2) Bib. Antitrinit. p. 26, 27.

(3) Lubieniec, Hiſt. Reformat. Polon. p. 107.

(4) Theſe faults are found in the edition of 1687, augmented with the notes and the continuation of Mr. Leydecker.

tion to Alciat, for at his requeſt the Bailiff of Gex had releaſed him out of priſon [B]. They pretend that from Poland they went to Moravia. We ſhall ſpeak of the fate of Gentilis in its proper place. As for Alciat he retired to Dantzick, and died there in the ſentiments of Socinus [C], for it is not true that he turned Mahometan [D]. He had written two letters to Gregory Pauli, one in 1564, the other in 1565, dated from Huſterilts, in which he maintained that Jeſus Chriſt did not begin to exiſt before he was all theſe heterodox Italians, and particularly John Paul Alciat, ſigned the Formulary; one would be tempted to think, that thoſe of whom Peter Martyr ſpeaks refuſed to ſubſcribe it. However that be, they had left Geneva, ſoon after the ſigning; for it was done the 10th of May 1558, and they were at Zurich the 11th of July following. Gentilis was not put to death till 1566. He had left Geneva ſome months after the ſigning, and withdrew to the country of Gex, where he conferred with Alciat: which ſhews, either that Alciat did not go to Chiavenna, when he went from Zurich; or that he ſtaid there but a little while. See the article BLANDRATA, where I endeavour to clear the order of time with regard to thoſe people.

[B] At his requeſt the Bailiff of Gex had releaſed Gentilis out of priſon (5).] It is not known whether requeſting was ſufficient. Sandius inſinuates that money was to be given: In oppido nomine Gajum in carcerem conjicitur (Gentilis,) unde cum evadere non poſſet, quod eſſet pauper, à ſocio ſuo Paulo Alciato redimitur, quem utpote locupletem, præterea vero nobili gente ortum, immo & militem, ſimili modo non audebant aggredi (6). i. e. "Gentilis was caſt into "priſon in a town called Gex, whence he could "not be releaſed, being poor, but was redeemed by his companion Paul Alciat, who was rich, "deſcended of a noble family, and alſo a ſoldier "for which reaſon they durſt not attempt to treat "him after the ſame manner."

(5) Hiſtor. Reformat. Polon. pag. 107; Bibliot. Antitrinitar. p. 28.

(6) Bibliot. Antitrinit. p. 26.

[C] He died at Dantzick in the ſentiments of Socinus.] One cannot reaſonably doubt of this, after the proofs that Martin Ruarus (7) has given of it. He ſays that this man, having lived ſome years at Dantzick, like a good Chriſtian, at his death recommended his ſoul to Jeſus Chriſt his Saviour: and afterwards adds (8), "Catherine Weimera my wife's "grandmother, who knew him familiarly, and was "preſent at his death, has often told this to David Werner Buttel her husband, who is ſtill alive, and it is "but three years ſince ſhe died. My mother-in-"law told me yeſterday that ſhe had often ſeen Alciat's widow in this city, who ſurvived her husband ſome years." He adds occaſionally, that he had heard from Andrew Woidovius, that Alciat, being in danger of being killed at Cracow, by ſome Scholars, becauſe he paſſed for an Arian, evaded their ill deſigns, by telling them that he believed in Jeſus Chriſt the Son of the living God and of Mary: this name of Mary ſaved him. Ridiculo ſchemate evaſiſſe cum ſe non Arianum ſed Marianum eſſe diceret, quod cum illi quid ſibi vellet quærerent reſpondiſſe, credere ſe Jeſum Chriſtum Dei vivi & Mariæ filium. Illi non minore ſtupore quam malitia obſeſſi, audito venerando Mariæ nomine incolumem dimiſerunt. i. e. "He eſcaped by a comical contrivance, "ſaying he was not an Arian but a Marian, and when "they asked what that meant, he anſwered, that he "believed in Jeſus Chriſt the Son of the living God "and of Mary. They being as ſtupid as malicious, "as ſoon as they heard the venerable name of "Mary, diſmiſſed him." Here was a caſe where the moſt extravagant devotees of the holy Virgin found it true, That one is ſometimes ſaved more readily by invoking the name of Mary, than by invoking the name of Jeſus (9).

(7) Read it thus, and not Martin Bucerus, in the Bibliotb Antitrinitar. p 27.

(8) In a letter written to Calovius, and dated from Dantzick a.d. III. non. Ap. 1640. It is the xlviith of the firſt Century of Ruarus's Letters.

(9) Velocior eſt nonnunquam ſalus invocato nomine Mariæ, quam invocato nomine Jeſu. S. Anſelmus de Excellentia Virginis, c. 6.

[D] It is not true that he turned Mahometan.] We have juſt given the proofs of it, and, upon that, who can forbear ſaying that it were to be wiſhed, that thoſe who maintain the truth were not ſubject to ſome faults, that reign eternally among the perſecutors of orthodoxy? An exceſſive credulity, a fund of ill-apply'd hatred, I mean a hatred that extends to the perſon of the heretick, no leſs than to the hereſy itſelf, make us ſwallow all the ſtories that are told to the diſadvantage of an hereſiarch. Let there but be a report that he has killed himſelf, that the Devil carried him away, that he died mad and blaſpheming, it is believed without ſtaying for its being confirmed; people write it to all their friends, wherever they have a correſpondence, and what is worſe they print it; and thence a lie is ſown, which falls into ſuch good ground, that it is never loſt. The firſt that ſpreads it is not long the only one that does it: they continue publiſhing it from book to book, as a grand motive of zeal, or as an object of reflexions.

The Proteſtants have been no leſs deceived than the Catholics in the pretended Mahometiſm of John Paul Alciat. And one has been no leſs careful to report it than the other.

Iliacos intra muros peccatur & extra (10).
That is,
"Within and without the walls of Troy they ſin.

(10) Horat. Ep. 2. l. 1. ver. 16.

Spondæus has inſerted it in his Eccleſiaſtical Annals, and it is from thence no doubt that F. Maimbourg copied it (11), tho' he does not quote this author as Moreri quotes him. The famous Calovius had reported it: Ruarus wrote to him what has been ſaid above. His Letter had been printed two years, when there was a new edition made of Micrœlius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory: however he that has taken the pains to add a great many things to it, has not taken out the lie for which Calovius had been cenſured. I do not know whether Ruarus has rightly diſcovered the origin of this ſtory. He thinks a Letter of Theodorus Beza (12) has been the foundation of it. This Letter relates that Valentine Gentilis, being asked about his companion Alciat, had anſwered, He is turned Mahometan, and I have not had any correſpondence with him a long time. The two conjectures of Ruarus are not amiſs: I, Gentilis thought to oblige by this the Judges that proſecuted him. We learn every day (13) from our Gazettes ſomething like this, that deſerters tell a thouſand pieces of news to tickle thoſe who ask them queſtions. II, Gentilis who acknowledged a very ſingular generation or filiation in our Lord, was ſoon diſpoſed to place the Samoſatenians and Mahometans in the ſame category. Two Sectaries that fall out, hate one another at the beginning, more than they do the ſtock from which they have ſeparated themſelves: ſo that Gentilis was a bad witneſs with regard to Alciat, after the violent diſputes that had broke their union in Poland. Voetius (14), and Lætus (15) have quoted only this Letter of Theodorus Beza, when they ſaid that Alciat turned Mahometan. Hornius has quoted nobody, tho' he advances the ſame thing with the utmoſt confidence. Alciatus, ſays he (16), tranſiit ad Turcas, ac Muhamediſmum amplexus, inter eos vitam finit. Hoornbeek alſo cites no voucher in the Apparatus of his diſputes with the Socinians, where he ſays two or three times that Alciat embraced Mahometiſm. Dignam pœnam dedit quando eum Deus ad Muhamedanos prolabi ſivit; nempe ne alibi quam inter infideles iſtos nomen ſuum ultra profiteretur (17). i. e. "God inflicted an adequate puniſhment on him, "when he ſuffered him to ſlide away to the Ma-"hometans; that he might profeſs his name no "where elſe but amongſt thoſe Infidels." We might ſuſpect that this ſtory had not Theodorus Beza's Letter for its only foundation, if we conſidered but curſorily the Hiſtory of the Poliſh Reformation; for when we ſee there that the author, having ſpoken of one Adam Neuſſerus (18), who found himſelf at laſt forced to fly to Conſtantinople, adds that Alciat had a like fate, we cannot hardly forbear thinking the thing is true, when ſuch a Hiſtorian relates it. But when we examine this author's words a little more cloſely, we find that his teſtimony comes to nothing. See how he ſpeaks in the 200th page. Exacto trimeſtri neceſſe habebat (Adamus Neuſſerus) periculo ſibi ab exploratoribus Cæſaris imminente ſolum vertere, & Conſtantinopolim (quam & Alciati fortunam fuiſſe ſupra vidimus, adeo Turcæ ante Chriſtianos æquita-

(11) Maimbourg, Hiſtoire de l'Ariani/me, tom. 3. p. 344 of the Dutch edition.

(12) It is the lxxxi.

(13) This was writ in 1693.

(14) Voet. Diſputat. tom. 3. p. 781.

(15) Joh. Lætus, Compend. Hiſt. Univ. p. 436.

(16) Hornius Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 351. edit. an. 1687.

(17) Hoornb. Apparatus, pag. 29; vide etiam p. 23.

(18) It is printed Neuſnerus; but this book is very full of errors, and eſpecially in proper names.

was born of the holy Virgin (d). Moreri therefore is to be blamed who made him firſt an Arian, and afterwards a Mahometan (e). Perhaps before he retired to Dantzick he had made a tour into Turky, without deſigning to be a renegado, but only to be ſheltered there from perſecutions [E]; and that perhaps has given room to a report which has been ſo current, and is ſtill rife, of his pretended Mahometiſm. Calvin and Beza have ſpoken of him as of a raving mad man [F].

(d) Bibliot. Antitrinit. p. 28.

(e) See his Dictionary, at the word ALCIAT, where it is refuted.

te & humanitate longè ſunt!) confugere. i. e. "At "the end of three months being in danger from "the Emperor's ſpies, he found it neceſſary to "fly to Conſtantinople; which was Alciat's for- "tune alſo, as we ſaw above; ſo far do the Turks "then ſurpaſs the Chriſtians in equity and humani- "ty! Theſe words refer us to a preceding paſſage: I believe it is in page 109. Now if on one ſide we find in that page that ſome have writ that Gentilis turned Mahometan, we find there alſo on the other ſide, that they were his enemies who forged this impoſture. It is without doubt what the Sieur Staniſlaus Lubienietzki meant. One may perceive it through all the errors of the preſs that miſerably diſfigure his book. De Alciato ſcriptum accepi, ſays he (19), eum in Epiſtolis ad Gregorium Pauli anno 1564 & 1565 Huſterlitzii datis diſſuaſiſſe ſententiam quod Chriſtus extiterit antequam ex Mariâ naſceretur, & acerrime dogmati vulgari de Trinitate reſtitiſſe, ita ut Mahometiſmum conſilii in primordio Reformationis ſat ancipiti & arduo ignarus ei prætuliſſe ſcribatur, ſed à Calvino & inventurum ejus æmulis, odio internecino iri eum & alios veritatis amantes flagrantibus (20). i. e. "I have heard it is written of Alciat, that "in his Letters to Gregory Pauli in 1564 and 1565, "dated at Huſteriltz, he diſſuaded him from the opini- "on that Chriſt exiſted before he was born of the Vir- "gin Mary, and that he ſharply oppoſed the common "doctrine of the Trinity, ſo that he is ſaid to have "unadviſedly preferred Mahometiſm before the Re- "formation, in its dubious and difficult beginning; "but that it was invented by Calvin and others like "him, who burned with a deadly hatred againſt him "and other lovers of the truth.

(19) Hiſt. Reformat. Polonicæ, p. 109.

(20) I believe we muſt read, a Calvino eſſe inventum & ejus æmulis, odio internecino in &c.

[E] Perhaps . . . he had made a tour into Turkey . . . to be ſheltered from perſecutions.] This brings Father Abelard to my mind, who was juſt going to ſeek a refuge in the country of the Infidels, againſt the agents or promoters of orthodoxy. He had been alarmed, and was more upon the watch than any other; for every time he heard there would ſoon be an aſſembly of Eccleſiaſtics, he imagined it was to condemn him. Beſides he had experienced the great credit of thoſe agents, and it was not eaſy to eſcape them under Princes of their party. They write to every place; and before their enemy is arrived in a city, the repreſentation of his errors has already put it in a fright, and ſtirred up every ſpirit. There was a time, when thoſe who had the Pope's ear could make the beſt part of Europe uninhabitable to a man, whom they had taken ſtrongly in their heads to repreſent as a heretic; and this poor wretch might apply to them ſome parts of the cxxxixth Pſalm (21). We muſt not be ſurprized then that Peter Abelard had a mind to ſeek reſt in the midſt of Mahometans or of Pagans: He hoped that by paying tribute he might have the liberty of profeſſing Chriſtianity out of the reach of the Odium Theologicum; and he was afraid, that without coming there, he would always be encompaſſed within this ſphere. Theſe are his words: Deus ipſe mihi teſtis eſt quotiens aliquem eccleſiaſticarum perſonarum conventum adunari noveram, hoc in damnationem meam agi credebam. Stupefactus illico quaſi ſupervenientis ictum fulguris expectabam, ut quaſi hæreticus aut profanus in Conciliis traherer aut Synagogis. . . . Sæpe autem (Deus ſcit) in tantam lapſus ſum deſperationem, ut Chriſtianorum finibus exceſſis ad Gentes tranſire diponerem, atque ibi quiete ſub quacumque tributi pactione inter inimicos Chriſti chriſtianè vivere (22). Now as Alciat had yet more to fear from Popery than Abelard, and ſaw no ſecurity in the countries where other Chriſtians were maſters, Tenent Danai qua deficit ignis (23).

That is,
"Where e'er the raging fire has left a ſpace,
"The Grecians enter, and poſſeſs the place.
Dryden.

his whims and his caprice might eaſily ſtir up in him a deſire of trying the toleration of the Turks, make him ſoon ſick of it, and drive him to Dantzick. Let us learn to diſtruſt ſome ſtories, notwitſtanding their being received by conſiderable authors.

(21) Quo ibo a ſpiritu tuo, & quo a facie tua fugiam? . . . . Si ſumpſero pennas meas diluculo & habitavero in extremis maris . . . Illuc tenebit me dextera tua. i. e. "Whither "ſhall I go from "thy Spirit? or "whither ſhall I "flee from thy "preſence? If "I take the "wings of the "morning, and "dwell in the "uttermoſt "parts of the "ſea . . . Even "there ſhall thy "right hand "hold me.

(22) Abælard. Opera, p. 32.

(23) Virgil. Æneid, l. 2. ver. 505.

[F] Calvin and Beza have ſpoken of him as of a raving mad man.] The firſt ſays, that on the day that a Formulary was propoſed to the Italians ſuſpected of heterodoxy, to ſign, Alciat raved after a furious manner: Inter quos princeps fuit Joannes quidam Paulus Alciatus, homo non ſtolidi tantum ac veſani ingenii, ſed plane phreneticus ad rabiem uſque (24). The other ſays he was a whimſical man and quite frantic; Paulus quidam Alciatus, Mediolanenſis, homo jam antea plane phreneticus & vertiginoſus (25).

(24) Calvin. adverſ. Valent. Gentil. p. 659. Tractat. Theolog.

(25) Beza, Ep. lxxxi.

ALCIAT (TERENCE) an Italian Jeſuit, deſcended of the ſame family with Alciat the Lawyer, was born at Rome in the year 1570. He ſtudied the Law five years before he turned Jeſuit; it was in the month of March 1591 that he entered into that Society. The functions he exerciſed there, witneſs that they conſidered him as a man of importance: He was for thirteen years Præfect of the College of Rome; he taught Philoſophy there five years, and Divinity ſeventeen: After that he was Director of Penitence in the Vatican, and Deputy Governor of the Maiſon Profeſſe. He was preſent at the ninth general Congregation of the Jeſuits, as Deputy of the Province of Rome; and when he died of an Apoplexy the 12th of November 1651, he was Sub-Provincial. He was as much conſidered out of the Society; for beſides his being a great while Qualificator of the Congregation of the Holy Office, and Counſellor of the Congregation of Ceremonies, he was choſen by Pope Urban VIII to confute Father Paul. He prepared an edition of the Acts of the Council of Trent, which would have been an apology for that Aſſembly againſt all ſorts of adverſaries, and particularly againſt that formidable Venetian. He had already collected a great many materials for this important and laborious work, when death made him leave this world (a); but although he ſpent many years on this work, he had hardly begun to put his materials in order. Father Sforza Palavicini, who was charged with the ſame deſign, informs us why Father Alciat was ſo ſlow in the execution of it [A]. If Moreri had only caſt

(a) Ex Biblioth. Scriptorum Societatis Jeſu, Nathanaëlis Sotuelli.

[A] Father Alciat, who had undertaken a confutation of F. Paul, was ſlow in the execution of it.] He had impoſed on himſelf a rule of denying nothing to his adverſary, without bringing proofs of his negative; ſo that he employed a good many years in ſearching for memoirs to furniſh him with theſe proofs. Cardinal Palavicini pretends it was a work of ſupererogation; becauſe there are no laws that oblige a man to prove a negative: it lies on the accuſer to prove; and if he does not do it, he deſerves the puniſhment caſt his eyes on the Preface of Cardinal Palavicini, he would not have reckoned the Acts of the Council of Trent amongſt the works of F. Alciat. There ſhould only be reckoned among thoſe works a Sermon on the Paſſion preached before Pope Clement VIII in 1602, and the Life of Peter Fabri, companion of St. Ignatius Loyola. F. Alciat, diſguiſed under the name of Eminius (b) Tacitus, tranſlated it into Italian, from the Latin of Nicholas Orlandino (c). This tranſlation was printed at Rome in 1629. The Latin was printed at Lyons in 1617. Moreri obſerves that Pope Urban VIII ſaid that Father Alciat was worthy of the Cardinal's Cap. Nicius Erythræus mentions it (d). If it be aſked what was the reaſon that this Jeſuit had not what he deſerved? Was not Urban VIII the diſpoſer of theſe Caps? The anſwer is very eaſy: That this dignity muſt be conferred on ſo many men for political reaſons, that they cannot always admit thoſe that they think deſerve it.

(b) Leon. Allatius in Apibus Urbanis, p. 238, and Alegambe, ſay, Erminius.

(c) Sotuellus, Bib. Societ. Jeſu.

(d) Nicius Erythr. Pinacth. 2. cap. 47.

puniſhment of retaliation: but the perſon accuſed may content himſelf with a denial of the fact; that is ſufficient to acquit him, when there is no proof againſt it. Là dove queſti s'era fatto lecito d'accuſare ſenza provare, il che dalle leggi è punito colla pena del talione; quegli non volle negare ſenza haver la prova della falſità; dal che ogni legge il diſobligava. Quindi fu che ſpeſe moltiſſimi anni in cercar memorie certe di que' ſucceſi (1). With ſubmiſſion to this Cardinal, I do not think that on this occaſion it was ſufficient to deny what Father Paul affirmed. When one has to deal with an adverſary favoured by the public, he muſt have a truth and a half, and heap proof upon proof, if he would carry the cauſe. This Cardinal adds that Father Alciat compoſed very ſlowly, becauſe he would ſuffer nothing to ſlip, that fell ſhort of perfection: old age, and the affairs of the ſociety, were new obſtacles. Dapoi, la fredezza dell' età decrepita, la natura perpleſſa, la penna altrettanto lenta, quanto eſquiſita, le occupazioni de' noſtri governi domeſtici, hanno cagionato ch' egli ſia morto con laſciar ſolo qualche veſtigio dell' opera conceputa in idea (2). i. e. "Beſides, (2) Idem. "the coldneſs of decrepit old age, his irreſolute "temper, his pen as ſlow as it was excellent, his "being employed in the goverment of our ſociety, "was the reaſon that upon his death he left only "ſome traces of a work, of which he had but juſt "formed an idea." This gives us to underſtand, that there are ſome, who by taking pains to become good authors, never become authors at all.

(1) Pallavicini Introduzione all' Hiſt. del Concilio Trident. c. 5.

ALCINOE, daughter of Polybius the Corinthian and wife of Amphilochus, fell in love with one Xanthus of the Iſle of Samos, who lodged at her houſe. This is not the ſtrangeſt thing in the ſtory of her life; the greateſt ſubject of ſurpriſe is to ſee that it was Minerva, who inſpired her with this diſeaſe of love, to puniſh her becauſe ſhe had not paid all ſhe had promiſed to a woman who had worked for her. This woman prayed Minerva to avenge her, and behold how her prayers were accepted. Alcinoe, by the care of this Goddeſs, became ſo furiouſly in love with her lodger, that ſhe forſook her houſe and little children, and embarked with him. But during the voyage, ſhe reflected upon her conduct; ſhe wept for it; ſhe called to mind with cries and tears her young huſband and her children; in fine, all the good words of Xanthus, who promiſed to marry her, being too weak a conſolation, ſhe threw her ſelf into the ſea (a). A great exploit, and well worthy of the Goddeſs Minerva! See the note [C] of the article EGIALEA, and the note [D] of the article MYRRHA.

(a) Parthenius, Eroticorum c. 27.

ALCINOUS, King of the Phæacians, in the Iſland which is now called Corfu, was ſon of Nauſithous (a), and grandſon of Neptune and Peribea [A]. He married Arete, his niece, only daughter of Rexenor ſon of Nauſithous, and had five ſons by her, and a daughter named Nauſicaa, of whom Homer ſpoke very well (b). He praiſes his mother ſtill more, and makes a Heroine of her; he alſo gives a very long deſcription of the palace and gardens of Alcinous. According to him, there was the moſt excellent fruit of the world in thoſe gardens every month of the year, without viciſſitude of winter and ſummer. It is without doubt by his gardens that Alcinous has chiefly immortalized his memory [B]. He received Ulyſſes with much civility [C], (a) Homer. Od. lib. 6, 7. We muſt not ſay Naſitoüs with Moreri.

(b) Homer. Od. l. 6. ver. 62.

[A] He was grandſon of Neptune and Peribea] Britannicus aſſures us that Alcinous was the ſon of Phæax, and that Phæax was the ſon of Neptune and Corcyra (1). I find in Stephanus Byzantinus the laſt of theſe aſſertions, but not that this ſon of Neptune and Corcyra was the father of Alcinous.

(1) Britann. in Juvenal. Sat. 5. ver. 151.

[B] It is by his gardens that Alcinous has chiefly immortalized his memory.] All the Poets ſpeak in raptures of his gardens. Mr. Lloyd quotes ſeveral paſſages from them; let us content ourſelves with this of Juvenal:

. . .

Illa jubebit
Poma dari, quorum ſolo paſcaris odore
Qualia perpetuus Phæacum autumnus habebat (2);

(2) Juven. Sat. 5. ver. 151.

That is,

"To him are order'd, and thoſe happy few,
"Whom fate has rais'd above contempt and you,
"Moſt fragrant fruits; ſuch in Phæacian gardens grew:
"Where a perpetual Autumn ever ſmil'd,
"And golden apples loaded branches fill'd.
Bowles.

And let us add the teſtimony of a Proſe-writer. Antiquitas nihil prius mirata eſt quam Heſperidum hortos, ac regum Adonis (3) & Alcinoi (4). i. e. "Antiquity "has admired nothing more than the gardens of the "Heſperides, and thoſe of the Kings Adonis and "Alcinous." Mr. Lloyd quotes Theophilus Patriarch of Antioch, who has ſpoken of theſe gardens in his third book ad Autolicum; but he obſerves that we muſt correct in it the reading Antinoüs and ſubſtitute Alcinoüs. He quotes alſo theſe words of St. Gregory Nazianzen;

——— Ἡ δὲ τράπεζα ἐ ἄλσε Ἀλκινόου
Τερπνοτέρη (5).

That is,

"Your table is pleaſanter than the garden of Alci-
"nous.

(3) I do not know whether Pliny rightly underſtood what he had read concerning the gardens of Adonis. They were not what he imagines. See above, pag. 271. Col. 2. ſome lines after the quot. 23.

(4) Plinius, l. 19. cap. 4.

(5) Greg. Naz. Carm. ad Vitalian.

I have not obſerved that the Poets have feigned this Prince to be the keeper of the orchards, as Moreri relates: Charles Stephens has led him into this miſtake; for in his Dictionary we meet with an Alcinous different from the King of the Phæacians, and characterized by the office of Hortorum cuſtos: which the author proves civility [C], whom the ſtorm had caſt on the coaſt of Phæacia: he offered him his daughter, and conducted him to Ithaca loaded with preſents. And as during the feaſt to which he admitted him he told the company an hundred idle tales, it is thought this became the origin of ſome proverbs [D] in uſe among the Ancients. However it be, the kingdom of Alcinous was a true * païs de Cocagne: the people loved good cheer, and the conveniences of life [E], which did not hinder the men from being active and very good ſeamen (c), and Alcinous from being a very juſt Prince, as appears by theſe words. Ἀλκίνοος κραίνεσκε δικαιότατος Βασιλήων (d).

(c) Homer. Od. l. 6. ver. 270; lib. 7. ver. 35, 107; lib. 8. ver. 247, 253, and in many other places.

(d) Orpheus.

* Cocagne is the name given in Languedoc to the little cakes of woad made up for the uſe of the Dyers. This herb is cultivated only in the moſt fertile countries, and brings a very great profit. Hence the upper Languedoc is called by ſome Païs de Cocagne, and the ſame name is applied alſo to all fertile countries, where the inhabitants enjoy eaſe and plenty. Add. Rem.

proves by the 2d book of Virgil's Georgicks, and by ſome verſes of Ovid and Statius, where they do not ſpeak of this; but of the gardens of Alcinous only. Probably this blunder owes its original to the fault of ſome Copyiſt, or Printer, who may have put cuſtos inſtead of cultor.

[C] He received Ulyſſes with much civility.] Several authors, as Raviſius Textor (6) and Decimator (7) attribute this reception to Nauſicaa daughter of Alcinous, without giving any ſhare to the father. They do not conſider that ſhe gave only cloaths and advice to Ulyſſes without the city, and that ſhe had a father and mother who received him with civility and hoſpitality. See the article NAUSICAA.

(6) In Epithet.
(7) In Sylva Vocab. and in Theſauro Linguarum.

[D] It is thought the ſtories that Ulyſſes told Alcinous were the origin of ſome proverbs.] Moreri ſays Ulyſſes told the fable of the Cyclops, of the Leſtrigonians *, and others, with their elbows upon the table, which gave occaſion to this proverb of the ancients, which Eraſmus has not forgotten, "The "Table of Alcinous," or as Plato expreſſes it, "Would you have me tell you Alcinous's tale?" All this is wrong: Firſt, the word and others are obſcure and inaccurate. In the ſecond place, the proverb of Alcinous's table does not come from theſe ſtories of Ulyſſes; but from the good cheer that Alcinous uſually made. See the following note. Beſides, it is not true, that Plato expreſſes himſelf by an interrogation: he only declares that he will ſay nothing of the Apologue of Alcinous (8). It is ſtill more falſe that what he ſays is in other terms the ſame thing with the table of Alcinous. It is certain that we find in the Index of Eraſmus's Adagies, Alcinoi Menſa, and Alcinoi Apologus, as two different proverbs. The firſt of theſe is not a capital proverb in the body of the book: but is only related as a little addition to the Adage Sybaritica Menſa (9); It is taken from theſe words of Gregory Nazianzen, Οὐκ ὡς λαϊοφάγε πενίαν, ἀλλ' ὡς Ἀλκινόου τράπεζαν, i. e. "Not according to the penury of "the Lotophagi; but the table of Alcinous." Hadrian Junius, who has made a collection of proverbs after Eraſmus, where he has put Alcinoi Horti as a capital proverb, quotes in the explanation of it this other paſſage of the ſame father relating to the table of Alcinous:

* A barbarous people in Italy.

(8) Plato, de Reipub. lib. 10.

(9) It is the lxvth of the 2d Century of the 2d Chiliad.

Καὶ δόμον αἰγλήεντα καὶ Ἀλκινόοιο τράπεζαν.

"A ſplendid houſe and table of Alcinous.

Lloyd quotes another paſſage where this holy Doctor uſes the ſame phraſe. As to the Alcinoi Apologus, Eraſmus relates it twice. Firſt, he explains it as an old woman's ſtory, de longis & anilibus fabulamentis; and he builds upon the fables which Ulyſſes told at Alcinous's table. Prodigioſas ac deridiculas fabulas & portentuoſa mendacia de Lotophagis, Læſtrigonibus, Circe, Cyclopibus, atque id genus aliis plurimis miraculis, fretus videlicet Phæacum inſcitiâ barbarieque (10). "Prodigious and moſt ridiculous fables and monſtrous lies of the Lotophagi, Læſtrigonians, Circe, "Cyclops, and many other ſuch like wonders, knowing the ignorance and barbarity of the Phæacians." But in another place (11), he gives us to underſtand that he had found another ſignification of the ſame Adage in the 1vth book of Ariſtotle's Rhetoric (12), and that he will ſuſpend his deciſion till he be better informed, either by the Commentaries of St. Gregory Nazianzen on theſe books of Ariſtotle (13), or by ſome other means. I hardly ſee any one that gives attention to this laſt paſſage of Eraſmus. They ſtop at the firſt, as if the true ſenſe was found there: we are far from finding it there, for if we only caſt an eye upon what Eraſmus ſays upon the words of Ariſtotle, we muſt doubt of the explanation he had given of it in another place. I confeſs this paſſage of Ariſtotle is obſcure, that it is read differently, and that there is perhaps ſome hiatus in it; but there is no probability, that one muſt underſtand ſtories of Tom Thumb by the fable of Alcinous. Gilbertus Cognatus however, who has made a collection of Proverbs after Eraſmus, is of that opinion, tho' he does not conſider the thing but according to the quotation of Ariſtotle (14). There is a paſſage in Ælian, where Alcinous's Apologues, Ἀλκινόου Ἀπόλογοι, can be taken for nothing but the diſcourſes Ulyſſes had with that Prince in the Odyſſey (15).

(10) Eraſm. Adagior. Centur. IV. Chil. II. num. 32. p. 469.

(11) Idem. Centur. I. Chil. V. num. 82. p. 1057.

(12) It is in the 16th chapter of the 3d book, in the Geneva edition in 1605.

(13) I have never heard of theſe Commentaries.

(14) Cognat. in Proverb. num. 210; he quotes, like Eraſmus, the 4th book of Ariſtotle's Rhetorick.

(15) Ælian, Var. Hiſt. l. 13. c. 13.

[E] The people loved good cheer and the conveniencies of life in his kingdom.] This is what Alcinous made no ſecret of to Ulyſſes: We love, ſays he, feaſting, muſic, dancing, change of apparel, baths and beds.

Αἰεὶ δ' ἡμῖν δαὶς τε φίλη κίθαρίς τε, χοροί τε
Εἵματά τ' ἐξημοιβὰ, λοετρά τε θερμὰ, ἐ εὐναὶ (16).

(16) Homer. Od. lib. 8. ver. 241.

"To dreſs, to dance, to ſing our ſole delight,
"The feaſt or bath by day, and love by night.
Pope.

Horace expreſſes it in this manner:

——— Alcinoique
In cute curanda plus æquo operata juventus,
Cui pulchrum fuit in medios dormire Dies, &
Ad ſtrepitum citharæ ceſſatum ducere curam (17).

(17) Horat. Ep. 2. lib. 1. ver. 28, ſeq.

——— "Whoſe whole deſign
"Was to get vicious pleaſure, and be fine:
"Who thought it virtuous to ſleep half the day,
"And lull their cares with dances, ſongs and play.
Creech.

I need not obſerve that by Alcinoi juventus, muſt be underſtood the young people of the kingdom of Alcinous. Athenæus ſpeaks ſometimes of the voluptuous life of the Phæacians.

ALCMAN, a Lyrick Poet, flouriſhed in the twenty ſeventh Olympiad (a). Some ſay he was of Lacedæmon, others that he was born at Sardis, a conſiderable city in Lydia. What we are ſure of is, that he was a Citizen of Sparta [A], and that the Lacedæmonians have taken to themſelves the honour of having furniſhed Greece with ſo

(a) Suidas, in Ἀλκμάν.

[A] He was a Citizen of Sparta.] This appears from an Epigram inſerted by Plutarch in his Treatiſe on Baniſhment (1). He has there made Alcman ſay, that if he had been brought up at Sardis, the country of his anceſtors, he would have been a poor Prieſt of the Goddeſs Cybele, deprived of his manhood;

(1) Oper. Moralium. p. 599.

ſo great a genius [B]. He compoſed ſeveral Poems, whereof there are none remaining but ſome fragments, quoted by Athenæus, or ſome other ancient writers. He was of a very amorous conſtitution, and is accounted the Father of Gallant Poeſy [C]. It ſeems likewiſe that he is ſaid to have been the firſt that introduced the cuſtom of ſinging love verſes in company (b). There has been preſerved to us the name of one of his miſtreſſes (c): ſhe was called Megaloſtrata, and dabbled a little in verſifying. If he had kept himſelf to her, he would not have given ſo much ground of complaint; but there is mention too of one Chæron, with whom he was enamoured (d). Alcman was one of the greateſt eaters of his age (e). That quality might have been grievouſly inconvenient, if Poetry had been at that time upon ſuch a foot as it has been often, not proper to find its maſter bread. He died of a pretty ſingular diſeaſe, for he was eat up with lice (f). We muſt not diſtinguiſh him from the Poet Alcmæon [D]; and I ſee no occaſion to acknowledge two Alcmans, the one of Lacedæmon, and the other of Meſſene [E].

(b) Athen. lib. 13. p. 600.
(c) Idem, ibid.
(d) Idem, l. 10. p. 416.
(e) Id. ibid. and Ælian Var. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 27.
(f) Ariſtot. de Hiſt. Animal l. 5. c. 31; Plutarch in Sylla, p. 474.

hood; but that at preſent he ſees himſelf a Citizen of Lacedæmon, well inſtructed in the learning of the Greeks, which makes him ſuperior to the Kings of Lydia. The Latin interpreter has given an ill tranſlation of the firſt verſe of this Epigram, Σάρδεις ἀρχαῖος πατέρων νόμος.

O! mea majorumque meorum patria Sardes;

"O! Sardes the country of me and my anceſtors;

For it muſt be concluded from that verſion, that Alcman was born at Sardes (2), which cannot be concluded from the Greek words: and thus one may ſee how a tranſlator is ſometimes a ſower of tares, when he does not in the leaſt deſign it. He that tranſlated the Greek Epigram into Latin, never dreamt that by adding the word mea, which he took to be of no conſequence, ſhould occaſion ſeveveral people obſtinately to maintain that Alcman was not born at Lacedæmon. How many authors are there, who conſult nothing but tranſlations, and that in Greek books take all the arguments with which thoſe verſions furniſh them, whether they be agreeable to the original or not? Salmaſius has learnedly corrected this Epigram (3); but I do not very well ſee what thoſe people mean who refer us to him, as to a Judge that has determined the diſpute about the country of Alcman. The queſtion in this diſpute is, whether this Poet was born at Lacedæmon, or at Sardis in Lydia. Suidas maintains the firſt opinion (4): Crates maintains the ſecond (5); Velleius Paterculus (6), and Ælian (7), deny what Suidas affirms. Of what uſe is the Epigram, to decide this controverſy, ſince it does not tell us where Alcman was born: but only that he was not brought up at Sardis, the Country of his anceſtors; that he was educated after the manner of the Greeks; and that he was a Citizen of Lacedæmon? It may equally prove theſe two things, either that Alcman was removed into Greece during his infancy, or that his father had ſettled himſelf there before this ſon of his was born. On the laſt ſuppoſition, nothing can be objected againſt Alcman's having drawn his firſt breath in the city of Lacedæmon. Scaliger was of this opinion; but he founded it upon a bad reaſon. Ego, ſays he (8), Laconem fuiſſe arbitror, quum Laconicâ Dialecto uſus ſit. i. e. "I take him to have "been a Lacedæmonian, becauſe he made uſe of "the Laconick Dialect." If he had remembered the Epigram which Plutarch has quoted, he muſt have ſeen the falſity of that reaſon. Alcman not having been brought up in Lydia, but in Greece, and dwelling at Lacedæmon, muſt needs uſe the Dorick Dialect which was that of Sparta. How rough ſoever it was, he uſed it nevertheleſs in ſome good Poems. Ὦ ποιήσαντι ἄσμαθα, ὑδὲν ἐς ἡδονὴν αὐτῶν ἐλυμήνατο τῶν Λακώνων ἡ γλῶσσα, ἥκιστα παρεχομένη τὸ εὔφωνον (9). i. e. "To whom the Laconick Dialect was no "inconvenience in making verſes, though there be "no manner of ſweetneſs in the ſound of its "words.

(2) Amiot has been guilty of the ſame fault.
(3) Salmaſ. Exercit. Plinian. p. 885.
(4) He makes him to be born at Meſſoa, which was a part of Lacedæmon, according to Strabo corrected by Salmaſius, Exercit. Plinian. p. 885.
(5) Apud Suidam, in Ἀλκμάν.
(6) Alcmana Lacones falſo ſibi vindicant. Paterc. l. 1. ſub fin.
(7) Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 50.
(8) Scalig. Animadv. in Euſeb. num. 1360.
(9) Pauſan. l. 3. p. 96.

[B] The Lacedæmonians have taken to themſelves the honour of having furniſhed Greece with ſo great a Genius.] The paſſage of Paterculus which I have quoted proves that: and theſe words of Statius,

Et tetricis Alcman cantatus Amyclis (10),

"And Alcman ſung at cruel Amyclæ, prove it further. Add to this the monument which they erected to Alcman near the temple of Helen (11).

(10) Stat. Sylv. 3. lib. 5. ver. 153.
(11) Pauſan. l. 3. p. 96.

[C] He is accounted the father of gallant Poeſy.] It appears from this paſſage of Athenæus (12), Ἀρχύτας ὁ Ἁρμονιακὸς, ὡς φησι Χαμαιλέων, Ἀλκμᾶνα γενέσθαι τῶν ἐρωτικῶν μελῶν ἡγεμόνα, καὶ ἐκδοῦναι πρῶτον μελὸς, ἀκόλαστον ὄντα καὶ περὶ τὰς γυναῖκας καὶ τὴν τοιαύτην Μοῦσαν εἰς τὰς διατριβάς. i. e. "Archytas Harmoniacus writes, as Chamæleon ſays, that Alcman was "the chief leader in making love verſes, being "very much given to women, and the firſt who "promoted ſuch kinds of verſes, to be ſung in the "public aſſemblies of the people.

(12) Athen. lib. 13. p. 600. Vide etiam Suidam, in Ἀλκμάν.

[D] We muſt not diſtinguiſh him from the Poet Alcmæon.] St. Jerome, in Euſebius's Chronicle, after having mentioned Alcmæon under the 30th Olympiad, ſpeaks of Alcman under the 42d, and cautiouſly guards himſelf with ut quibuſdam videtur, i. e. "as ſome think." Scaliger, in the firſt paſſage, has corrected Alcmæon by Alcman. It is evident, by the reign of Ardys, King of Lydia, under whom Crates has placed Alcman, that this Poet flouriſhed about the 30th Olympiad, the time in which Alcmæon is placed in Euſebius's Chronicle. If this reaſon be not ſufficient to ſhew that theſe two names ought to be reduced to one and the ſame perſon, it ſhall be undeniably proved that Alcmæon, Ἀλκμαίων, and Alcman Ἀλκμᾶν, differ in nothing but the Dialect; and that the firſt muſt be changed into the ſecond by the rules of the Dorick Dialect. See Salmaſius's Comment upon Solinus, page 885. The Alcman of the 42d Olympiad is a fiction. He has been placed there becauſe the authors that had blundered about the age of Alcman have been followed.

[E] I ſee no occaſion to acknowledge two Alcmans, the one of Lacedæmon, and the other of Meſſenæ.] Suidas is, I think, the only one that does it. But his authority is not very great, when he quotes no body, nor points out any circumſtances. This is the caſe of his Alcman of Meſſene, he ſays nothing of him. Let us remember that he has ſaid the true Alcman was born at Meſſoa, ἀπὸ Μισσόας. That place is not very famous; and this is the reaſon why ſome Copiſts are of opinion, that it ought to be read ἀπὸ Μισσήνης, in thoſe authors that had told the ſame tale with Suidas. By their pretended correction a new Alcman has been forged that has been tacked to the collections of Suidas. This conjecture appears to me more probable than that of Lilius Gyraldus. He allows but of one Alcman; but he will have him a native of Meſſene, and corrects in Suidas ἀπὸ Μισσόας by ἀπὸ Μισσήνης. Scaliger juſtly rejects this conjecture (13).

(13) Scalig. Animadv. in Euſeb. num. 1360.

ALCMENA, the daughter of Electryo [A], King of Mycenæ, was the wife of Amphitryo,

[A] The daughter of Electryo.] Aſius the Poet makes her the daughter of Amphiaraüs and Eriphyle (1). Others ſay right, that Electryo was her father; but they give her for a mother Anaxo, the daughter of

(1) Apud Pauſaniam, lib. 5. pag. 165.

Amphitryo, and mother of Hercules. She bore this ſon during her huſband's lifetime; and nevertheleſs Hercules was not the ſon of Amphitryo, but of Jupiter, who taking upon himſelf the likeneſs of Alcmena's huſband [B], was admitted without ſcruple to the liberties of the marriage bed. The ſport pleaſed him ſo well, that he made that night laſt as long as three ordinary ones [C]. This was the origin of Hercules. The greateſt part of modern writers ſay that Alcmena was already with child by Amphitryo; but Apollodorus inſinuates plainly enough that ſhe was ſtill a maid [D], and that is giving the thing a turn the moſt for Jupiter's honour. However that be, Amphitryo returned to his houſe the very day ſucceeding the long night which the God of Alcæus, the ſon of Perſeus (2), and not Lyſidice the daughter of Pelops and Hippodamia, which Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Hofman, &c. give her (3). The Scholiaſt upon Pindar is for Lyſidice (4).

(2) Apollodor. Biblioth. l. 2. p. 96. Scholiaſt. Homeri in Iliad. Ξ, ver. 323.

(3) See their Dictionaries.

(4) In Olymp. Od. 7.

[B] Jupiter taking upon himſelf the likeneſs of Alcmena's husband.] Diodorus Siculus obſerves that Jupiter took this method becauſe he would not make uſe of force; and that by the ſtrength of perſuaſion he could have no hopes from ſo virtuous a Lady as Alcmena (5). The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves that Jupiter was not actuated in this affair, by that laſcivious paſſion which he had ſo often felt for other women; and that he had no other motive to it but the begetting an illuſtrious infant. It is for that reaſon that he was not in a hurry about it, but took a great deal of time, even three ſucceſſive nights. Our Phyſicians laugh at this reaſon. I do not ſee why Plautus makes Jupiter talk thus to Amphitryo.

(5) Diod. Sicul. l. 5. cap. 2.

Tu cum Alcumena uxore antiquam in gratiam
Redi: haud promeruit quamobrem vitio verteres.
Mea vi ſubacta eſt facere (6);

(6) Plaut. in Amphitr. ſub finem.

" You with your wife Alcmena ſtrait return
" To former love: ſhe merits not your anger,
" Compell'd by my great pow'r to what was done:

Becauſe as Jupiter took upon him the form of her husband, there was no occaſion for compulſion; and we have juſt been told that he put on that form becauſe he would not make uſe of force. A modern author makes uſe of this example of Alcmena to prove that an honeſt ignorance takes away the ſinfulneſs of an action, and has quoted ſome beautiful verſes of Moliere (7). A thouſand things may be ſaid upon this head: it opens a large field for reflexions. Obſerve there are ſome people that would have Plautus's thought be underſtood thus: Alcmena has been compelled to ſuffer me to enjoy her, becauſe I have had the power of putting on your form. If it be ſo, it muſt be ſaid that the Poet's meaning was much better than his expreſſion.

(7) See the N. Lettres contre le Calvin. de Maim. p. 280, &c.

[C] He made that night laſt as long as three ordinary ones.] One may perhaps without diſguſt read the following old French. Jupiter trouva une telle faveur en la Dame, qu'il prolongea cette nuit du jour & de l'autre nuit enſuivant, ce qui auroit mu Lycophron d'appeller Hercule τρισίσπιρος λέων, le lion de trois nuits, comme fait auſſi Lucien (8). i. e. " Jupiter " found ſo great delight in the Lady that he length- " ened that night into the day and the night follow- " ing, which cauſed Lycophron to call Hercules " τρισίσπιρος λέων, the lion of three nights, as Lucian " has alſo done." Perhaps he had in his eye theſe words of Hyginus: Qui tam libens cum ea concubuit, ut unum Diem uſurparet, duas noctes congeminaret (9). That is, " Who enjoyed her with ſo much pleaſure, " that he made uſe of one day, and joined two " nights to it." Lucian's Dialogue, where he ſpeaks of the long night which Jupiter had with Alcmena, tells us that Mercury went to carry the Sun an order to keep himſelf quiet for three days, in order that Jupiter might have the time that was neceſſary to produce Hercules; one night not being ſufficient for the production of ſo great a warrior. Τοῦτον δὲ ἐν μιᾷ νυκτὶ ἀποτελισθῆναι, ἀδύνατον, i. e. " It cannot " then be finiſhed in one night (10)." It appeared that Jupiter was not at all ſparing of the ſtuff; for the weight of the infant had like to have made the mother burſt:

(8) Vigenere ſur Philoſt. tom. 2. fol. 17. edit. in 4°.

(9) Hygin. cap. 29.

(10) Lucianus, Dialog. Merc. & Solis. See alſo Diodorus Siculus, book 5. chap. 2.

Tendebat gravitas uterum mihi, quodque ferebam
Tantum erat, ut poſſes auctorem dicere tecti
Ponderis eſſe Jovem (11).

(11) Ovid. Met. l. 9. ver. 288.

" ——Ten accompliſh'd ſigns did now excite
" My travail to Alcides birth, whoſe weight
" My belly ſtretch'd; which bare ſo great a freight,
" That you might ſwear it was begot by Jove.
Sandys.

There are a good many Authors, who aſſure us that that night was not made up of three but only of two nights (12). Others ſay that it laſted nine times as long as uſual. St. Jerome, who might have read it in the writings of two of the Fathers of the Church (13), does not however give into that notion; he holds to the tradition of the double night: In Alcmenæ adulterio duas noctes Jupiter copulavit. i. e. " Jupiter put together two nights for his adultery " with Alcmena." Jupiter at that time took his leave of the women: Alcmena was the laſt mortal that he lay with. Niobe was the firſt; there had been ſixteen generations from the one to the other (14); ſuch was the duration of the love of Jupiter for women. But ſince the enjoyment of Alcmena was the laſt entertainment of that ſort he was to have in this world, was it not reaſonable that he ſhould make it laſt a long time? Alcmena wondered at the length of the night (15): it appeared long to her then; this makes for her character; and indeed ſhe was a very virtuous woman (16), and if ſhe had loſt her ſight, ſhe would not have deſerved ſuch a diſtich to have been made upon her as the following:

(12) Id. Amor. lib. 1. Eleg. 13. Propert. lib. 2. Eleg. 22; Capella, lib. 2. c. 39.

(13) Clem. Alexand. in Protrept. p. 20. Arnobius, lib. 4. p. 145, cujus hæc ſunt verba: Quis illum in Alcmena novem noctibus fecit pervigilaſſe continuis?

(14) Diod. Sicul. lib. 5. c. 2.

(15) Hygin. cap. 29.

(16) See the Note [B].

Cum longas noctes Moreta (17) ab amore rogaret,
Favit amor votis, perpetuaſque dedit.

(17) The Comteſſe de Moret, Henry the Great's miſtreſs.

" Moreta lengthen'd nights of love did crave,
" Love heard, and darkneſs everlaſting gave.

Sofia, the ſervant of Amphitryo, made an obſervation worthy of him, when he perceived that the night continued longer than ordinary. He congratulates thoſe gallants that had not had their game cheap.

Ubi ſunt iſti ſcortatores, qui ſoli inviti cubant?
Hæc nox ſcita 'ſt exercendo ſcorto conducto malè (18).

(18) Plauti Amphitr. Act. 1. Sc. 1. ver. 130.

" Where are thoſe whoremongers that lye alone
" Tho' ſore againſt their wills? this night is fitted
" To deal with high pric'd ſtrumpets.

[D] She was ſtill a maid.] Apollodorus relates that Electryo going to revenge the death of his ſons, committed his kingdom and his daughter Alcmena into the hands of Amphitryo, after having made him ſwear that he would not make any attempt upon Alcmena till his return (19). Not long after Amphitryo, having ſlain him by an accident, was obliged to ſeek for a retreat. He retired into Bœotia with Alcmena; and becauſe ſhe declar'd that ſhe would marry the perſon that ſhould revenge her brother's death, he engaged himſelf to proſecute that vengeance, and entring into an aſſociation with ſome others, he carried the war home to the Teleboes, who had ſlain the brothers of Alcmena (20). At his return to Thebes, victorious and triumphant, he learnt that another ſelf had been lying with his miſtreſs. It is evident that it was not he that had the firſt favour: Alcmena had undoubtedly deferred the nuptials, at leaſt the conſummation of the marriage till Amphitryo had vanquiſhed the Teleboes. Jupiter knowing that Amphitryo was coming back, and that, in order

(19) Apollod. Biblioth. lib. 2. p. 99.

(20) Ibid. p. 101.

God had paſſed with Alcmena. He did not find that his wife received him with thoſe tranſports which uſually accompany the firſt interview after an abſence; and he ſoon found the reaſon by the account which ſhe gave him of the laſt night. They that can put themſelves in his place may tell us the thoughts which he had thereupon. He went forthwith to a Soothſayer, and was informed by Tireſias, that Jupiter, in the likeneſs of Amphitryo, had enjoyed Alcmena's embraces. This gave him ſome conſolation; and it does not appear that his reſentment laſted long, becauſe on the following night he got a child upon his wife who was already pregnant by a God (a). Juno, by the uſual effect of her jealouſy, diſturbed as much as lay in her power the delivery of this woman; and it was only by the management of a ſervant, that the ill deſigns of Lucina were eluded [E], who obſtructed Alcmena in her delivery. She brought forth two ſons: that which Jupiter begat was named Hercules; that which was Amphitryo's ſon was called Iphiclus (b). It is ſaid that after the death of Amphitryo ſhe married Rhadamanthus, and that her tomb was near that of Rhadamanthus, hard by Haliartus in Bœotia (c). Others ſay that ſhe was buried at Megara, and that the Oracle appointed it, when the children of Hercules conſulted it upon a difference that was amongſt them; ſome being willing that ſhe ſhould be carried to Argos, the others deſiring that ſhe might be removed to Thebes (d). She died upon the road on the frontiers

(a) Ex Apollod. Bibl. l. 2. pag. 97, & ſeq. Hygin. chap. 29, ſays, he lay with her no more, and mentions only Hercules.

(b) Apollod. Biblioth. p. 103.

(c) Plutarch. in Lyſandro, p. 449. Antonini Liberalis Metam. cap. 33.

(d) Pauſan. l. 1. pag. 39.

order to crop this flower of virginity, there was no other time to be taken but that which Amphitryo ſhould ſpend in his voyage, got before him, and did what he had to do before the husband's arrival. Apollodorus adds, that Amphitryo having lain with Alcmena begot a child upon her, that was one night younger than Hercules. Ἀλκμήνη δὲ δύο ἐγείνατο παῖδας, Διὶ μὲν Ἡρακλέα μιᾷ νυκτὶ πρεσβύτερον. Ἀμφιτρύωνι Ἰφικλέα (21). i. e. "But "Alcmena brought forth two ſons: to Jupiter Hercu- "les, who was one night older, and to Amphitryo "Iphicles." Here is a new confirmation of what I have to prove. The Scholiaſt upon Homer is more particular than Apollodorus: he ſays plainly that the marriage was not till after Amphitryo's return (22). In Plautus's Comedy the things run otherwiſe. Amphitryo there leaves his wife with child when he goes to the war (23). A mighty repaſt for Jupiter! It would have been worſe if Plautus had obſerved the unity of time, as Mademoiſelle le Fevre (Dacier) would have had him. It muſt have been ſaid, upon that ſuppoſition, that in ſtopping the Sun, Jupiter interrupted the whole courſe of nature for the ſake of diverting himſelf a long time with a woman that was big with two children, and ſo near her reckoning, that if he had ſtayed a little longer, the midwife would have been obliged to have ſaid to him, Make room for me. Plautus has got but an unlucky alternative: either his piece muſt be ſuppoſed to laſt ſeveral months, or he muſt make a woman juſt ready to be delivered of twins, one of the moſt delicious morſels in the world for the greateſt of all Monarchs; and that by ſuppoſing that this Ruler of Gods and Men had already begot one of thoſe twins. Take care that this Poet does not pretend, that Jupiter diſguiſed himſelf like Amphitryo, that he might come like a good husband to Alcmena's aſſiſtance, whilſt ſhe was in travail of the infant: it was the viſit of a man thoroughly amorous. See how Mercury ſpeaks in the Prologue:

(21) Id. p. 103.

(22) Schol. Homeri in Iliad. ξ. ver. 323.

(23) Gravidam ego illam hic reliqui cum abeo. Plautus Amphit. Act. 2. Sc. 2. ver 34. I left her here big with child when I went away. Et cum te gravidam, cum te pulchrè plenam adſpicio, gaudeo. ibid. ver. 52. And I rejoice that I ſee you finely big. Mercury had affirmed the ſame in the Prologue.

Et meus pater nunc intus hic cum illâ cubat;
Et hæc ob eam rem nox eſt facta longior,
Dum ille qua cum volt voluptatem capit.

"Within my fire lies ſunk in her embraces;
"And that's the reaſon that this night's protracted
"Whilſt he enjoys the pleaſures he deſires.

And Sofia's bringing out theſe words,

Hæc nox ſcita 'ſt exercendo ſcorto conducto malè (24),

(24) Plaut. Amphit. Act. 1. Sc. 1. ver. 133.

"This night is fitted to deal with high-pric'd "ſtrumpets."

See how Mercury takes them up:

Meus pater nunc pro hujus verbis rectè & ſapienter facit,
Qui complexus cum Alcumena cubat amans, animo obſequens.

"According to this fellow's opinion my father is "doing what is right and prudent; for he is now "lying with Alcmena, in the full poſſeſſion of her "affections and embraces."

He congratulates himſelf that he has removed every obſtacle that might interrupt the pleaſure of Jupiter, and he prepares himſelf ſo to continue his good offices, till the Gallant be ſatisfied.

Benè & proſperè hoc hodie operis proceſſit mihi:
Amovi à foribus maximam moleſtiam,
Patri ut liceret tuto illam amplexarier.

"This day ſucceſs my labours has attended:
"I from the doors have mov'd each obſtacle,
"That Father Jove might kiſs his love in ſafety.

Erroris ambo ego illos & dementiæ
Complebo, atque omnem Amphitryonis familiam
Adeo, uſque ſatietatem dum capiet pater
Illius quam amat (25).

(25) Plaut. Amphit. Act. 1. Sc. 2. ver. 1, 2, 3, 5, & ſeq.

"With madneſs and miſtake I thus will fill "Them both, and all Amphitryo's family
"Till Jupiter ſhall have ſatiety
"Of her he loves.

[E] By the management of a ſervant, the ill deſigns of Lucina (26) were eluded.] I follow Ovid in this narration: Alcmena had been ſeven days in labour with horrible pains. Galanthis one of her women, went backwards and forwards; and ſuſpecting ſome witchcraft, becauſe ſhe ſaw a woman ſitting at the gate muttering, with her hands croſſed upon her knees (α), ſhe went and told her that Alcmena was delivered. Lucina (for it was ſhe that had put herſelf in that poſture) had no ſooner heard thoſe words, but ſhe parted her hands and got up; which occaſioned Alcmena to be delivered.

(26) She was the Goddeſs that preſided over women in labour.

Subſedit in illa
Ante fores ara, dextroque à poplite lævum
Preſſa genu, digitis inter ſe pectine junctis,
Suſtinuit partus. Tacita quoque carmina voce
Dixit, & inceptos tenuerunt carmina partus.

"She ſate before the gate
"On yonder altar. Her right knee upholds
"Her croſs left hand, her fingers knit in folds
"Delay'd delivery: ſhe with mutter'd ſpells
"Of ſecret power, the preſſing birth repells.
Sandys.

Una miniſtrarum media de plebe Galanthis
Flava comas, aderat faciendis ſtrenua juſſis
Officiis dilecta ſuis. Ea ſenſit iniqua
Neſcio quid Junone geri, dumque exit & intrat
Sæpe fores, Divam reſidentem vidit in ara, Brachiaque in genibus, digitis connexa, tenentem;

tiers of Megara, as ſhe was returning from Argos to Thebes (e). Hercules was already dead: ſhe had the affliction of ſurviving him; but on the other hand, ſhe had the ſatisfaction of holding the head of Hercules's perſecutor in her hands, and of plucking out his eyes [F]. It is related that her body diſappeared during the funeral ceremonies, and that a ſtone was found in her bed (f), which gave Pauſanias occaſion to ſay that ſhe was turned into ſtone (g). Antonius Liberalis relates, that whilſt the Heraclides were buſied about Alcmena's obſequies, Jupiter commanded Mercury to ſteal her away, and to tranſport her to the Elyſian Fields, in order to be married to Rhadamanthus. The order was executed, and a ſtone was put into the coffin. They who carried it, finding it very heavy, opened it, and there found inſtead of the body a ſtone, which they depoſited in a ſacred wood, where was afterwards the chapel of Alcmena at Thebes (h). Diodorus Siculus only obſerves that ſhe diſappeared, and that the Thebans paid her divine honours (i). They continued to ſhew her chamber in Pauſanias's time (k). Her altar was likewiſe to be ſeen at Athens at the ſame time (l). The preſent which ſhe received from Jupiter for that long night which he had paſſed with her, was ſhewn at Lacedæmon during ſeveral ages, as a very great rarity (m). Several very wonderful things are related concerning her tomb [G]. Conſult the article of AMPHITRYO.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Plut. in Romulo, p. 35.

(g) Pauſan. l. 9. p. 294.

(h) Antonini Liberalis, Metam. cap. 33. ex Pherecyde.

(i) Diod. Sic. lib. 5. cap 4.

(k) Pauſan. l. 9. p. 290. He lived about 150 years after the nativity of Chriſt.

(l) Idem, lib. 1, p. 17.

(m) See the note [D] of the article TELEBOES.

Et, quæcunque es, ait, dominæ gratare: levata eſt
Argolis Alcmene, potiturque puerpera voto.
Exſiluit, junctaſque manus patefacta remiſit
Diva potens uteri: vinclis levor ipſa remiſſis (27).

(27) Ovid. Met. lib. 9. ver. 298, & ſeq.

" Red-hair'd Galanthis, one of mean deſcent
" In all employments ſtoutly diligent,
" Beloved for her duty, doth miſdoubt
" Malicious Juno. Paſſing in and out,
" She ſaw the Goddeſs on the altar ſit;
" Her arms about her knees, her fingers knit.
" Whate'er you be, rejoice with us he ſaid;
" Joyful Alcmena hath her belly laid.
" The Goddeſs great in child-birth, ſtarting, roſe;
" And parting her link'd fingers, eas'd my throws.
Sandys.

Pauſanias does not tell the ſtory with the ſame circumſtances. He ſays that there were ſeen at Thebes the figures of certain women (28), which Juno had ſent to hinder Alcmena's delivery. The daughter of Tireſias (29) deceived them by ſaying that Alcmena was delivered (30). In Pliny's time, the poſture of which I have been ſpeaking, was ſtill taken for enchantment. To ſit near a big-bellied woman, or any perſon that is taking a medicine, with fingers faſtned in form of a comb, is ſorcery; and this it is ſaid was experienced when Alcmena was in labour of Hercules. It is worſe if the hands are held acroſs one or both knees. To this effect Vigenere (31) tranſlates theſe words of Pliny: Adſidere gravidis vel cum remedium alicui adhibetur, digitis pectinatim inter ſe implexis, veneficium eſt: idque compertum tradunt Alcmena Herculem pariente. Pejus ſi circa unum ambove genua, item poplites alternis genibus imponi (32). We ſhall ſee elſewhere (33) the liberty which Plautus has taken to ſuppoſe that Alcmena was delivered without pain.

(28) They were called φαρμακίδες. We ſhould call them witches now a days.

(29) Her name was Hiſtoris.

(30) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 290.

(31) Vigenere ſur la Philoſtrate, tom. 2. fol. 17.

(32) Pliny, lib. 28. c. 6. p. 579.

(33) In the note [F] of the article TELEBOES.

§ (a) RABELAIS B. 3. ch. 48. has rendred the text of Ovid and Pliny very well. If Mr. Bayle had been aware of it, it would have been a fit paſſage to have quoted here. REM. CRIT.

[F] She had the ſatisfaction of holding in her hands the head of Hercules's perſecutor, and plucking out his eyes.] Apollodorus tells us that the ſons of this Hero found at Athens a good refuge againſt Eryſtheus; and that Hyllus, one of them, having ſlain him, cut off his head, and gave it to Alcmena: Καὶ τὴν μὲν κεφαλὴν ἀποστείλων Ἀλκμήνῃ δίδωσιν· ἡ δὲ κερκίσι τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ἐξώρυξεν αὐτῆς (34). i. e. " He preſented the head " which was cut off to Alcmena. And ſhe dug the " eyes out of it with a weaver's ſhuttle.

(34) Apollodori Bib. l. 2. p. 151.

[G] Several very wonderful things are related concerning her tomb.] Ageſilaüs, King of Sparta, being deſirous to remove the relicks of Alcmena to Lacedæmon, ſent ſome people to Haliartus to open the tomb of this woman. There were found therein two earthen veſſels, a bracelet of copper, and a braſs plate on which were graven letters that no body underſtood. As they reſembled the Egyptian characters, Ageſilaüs had them copied, and ſent this copy to the King of Egypt; deſiring him to cauſe his Prieſts to explain the meaning thereof if they could (35). Plutarch adds that Agetoridas, Ageſilaüs's Deputy, went to Memphis, where the Prophet Chonuphis decyphered this inſcription. It contained an order directed to the Greeks, that they ſhould live in peace, honour the Muſes, and determine their differences according to the rules of equity. The letters of the inſcription were agreeable to the characters which Hercules learnt under the reign of King Proteus. What is the moſt remarkable is, that the inhabitants of Haliartus having had a very bad harveſt, and great inundations, believed that theſe evils were come upon them becauſe they had ſuffered Alcmena's ſepulchre to be diſturbed. One reads ſuch reflections in ſeveral Legends, on account of the diſmembring or removing the bodies of Saints.

(35) Plutarch. in libr. de Socratis Genio, p. 576, & ſeq.

ALCMEON. There have been ſeveral perſons of that name. The laſt perpetual Archon of Athens was called ALCMEON. After him other Archons were created, whoſe office laſted but ten years. This alteration happened during the ſixth Olympiad, a little before Romulus built the city of Rome (a). Herodotus mentions one Alcmeon who lived at Athens in the time of Crœſus, and who did a thouſand good offices to the Ambaſſadors whom that King ſent to Delphi (b). Crœſus being informed thereof, cauſed him to come to his court, and gave him leave to take from his treaſury as much gold as he could carry. One may read in Herodotus the expedients that Alcmeon made uſe of to get himſelf well loaden. Crœſus made him ſtill other preſents, inſomuch that he put him into a capacity of adding great luſtre to his family at Athens; it was one of the moſt conſiderable there. The Alcmeonides (that is to ſay the deſcendants of Alcmeon) diſtinguiſhed themſelves there on many occaſions; and, above all, in ſtoutly oppoſing the tyranny which Piſiſtratus and his ſons endeavoured in vain to perpetuate. I believe this is the ſame Alcmeon that was General of the Athenians in the war which was undertaken for the protection of the temple at Delphi by the ſollicitation of Solon (c). I find in Plutarch one Alcmeon that was a great enemy of Themiſtocles (d). There are in Moreri's Dictionary ſeveral miſtakes concerning (a) Euſebii Chronicon.

(b) Herod. l. 6. cap. 125.

(c) Plut. in Solone, p. 84.

(d) Idem, in Vit. Ariſtid. ſub finem, p. 334 E.

cerning the word Alcmeon [A]. I am going to ſpeak ſeparately of two perſons who are of that name.

[A] There are in Moreri's Dictionary ſeveral miſtakes concerning the word Alcmeon.] I. It is not true that Alcmeon, the laſt perpetual Archon, lived about the 300th or 301ſt year of Rome. Euſebius, who quoted for this, places the laſt of the perpetual Archons before the foundation of Rome. II. Beſides, the 301ſt year of Rome does not anſwer to the year of the world 3300; but to about the year 3530, according to Petavius, or to the year 3498, according to Calviſius. III. Alcmeon, the perpetual Archon, is not the ſame Alcmeon that received ſo many preſents from Crœſus (1). He lived about 190 years before the firſt year of that Monarchs reign. IV. The laſt year of his reign anſwers to the 206th of Rome V. Herodotus, whom Moreri quotes, does not ſay that Alcmeon ſucceeded his father Megacles, in the office of Perpetual Archon; nor that the Embaſſadors of Crœſus asked Alcmeon, if he was willing to join with their Maſter to go to Delphi; nor that after he had promiſed them to do it, the King made him a preſent of as much gold as he could carry; nor that having perceived that Alcmeon had loaded himſelf with gold, beyond his ſtrength, he cauſed him to be carried to his houſe with his burden, becauſe he was not able to walk by reaſon of his load. I cannot conceive why he quotes Herodotus when he has ſo ſtrangely falſified what he ſays. VI. Alcmeon, the ſon of Amphiaraüs, did not marry Callirrhoe after the death of Alpheſibea his firſt wife: ſhe was alive during the ſecond marriage (2). VII. Plutarch does not ſay that the fable of Alcmeon ſignifies, that he ſlew his mother, that is to ſay, his privies, to go and live in the country; which is expreſſed to us by the river of his father-in-law. Would not any one think that Moreri had read in Plutarch that Alcmeon had gelt himſelf: it is what theſe words naturally import, il tua ſa mere, c'eſt a dire ſa partie. I am apt to believe that in the room of partie, our author had ſaid patrie: but that does not bring him out of the difficulty; for Plutarch has not ſaid that Alcmeon deſtroyed his country, or that he uſed it ill: He ſays on the contrary, that Alcmeon declining the Magiſtracies, and avoiding ſeditions, factions, and calumnies, choſe for himſelf a ſmall retreat, that he might live there in quiet; and that it is thus he had fled from the furies (3). VIII. Euſebius's Chronicle is ſtill more improperly quoted to explain what the fable has ſaid of Alcmeon; for of what uſe is it for the explication of this fable, to ſay that Thebes was plundered, that Tireſias was made a priſoner, and that his daughter Manto was conſecrated to the ſervice of Apollo? IX. It is not true that Euſebius refers theſe things to the 817 year of Abraham. He ſays nothing about the plundering of Thebes: He ſpeaks in general of the ſeven Captains that attacked that city, and of their deſcendants who renewed the war; he ſpeaks, I ſay, of the firſt of thoſe expeditions under the year 784, and of the laſt under the year 823. In the Xth place, neither Euſebius, nor any other Hiſtorian has related that Alcmeon's expedition againſt Thebes was unfortunate (4); for it was then that the Epigoni plundered the city, &c. XI. They did not take along with them the poor blind Tireſias: He fled along with the other Thebans before the enemy entred the city. XII. They did not take a great booty, to revenge the diſhonour their father. He ſhould have ſaid, that to revenge the diſhonour of their fathers, they undertook a ſecond expedition. XIII. It is not true that the Philoſopher Alcmeon has demonſtrated that the Moon has one particular property, that it never comes to an end. He has ſuppoſed the eternity of that Planet. It is a thing that can only be ſuppoſed; and it is a negligence more unpardonable in a Prieſt, than any other author, to ſay that any one has demonſtrated that the Moon is eternal, and that the immortal ſoul turns always round like the Sun. XIV. Euſebius ſays nothing of Alcmeon the Philoſopher. and it is undoubtedly the Poet that he meant, when he ſaid, Alcmæon clarus habetur, & Leſches Lesbius qui parvam fecit Iliadem. i. e. "Alcmeon flouriſhed then, "and likewiſe Leſches the Lesbian who compo- "ſed a ſmall Iliad." XV. He has mentioned him under the 31ſt Olympiad and not under the 69th. XVI. It is not true that Plutarch in his Life of Solon quotes an Hiſtorian called Alcmeon. Obſerve Plutarch's words: they will ſerve to ſhew how the Copyiſts plunge headlong into the groſſeſt blunders: Οὐ μὴν ἀλλ' οὐδὲ στρατηγὸς ἐπὶ τούτῳ ἀπεδείχθη τοῦ πολέμου, ὡς λέγων φησὶν Ἕρμιππος Εὐάνθη τὸν Σάμιον. Οὔτε γὰρ Αἰσχίνης ὁ ῥήτωρ τοῦτ' εἴρηκεν, ἔν τε τοῖς τῶν Δελφῶν ὑπομνήμασιν Ἀλκμαίων, ἀ Σόλων, Ἀθηναίων στρατηγὸς ἀναγέγραπται (5). i. e. "However he was not deſigned to be "the Commander in this war, as Hermippus ſays "Euanthus of Samos relates. Nor has even Æſchi- "nes the Orator ſaid ſo, and in the Delphic Com- "mentaries Alcmeon, and not Solon, was the Athe- "nian General." Lloyd and Hofman have found the pretended Hiſtorian Alcmeon in this paſſage of Plutarch: In Delphorum Commentariis, ſay they, citatur à Plutarcho in Solone. i. e. "In the Delphic "Commentaries he is quoted by Plutarch in his Life "of Solon." It is evident that theſe Delphic Commentaries are the work which they attribute to Alcmeon, and pretend to have been quoted by Plutarch. I am ſurprized that Voſſius is fallen into ſuch a miſtake. Alcmæon, ſays he (6), in Delphorum Commentariis Ἀλκμαίων ἐν τοῖς τῶν Δελφῶν ὑπομνήμασι, citatur à Plutarcho in Solone. i. e. "Alcmeon in his Del- "phic Commentaries is quoted by Plutarch in his "Life of Solon.

(1) It is ſaid ſo however in the Dutch edition. The ſupplement to Moreri ſaid only that Alcmeon had been annual Archon of Athens.

(2) Beſide Apollodorus, there is another witneſs, Ovid de Remed. Amor. ver. 455. Amphilochi frater ne Phegida ſemper amaret, Callirrhoe fecit parte recepta tori. i. e. "Calli- "rhoe being re- "ceived into "part of his bed, "kept the bro- "ther of Am- "philochus from "always loving "Phegis.

(3) Plutarch. de Exilio, p. 602.

(4) Obſerve how Moreri ſpeaks both in the Lyons edition in 1688, and in that of Holland, Après ſa malheureuſe expedition de Thebes. i. e. "After his un- "fortunate The- "ban expedition.

(5) Plutarc. in Solone, p. 84. A.

(6) Voſſius de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 501.

ALCMEON, the ſon of Amphiaraüs and Eriphyle the ſiſter of Adraſtus, ſlew his mother in obedience to the command of his father. You ſhall know immediately the reaſon of ſo ſtrange a command. Amphiaraüs looked upon Eriphyle as the cauſe of his death. He would not go to war againſt the Thebans; for being a great Diviner he had foreſeen that if he went thither he ſhould there periſh. Beſides, he had promiſed with an oath, that in all the diſputes he might have with Adraſtus, he would be wholly guided by his wife's advice. They had a diſpute about an expedition to Thebes. Adraſtus was for having Amphiaraüs engage in it. Amphiaraüs would have nothing to do with it, and diſſuaded the others from it. Eriphyle decided the diſpute according to the deſire of Adraſtus, having been gained over by a fine necklace (a) which Polynices offered her (b), and ſhe accepted, without regarding the injunction that her huſband had laid upon her to receive nothing from Polynices. She is by that means become a great ſubject of common places, and moral reflections, in the hands of the cenſurers of the ſex. It is well known that Amphiaraüs, having betaken himſelf to flight after the defeat of his army, was ſwallowed up by a gulph which a thunderclap had opened in his way. He had given orders to his ſons, before he marched againſt Thebes, that as ſoon as their age would permit they ſhould ſlay Eriphyle. All the other Generals, except Adraſtus, periſhed in that war. Their ſons took a reſolution ten years after to go and revenge the repulſe, and they made choice of Alcmeon for their Generaliſſimo, Eriphyle, again won by preſents, ſollicited them to this war. Therſander the ſon of Polynices, had preſented her with a necklace (c), and a mantle (d). Whatever deſire Alcmeon might have to ſlay his mother before he accepted of the

(a) See the notes on the article CALLIRRHOE concerning the necklace.

(b) Hyginus, chap. 73 ſays, that Adraſtus gave the necklace, and that Eriphyle diſcovered the place where Amphiaraüs had hid himſelf.

(c) Rather believe Diodorus Siculus, who ſays, that Therſander gave her only the mantle. He could not give her the necklace, becauſe Eriphyle had it already.

(d) Called in Greek Πέπλος.

command of the army, he marched againſt Thebes, without having executed the order of Amphiaraüs. The expedition proved very fortunate: The Thebans, by the advice of Tireſias, abandoned their city, which was plundered and ruined. Alcmeon, tranſported with new rage, after having learnt that Eriphyle had ſuffered her ſelf to be corrupted by preſents againſt him alſo, made no further difficulty of ſlaying her when he had conſulted the Oracle. Some writers maintain that his brother Amphilochus aſſiſted him in the parricide; but a much greater number ſay otherwiſe. Alcmeon, haunted by the furies on account of that action, retired to Pſophis in Arcadia, where he expiated his crime in the hands of Phegeüs, according to the ceremonies in ſuch caſes appointed, and married Arſinoe (e) Phegeüs's daughter, to whom he made a preſent of the ſame necklace and mantle that had been given to Eriphyle. There ariſing a great famine, recourſe was had to the Oracle, who ordered that Alcmeon ſhould take refuge with Acheloüs. He arrived in his country, after much wandring; received afreſh the ceremonies of expiation; married Callirrhoe the daughter of Acheloüs, and ſettled upon a corner of land which the river had formed [A], by heaping up the ſand. Callirrhoe declared to him that ſhe would not bed with him, if he did not make her a preſent of Eriphyle's necklace and mantle. That obliged him to go back to Phegeüs, of whom he obtained the necklace, after having made him believe that he had learnt from the Oracle, that the perſecution of the Furies would not ceaſe, till he had offered up that necklace to Apollo. Phegeüs found out afterwards that Alcmeon intended that preſent for Callirrhoe, whereupon he ordered his two ſons to purſue and kill him, which they did; and, becauſe Arſinoe was offended at it, they carried her to Tegea in a cheſt, and charged her with the murder. Some ſay that Alcmeon diverted himſelf during his madneſs with the Propheteſs Manto, daughter of Tireſias, and that he had two children by her (f). See the ſequel of all this in the article of CALLIRRHOE. The Furies of Alcmeon made a great noiſe upon the ſtage of ancient Greece (g); but we have none of thoſe Tragedies now remaining [B]. What has been ſaid of his tomb deſerves to be conſidered [C]. The Oropians who were more forward than all other people to rank Amphiaraüs amongſt the Gods, excluded Alcmeon from thoſe divine honours which they conferred upon his father and brother: They excluded him from them, I ſay, becauſe of his parricide (h). It is remarked that a certain Perſian, named Orontes, very much reſembled him (i).

There are Hiſtorians who ſay that Alcmeon, after the ſecond Theban war, went into Ætolia, upon the perſuaſion of Diomedes; that he aſſiſted him to conquer that country and Acarnania; and that having been ſummoned to join in the Trojan expedition, Diomedes went thither, but that Alcmeon ſtaid in Acarnania, and to do honour to his brother (k), he built a city which he called Argos of Amphilochus (l). Obſerve that he propheſied in Acarnania (m).

(e) Pauſanias lib. 8 p. 255, calls her Alphesibea.

(f) Extracted from Apollodor. Bibliothec. lib. 3. p. 187, & ſeq. See alſo Diod. Sic. l. 5. ch. 6.

(g) Alcmæon olim Tragicorum pulpita laſſavit furore ſuo, nunc nullam ſui nominis fabulam habet. Barthius in Statium, tom. 2. pag. 449. i. e. "Alcmæon formerly ſurfeited the ſtages of Tragedians with his raving, but there is now no play remaining that bears his name.

(b) Pauſan. l. 1. p. 33.

(i) Plutarch in Arato p. 1028.

(k) He was called AMPHILOCHUS. See the notes on that article.

(l) Strabo lib. 7. p. 225. See alſo lib. 10. p. 318.

(m) Clem. Alex. Stromat. l. 1. p. 334.

[A] He ſettled upon a corner of land which the river Achelous had formed.] It will not be amiſs to explain Apollodorus by a paſſage of Pauſanias, which imports that Alcmeon, after having ſlain his mother, fled from Argos to Pſophis, where he married Alphesibea the daughter of Phegeüs (1). The marriage did not remove the diſorder of his mind; he had therefore recourſe to the Oracle, which ordered him to retire upon land that was quite new, and produced ſince the murder of Eriphyle. He was aſſured that the Furies would not purſue him thither. Having then found in the mouth of the river Achelous, a piece of land which the waves had carried thither, he there took up his abode, and married Callirrhoe.

(1) Pauſan. l. 8. pag. 255.

[B] We have none of thoſe Tragedies now remaining.] I do not queſtion but the two verſes, which Plutarch has inſerted in one of his books, were taken from ſome of thoſe pieces. The common place which Plutarch touches in that paſſage is more important than one is aware of: it regards a failing which is obſervable every where. I mean that of thoſe who reproach their neighbour with a vice which themſelves are guilty of, or which is not ſo great as their own. Alcmeon reproaches Adraſtus with being the brother of a woman that killed her husband; Adraſtus anſwers him, And as for your part, you ſlew your own mother. It is not proper to ſet up for a Cato or a Cenſor, when ones ſelf is full of faults.

Οὐκοῦν μηδὲ μοιχὸν λοιδορήσῃς, αὐτὸς ὢν παιδομανής.
Μηδ' ἄσωτον αὐτὸς ὢν ἀνελεύθερος,
Ἀνδροκτόνης γυναικὸς ὁμογενὴς ἔφυς:
Τὸν Ἀδράστον ὁ Ἀλκμαίων. Τί οὖν ἐκεῖνος; οὐκ ἀλλότριον ἀλλὰ ἴδιον ἑαυτῷ προσφέρων ὄνειδος,
Σὺ δ' αὐτόχειρ γε μητρὸς ἣ σ' ἐγείνατο (2).

(2) Plutarch de capiendâ ex inimicis utilitate, p. 88.

" Object not adultery to another, when you yourſelf " are a Catamite; nor accuſe him of profuſion, when " you are a ſordid niggard. Alcmeon threw this " taunt in the teeth of Adraſtus,

" The woman who killed her husband was your " ſiſter.

" But what ſaid Adraſtus? He did not retort upon Alc- " meon another perſon's but his own crime.

" You ſlew your mother with your own hand.

[C] What has been ſaid of his tomb deſerves to be conſidered.] This tomb was at Pſophis in Arcadia: It had hardly any magnificence or ornaments; but it was ſurrounded with cypreſs-trees, ſo high that they could cover with their ſhade the hill that overlooked the city. They were not cut down becauſe they were ſuppoſed ſacred to Alcmeon, and they were called the Virgins (3).

(3) Idem, ibid. Pauſan. l. 8. p. 255.

ALCMEON, a native of Crotona, and diſciple of Pythagoras. It is thought that he was the firſt that wrote upon natural Philoſophy (a). He held ſome very heterodox opinions, as that the Moon was eternal, and that our ſoul is in a perpetual motion like the Sun. This is what Laertius ſays of him. Cicero repreſents this Philoſopher's ſyſtem better; for what can be more inaccurate than to make choice, amongſt all the heavenly bodies, to whoſe nature Alcmeon attributed eternity, of that whoſe variations ons are moſt apparent, I mean the Moon? Therefore he ſhould have ſaid, like Cicero (b), that this Philoſopher attributed Divinity to all the Stars, and the ſame to our ſoul. But as it is the property of bad ſyſtems, not to hang well together, we ſee that our Alcmeon did not reaſon conſequentially, when he made a great diſtinction betwixt the knowledge of the Gods, and that of men. He ſaid that the Gods knew things manifeſtly, and that men could only conjecture (c). This is what they can ſay that acknowledge one only and true God; but thoſe who take Stars and human Souls for ſo many Gods, make themſelves ridiculous of courſe, if they pretend that human and divine knowledge differ any otherwiſe than in degree. It is not true that this Alcmeon died of the pedicular diſtemper [A].

(a) Phavorin. in omnimoda Hiſt. apud Laert. in Alcmæone l. 8. Clem. Alexand. Stromat. l. 1. Theodoret. Serm. 1.

(b) Cicero de Natura Deorum, l. 1. cap. 11.

(c) Laert. in Alcmæon. l. 8.

[A] It is not true that he died of the pedicular diſtemper.] Antigonus Caryſtius has miſtaken one perſon for another, when he ſaid that Alcmeon the Naturaliſt had that diſeaſe; he took, I ſay, Alcmeon the Diſciple of Pythagoras, for the Poet Alcman (1). Charles Stephens does not content himſelf with ſaying that Alcmeon the Philoſopher died of the pedicular diſeaſe; he ſays further that he was the firſt that died of it, and he had the authority of Ælian for it. Theſe are two falſhoods: Ælian ſays nothing about our Alcmeon; it is upon Alcman the Poet that he makes ſeveral obſervations: but having ſaid that Pherecydes the Philoſopher died of the diſeaſe of which we are here ſpeaking (2), he would undoubtedly have given him the priority before Alcmeon, if he had ſpoken of the latter, with relation to that ſort of diſeaſe. The errors of Charles Stephens are found in Father Leſcalopier (3).

(1) Antig. Caryſt. Hiſt. Mirab. c 95. Meurſius in his notes has pointed out that fault to him.

(2) Ælian. var. Hiſt. l. 4. c. 28.

(3) In Cicer. de Nat. Deor. p. 41.

☞ALCRED deſcended from King Ida by his ſon Etric (a), whom Rapin calls (b) Alaric, and ſays he was Ida's natural ſon. Moll Ethelwold (c), who was not of the Royal Blood, having been choſen King of Northumberland, his election cauſed great diviſions in that Kingdom, the Nobles thinking they had as much right as he to aſpire to the crown. Among them was Alcred, who having conſpired ſecretly againſt Moll found means to draw him into his ſnares, and having killed him, he was crowned in his ſtead in the year 765 (d). Moll's party, which had been reduced very low by his death, having gained ground again, all Alcred's friends left him, ſo that he was obliged to quit the throne, and to fly to Cynoth King of the Picts, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemies (e), who would probably have treated him as he had done his predeceſſor: This happened in the year 774, ſo that Alcred reigned only about nine years; he had two ſons, Oſred and Alcmund. Oſred was made King in 789, after Elfwald (f) had been murthered; but he reigned only a few months [A]. We will ſay ſomething of Alcmund in the article of King ALDULF.

(a) Simeon Dunelmenſis, apud Twyſden, Hiſt. Ang. Script. 10. tom. 1. col. 11.

(b) Hiſt. d'Ang. tom. 1. p. 172.

(c) Rapin (ibid. p. 171) calls him Mollon-Adelwalt.

(d) Chron. de Mailros, in Rer. Ang. Script. Vet. tom. 1. p. 138.

(e) Rap. ibid. Sim. Dunelm. ubi ſupra, col. 107.

(f) Rapin, ubi ſupra, pag. 173, calls him Alphuald I. See Simeon Dunelm. ubi ſupra, col. 3.

[A] Oſred reigned only a few months.] Rapin ſays, he made himſelf ſo contemptible, that the very firſt year of his reign he was confined in a monaſtery. Simeon of Durham (1) tells us that Oſred, having been betrayed by his Nobles, was deprived of the crown, and thrown into a monaſtery at York, and that afterwards he was obliged to go into baniſhment. About two years after, viz. A. D. 792, he came back being invited by ſome Noblemen, who had promiſed upon oath to ſupport him; but his army having forſaken him, he was taken and killed the 14th of October 792, by order of King Ethelred. P.

(1) Sim. Dunelm. Hiſt. de Geſt. Anglor. apud Twyſden, tom. 1. col. 111.

☞ALCUINUS or ALBINUS (FLACCUS) a famous Engliſh writer in the eighth Century, was born in Yorkſhire (a), or, as others tell us, not far from London. He was at firſt a ſcholar of Venerable Bede, and afterwards of Egbert Archbiſhop of York (b). He was Deacon of the church of that city, and Abbot of St. Auguſtin's in Canterbury. He flouriſhed in the year 780. In 793 he was ſent for to France by Charlemagne, in order to oppoſe the hereſy of Felix Orgelitanus, and received by him with the utmoſt honour. The year following he attended that Prince to the council of Francfort, and was recommended by him as a perſon well ſkilled in Eccleſiaſtical affairs, upon which he was admitted a member of that council. Charlemagne gave him the Abbeys of Ferrara, St. Jodocus, and St. Lupus. In the year 796 he deſired leave of him to retire from ſecular affairs, which was refuſed him; however he had the Abbey of St. Martin at Tours, and another Abbey given him. In the year 798 he wrote againſt Fælix Orgelitanus, whom he had before endeavoured to prevail upon by the moſt courteous and obliging letters imaginable. In the year 799 he was deſired by Charlemagne to attend him in his journey to Rome; but he excuſed himſelf on account of his weakneſs and old age. In 801 he congratulated Charlemagne newly declared Emperor upon his return from Italy, and importuned him ſo warmly for leave to retire from court, that at laſt he obtained it. He went immediately to his Abbey of St. Martin at Tours, where he ſpent the remainder of his life in devotion and ſtudy, and inſtructing the youth in the ſchool which he founded in that city, though the Emperor endeavoured frequently by letters to recall him to court (c). Voſſius tells us (d), that Charlemagne founded the Univerſity of Paris by his advice; and other writers inform us, that ſeveral other Univerſities, as that of Tours, Soiſſons, &c. owe their original or inlargement to him (e). In ſhort France was likewiſe obliged to him for the flouriſhing ſtate of polite learning in that and the following ages. He underſtood the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages extremely well, and was an excellent Orator, Philoſopher, Mathematician, and Divine (f), and the moſt learned of all the Engliſh writers after Bede and Adhelme (g). Voſſius ſays, that he was Almoner and Privy-Counſellor to Charlemagne. He died at Tours on Whitſunday the 19th of May 804, and not in 790, as Pit's

(a) In the notes of Mr. Tindal's tranſlation of Rapin's Hiſtory of England, vol. 1. B. 3. he is ſaid to be a Northumbrian.

(b) Cave, Hiſt. Literar. Sæc. 8. p. 420. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(c) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(d) De Hiſt. Lat. l. 2. c. 30.

(e) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(f) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

(g) Baleus, de Script. Britann. Cent. 2. c. 17.

Pit's falſely affirms (h). He was buried in the church of St. Martin in that city, and an epitaph of twenty four verſes of his own compoſition (i) was inſcribed upon his Tomb. His ſtyle is very neat and lively; he writes with a great deal of ſpirit, and his expreſſions are extremely pure conſidering the age in which he lived; and the turn which he gives to elegance in things is very agreeable. In ſhort, he wants neither eloquence, nor even politeneſs and elegance in his compoſitions (k). He wrote many books, the greateſt part of which are ſtill extant. We ſhall give a catalogue of them in a note [A].

(b) Script. Ang. Illuſt. p. 156.
(i) Labbe in Theſauro Epitaph. p. 82.
(k) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 6. p. 123. edit. de Mons, 1692.

[A] We ſhall give a catalogue of them in a note.] They were collected together, and publiſhed in one volume in folio, by Andrew du Cheſne at Paris in 1617. They are divided into three parts; the firſt contains the tracts upon Scripture; the ſecond thoſe upon Doctrine, Diſcipline, and Morality; and the third Hiſtorical Treatiſes, Letters, and Poems. The firſt part contains the following works: Interrogationes & Reſponſiones; ſeu Liber Quæſtionum in Geneſin; i. e. "Queſtions and Anſwers upon the Book "of Geneſis." Dicta ſuper illud Geneſeos, Faciamus hominem ad imaginem noſtram; i. e. "A Diſcourſe "upon theſe words in Geneſis, Let us make man in "our own image." Enchiridium ſeu Expoſitio pia brevis in ſeptem Pſalmos Penitentiales, in Pſalmum centeſimum octodecimum, & in Pſalmos graduales ad Arnonem Archiepiſcopum Salisburgienſem; i. e. "An "Enchiridion, or a ſhort Expoſition of the ſeven Peni-"tential Pſalms, and the hundred and eighteenth Pſalm, "and the Pſalms of Degrees, dedicated to Arno "Archbiſhop of Saltzburg." It was printed ſeparately at Paris 1547 in 8vo; but without the Preface, which was firſt publiſhed by Lucas Dacherius (1). De Pſalmorum Uſu Liber; i. e. "Of the Uſe of "Pſalms," with divers Forms of Prayers fitted for daily uſe, dedicated to Fredegiſus his Scholar. Officia per Ferias; i. e. "Offices for the holy days." Epiſtola de illo Cantici Canticorum loco, Sexaginta ſunt Reginæ &c. i. e. "An Epiſtle concerning that "place in the Canticles. There are threſcore Queens "&c." Commentaria in Eccleſiaſten; i. e. "Com-"mentaries upon Eccleſiaſtes," printed at Baſil 1531, 8vo. Commentariorum in S. Joannis Evangelium Libri ſeptem; i. e. "Seven Books of Commentaries "upon St. John's Goſpel," printed at Strasburg 1527. At the end of this part of Alcuinus's works it is obſerved, that he undertook by Charlemagne's order the correction of the whole text of the Vulgate Bible, and that this work is ſtill to be found in the Library of Vauxcolles, with his verſes upon it (2), intitled, Epigrammata de Recognitione & Emendatione totius divinæ Scripturæ (3).

(1) Specileg. tom. 9.
(2) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.
(3) Cave, ubi ſupra.

The ſecond part contains the following Tracts: De Fide S. S. Trinitatis, Libri III, ad Carolum Magnum; cum Invocatione ad S. Trinitatem & Symbolo Fidei; i. e. "Three Books concerning the Faith in the "Holy Trinity, addreſſed to Charlemagne; with an "Invocation to the Holy Trinity, and the Creed." De Trinitate ad Fridegiſum Quæſtiones xxviii, ſeu Confeſſio ſive Doctrina de Deo; i. e. "Twenty eight "Queſtions concerning the Trinity, addreſſed to "Fridegiſus, or a Confeſſion or Doctrine concerning "God." De Differentia æterni & ſempiterni, immortalis & perpetui, ævi & temporis Epiſtola; i. e. "A Letter to explain what time, eternity and age, "&c. are." De Animæ Ratione Liber, ad Eulaliam Virginem; i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning the Soul, "dedicated to the Virgin Eulalia." Contra Fælicem Orgelitanum Epiſcopum, Libri VII. i. e. "Seven "Books againſt Felix Biſhop of Urgel," who maintained that Jeſus Chriſt might properly be called the adopted Son of God with regard to his humun nature. This was written in 798, and is falſly aſcribed in the Bibliotheca Patrum to Paulinus of Aquileia. Epiſtola ad Elipandum; i. e. "An Epiſtle to Elipan-"dus," Biſhop of Toledo upon the ſame ſubject." Epiſtola Elipandi ad Alcuinum; i. e. "An Epiſtle "of Elipandus to Alcuinus," in defence of his opinion, written with great virulence and in a very barbarous ſtyle (4). Contra Elipandi Epiſtolam Libelli IV; i. e. "Four Books in anſwer to Elipandus's Epiſtle," which are written with great candour and moderation (5). At the end of theſe four Books is an Advertiſement of Alcuinus concerning the origin of Felix's error, and the retractation which he made; the Letter of Elipandus to Felix; the Confeſſion of Faith, which he made after he had retracted; and a Letter of Alcuinus upon the queſtions, which might be raiſed concerning the Son of God. Theſe are the pieces contained in the ſecond part. The firſt work concerning Diſcipline is that intitled, De Divinis Officiis Liber, ſive Expoſitio Romani Ordinis; i. e. "A Diſ-"courſe concerning the divine Offices, or, an Expo-"ſition of the Roman Office." This is publiſhed with his name, but it was written by a later author; ſince it mentions Hilperic, who lived in the tenth Century, and contains many obſervations, which belong to a later age, than that of Alcuinus (6). De Ratione Septuageſimæ, Sexageſimæ, & Quinquageſimæ Epiſtola; which is an Epiſtle to Charlemagne concerning the Septuageſima, Sexageſima, and Quinquageſima, and the difference of the number of weeks in Lent, with that Emperor's Anſwer upon the ſame ſubject. De Baptiſmi Ceremoniis ad Odvinum Presbyterum Epiſtola; i. e. "An Epiſtle to Odwin "the Presbyter concerning the Ceremonies of Bap-"tiſm." De iiſdem Ceremoniis alia Epiſtola; i. e. "Another Epiſtle concerning the ſame Ceremonies." Father Sirmond very juſtly denies this to have been written by Alcuinus, ſince it belongs to Amilarius of Treves. De Confeſſione peccatorum ad pueros S. Martini Epiſtola; i. e. "A Letter to the youths of St. "Martin concerning the Confeſſion of ſins." Sacramentorum Liber; i. e. "A Book of Sacraments," or Maſſes for ſeveral holy days. Homiliæ III. 1. De Silentio, in quo miſſum eſt incarnatum Verbum. 2. In Nativitate B. Mariæ. 3. In Feſto omnium Sanctorum. i. e. "Three Homilies; the 1ſt upon the Incarna-"tion, the 2d upon the Nativity of the Virgin, "and the third upon the Feaſt of All-Saints." Theſe Homilies are taken from Paulus Diaconus's Book of Homilies, and very probably are not Alcuinus's. Vita Antichriſti ad Carolum Magnum; i. e. "The Life of Antichriſt, dedicated to Charlemagne." De Virtutibns & Vitiis ad Widonem Comitem Liber; i. e. "A Diſcourſe concerning Virtues and Vices, "dedicated to Earl Wido." De ſeptem Artibus Liber imperfectus; i. e. "An imperfect Book con-"cerning the ſeven Arts." There are only two chapters remaining, viz. of Grammar and Rhetoric, with a tranſition to Logic. Grammatica; i. e. "The "Grammar," was publiſhed ſeparately at Hanow. "1605. De Rhetoricâ, & de Virtutibus Dialogus; i. e. "A Dialogue upon Rhetoric and the Virtues," printed at Paris in 4to, 1599. Dialectica; i. e. "Lo-"gic," in a Dialogue between Charlemagne and Alcuinus, printed with the Grammar at Ingolſtad in 4to, 1604. Diſputatio Regalis, being a Dialogue between Pipin afterwards King of Italy, and Albin or Alcuinus.

(4) Cave, ubi ſupra.
(5) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.
(6) Du Pin, and Cave, ubi ſupra.

The laſt part of his works contains the following: Scriptum de Vitâ S. Martini Turonenſis; i. e. "The "Life of St. Martin of Tours." De Tranſitu S. Martini Sermo; i. e. "A Sermon upon the Death of "St. Martin." Vita S. Vedaſti Epiſcopi Atrebatenſis; i. e. "The Life of St. Vedaſt Biſhop of Arras," written in the year 795. Vita beatiſſimi Richardi Presbyteri; i. e. "The Life of St. Riguier the Prieſt." De Vitâ S. Willebrordi Trajectenſis Epiſcopi Libri II; i. e. "Life of St. Willebrord Biſhop of Utrecht, in "two Books," one in proſe, and the other in verſe, with an Homily upon him. They are publiſhed in Mabillon (7) and Surius (8). Epiſtolæ cxv. i. e. "cxv Epiſtles," 67 of which are in Caniſius. Poemata & Verſus de pluribus Sanctis; i. e. "Poems "and Verſes upon ſeveral Saints." And ſeveral other Verſes collected from divers places. Since Du Cheſne's Edition of his works, there have been publiſhed ſeveral other Tracts of his; as particularly, Commentarius brevis in Cantica Canticorum; i. e. "A ſhort Commentary upon the Canticles," publiſhed by Patrick Young with the Commenrary of Gilbert Foliot at London, in 4to, 1638. Breviarium Fidei adverſus Arianos; i. e. "An Abridgment "of (7) Sæc. Benedict. III. Par. 1. p. 601.

(8) 7 Novemb.

ALCYONIUS (PETER) was one of thoſe learned Italians who improved the Belles Lettres in the ſixteenth Century. He acquired a very reaſonable knowledge of Greek and Latin, and wrote ſome Pieces of Eloquence, which have deſerved the approbation of the Learned. He was corrector of the preſs for a long time at Venice for Aldus Manutius [A]; and by conſequence he ought to ſhare in the praiſes given to the editions of that learned Printer. He has tranſlated into Latin ſeveral Treatiſes of Ariſtotle (a), and has not very well ſucceeded in them. Sepulveda wrote againſt theſe verſions, and pointed out ſo many faults in them, that Alcyonius could find no better way to remedy his diſgrace, than by buying up as many copies as was poſſible of Sepulveda's work, to burn them [B]. Paulus Jovius accuſes him of a ſecond fault, which is more ſhameful than the firſt; that of being an impudent Paraſite [C], who made no difficulty of eating two or three times a day at other peoples houſes. I do not know whether we

(a) See the catalogue of them in Geſner's Bibliotheca.

" of the Faith againſt the Arians;" publiſhed by Father Sirmond at Paris 1630, without the author's name; but Father Chifflet (9) tells us, that the MSS. aſcribe to Alcuinus, Homilia de Purificatione B. Mariæ Virginis; i. e. " An Homily concerning " the Purification of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary," printed without a name among St. Ambroſe's works, and reſtored to Alcuinus by Mr. Baluze (10). Epiſtolæ II, & Sermo ad Carolum Magnum; i. e. " Two E- " piſtles and a Diſcourſe to Charlemagne," publiſhed by Baluze (11). Epiſtola & Præfatio in Libros VII, ad Fælicem Orgelitanum; i. e. " An Epiſtle and Pre- " face to the ſeven Books againſt Felix Biſhop of " Urgel," which was wanting in the printed copies. Theſe two pieces were likewiſe publiſhed by Baluze (12). Three Epiſtles publiſh'd by Dacherius (13). Twenty ſix Epiſtles, publiſhed by Father Mabillon (14). Carmen de Cuculo, a Poem, in which he laments the irregular conduct of one of his friends, whom he conceals under the name of the Cuckow; and two other Poems, publiſhed by Mabillon (15), and others by Mr. Baluze (16). Two Poems, the firſt a ſhort one in heroic verſe, and the other a long one in elegiac verſe, both of them chiefly upon the argument of the books of the Old and New Teſtament. Theſe were publiſhed by Lambecius (17). An Hymn, and three Epigrams upon St. Vedaſt, publiſhed by the ſame (18), Homilia in Die Natali S. Vedaſti; i. e. " An Homily upon the Birth Day of St. Vedaſt," publiſhed by Bollandus (19). The Homiliarium of Paulus Diaconus is aſcribed in many MSS. to Alcuinus, and has been often publiſhed under his name, but erroneouſly. Libri quatuor Carolini de Imaginibus, againſt worſhipping of images, are ſaid by Roger Hoveden (20) to have been written by Alcuinus in the name of the Emperor Charlemagne. Confeſſio Fidei; i. e. " A Confeſſion of Faith," collected from the writings of St. Auſtin and other Fathers, and divided into four parts, publiſhed under Alcuinus's name by Chifflet at Dijon in 4to, 1656, among ſeveral Tracts of other writers. However it is not agreed among learned Men, whether this confeſſion is the genuine production of Alcuinus. Mr. Daillé endeavoured to prove it ſpurious in a poſthumous Tract of his publiſhed at Roan in 1675. But Father Mabillon has attempted to juſtify Alcuinus to be the author of it in a long Diſſertation, printed in his Analecta (21). However he owns very candidly, that he has not abſolutely demonſtrated that point, but only render'd it very probable. Poema Heroicum de Pontificibus Anglis & Sanctis Eccleſiæ Eboracenſis; i. e. " An Heroic Poem upon the Engliſh Biſhops and " the Saints of the Church of York." This Poem contains 1658 Verſes, and was copied from two MSS. one at Reims in France, and the other at St. Theodoric near Reims, and ſent by Father Mabillon to Dr. Thomas Gale Dean of York, who publiſhed it under Alcuinus's name in his edition of the Rerum Anglic. Scriptores (22). But Oudin (23) is not of opinion that this was written by Alcuinus, ſince the Poetry is ſo very barbarous, and infinitely inferior to his other Poems; and for other reaſons, which he alledges (24); but rather aſcribes it to Fridegodus, a Benedictine Monk, who lived about the year 960. Dr. Gale aſſured the world, that he had ſeveral Epiſtles of Alcuinus, which never were publiſhed. The works of that Writer, which are loſt, were his Commentary upon the Proverbs, and four of St. Paul's Epiſtles, viz. that to the Epheſians, to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews; A Book concerning Orthography; and another concerning Muſic (25). Voſſius tells us (26), that ſome aſcribe to him the Life of Charlemagne, publiſhed under the name of Eginhart; but this is a very groundleſs opinion.

(9) Præfat. in Opera Ferrandi.

(10) Miſcellan. tom. 2. p. 382.

(11) Ibid. tom. 1. p. 365.

(12) Ibid. tom. 4. p. 413.

(13) Spicileg. tom. 9.

(14) Analect. tom. 4. p. 272.

(15) Ibid. tom. 1. p. 369. and tom. 2. p. 552.

(16) Miſcell. tom. 4.

(17) Comment. de Biblioth. Vindob. l. 2. c. 5. p. 403.

(18) Ib. p. 413.

(19) Acta Sanctor. Menſe Feb. p. 800.

(20) Annal. ad ann. 792.

(21) Tom. 1. p. 178, &c.

(22) Tom. 3. p. 703.

(23) Comment. de Scriptor. & Script. Eccleſiaſt. Sæc. 8. tom. 1. Col. 1923. edit. Francofurt 1722.

(24) Sæc. 10. tom. 2. Col. 467, 468.

(25) See Cave, ubi ſupra, pag. 421.

(26) Ubi ſupra.

[A] He was Corrector of the preſs a long time, at Venice, for Aldus Manutius.] Paulus Jovius does not ſay ſo much of him. Cum diu in Chalcographorum officinis, ſays he (1), corrigendis erroribus menſtruâ mercede operam navaſſet, multa obſervatione ad præcellentem ſcribendi facultatem pervenit. i. e. " When he had laboured a long time at correcting " in the Printers ſhops, for a monthly ſalary, he " came by much obſervation to an excellent faculty " of writing." It is from Mr. Varillas, that I draw what concerns Aldus Manutius; and I confeſs that I do it trembling, conſidering the great number of faults which this writer has committed, concerning the great wits he ſpeaks of in his Anecdotes of Florence. The Public is indebted to him, ſays he (2), for Aldus Manutius's exactneſs in the printing of the beſt Greek and Latin Authors which we admire at preſent; for he was all his life corrector of this famous preſs. This laſt particular is falſe; for Alcyonius was Profeſſor at Florence, under the Pontificate of Adrian VI.

(1) Paul. Jovius, Elogior. cap. 123. pag. 265.

(2) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, p. 168.

[B] He bought up as many copies as was poſſible of Sepulveda's verſion of Ariſtotle, to burn them.] Paulus Jovius takes notice of that: Quum aliqua ex Ariſtotele perperam inſolenterque vertiſſet, in eum Sepulveda vir Hiſpanus, egregie de literis meritus, edito volumine peracuta jacula contorſit ... tanto quidem eruditorum applauſu, ut Alcyonius ignominiæ dolore miſerè conſternatus, Hiſpani hoſtis libros in tabernis, ut concremaret, gravi pretio coëmere cogeretur (3). i. e. " When he had given a wrong and unuſual verſion " of ſome paſſages of Ariſtotle, Sepulveda a Spaniard, " a man who has deſerved much of the learned " world, fell ſharply upon him in a book he " publiſhed ..., and that with ſuch approbation of " the Learned, that Alcyonius being grievouſly " ſmitten with the ignominy, was forced to buy up " his adverſary's books, at a great price, to burn " them." See the Letters of the Princes *, collected by Ruſcelli, and tranſlated by Belleforêt, folio 93. See alſo the xxviiith and laſt Letter of the iii book of Longolius. Si benè te novi, ipſe tu denunciabis; ut hominis ad tantæ contumeliæ nuncium, vultum videas: quod unum ſanè ſpectaculum tibi magnopere invideo. Nunquam enim is ex oculis laborabit, qui tum ejus frontem ſpectârit (4). i. e. " If I know you " well, you will denounce; namely, that Sepulveda's " work was printed, that you may ſee the face of the " man at the news of ſo great a reproach: which " one ſight truly I greatly envy you. For he will " never have his eyes ſore, who ſhall ſee his face " at that time."

(3) Paul. Jovius, Elogior. c. 123. pag. 265.

* Les Epitres des Princes.

(4) Longolius, Epiſt. ultimâ lib. 3. fol. 256 verſo.

[C] He was accuſed ... of being an impudent Paraſite.] Let us relate the words of Paulus Jovius. Cum nulla ex parte ingenuis, ſed plane plebeis & ſordidis moribus fœdaretur, erat enim impudens gulæ mancipium, ita ut eodem ſæpe die bis & ter aliena tamen quadra cœnitaret; nec in ea fœditate malus omnino medicus, quod domi demum in lecti limine per vomitum ipſo crapulæ onere levaretur (5). i. e. " Since he had nothing in him of a Gentleman, " but was of a low and ſordid behaviour; for he " was an impudent ſlave to his appetite, ſo that he " would eat two or three dinners in a day, but at " other mens tables; however in the midſt of all " this gluttony he was no bad Phyſician, for when " he went home he would empty himſelf of his

(5) Paul. Jovius, Elogior. c. 123. p. 265.

we muſt entirely believe Paulus Jovius, for he quarrelled with Alcyonius (b), as ſoon as he heard that he was his rival in the commiſſion of writing Hiſtory [D]. The Treatiſe that Alcyonius publiſhed concerning Baniſhment contained ſo many fine things mixt with others quite the reverſe, that it was thought he had tacked to his own thoughts ſeveral fragments of a Treatiſe of Cicero de Gloria, and that afterwards, to keep himſelf from being convicted of this theft, he burnt this manuſcript of Cicero [E], which was the only one extant (c). The two Orations he made after the taking (b) See the Letters of the Princes, Les Epirets des Princes fol. 92 verſo.

(c) Jovius, Elogior. c. 123.

" load by his bed's ſide." Mr. Varillas ſpeaks only of the drunkenneſs of Alcyonius: he only accuſes him of getting drunk as often as he had an opportunity. Latomus, whoſe verſes are related by Paulus Jovius, makes mention of two exceſſes of this perſon, drinking and eating.

[D] Paulus Jovius thought him his rival in writing Hiſtory.] Where we learn this, it is added that it is not true that Alcyonius was to compoſe a Hiſtory; and that Paulus Jovius was told ſo, only to ſet them together by the ears (6). Cardinal de Medicis diverted himſelf with theſe quarrels of learned Men: he took a pleaſure in the uneaſineſs he gave Alcyonius, by protecting Sepulveda (7). Obſerve that Alcyonius made very great commendations on the firſt Decad of Paulus Jovius's Hiſtory, in the ſecond part of his Treatiſe de Exilio.

(6) Lettres des Princes, fol. 93.

(7) Ibid.

[E] He was accuſed of having appropriated to himſelf ſome frugments of a Treatiſe of Cicero de Gloriâ, and of having afterwards burnt it.] Paulus Jovius is not the only one that relates this fatal cheat. Paulus Manutius, in his Commentary on theſe words of Cicero, Librum tibi celeriter mittam de Gloria (8), i. e. "I will ſend you my Book on Glory," ſpeaks of it thus, Libros duos ſignificat, quos de Gloria ſcripſit: qui uſque ad patrum noſtrorum ætatem pervenerunt. Nam Bernardus Juſtinianus, in Indice librorum ſuorum nominat Ciceronem de Gloriâ. Is liber poſtea, cum univerſam Bibliothecam Bernardus Monacharum monaſterio legâſſet, magnâ conquiſitus curâ, neutiquam eſt inventus. Nemini dubium fuit, quin Petrus Alcyonius, cui Monachæ Medico ſuo ejus tractandæ Bibliothecæ poteſtatem fecerant, homo improbus furto averterit. Et ſanè in ejus opuſculo de exſilio, aſperſa nonnulla deprehenduntur, quæ non olere Alcyonium Auctorem, ſed aliquanto præſtantiorem artificem videantur. i. e. "He means his two books Of Glory, " which have laſted down to the age of our Fathers. " For Bernardus Juſtinianus, in the Index of his " books names Cicero de Gloriâ. That book after- " wards, when Bernardus left his whole Library, " which he had very carefully collected, to a Nunnery, " could no where be found. No body doubted, but " Peter Alcyonius, to whom being their Phyſician " the Nuns had given the uſe of their Library, had " wickedly ſtollen it. And truly in his treatiſe Of " Baniſhment, ſome things are found ſcattered here " and there, which do not ſeem to ſavour of Al- " cyonius, but of ſome better author." We learn from this paſſage that Alcyonius was a Phyſician by profeſſion. See the note [I]. But ſince he belonged to a Convent, it cannot be true, methinks, that he paſſed all his life in Manutius's printing-houſe. It is a new proof of Varillas's miſtaking.

(8) Cicero, Epiſt. ad Attic. xxvii. lib. 15.

REMARKS upon Varillas.

I have two things to obſerve againſt this Hiſtorian. The firſt is, that in the Fragment of his Louïs XI, he imputed to Philelphus the plagiariſm and deſtruction of the Treatiſe de Gloriâ, and quoted the little Elogies of Paulus Jovius. He was acquainted (9), that it was not there. He made uſe no doubt of this advice, in publiſhing his Louïs XI; for after having made the ſame obſervation concerning Philelphus as in the Fragment, he adds: It is not certain however, that he was guilty of this crime, which is eſteemed one of the greateſt that can be committed in literature; and there are ſome authors, who impute it to a learned man of the ſame age, named Alcyonius, and affirm that he appropriated this book of Cicero to himſelf, after having changed the title, which was of Glory, into that of Baniſhment (10). He applies the quotation of Paulus Jovius to this laſt fact. If he had entirely ſuppreſſed what regards Philelphus, he would have diſengaged himſelf much better; for where could he have found that Philelphus was guilty of this theft? Beſides, Alcyonius is not accuſed of having publiſhed Cicero's Book, and only changing the title: one might eaſily have pardoned his vanity, if he had been guilty only of that; the joy of having Cicero's work would make the fraud be forgotten: but he is accuſed of having taken a rich imbroidery out of it, to put upon his own rags, and afterwards burning the whole work of Cicero. Ex libro de Gloriâ Ciceronis, quem nefaria malignitate aboleverat, multorum judicio confectum crederetur. In eo enim tanquam vario centone præclara excellentis purpuræ fila, languentibus cæteris coloribus, intertexta notabantur (11). i. e. "It is thought by many to have been framed " out of Cicero's book of Glory, which he had wick- " edly deſtroyed. For it appeared like a piece of " patch-work, wherein were ſome beautiful well- " coloured pieces, mixt with others that were quite " faded."

(9) In the Nouvelles de la Republiques des Lettres, June 1685, Article I, towards the end.

(10) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XI, Liv. 1. pag. 39. of the Dutch edition.

(11) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 123. p. 266.

My ſecond remark is, that when Mr. Varillas makes mention of Franciſcus Philelphus, in the Anecdotes of Florence (12), he aſcribes nothing to him with regard to the book de Gloria: It is Alcyonius alone, that he accuſes of this crime. He ſays (13) that the miſerable Plagiary was obliged to comfort the Proveditor Cornaro in the baniſhment to which he was condemned, for having been beaten in his war with the Turks, tho' it was not his fault. Algionus (14) ſent him the book De fortiter toleranda exilii fortunâ: and, as this Treatiſe was compoſed only of ill adjuſted ſentences of Cicero's book of Glory, it was nevertheleſs very well eſteemed, tho' the moſt judicious obſerved that there was no connexion in it. Algionus, fluſh'd with the ſucceſs of his work, changed his deſign of printing the piece of Cicero. And as he well knew that no body elſe had a copy of it, he threw it in the fire, for fear it ſhould be found ſome time or other among his papers, and ſo he ſhould be convicted of the theft. If we compare this relation with that which is found in the Life of Louis XI, we cannot help being ſurprized that the very ſame man could relate a fact with ſo many incompatible varieties. As I have not this Treatiſe of Alcyonius, I cannot determine by myſelf, whether Mr. Varillas is right with regard to the ſubject and the occaſion. I can ſay only, that the title he gives it is not conformable to what Geſner has ſet down, Medices Legatus, ſive de Exilio Liber; and that a paſſage of this book (15) has ſhewed me that John de Medicis, who was Pope Leo X, ſpeaks in it. But what I cannot determine by myſelf, I can affirm upon the word of one of my friends, whoſe exactneſs and parts are very well known to me (16). This is the information he has given me. " The Legatus Medices, ſeu de " Exilio, of Peter Alcyonius, very far from being " written to ſerve as a conſolation to the pretended " Proveditor Cornaro, is addreſſed by the author ad " Nicolaum Schonbergium, Pontificem Campanum " (17), and in the whole book there is not one word " that can directly or indirectly regard Cornaro. This " work, printed at Baſil, in 1546, is divided into " two books, of which this is the title word for word: " Petri Alcionii Medices Legatus, ſeu de Exilio, ad " Nicolaum Schonbergium, Pontificem Campanum. It " is written by way of Dialogue, in which John " de Medicis, afterwards Leo X, Julius de Medicis, " and Laurence de Medicis, are the ſpeakers. This " is the reaſon that Medices was put in the title; and " becauſe the author ſuppoſes that theſe ſpeakers " diſcourſed ſoon after Pope Julius II had ſent John " de Medicis as his Legate at the head of the ar- " my, that was to retake Bologna, the word Legatus " is joined to that of Medices." Here follows moſt certainly a groſs fault. He repented however towards the latter end of his (Alcionius) life, and made a ſort of Amende honourable at the beginning of two Orations which he had compoſed at Venice upon the deſolation of Rôme by the Lutherans (18). We cannot queſtion but the author pretended to tranſlate theſe words of Paulus

(12) Page 169.

(13) Page 168.

(14) It is always put thus in the edition of the Anecdotes.

(15) It is curious; read it in the Opuſcules de Colomiés, ch. 15.

(16) Mr. de Larroque.

(17) He was afterwards a Cardinal: I ſpeak of him under SCHOMBERG (NICHOLAS).

(18) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, p. 168.

taking of Rome, in which he very eloquently repreſented the injuſtice of Charles the Fifth, and the barbarity of his ſoldiers, diſſipated a little the evil ſuſpicions that had been formed againſt him (d). They are two excellent pieces. There is an Oration mentioned that he made upon the Knights who died at the ſiege of Rhodes (e). He was Profeſſor at Florence, under the Pontificate of Adrian VI, and had beſides his penſion ten ducats a month from the Cardinal de Medicis, to tranſlate a work of Galen (f). As ſoon as he knew that this Cardinal was created Pope, he aſked leave of the Florentines to depart; and though he was refuſed it, he went nevertheleſs to Rome in full hopes of raiſing himſelf there (g). He loſt all his wealth during the troubles the Columna's excited in Rome; and ſome time after, when the Emperor's troops took the city, in the year 1527, he received a wound in going to take ſhelter in the Caſtle of St. Angelo. He entered it in ſpite of the ſoldiers who purſued him, and joined Clement VII. He was guilty of a baſe ingratitude towards this Pope; for, as ſoon as the ſiege was raiſed, he ſurrendered himſelf to Cardinal Pompeius Columna, at whoſe houſe he died of ſickneſs within a few months (h). His vanity hindered him from making greater progreſſes [F], and his railing drew upon him many enemies [G]. The ſupplement to Moreri is extremely bad upon this article [H]; it is only a faithful copy of the enormous faults of Mr. Varillas. However, there are very learned men who have highly praiſed Alcyonius, and his tranſlations [I].

(d) Jovius, ibid.
(e) Letters of the Princes, fol. 13.
(f) It is that de Partibus Animalium.
(g) Letters of the Princes, fol. 95.
(h) Pierius Valerianus de Literat. Infelicitat. p. 63.

There

Paulus Jovius: Verùm non multo poſt confirmatæ ſuſpicionis invidiam duabus ſplendidiſſimis Orationibus peregregiè mitigavit, quum in clade urbis vehementiſſimè invectus in Cæſarem, populi Romani injurias & Barbarorum immanitatem ſumma perfecti Oratoris eloquentiâ deploraſſet. i. e. "But not long after he "made conſiderable mitigation of the invidious ſuſ- "picion he lay under, by two very fine Orations, "wherein he inveighed moſt vehemently againſt the "Emperor, on account of the deſtruction of the city, "and deplored the injuries of the Roman people, "and the cruelty of the Barbarians, with the higheſt "eloquence of a moſt conſummate Orator." Is there the leaſt ſhadow of Lutherans in this paſſage? Is there any trace of repentance? any footſtep of puniſhment, on account of the book de Gloria? Had Paulus Jovius any other deſign than to ſhew that Alcyonius's Orations were thought ſo good, that he was leſs ſuſpected than before of being incapable of producing from his own brain the fineſt parts of the book de Exilio? It appears to me a great falſhood that theſe Orations were compoſed at Venice.

As to the reſt, I am ſurprized that Pierius Valerianus, who has regretted the ſuppreſſion of a work, with which he has taxed Alcyonius, has ſaid nothing of the Treatiſe de Gloria. Having related that Peter Martellus was not able to finiſh ſome works, becauſe of his ſickneſs, he adds: Quatuor tamen libros exactiſſimæ interpretationis in mathematicas diſciplinas Braccius ejus filius ab interitu vindicarat, vel ipſius auctoris de ſe teſtimonio abſolutos, atque ii Barbarorum (19) manus effugerant, Braccii ipſius diligentia in arcem Æliam aſportati. Sed enim in Petri Alcyonii manus cum incidiſſent, ita ſuppreſſi ſunt, ut nuſquam amplius apparuerint (20). i. e. "His "ſon Braccius had retrieved from deſtruction four "accurate Mathematical Treatiſes, which the author "himſelf teſtifies were finiſhed, and having eſcaped "the hands of the ſoldiers were carried into the "Ælian tower by the care of Braccius himſelf. "But when they had fallen into the hands of Peter "Alcyonius, they were ſo ſuppreſſed as never to appear "any more." After the firſt edition of this Dictionary, Mr. Bourdelot, Phyſician to the King of France and to the Ducheſs of Burgundy, did me the favour of ſending me his copy of Alcyonius's Treatiſe. It is a ſmall volume in 4to, printed at Venice, in 1522, in ædibus Aldi & Andreæ Aſulani ſoceri. Its title is, Petri Alcyonii Medices Legatus de Exſilio, and contains two parts (21), both which are dedicated ad Nicolaum Schonbergium, Pontificem Campanum. I have found the information that Mr. Larroque has given me concerning this work perfectly juſt. It contains nothing that relates to the baniſhment of a Venetian Proveditor. The three Speakers conſider only their own proper ſtate. They were all of them of the Medicæan family, and had the misfortune to be baniſhed. John de Medicis comforts himſelf and comforts them: it is he that is the principal perſonage of the piece, and delivers the reaſons and examples; it is to him, in ſhort, that the author lends his erudition, and elegant ſtyle. Obſerve, that this work of Alcyonius was reprinted at Geneva, in 1624, in 8vo, with two Treatiſes of Cardan (22).

(19) He ſpeaks of the ſoldiers of Charles V, who plundered Rome in 1527.
(20) Petrus Valerianus de Literat. Infelicit. p. 76.
(21) To the firſt, there is put at the top of the pages, Medices Legatus prior, and to the ſecond Medices legatus poſterior.
(22) That de Sapientiâ, and that de Conſolatione.

[F] His vanity hindered him from making greater progreſſes.] It is the opinion of Pierius Valerianus: Non diſplicuiſſet mihi, ſays he (23), Alcyonius, ſi quantum ſtylo profecerat, amicorum conſilium de rebus adhibere voluiſſet, qui niſi ipſemet ſibi tantum arrogaſſet futurus omnino fuerat e primoribus, multam enim Græcis, Latiniſque literis operam impenderat, & diſciplinis variis oblectatus erat. That is, "Alcyo- "nius would not have diſpleaſed me, if he would "have made as much uſe of the advice of his friends "in things, as he excelled in ſtyle, who if he "had not arrogated too much to himſelf, would "have been a man of the firſt rate, for he had taken "much pains about Greek and Latin, and delighted "in various parts of learning.

(23) Petrus Valerian. de Literat. Infelicit. p. 63.

[G] His railing drew upon him many enemies.] Let us hear the ſame witneſs again: Is eo primum infelicitatis incommodo flagellatus eſt, quod dum de litteratis omnibus malè ſentit, dicaciſſima omnes obtrectatione lacerabat, unde omnium tam doctorum quam imperitorum in ſe odium concitârat i. e. "He laboured under that great "unhappineſs of having an ill opinion of all learned "men, and ſlandering them in a moſt abuſive man- "ner, by which he drew upon himſelf the hatred "of all, both learned and unlearned" See the Note [K].

[H] The ſupplement to Moreri is extremely bad upon this article.] I. There is no notice taken that the Algionus of the Anecdotes of Mr. Varillas is a chimera of the Copyiſts. He had Alcyonius no doubt in the original of thoſe Anecdotes, and conſequently the pretended Algionus muſt not be diſtinguiſhed from Peter Alcyonius, whom Moreri had rightly placed in the ſixteenth Century. This brings to my remembrance that Claudius du Verdier, page 73 of his Cenſura in omnes penè Auctores ſays, that Petrus Avionius has pointed out a great many faults in Apuleius's book de Mundo. The errata corrects Avionius by Alcyonius. Avionius however is quoted in the fifty ſixth page of the Plagiariorum Syllabus, printed at Amſterdam in 1694, with the Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ of Mr. Almeloveen. II. It ſhould have been conſidered, that according to Mr. Varillas, this pretended Algionus having deplored the ravage that Charles V made at Rome under Clement VII, ought to have been placed in the ſixteenth Century. III. What is taken from the Anecdotes has not been cleared from any fault.

[I] There are very learned men, who have highly praiſed Alcyonius and his tranſlations.] I ſhall content myſelf with relating what was written to Eraſmus by Ambroſe Leo of Nola, in 1518. This friend of Eraſmus, who was a very able Phyſician, gave him notice that the Senate of Venice had proclaimed with ſound of trumpet, that all thoſe who aſpired to the Greek Profeſſorſhip, vacant by the death of Marcus Muſurus, ſhould offer themſelves, and that two months were allowed to take their names, and ſee what what they were capable of performing on the Greek Authors. Statutum eſt tempus duorum menſium, quo competitores & nomina dent, & legendo & aperiendo Græcos Autores oſtendant qui viri ſint, & quantum lingua & ingenio polleant (24). Ambroſe Leo adds that ſeveral of Muſurus's diſciples prepared themſelves to diſpute for his chair; and that Alcyonius, one of the moſt accompliſhed amongſt them, had made himſelf known by ſome admirable tranſlations. It will be better to expreſs the thing in the words of the original: Inter eorum elegantiores unus Petrus Alcyonius multa è Græco in Romanum ſermonem elegantiſſimè vertit. Nam Orationes pleraſque Iſocratis ac Demoſthenis tanta Arpinitate expreſſit, ut Ciceronem ipſum nihilominus legere videaris. Ariſtoteliſque multa vertit tam candidè, ut Latium gloriabundum dicere poſſit, en Ariſtotelem noſtrum habemus. Idem ipſe juvenis, ut eſt litterarum optimarum utrarumque maximus alumnus, ita tui quoque amantiſſimus, ac ſtudiorum tuorum laudator ſummus (25). That is, "One of the brighteſt of theſe was Peter Alcyonius, who tranſlated many things out of Greek into Latin very elegantly; for he expreſſed moſt of the Orations of Iſocrates and Demoſthenes in ſo Ciceronian a manner, that you would think you was reading Tully himſelf. And he turned many parts of Ariſtotle ſo well, that the Latins may boaſt and ſay, ſee we have our own Ariſtotle. And as that young man is an excellent Greek and Latin ſcholar, ſo he is a great lover of you, and an admirer of your learning." Eraſmus, in anſwer to this letter, the fifteenth of October, in the following year, made his compliments to Peter Alcyonius, and acknowledged that he had never heard of him. It were to be wiſhed, that in this difference of opinions concerning the nature of Alcyonius's tranſlations, the learned Mr. Huët had done him the honour to remember him when he compoſed his Dialogues de Interpretatione.

There is ſomething to be found concerning him in Longolius's Letters, which is not to his honour [K].

(24) Eraſmi, Epiſt. 28. l. 10. pag. 530.

(25) Id. p. 531.

Let us add now another teſtimony to that of Leo of Nola. I find that Gabriel Naudæus very much commends the verſions of Alcyonius. It is in his Treatiſe de Fato & Vitæ Termino. He, ſays this Tranſlator, having taken off three objections that might be made againſt thoſe who ſay that the Treatiſe de Mundo is a work of Ariſtotle's, ſhifts afterwards every way, to avoid being obliged to allow that it is a ſuppoſititious work. Difficultates ejuſmodi amoliri tentat: atque ne ſuppoſititium hunc fœtum, quem una cum legitimis aliis ELEGANTISSIME de Græco Latinum fecerat, agnoſcere cogeretur, vertit ſe in omnes partes, tandemque his verbis concludit: ſed moroſitatem ejus generis quæſtionem Grammaticis relinquamus (26). i. e. "He endeavours to remove "ſuch difficulties; and that he may not be forced "to confeſs this off-ſpring, which he had tranſlated "along with others that were genuine, to be ſuppoſititious, he turns himſelf into every ſhape, and at "laſt concludes in theſe words: But let us leave the "tediouſneſs of ſuch queſtions to the Grammarians.

(26) Gabriel Naudæus, de Fato & Vitæ Termino, p. 32.

[K] There is ſomething to be found concerning him in Longolius's letters, which is not to his honour.] We have already ſeen (27), that in Longolius's opinion, Alcyonius's countenance, at the new publication of Sepulveda's piece, would have been a diverting ſight. Here follows ſomething worſe. Alcyonius having paſſionately deſired to be the bearer of a letter of Longolius to Marcus Antonius Flaminius, went away without taking it; whereupon this reflexion was made: Noſti hominis ingenium: ille enim & cœnæ quam ei opiparam hic dederamus, & laudum quibus à nobis ornatiſſimus diſceſſerat, & litterarum quas ſumma contentione ut feſtinanter ſcriberem pervicerat, oblitus, profectus eſſe dicitur. Quod vos idcirco ſcire volui, ut meis verbis hac de inhumanitate cum eo expoſtuletis (28). i. e. "You know the "nature of the man: for he is ſaid to be gone, unmindful of the ſumptuous ſupper with which we "had entertained him, and of the large praiſes we "had given him, and the letter which he had with "ſo much earneſtneſs prevailed on us to write. "Which I was willing you ſhould know, that you "might expoſtulate with him concerning this incivility." It is added that there was a lucky hit in that, becauſe there were ſome things ſlipt into that letter, of which it was deſired he ſhould be as ignorant as any other. Is not this inſinuating that he was thought capable of opening a letter? Quanquam id ipſum de quo queror non omnino incommodè nobis cecidiſſe videri poſſit, ea enim iis literis incaute commiſeram quæ illum in primis celatum eſſe cupiebam. Perfecerat ſcilicet priſtinæ noſtræ conſuetudinis uſus ut magis quibuſcum agerem in mentem mihi veniret, quam cui literas daturus eſſem ſatis meminiſſem (29). i. e. "Tho' the very thing I complain of "may ſeem to have fallen out not unluckily, for I "had imprudently writ ſome things in that letter, "which I was very deſirous ſhould be concealed "from him. For our old friendſhip had made me "mind more the perſon with whom I correſponded, "than him with whom I ſent my letter." If he is the perſon intended in another of Longolius's letters (30), as a learned Man conjectures (31), what a deſcription is made of him! what diſhoneſty, what ſpirit of calumniating is not aſcribed to him, what contempt is there not ſhewn for his perſon! What would make one queſtion Longolius's ſpeaking of him in this place, is that he names Alcyonius ſoon after, without any ſign of an ill diſpoſition; but this is no convincing proof, becauſe at the ſame time this deſcription of him is conformable to the picture which another author of the ſame age has drawn of Alcyonius. He had juſt ſaid, that Pierius Valerianus was a man of ſincerity, and immediately after obſerves, Diverſæ naturæ eſt Petrus Alcyonius, Venetus, mordax & maledicus, nec pudens magis quàm prudens .... mitto de hoc nebulone plura, qui bellum bonis omnibus indixit, flagris & fuſte coërcendus (32), i. e. "Peter Alcyonius a Venetian, was of a different "temper, ſnarling and railing, and not more modeſt "than wiſe.... I paſs over ſeveral things concerning this knave, who has proclaimed war againſt all "good men, and deſerves to be anſwer'd with a cudgel "and a ſcourge." It is acknowledged by this Author that he made ſome good lyric and jambic verſes, and that he boaſted of having compoſed an excellent Tragedy on the Death of Jeſus Chriſt (33).

(27) In the note [B].

(28) Chriſtoph. Longolius, Epiſt. 21. lib. 2. fol. 203 verſo.

(29) Idem, ibid. fol. 204.

(30) It is the 20th of the 2d book.

(31) Mr. de la Monnoie; it is he that has pointed me out theſe paſſages of Longolius or Longueil.

(32) Lilius Gregorius Gyraldus, de Poët. ſui temporis, Dialog. 1. p. 542. ed. 1696.

(33) Idem, ibid.

☞ALDHUN or ALDUN, ſucceeded Elfig in the Biſhoprick of Holy-Iſland (a) in the year 990. That Iſland being very much expoſed to the invaſions of the Danes, Aldhun fled with the corps of St. Cuthbert, and ſettled at Durham, about the fifth year after he had been conſecrated Biſhop, namely A. D. 995. He built a church at Durham, and dedicated it to St. Cuthbert, and conſecrated it three years after. Thus the Epiſcopal See, which had been fixed by King Oſwald in Holy Iſland, at Aidan's (b) requeſt, was after three hundred and ſixty one years tranſlated to Durham (c), where it ſtill remains. Aldhun had a daughter called Ecgfrid, whom he married to Uctbred (d), a brave and valiant young man, ſon of Waltheof Earl of Northumberland. Aldhun gave his ſon-in-law ſeveral lands, which belonged to the church of St. Cuthbert at Durham [A], on condition that he would never ſeparate from his wife. It happened

(a) Lindisfarnia.

(b) See the article of AIDAN, p. 384.

(c) Simeon Dunelmenſis, Hiſt. de Dunelm. Eccleſ. l. 2. c. 20. l. 3. c. 1 and 4. Ap. Reg. Twyſden, Hiſt. Angl. Script. Decem. tom. 1. Col. 26. 29.

(d) Rapin calls him Utbred, Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 1. p. 401.

[A] Aldhun gave his ſon-in-law ſeveral lands, which belonged to the Church.] We are not ſurprized to find a Biſhop married, eſpecially in the tenth Century, ſince it is well known that even after that time this was common enough among the Clergy in England (1): for we may ſuppoſe that Aldhun pened at that time, that Malcolm King of Scotland invaded the county of Northumberland, laid all the country waſte, and even beſieged Durham: Uƈthred having aſſembled as many forces as he could out of Northumberland and Yorkſhire, marched againſt the Scots and routed them: for which ſervice King Ethelred made him Earl of Northumberland, though his father was ſtill living, and added the county of Yorkſhire to the former. The young Earl thought himſelf now too great, to be but a Biſhop's ſon-in-law, ſo that he ſent Ecgfrid back to her father, and married Edgin King Ethelred's daughter (e), upon which Aldhun obliged him to reſtore all the lands he had given him. Ecgfrid was afterwards married to a certain Thane (f) called Kilvert, ſon of Ligulf, who diſmiſſed her, after he had had a daughter by her, who was named Sigrid. Ecgfrid being divorced from her ſecond huſband returned to her father at Durham, where ſhe took the veil, and led a holy life the remaining part of her days. We may obſerve, that ſhe had by her firſt huſband a ſon named Aldred, who ſucceeded his father in the dignity of Earl of Northumberland [B], after the death of Eadulf ſurnamed Cadel, his uncle (g). Aldhun died in the year 1018 (h). If what is ſaid to have been the occaſion of his death be true, it ſhews that he was a man of a very tender and compaſſionate temper [C]. Simeon of Durham gives him an excellent character. "He was of a noble family, ſays he, but more illuſtrious ſtill by his "behaviour, which could but be pleaſing to God; and by his manners and converſa"tion he was really a Monk who deſerved the higheſt commendation: His piety is "ſtill celebrated among the inhabitants of his dioceſe, tradition having brought down "the fame of his virtues to poſterity (i)." We muſt obſerve here, that Simeon of Durham, from whom we have extracted this article, is not very exact in his Chronology [D].

(1) See the remark [B] of the article ALBERT, not. 6.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) Tein quidam; in Everwicſhire, which I take to be Warwickſhire.

(g) Simeon Dunelm. Epiſt. ad Hugon. Decan. Ebrac. apud Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 79, 80.

(h) Sim. Dunelm. Hiſt. de Dunelmenſ. Eccleſ. lib. 3. c. 5. ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra.

(i) Idem, ibid. lib. 2. cap. 20. ap. eund. col. 26.

hun was married, tho' none of the authors we could conſult ſay it expreſly. But what is ſurprizing is, that a Biſhop ſhould diſpoſe of the church-lands, as of his own, and give them as a dowry to his daughter, and yet not be ſtyled a ſacrilege for ſuch an offence. For church-lands muſt by no means be alienated. I wonder Aldhun has not been branded for this with the moſt odious names, by the monaſtic writers. This action of his ſhews that he enjoyed a very great power and credit in his dioceſe.

[B] Aldred ſucceeded his father in the dignity of Earl of Northumberland.] Uƈthred having refuſed to aſſiſt King Canute againſt Ethelred his lawful King, the former reſolved to be revenged. After the death of Ethelred, he ſent for Uƈthred, who having obtained a ſafe conduƈt went to the King, in order to make a treaty of peace with him; but he was treacherouſly killed with forty of his attendants, by Turebrant ſurnamed Hold. His brother Eadulf ſucceeded him; but being a very puſillanimous man, he was fearful that the Scots might revenge upon him the death of his brother; and to appeaſe them he yielded to them the whole county of Lothien (2), which ever ſince remained in the poſſeſſion of the Scots. But Eadulf dying ſoon after, Aldred ſucceeded him, and to revenge his father's death, killed Turebrant. This occaſioned a great hatred between him and Carl, Turebrant's ſon; they often endeavoured to kill one another; but at laſt their friends reconciled them, and they ſeemed ſo well united in friendſhip that they reſolved to go together to Rome: but being detained by contrary winds, Carl entertained Aldred at his houſe, and after the entertainment he went with him into a wood, upon pretence only of walking there for pleaſure, and falling unawares upon him he murdered him (3).

(2) Lodoneium.

(3) Simeon Dunelm. ap. Twyſden, Hiſt. Angl. Scrip. 10. tom. 1. Col. 81.

[C] The occaſion of Aldhun's death ſhews he was a man of a very tender and compaſſionate temper.] A great number of people of Aldhun's dioceſe having been killed by the Scots, he took it ſo much to heart, that his grief threw him into a ſickneſs of which he died. As ſoon as he heard the misfortune of his people, he cried out in the deepeſt ſorrow, "O un"happy man that I am! Why have I been kept to "ſee theſe wretched days! Have I lived ſo long, to "be a witneſs of ſo dreadful an overthrow of my "people! No, this land will never be reſtored to "its peace and happy ſtate. O bleſſed Cuthbert, thou "friend of God, if ever I have pleaſed thee, re"ward me now; the reward I beg for, is not to "ſurvive any longer thy people (4) who have been kil"led." Thus ſpoke the Biſhop. His prayer was heard, and he died ſoon after (5).

(4) Cuthbert had been Biſhop of Holy-Iſland.

(5) Sim. Dunel. Hiſt. Eccleſ. Dunelm. l. 3. c. 5. ap. Twyſden, Col. 30.

[D] Simeon of Durham is not very exaƈt in Chronology.] Having ſaid (6) that Aldhun was made Biſhop of Holy-Iſland in 990, he ſpeaks of the marriage of the Biſhop's daughter, when he relates what happened in the year 969, under King Ethelred; and he mentions there the invaſion of Northumberland by the Scots, under the command of King Malcolm, and the ſiege of Durham, adding that Aldhun was then Biſhop of that city. But I ſuſpect that there is an error in the number 969; for Simeon himſelf places the beginning of King Ethelred's reign in the year 978 (7). So that we muſt ſuppoſe, that this invaſion of the Scots happened ſeveral years later, tho' Rapin does not mention any ſuch invaſion between the years 990 and 1018, which is the time, during which Aldhun enjoyed his biſhoprick. However we find that about this time there was a great war between the Engliſh and the Scots (8).

(6) Ibid. lib. 2. cap. 20. ap. eund. Col. 26.

(7) Hiſt. de Geſt. Angl. ap. eund. Col. 160, where he calls this King Egelred.

(8) Chronica de Mailros, ad ann. 1018. in Rer. Anglic. tom. 1. pag. 155.

P.

☞ALDRED Abbot of Taviſtock was promoted to the Biſhoprick of Worceſter [A] in the year 1046 (a). He was ſo much in favour with King Edward the Confeſſor, and had ſo much power over his mind, that he obliged him to be reconciled with the worſt of his enemies, particularly with Swane ſon of the Earl Goodwin, who had revolted againſt him, and came with an army to invade the Kingdom (b). Rapin ſays (c) it was Stigand Biſhop of Wincheſter who procured that reconciliation. Aldred alſo reſtored the union and friendſhip between King Edward and Griffin King of Wales. He took afterwards a journey to Rome, and being returned into England, in the

(a) Simeon Dunelm. de Geſtis Reg. Angl. apud Twyſden, Hiſt. Angl. Script. Decem. tom. 1. Col. 182.

(b) Tho Stubbs, Act. Pontif. Ebor. ap. Twyſden, ibid. Col. 1700.

(c) Hiſt. d'Ang. tom. 1. liv. 5. p. 434.

[A] Promoted to the biſhoprick of Worceſter.] This is what Simeon of Durham (1), Tho. Stubbs (2) and Henry de Knyghton (3) tell us; and we don't find that Aldred has been Biſhop of Glouceſter; therefore Rapin, who aſſerts it (4) muſt certainly be miſtaken. If he had quoted his vouchers, as all Hiſtorians ought to do, we might be able to know, whence this miſtake originally came; whether from Rapin's own overſight, or from ſome other author. But whenever he quotes no authority, he may juſtly be anſwerable for all the errors he commits; we'll take notice hereafter (5) of a more egregious blunder, of which he is guilty.

(1) De Geſt. Reg. Angl. ap. Twyſden, tom. 1. Col. 182, 184.

(2) Ap. eund. Col. 1700.

(3) Ap. eund. Col. 2333.

(4) Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 2. liv. 6. p. 153.

(5) In the Remark [F].

the year 1054 (d) he was ſent Embaſſador to the Emperor Henry II [B]; he ſtaid a whole year in Germany, and was very honourably entertained by Herman Archbiſhop of Cologn, from whom he learned many things relating to Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, which on his return he eſtabliſhed in his own dioceſs. In the year 1058 he went to Jeruſalem, which no Archbiſhop or Biſhop of England had ever done before him. Two years after he returned to England, and Kinſius Archbiſhop of York dying the 22d of December 1060, Aldred was elected in his ſtead on Chriſtmas day following (e), and thought fit to keep his Biſhoprick of Worceſter with the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, as ſome of his predeceſſors had done (f). William of Malmeſbury ſays, that Aldred, abuſing King Edward's ſimplicity, kept the Biſhoprick of Worceſter, rather by the money he diſperſed, than by the force of the cuſtom which he alledged. This I take to be the ſenſe of the following obſcure words of the Author I have juſt mentioned. Qui (Aldredus) ſimplicitati Edwardi illudens, moremque anteceſſorum magis PECUNIA quam ratione allegans Archiepiſcopatum Eboracenſe, non intermiſſa priori ſede, ſuſcepit (g). Aldred went ſoon after to Rome, in order to receive the Pallium from the Pope: He was attended by Toſton Earl of Northumberland, Giſo Biſhop of Wells, and Walter Biſhop of Hereford. The Pope received Toſton very honourably, and made him ſit by him in the Synod, which he held againſt the Simoniſts. He granted to Giſo and Walter their requeſt, becauſe they were tolerably well learned, and not accuſed of Simony. But Aldred being by his anſwers found ignorant, and guilty of Simony, the Pope deprived him very ſeverely of all honours and dignities; ſo that he was obliged to return without the Pallium. On his way home he and his three fellow-travellers were attacked by ſome robbers, who took from them all that they had, though they did not offer to kill them. This obliged them to return to Rome; and the Pope, either out of compaſſion, or by the threatnings of the Earl of Northumberland [C], gave Aldred the Pallium (b). But he was obliged to reſign his Biſhoprick of Worceſter; however, as the Archbiſhoprick of York had been almoſt entirely ruined by the many invaſions of foreigners, King Edward gave the new Archbiſhop leave to keep twelve villages [D] or manors (i) which belonged to the Biſhoprick of Worceſter (k). Edward the Confeſſor dying in 1066 (l), Aldred crowned Harald his ſucceſſor. He alſo crowned William the Conqueror, after he had made him take the following oath, viz. that he would protect the holy churches of God and their leaders; that he would eſtabliſh and obſerve righteous laws; that he would entirely prohibit and ſuppreſs all rapines and unjuſt judgments (m). He was ſo much in favour with the Conqueror, that this Prince looked upon him as a father, and tho' imperious in regard to every body elſe, he yet ſubmitted to obey this Archbiſhop (n): John Bromton gives us an inſtance of the King's ſubmiſſion, which at the ſame time ſhews the Prelate's haughtineſs [E]. Tho. Stubbs, who relates it more fully, calls it the Archbiſhop

(d) Joan. Bromton in Chron. and Tho. Stubbs, Actus Pontif. Ebor. Utrumque ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 950, and 1701.

(e) Sim. Dun. ap. Twyſden, ib. Col. 190.

(f) Tho. Stubbs, ubi ſupra.

(g) Will. Malm. de Geſtis Pontif. Anglor. l. 3. in Rer. Anglic. Script. poſt Bedam, edit. ab Henr. Savile, Francof. 1701. fol. p. 271.

(b) Will. Malm. ubi ſupra, and Tho. Stubbs, ubi ſupra, Col. 1701.

(i) xii villas.

(k) Stubbs, ibid.

(l) Chron. de Mailros. But Rapin places his death in the latter end of 1059. Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 1. liv. 5. p. 445.

(m) Stubbs, ubi ſupra, Col. 1702.

(n) Joh. Bromton, ubi ſupra, Col 962.

[B] He was ſent Embaſſador to Henry II.] The reaſon of this Embaſſy was as follows. King Edmund II having left two ſons Edmund and Edward, Canute ſent them into Denmark, under pretence to make them travel; but really with an intention to have them killed, for fear they ſhould diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of the throne. The perſon, whom he had truſted with the young Princes, knowing his deſign, inſtead of conducting them into Denmark, carried them to the King of Sweden, whom he acquainted with Canute's intention. The King received them very kindly, but being afraid to draw upon him the reſentment of Canute, he ſent them to Solomon King of Hungary, who willingly took upon him their education; he married afterwards one of his daughters to Edmund, and gave his ſiſter-in-law, who was the Emperor Henry II's daughter, to Edward. Edmund died ſoon after his marriage, but Edward had ſeveral children (6). Edward the Confeſſor deſigning to name this Prince Edward, who was his nephew, for his ſucceſſor, ſent Aldred to Henry II, with a letter, in which he deſired him to ſend Embaſſadors to the King of Hungary, in order to prevail with him to let Edward come over to England. The Emperor complied with his requeſt; and accordingly Edward arrived in England (in 1057, according to Rapin) with Agatha his ſpouſe, Edgar his ſon, and Margaret and Chriſtina his daughters: but he died ſoon after his arrival (7).

(6) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 1. liv. 5. p. 408.

(7) Joh. Bromton, in Chron. ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 942. Rap. ubi ſupra, p. 438, 439.

[C] By the threatnings of the Earl of Northumberland.] Tho. Stubbs ſays, it was at the interceſſion of the whole Court. But William of Malmsbury (8), John Brompton (9), and Henry de Knyghton (10), relate this affair in quite another manner. They ſay, that the Earl of Northumberland plainly told the Pope, that his excommunications were not much to be feared far off, ſince the robbers, who were near him, laugh at them; he added that if the Pope did not reſtore to them, whatever they had been robbed of, they would conclude that he ſhared with the robbers: he further ſaid that the King of England, hearing the Pope refuſed the Pallium to Aldred, would not for the future pay the Peter-pence to the Pope. This laſt reaſon was no doubt the moſt powerful, as William of Malmsbury very juſtly obſerves. Hoc minarum fulmine, ſays he, Romani territi, Papam flexerunt, ut Archiepiſcopatum reddant & pallium.

(8) De Geſtis Pontific. Anglorum, l. 3. p. 271.

(9) Ubi ſupra, Col. 952.

(10) De Eventibus Angliæ, l. 1. c. 13 ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 2336.

[D] King Edward gave the new Archbiſhop leave to keep twelve villages.] This is what Tho. Stubbs relates, who ſeems to write rather a panegyrick on Aldred, than an hiſtory of him. But Bromton and Knyghton tell us (11), that Aldred to whom the Pope gave leave to name his ſucceſſor to the ſee of Worceſter, choſe one Wolſtan, who was a very plain man, and whom Aldred for that reaſon thought a very fit perſon to hide his plunders and rapines, and who would not force him to reſtore the lands belonging to the biſhoprick of Worceſter, which he unjuſtly detained; by which it appears, that there is no reaſon to believe, Aldred had the King's authority for what he did: and indeed after his death Wolſtan cauſed all the lands, which Aldred had kept, to be reſtored to the Church of Worceſter.

(11) Ap. Twyſden, ib. Col. 952 and 2367.

[E] An inſtance of the King's ſubmiſſion, which at the ſame time ſhews the Prelate's haughtineſs.] Before we relate this, as we find it in Stubbs, we'll give the reader an inſtance of Aldred's liberty of ſpeaking. One Urſus or Urſe (12) having been made Governor of Worceſter, built a caſtle or fort ſo near the convent of the Monks of that city, that the walls of the caſtle were upon the church-yard of the convent. The Monks complained of this to Aldred, who though Archbiſhop of York, had nevertheleſs ſtill the care of the Church of Worceſter. The Prelate meeting with the Governor addreſſed him in this manner:

(12) That name ſignifies a Bear in Latin.

biſhop's conſtancy and magnanimity. The Danes having made an invaſion in the North of England in the year 1668, under the conduct of Harold and Canute, the ſons of King Swane (o), Aldred was ſo much afflicted at it, that he died of grief the 11th of September in that ſame year (p), having beſought God that he might not ſee the deſolation of his church and country. Rapin places the invaſion of the Danes in the year after Aldred's death, and tells us, that this Prelate had ſo great an eſteem for William the Conqueror, that he was always ſpeaking in his praiſe; but that he altered his opinion of him, when he ſaw this Prince began to act as a Tyrant, and would oblige the Engliſh to pay the ancient tax called Dane-guelt. He adds, that the Archbiſhop repreſented to the King what an injury he did to the nation by impoſing this tax, and the dreadful conſequences it might produce. The King was very angry at this remonſtrance, and treated Aldred extremely ill for it; which ſo offended the meek Prelate, that he could not forbear curſing the King and all his family. It was to be feared, ſays Rapin further, leſt the diſcontent of the Archbiſhop might produce dangerous effects upon the people; at leaſt the King ſeemed to fear it, but he was ſoon delivered of his fears by Aldred's death (q); this Prelate was buried in the church of St. Peter at York (r). Tho. Stubbs greatly extols Aldred's generoſity, and the proofs he gives of it are, that he bought ſeveral lands with his own money, and gave them to the church of York; that he built or finiſhed ſome Monaſteries, and enlarged their revenues: He alſo tells us, that this Archbiſhop reſtored the Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline in his dioceſs, and obliged his Clergy, who uſed to live and be dreſſed like the Laity, to wear more decent garments, and lead a more exemplary life (s). Rapin was not well acquainted with Aldred's character [F]. This Archbiſhop was the laſt perſon of the Engliſh nation that was promoted to the See of York; his ſucceſſors were of Norman race, if we may believe Tho. Stubbs (t), and this is very probable, ſince Aldred died under William the Conqueror, who is well known to have advanced his countrymen, and to have oppreſſed the Engliſh, and kept them under as much as lay in his power.

(o) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 2. liv. 6. p. 28, calls him Svenon.

(p) Joh. Bromton in Chron. ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 965. Tho. Stubbs, ap. eund. Col. 1703. Henr. de Knyghton. de Event. Angl. ap. eund. Col. 2344.

(q) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom 2. liv. 6. p. 22.

(r) Tho. Stubbs, ubi ſupra.

(s) Id. ib. Col. 1704.

(t) Ibid. Col. 1705.

manner: "Hateſt thou Urſe (13), have thou God's "curſe, and mine, and that of all the conſecrated "heads, (that is of the Prieſts and Monks,) if thou "doſt not demoliſh this caſtle (14)." This ſhews what a mild and Chriſtian ſpirit the Prelate had. The inſtance related by Stubbs is ſtill more remarkable. It happened one day, as the Archbiſhop was at York, that the Deputy Governor or Lord-Lieutenant (15) going out of the city with a great number of people, met the Archbiſhop's ſervants, who came to town with ſeveral carts and horſes loaded with proviſions. The Governor asked them to whom they belonged, and they having anſwered, they were Aldred's ſervants; the Governor ordered, that all theſe proviſions ſhould be carried to the King's ſtore-houſe. The Archbiſhop ſent immediately ſome of his Clergy to the Governor, commanding him to deliver the proviſions, and to make ſatisfaction to St. Peter, and to him the Saint's Vicar, for the injury he had done them; adding, that if he refuſed to comply, the Archbiſhop would make uſe of his apoſtolic authority againſt him, (intimating thereby, that he would excommunicate him). The Governor offended at this proud meſſage, uſed the perſons, whom the Archbiſhop had ſent him, very ill, and returned an anſwer as haughty as the meſſage was. Aldred thereupon went to London to make his complaint to the King; but in this very complaint he acted with his wonted inſolence; for meeting the King in the church of St. Peter at Weſtminſter, he ſpoke to him in theſe words: "Hearken, O William, when thou "waſt but a foreigner, and God to puniſh the ſins "of this nation, permitted thee to become Maſter "of it, after having ſhed a great deal of blood, I "conſecrated thee, and put the crown upon thy "head with bleſſings; but now becauſe thou haſt "deſerved it, I pronounce a curſe over thee, inſtead "of a bleſſing, ſince thou art become the perſecutor "of God's Church, and of his Miniſters, and haſt "broken the promiſes and the oaths which thou "madeſt to me, before St. Peter's Altar." The King terrified at this diſcourſe, fell upon his knees, and humbly begged the Prelate to tell him, by what crime he had deſerved ſo ſevere a ſentence. The Noblemen, who were preſent, were enraged againſt the Archbiſhop, and loudly cried out he deſerved to be killed, or at leaſt to be baniſhed, for having offered ſuch an injury to his Sovereign, and they preſſed him with threatnings to raiſe the King from the ground. But the Prelate unmoved at all this, anſwered calmly, "Good men, let him lie there, for "he is not at Aldred's but at St. Peter's feet; he "muſt feel St. Peter's power, ſince he dared to in"jure his Vice-gerent." Having thus reproved the Nobles by his Epiſcopal authority, he vouchſafed to take the King by the hand, and to tell him the ground of his complaint. The King humbly excuſed himſelf by ſaying, he had been ignorant of the whole matter, and begged of the Noblemen to entreat the Prelate, that he might take off the curſe he had pronounced, and to change it into a bleſſing; Aldred was at laſt prevailed upon to favour the King thus far, but not without the promiſe of ſeveral preſents and favours, and only after the King had granted him, to take ſuch a revenge on the Governor, as he thought fit. Since that time, adds the Hiſtorian, none of the Noblemen ever dared to offer the Prelate the leaſt injury (16). It may be queſtioned, what is more ſurprizing here, either the Archbiſhop's haughtineſs, who dares to treat his Sovereign after ſo unbecoming a manner; or the King's ſtupidity, who ſuffers this inſolence and audaciouſneſs from a Prieſt.

(13) That is, Thou art called, or thy name is, Urſe.

(14) Will. Mal. de Geſtib. Pontif. Anglor. l. 3. p. 271.

(15) Vicecomes.

(16) Stubbs, ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 1703, 1704.

[F] Rapin was not well acquainted with Aldred's character.] After the facts we have related of him, is it not an egregious blunder to ſay, that he was a good and pious Prelate? This is however what Rapin ſays of him (17). Can a man be called good and pious, when he is guilty of ſimony; when againſt the Canons, he will keep two biſhopricks together; when to make a good bargain, he places in a biſhoprick a perſon, whom he thinks ſilly enough to yield him part of the eſtate of his church; when he miſuſes his ſacred character to act the tyrant over his own King? Rapin might have read all this of Aldred, in William of Malmsbury, and in John Bromton, whom he ſometimes quotes: it is therefore ſurprizing, that this judicious and accurate writer, ſhould be ſo groſly miſtaken, with regard to the character of ſo famous a Prelate, as Aldred was. P.

(17) Hiſt. d'Ang. tom. 2. liv. 6. p. 163.

ALDRINGER, a famous General under the Emperor Ferdinand II, raiſed himſelf by the ſole recommendation of his merit. He was of the country of Luxembourg, and of very obſcure birth [A]. In his early youth he got into the ſervice of ſome Gentlemen that were going to France: he applied himſelf with them to ſtudy, and rendered himſelf well accompliſhed. Being gone into Italy, he was made made Chancellor to Count Madrucci. He went afterwards to Trent, and there had an honourable employment in the Chancery; but the jealouſy of his Collegues, and their conduct, raiſed in him ſo great a reſentment that he threw up his poſt, poſſeſſed of a ſpirit angry with fortune, and reſolved to embrace the profeſſion of the firſt man that ſhould fall in his way. He took the road to Inſpruk, and meeting near the bridge with a ſoldier who was returning into Italy, he reſolved to go into the army, and inliſted himſelf a common ſoldier. He was ſoon after made a ſergeant; and as he ſhewed that he could manage his pen very well, he was employed to keep all the accounts of the company, and to write the diſpatches which the Captain had to do. He gave ſuch inſtructions to the Captain, that it opened for him the way to greater employment. By the advancement of this Captain the Lieutenant of the Company was raiſed to his poſt, and Aldringer to that of Lieutenant. He defended himſelf ſo well with fifty men in a dangerous poſt, that he kept it in ſpite of the rough attacks of the enemy. From that time the reputation of his courage was not leſs ſpread abroad than that of his other accompliſhments: Several Colonels offered him a company; the nephew of the Archbiſhop of Saltſbourg was one of them. He wanted, by reaſon of his own youth, to have ſuch a man in his regiment: He ſought him out, he gained him, and he acquired to himſelf ſo much glory by the good counſels of Aldringer, that in teſtimony of his gratitude to him he made him his Sergeant-Major. Aldringer was afterwards Lieutenant Colonel, then Colonel; and he gave ſuch proofs of underſtanding his buſineſs thoroughly, that he was thought fit to command in chief in the expedition of Mantua (a). He joined very ſeaſonably to the ſhattered remains of the battle of Leipſick the troops which he brought from Italy (b); and, perhaps if Count Tilly had waited to give battle till thoſe troops were arrived, as he was adviſed to do, the event had not been ſo fatal to the Imperialiſts. Some time after, Aldringer parted from Tilly to retire into Bohemia, on account of the ſuſpicions which the ill ſtate of affairs had occaſioned betwixt the Imperialiſts and Bavarians (c); but that ſeparation did not laſt long. He was in the month of March 1632 with Tilli on the banks of the Leck, to diſpute the King of Sweden's paſſage over it. He was at that time Grand-Maſter of the Ordnance (d). The wound which he received in the head did not a little contribute to the advantage the enemies had in paſſing that river, but it did not hinder his ſerving the ſame campaign: He went and joined Walleſtein in Bohemia, notwithſtanding the efforts that the Swedes made to hinder their conjunction: He was obliged very ſoon to return into Bavaria to oppoſe the troops of General Horn. The ſucceſs varied from one ſide to the other in thoſe parts all the remainder of that year, and the beginning of the next. The moſt glorious exploit of Aldringer during that time, was his having contributed in 1633 to the raiſing the ſiege of the city of Conſtance. He afterwards joined the Duke de Feria, who had brought ſome Spaniſh troops from Italy. It is thought that Walleſtein had given Aldringer ſome ſecret inſtructions to diſappoint all the Duke's deſigns [B], and that this was the true reaſon and ſecret motive why Aldringer would never conſent to give battle. Nevertheleſs it muſt not be thought that he entered into all Walleſtein's ſchemes: He only complied with him in ſome things, which, without ruining the affairs of the publick, might very much advance the particular intereſts of that General. There are ſuch kinds of ſecret practices in almoſt all armies. He was ſlain in the year 1634 at Landſhut, a city of Bavaria; and it was never certainly known whether his own ſoldiers or the Swedes gave the blow. He had been promoted to the dignity of a Count (e). He was a man of excellent qualifications [C]; it is pity that they were accompanied with exceſſive

(a) In 1630, extracted from the Count Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato, in the 9th book of l'Hiſtoire des Guerres d'Allemagne.

(b) In 1631.

(c) Priorato, liv. 9. ad an. 1631.

(d) Le Blanc Hiſtoire de Baviere, tom. 4. p. 374.

(e) Ib. p. 436.

[A] He was of very obſcure birth.] Humili apud Lucenburgicos loco ortus, ſays Mr. Puffendorf, who adds that he was firſt a Lackey to ſome French Noblemen, and afterwards Secretary (1). Another Hiſtorian does not give him ſo mean a condition: he makes him firſt a Student, next a Soldier, then a Secretary, and at laſt makes him return into the army. Luxemburgi tenui ſed honeſto loco editus primam ætatem literis dedit (2). He makes him a Boileau * as to his natural parts, Ingenio prompto atque acri, & natura vini abſtinens (3), i. e. "Of a "ready and ſatyrical Wit, and naturally abſtemious "from wine," which was a very bad and highly prejudicial quality in Germany for a Soldier.

(1) Puffendorf. Rerum Suecicar. l. 6. p. 157.

(2) Joh. Cluverius, Epit. Hiſt. l. 11. Append.

(3) Id. ibid.

* Mr. Bayle plays here upon the word Boileau, which in French, ſignifies a perſon who drinks water.

[B] It is thought that Walleſtein had given Aldringer ſome ſecret inſtructions to diſappoint all the Duke of Feria's deſigns.] The Bavarian Hiſtorian, whom I have quoted (4), allows that the Swedes deſired nothing more than to come to a general battle, though they did not find themſelves ſo advantageouſly poſted as the Catholics. The Duke of Feria, continues he, ſeeing a good opportunity, made ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts to bring Aldringer to come to an engagement with the enemy; but he never could obtain any thing from a man who was under the direction of Walleſtein; and the Swedes having retired in a ſort of triumph towards the latter end of October, the wrong proceedings of Aldringer, which had been very prejudicial to the Catholic union, ſo much diſpleaſed the Duke of Feria, that it ſoon after broke his heart. This Hiſtorian in the foregoing page, had ſaid, that Aldringer, truſty to Walleſtein, would do nothing at all but by his orders, and that at that time a writing was publiſhed in which it was affirmed, that whilſt Walleſtein ſignified to the Emperor that he ſent Aldringer to the Duke of Bavaria to be entirely at his diſpoſal, he gave him private orders to ſerve him only on the defenſive with the ſmall ſupplies that he commanded: which Aldringer not having perpetually obſerved, Galas aſſured him by Walleſtein's order, that this General would pardon him that diſobedience.

(4) Le Blanc, Hiſt. de Baviere, tom. 4. p. 424.

[C] He was a man of excellent qualifications.] He had a very lively and penetrating genius, much experience, a refined underſtanding, and a great courage: He made himſelf admired in the Councils of war by the force of his reaſoning, and the probability of his conjectures; beſides he was Maſter of a good pen, he underſtood ſeveral languages, he knew how to make a very good uſe of the maxims of the ſeveral countries. The Politics of a Spaniard Italianiſed could ceſſive avarice and cruelty [D]. Such is almoſt always the fate of man. He reſembles thoſe ſoils that bring forth good and bad herbs promiſcuouſly.

could not ſurpaſs his: Le da lui practicate varie nationi, l'oſſervate diverſe maſſime, e gli inveſtigati genii e inclinationi di molti popoli, lo reſero coſì accolto nelle attioni che alcuno Spagnuolo Italianato non lo avanzava (5).

(5) Picorato, History of the Wars of Germany book 9 pag. 291. edit. in 4°.

[D] His good qualities were accompanied with exceſſive avarice and cruelty.] He was without compaſſion for the people, and he exacted contributions with the utmoſt rigour: he had no regard for the neceſſities of the ſoldiers; ſo that he was not beloved, either by the people or the army. He got a large booty in the ſacking of Mantua, and there was not an Officer in the Imperial Army that carried off ſo much as he (6). It is thought that his own people killed him upon the bridge of Landſhut, there being a favourable opportunity of doing it without its being known. Fu colpito e fatto cader morto, non ſenza ſoſpetto cio diveniſſe dalla parte de ſuoi, per vendetta de' alcune ingiurie fatte loro, eſſendo egli per la ſua ſeverita piu temuto che amato dalla militia (7). i. e. "He "received a blow that ſtruck him dead, not without "ſuſpicion of its coming from his own party, to re- "venge ſome injury done them, he being on ac- "count of his ſeverity more feared than beloved "by his ſoldiers.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ib. p. 289.

ALDROVANDUS (a) (ULYSSES) Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Phyſic at Bologna his native country, was one of the moſt curious men in the world with regard to natural hiſtory. His cares, his labours, and his expences upon that ſubject are incredible. He travelled into the moſt diſtant countries, with no other motive than to inform himſelf of their natural productions: The minerals, metals, plants, animals, were the objects of his reſearches and curioſity, but he applied himſelf principally to birds; and in order to have figures of them very exact and to the life, he employed for above thirty years, at his own expence, the moſt excellent artiſts in Europe [A]. Thoſe expences ruined him: He was at length reduced to the utmoſt neceſſity; and it is ſaid that he died in the Hoſpital of Bologna, full of years (b), and blind, anno 1605 (c) (α). This is an example that loudly complains againſt the ingratitude of the publick [B],

(a) Deſcended from the Counts of that name, as ſays Miræus de Scriptoribus Sæc. 16. p. 154.

(b) Bullart, Academie des Scienc. tom. 2. pag. 110, makes him eighty years old.

(c) Mercklinus, Lindenii renovat. p. 1047.

[A] To have the figures of animals very exact he employed the moſt excellent Artiſts of Europe.] See what Aubert le Mire has collected on this ſubject: Pictori cuidam, eâ in arte unico, triginta & amplius annos annuum aureorum ducentorum ſtipendium perſolvit. Delineatores celeberrimos, Laurentium Beninum Florentinum, & Cornelium Suintum Francofurtenſem ære ſuo conduxit, nec non Jacobi Ligotii, ſereniſſimi Etruriæ Ducis Pictoris eximii, opera in hac eadem provincia Florentiæ quandoque uſus eſt, ut quo maximo fieri poſſet artificio aves eæ deſignarentur. Tandem ſculptorem habuit inſignem Chriſtophorum Coriolanum Norimbergenſem, atque ejus nepotem, qui eas adeo venuſtè adeoque eleganter exſculpſerat, ut non in ligno ſed in ære factæ videantur (1). i. e. "He gave a "certain Painter who was ſingular in that art, for "thirty years and upwards, a yearly ſalary of two "hundred crowns. He employed at his own ex- "pence thoſe moſt famous Deſigners, Lorenzo Ben- "nini a Florentine, and Cornelius Suintus of Franc- "fort, and ſometimes he had at Florence the aſſiſtance "of Jacobus Ligotius the famous Painter of the "moſt ſerene Duke of Tuſcany, for the ſame "ſubject, that thoſe birds might be drawn with "the greateſt juſtneſs poſſible. Laſtly he had that fa- "mous Engraver Chriſtopher Coriolanus of Nurem- "berg, and his nephew, who engraved them ſo "beautifully and elegantly, that they ſeemed not to "be done in wood but in copper."

(1) Aubert. Miræus de Scriptoribus, Sæc. 16. p. 154.

(α) Mr. Monti (a) refutes this relation of Merklinus in the following words: Longe magis à veritate abhorret id quod ſcriptis mandavit de Ulyſſe Aldrovando Merklinus nempe, ipſum Aldrovandum propter ingentes ſumptus factos in exſculpendis iconibus ſuorum operum ad extremam paupertatem redactum viſuque orbatum in Xenodochio Bononienſi obiit. Hunc ego falſum rumorem plurimis argumentis refellere ſuperfluum duco. Nam in primis nonne vos omnes perſpectum habetis quanto amore omni tempore, Ampliſſimus Senatus Bononienſis, quantoque ſtudio quoſcunque literatos viros amplectatur? Nonne teſtis eſt ipſa Aldrovandi conjux, quæ anno 1606 poſt dilectiſſimi viri mortem adhuc mœſtiſſima proprio ære typis evulgavit ejus volumen de Cruſtaceis, & in nuncupatoria Epiſtola Nobiliſſimi & Excelſi Senatus clientelam, ſummamque gratitudinem diſertis verbis declaravit: Vos enim (ſic ipſa Senatum alloquitur) cum vires mei conjugis tot impenſis ac ſumptibus plane eſſent impares, illum præ cæteris civibus, omni ſemper favore, honoribus atque ſuppetiis pro veſtra ſingulari benevolentia foviſtis: quæ verba quemadmodum apud me, voſque omnes Aldrovandi Concives ad falſitatis coarguendum præfatum Merklinum maximè valent, ita plurimum quoque valuerunt apud clariſſimum Garidellum (b), qui in re-

(a) In a diſcourſe prefixed to his Plantarum Varii Indices, printed at Bologna in 1724.

(b) Hiſtoire des Plantes, xlvi.

cenſione ſcriptorum ſuæ Plantarum Provinciæ Hiſtoriæ præfixâ, quatuor abhinc annis (c) Gallico ſermone editæ affirmat, ſe, quod olim audiverat de Aldrovandi veſtri egeſtate, nunquam fide dignum exiſtimaſſe. Re enim vera, quis unquam credet, Aldrovandum illum Patritium Bononienſem, Publicum Archigymnaſii Profeſſorem, Doctorem Collegiatum, Nobiliſſimi Senatoris Comitis Pompei Aldrovandi conſanguineum à Senatu ipſo, imò ab ipſa Nobiliſſima Domo ſua fuiſſe derelictum? Verum procul hæc figmenta & perpetuo involvantur ſilentio quæcunque de Ulyſſe illo Aldrovando naturæ miraculo, ut Anguiſolæ verbis utar (d), Viro nempe omni immortalitate digniſſimo nimis leviter & à veritate aliena præfatus Auctor memoravit. That is, "Still more untrue is that, which Merklinus has "related concerning Ulyſſes Aldrovandus, namely, "that by the great expence he was at in engraving "figures for his works, he was reduced to a moſt "extreme degree of poverty, and died blind in the "hoſpital of Bologna. I think it ſuperfluous to con- "tradict this falſe rumour with many arguments. "For in the firſt place, do not you all evidently per- "ceive with much love and reſpect the moſt no- "ble Senate of Bologna ſhews to all learned Men? "Is not the wife of Aldrovandus herſelf witneſs "thereof, who in the year 1606, ſtill mourning "for the death of her husband, publiſhed his vo- "lume of cruſtaceous animals at her own expence, "and in the prefatory Epiſtle declared expreſly the "higheſt gratitude for their protection? For you (ſays "ſhe, ſpeaking to the Senate) when my husband's "abilities were quite unequal to ſuch great ex- "pences, always aſſiſted him with your favours, "honours, and ſupplies. Which words, as they are "of great weight with me and with you the fellow- "Citizens of Aldrovandus in proving Merklinus's aſ- "ſertion to be falſe, ſo have they alſo weighed very "much with the celebrated Mr. Garidel, who in "the Catalogue of authors prefixed to his Hiſtory "of the Plants of Provence, publiſhed in 1719 in "French, affirms that he could never give credit to "what he had formerly heard concerning the po- "verty of our Aldrovandus. For indeed who "can ever believe that Aldrovandus, a Patrician "of Bologna, public Profeſſor of the High-School, "Collegiat Doctor, and kinſman of the moſt no- "ble Senator Count Pompeius Aldrovandus, was "deſerted by the Senate itſelf, nay and by his own "illuſtrious family? Away then with theſe fic- "tions, and let all that this author has ſaid concern- "ing Ulyſſes Aldrovandus, that miracle of nature (to "uſe the words of Anguiſola) and a Man perfectly "worthy of immortality, be wrapped up in eternal "ſilence." CRIT. REM.]

(c) 1719.

(d) Comp. Scrip. Medic. 18.

publick [B], and alſo againſt the exceſſive curioſity of particular perſons. There might be a thouſand reflections, and a thouſand pretty common places advanced upon this accident: I leave them to whoever has a mind to make them, and content my ſelf with this little obſervation; that antiquity does not furniſh us with an inſtance of a deſign ſo extenſive and laborious, as that of our Ulyſſes with regard to natural Hiſtory. Pliny, I grant, has treated of more kinds of ſubjects, but he only touches them lightly, and ſays but little upon any thing, whereas Aldrovandus has collected all he could meet with (d). His compilation contains ſeveral large volumes in folio; but we muſt not give him the whole glory of them [C], for among the volumes that appeared after his death there are ſome, in which he is thought to have had no other ſhare than having formed the plan [D], or at moſt contributed ſome looſe memoirs. I explain that in the notes. It does not ſeem poſſible that he could compoſe ſuch a prodigious number of books as Imperialis has given a catalogue of (e); nor is it ſtrange that he, being entirely taken up with ſuch reſearches as engaged his whole attention, has often given us for verſe that which was quite contrary to the rules of Poeſy (f), and that he did not throughly underſtand Greek (g). A Poet, who was afterwards Pope, has celebrated his praiſes in a very elegant manner [E].

(d) See the note [D].

(e) In Muſæo Hiſtorico. See alſo le Theatre de Paul Freherus, p. 1317.

(f) Voſſius de Origine Idolatr. lib. 3. cap. 91. p. 1227.

(g) Ezek. Spanheim. apud Konig, Biblioth. p. 24.

[B] This is an example that loudly complains againſt the ingratitude of the Public.] We muſt not imagine that no body aſſiſted this Naturaliſt in the expences that he was at. The Senate of Bologna, the Cardinal Montalto, Francis Maria Duke of Urbino and ſome other Nobles readily contributed thereto, by furniſhing money for the ſupport of the Painters and Engravers, which Aldrovandus employed..... After having dedicated twelve books of the Ornithology, or the Hiſtory of Birds, to Pope Clement VIII, and ſome others to ſuch as had favoured his labours with their liberalities, he bequeathed the remainder by his will to the magnificent Senate of Bologna... which aſſigned a conſiderable ſum of money to John Cornelius Uterverius, a native of Delft in Holland, Profeſſor in that Univerſity, and after that to Thomas Demſter, a Scots Gentleman, Profeſſor alſo at the ſame place, to collect together, and put to the preſs books ſo worthy of being publiſhed (2).

(2) Bullart, Académie des Scienc. tom. 2. p. 110.

[C] We muſt not attribute to him the whole glory of his compilation.] It appears by the Catalogue of Phyſic-books, that the greateſt part of the volumes of Aldrovandus's Natural Hiſtory were printed after his death (3). The Ornithology (4), in three volumes in folio, and the ſeven books of Inſects, in one volume of the ſame ſize, are all that he publiſhed. The volume of Serpents, the three volumes of Quadrupeds, the volume of Fiſhes, that of exſanguious Animals, the Hiſtory of Monſters, with the Supplement to that of Animals, in twelve volumes, the treatiſe of Metals, the Dendrologie (5), were publiſhed at ſeveral times by the care of different perſons after the death of Aldrovandus. In truth, the volume of Serpents was put in order, and ſent to the preſs by Bartholomæus Ambroſinus (6). That of the Quadrupeds which divide the hoof was firſt digeſted into order by John Cornelius Uterverius, and afterwards by Thomas Demſter, and publiſhed by Marcus Antonius Bernia and Jerome Tamburini. That of the Quadrupeds which don't divide the hoof, and that of Fiſhes were digeſted by Uterverius, and publiſhed by Tambarini. That of the Quadrupeds with toes or claws was compiled by Ambroſinus. The Hiſtory of Monſters, and the Supplements were collected by the ſame Author, and publiſhed at the charge of Marcus Antonius Bernia. The Dendrologie is the work of Ovidius Montalbanus (7).

(3) Mercklinus, in Lindenio renovato, p. 1047

(4) That is, The Hiſtory of Birds.

(5) That is to ſay, The Hiſtory of Trees.

(6) In Patrio Bononiæ Archigymnaſio Simpl. Med. Profeſſor Ordinarius, Muſæi illuſtriſſ. Senatus Bonon. & Horti publici Præfectus.

(7) Ex Lindenio renovato, pag. 1047.

[D] There are ſome volumes of his Compilation, of which he only formed the Plan.] Mr. l'Abbé Gallois has ſo well explained the judgment that we ſhould form of this great work, that I thought it would be more acceptable to the reader, that I ſhould copy him, than abridge what he has ſaid. Here then are his own words: "Aldrovandus is not the author of that book (8), no "more than of ſeveral others, which have never-"theleſs been publiſhed under his name: but it has "happened to the collection of Natural Hiſtory, of "which thoſe books are part, as it does to thoſe "great rivers which retain during their whole courſe "the name they bore at their firſt riſe, tho' in the "end the greateſt part of the water which they "carry into the ſea does not belong to them, but "to other rivers which they receive. For, as the "ſix firſt volumes of this great work were Aldro-"vandus's, although the others were compoſed ſince "his death by different authors, they have ſtill been "attributed to him, either becauſe they were a continu-"ation of his deſign, or becauſe the writers of them "uſe his Memoirs, or becauſe his method was fol-"lowed, or perhaps that theſe laſt volumes might be the "better received under ſo celebrated a name (9)." They that would know the plan of this compilation need but look on the following words; they are Mr. l'Abbé Gallois's who proceeds thus: "Scarce any thing "has been written on thoſe trees, that may not be "found collected in this volume; for this author "does not content himſelf with relating all that he "has read thereupon in Naturaliſts: he remarks al-"ſo, following Aldrovandus's method, what the "Hiſtorians have wrote about them, what the Le-"giſlators have ordained, and what the Poets have "feigned of them. Further he explains the dif-"ferent uſes wherein theſe trees are employed in houſ-"hold-buſineſs, medicine, architecture, and other "arts. In ſhort he ſpeaks of morality, proverbs, "devices, riddles, hieroglyphics, and a great many "other things which relate to his ſubject (10)." He has not even neglected to conſult medals, and to draw from thence what might be of ſervice to him (11).

(8) Of the Dendrologie.

(9) Journal des Savans of Nov. 12, 1668, p. 425.

(10) Ibid.

(11) See Spanhem. de Præſt. Numiſm. Diſſert. 3. ſub finem, pag. 252.

[E] A Poet who was afterwards Pope has celebrated his praiſes in a very elegant manner.] I mean Mapheus Barberini, or Urban VIII. This is one of the Epigrams that he made in praiſe of Aldrovandus.

Multiplices rerum formas, quas pontus & æther
Exhibet & quicquid promit & abdit humus,
Mens haurit, ſpectant oculi, dum cuncta ſagaci
Aldobrande tuus digerit arte liber.
Miratur proprios ſolers induſtria fœtus
Quamque tulit mali ſe negat eſſe parem.
Obſtupet ipſa ſimul rerum fœcunda creatrix,
Et cupit eſſe ſuum quod vidit artis opus (12).

(12) Lorenzo Craſſo Elogii d'Huom. Letterati, tom. 1. pag. 137, 138.

"The various forms that ſwim the watry plains,
"Whate'er the earth's capacious womb contains,
"The trees and herbs that on her face appear,
"And all the wing'd inhabitants of air,
"In thy ſtupendous work collected lie,
"To feaſt the ſoul, and ſtrike th' aſtoniſh'd eye.
"Her own productions induſtry no more "Dares own, but wonders at the fruit ſhe bore
"And fruitful nature at thy deeds amaz'd
"Wiſhes her own thoſe works thy art has rais'd.

Lorenzo Craſſo quotes another of that Pope's epigrams with this.

☞ALDULF, ARDULF, or EARDULF, one of the principal Lords of Northumberland, was choſen King of that country [A], and inaugurated in St. Peter's church

[A] Was choſen King of that country] His father, who was alſo called Aldulf, had been killed, by order of King Ethelred, and he himſelf ſent into baniſhment (1). This inſtance of arbitrary power gave the faction, church at York the 26th of May in the year 796 (a). Two years after the murtherers of King Ethelred entered into a conſpiracy againſt Aldulf, and attacked him, being headed by one Wada; but after a bloody engagement, they were vanquiſhed and routed (b). In the year 801 Aldulf intended to make war againſt Cenulf King of Mercia, becauſe he had given a retreat in his dominions to the rebels of Northumberland. But a peace was ſoon concluded between the two Kings [B], by the mediation of their reſpective Biſhops and Nobles (c). As Aldulf had been raiſed to the throne by the faction that was then uppermoſt, he was not without apprehenſion leſt the other party ſhould gain ſtrength, and depoſe him; and indeed that party, being headed by Alcmund, the late King Alcred's ſon, began to be formidable, ſo that Aldulf thought it neceſſary for his own ſecurity to have Alcmund put to death (d), which was done accordingly. Alcmund's party looking upon him as a martyr, ranked him amongſt the Saints. But his faction was not ſuppreſſed by his death, which only gave them a fair opportunity of riſing againſt the King, under the conduct of a certain Lord called Aldrick; but he being killed in a battle, his faction remained quiet for ſome time, till they could find a more favourable opportunity to execute their deſign: And indeed the ſtate of affairs was ſoon altered; the party againſt the King became ſo powerful in a little time, that he was glad to eſcape with his life. He took refuge at the court of Charlemagne, where the Engliſh were always very kindly received. Alphuald II ſucceeded him, who reigned but two years, leaving the crown to Andred, in whoſe reign the kingdom of Northumberland was made ſubject to Ecbert King of Weſſex, who put an end to the Heptarchy (e). Aldulf had a daughter called Edburga, who was an Abbeſs, but we are not told of what Monaſtery (f).

(1) Simeon Dunelm. ap. Twyſden, tom. 1. col. 111, 114.

(a) Simeon Dunelm. ap. Twyſden, Hiſt. Angl. Scrip. Decem. tom. 1. Col. 113.
(b) Idem, ibid. Col. 114.
(c) Idem, ibid. Col. 117.
(d) A. D. 800.
(e) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 1. liv. 3. pag. 174, 175.
(f) Joh. Bromton, ap. Twyſden, ubi ſupra, Col. 797.

faction, that oppoſed the King, a fair opportunity to revolt; the civil war continued two years, and at laſt Ethelred was killed; but his faction was ſtill powerful enough to raiſe Osbald or Oſred to the throne; but he did not enjoy it long, for whilſt the people were rejoicing for his election, the oppoſite party took their meaſures ſo well, that they depoſed him, after he had reigned but ſeventeen days, and choſe Aldulf in his ſtead (2).

(2) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 1. l. 3. p. 174.

[B] A peace was concluded between the two Kings.] They entred into a treaty of friendſhip, and both ſwore upon the Goſpel, that as long as they lived and enjoyed their crowns, there ſhould be a perpetual and inviolable peace between them: which occaſioned univerſal joy to both their kingdoms. On which occaſion Simeon of Durham quotes the following verſes,

Gratius aſtra nitent, ubi nothus
Deſinit imbriferos dare ſonos;
Lucifer ut tenebras pepulerit,
Pulchra dies roſeos agit equos (3).

Imitated,

" The Sun a greater brightneſs yields
" After a rainy day;
" His rays much more adorn the fields,
" When clouds are chas'd away. P.

(3) Simeon Dunelm. ubi ſupra, Col. 117.

ALEANDER (JEROME) Archbiſhop of Brindiſi, and Cardinal, in the ſixteenth Century. Alexander VI wanted to have him in his ſervice [A], and would have made him Secretary to his ſon. He changed his mind ſoon after, and choſe rather to ſend him on a negotiation into Hungary; but Aleander was ſick at that time and could not leave Venice where he dwelt. Lewis XII prevailed with him to come to France in the year 1508 [B], to teach the Belles Lettres in the Univerſity of Paris. Aleander was at that time 28 years old. He made himſelf much eſteemed in that ſtation. He entered afterwards into the ſervice of Everard de la Mark Biſhop of Liege, who ſent him to Rome to facilitate his promotion to a Cardinalſhip notwithſtanding the oppoſition of France. Leo X found him of ſuch abilities that he deſired to retain him, to which the Biſhop of Liege conſented. Aleander was at firſt placed in the houſe of the Cardinal de Medici (a), to whom he was Secretary: He had afterwards the care of the Vatican Library, after the death of Acciaioli. But the grand theatre, where he began to appear with ſplendor, was Germany, at the beginning of the troubles which the reformation excited there. He

(a) Who was afterwards Pope Clement VII.

[A] Alexander VI wanted to have him in his ſervice.] I make uſe of this expreſſion, becauſe the author whom I have followed reduces the thing to a bare deſign that was never executed. According to what he ſays of him, Aleander was never actually in the ſervice of that wicked Pope. If that be ſo, we muſt reckon as nothing all the reflections that have been made to Aleander's diſadvantage, on account of that pernicious ſchool of Alexander VI, and Cæſar Borgia, where it is ſaid he was brought up. I determine nothing; I leave to the reader the trouble of ſifting a little into the matter: Aleandrum (qui paulò ante Cancellarius Leodienſis, & olim famoſiſſimi Cæſaris illius Borgiæ ſeu Ducis Valentini Secretarius fuerat, famulus bero dignus, & pars aulæ Romanæ ſub Alexandro VI,) peſſime deſcribit Lutherus (1). i. e. " Aleander (who a little before was " Chancellor of the Biſhop of Liege, and formerly Se- " cretary of the famous Cæſar Borgia, or Duke of " Valentinois, a ſervant worthy of his maſter, and one " of the Courtiers under Alexander VI,) has a very " bad character given him by Luther."

(1) Seckendorf, de Lutheran. l. 1. pag. 125. num. 3.

[B] Lewis XII prevailed with him to come to France, an. 1508.] Pallavicini does not ſet down this year; but ſince he ſays, that Aleander when he was 28 years old, was invited to Paris, I thought I could not be miſtaken in fixing upon that year; ſince Aleander's Epitaph relates that he died anno 1542, aged ſixty two years wanting thirteen days (2). He was therefore born Feb. 13, 1480, for they who record the day of his death, place it on the firſt of February (3). I am ſurprized at the negligence of the authors of his Epitaph. There they ſet down that he was born at la Motte, in the year 1479; and that he died at Rome in 1542, aged ſixty two years wanting thirteen days. That cannot be true but by ſuppoſing that the year 1479 did not commence in the month of January, and that the year 1542 did commence in that month: but it is ridiculous to ſuppoſe in an Epitaph ſo uniforming a way of recording time. I am ſurprized that the author of the Nomenclator was not aware of that falſe ſuppoſition. He has ſaid a thing that is incompatible with Father Pallavicini's aſſertion: viz. that Aleander was but twelve years old when he read Lectures in the univerſity of Paris.

(2) In nomenclatore Cardinalium, p. 132, and in Iſtoria de' Poëti Græci di Lorenzo Craſſo, pag. 278.
(3) Oldoïnus, in Athenæo Romano, p. 317.

He was ſent thither as Nuncio by the Pope, anno 1519. He there acted in the character both of Ambaſſador and of Doctor, as occaſion ſerved. He declaimed three hours together before the Diet of Worms, againſt the doctrine of Luther (b); but it is ſuppoſed that he did not repreſent it fairly (c). He could not prevent Luther from being heard in that Diet, and he refuſed to diſpute with him; but he obtained that his books might be burnt, and his perſon proſcribed; and he drew up himſelf the edict which proſcribed him (d). He reſided as Nuncio with Francis I, when he beſieged Pavia, anno 1525, and fell into the hands of ſome ſoldiers who abuſed him [C]. He was ſent a ſecond time into Germany in the year 1531, and there found a conſiderable alteration, if we are to believe what he is ſaid to have written. The people in the Proteſtant cities were no longer ſo animated againſt the Pope as formerly; but in the Catholick cities, they ſhewed an extreme deſire of ſhaking off the yoke of Rome, and enriching themſelves with the wealth of the church, as the Proteſtants had done. The alteration in the latter was owing to this reaſon, that having hoped for very great liberty, provided they could ſhake off the Papal yoke, they found by experience, that the yoke of the ſecular power, under which they were obliged to live, was not more eaſy. Aleander did every thing in his power, but without ſucceſs, to hinder Charles V from making a truce with the Proteſtants in Germany. He was created Cardinal by Paul III, and was intended to be Preſident of the Council of Trent, with two other Legates (e). In the mean time he went into Germany Legate from the Pope, anno 1538. That Legateſhip continued a year. His death, which happened February the firſt 1542, prevented his preſiding at the council. Some people ſay that he died by the blunder of his Phyſician [D]. I have not ſpoke all his Nunciatures. Moreri will furniſh what I have omitted. Aleander publiſhed ſeveral works [E]. He underſtood Hebrew and Greek very

(b) From Pallavicini Hiſt. Conc. Trident. it was in the year 1521

(c) Seckendorf, Hiſtoria Lutheraniſmi, lib. 1. pag. 149.

(d) Pallavicin. Hiſt. Conc. Trid. lib. 1. cap. 28. num. 5.

(e) The Cardinals Campegio and Simoneti.

[C] He fell into the hands of ſome ſoldiers who abuſed him.] See what appears on this ſubject in a Letter from Hieronymus Negro to Marcus Antonius Michieli, dated from Rome March 20, 1525. "The Archbiſhop of Capua relates a ſtrange adventure of Aleander, the Biſhop elect of Brindiſi, and Nuncio from his Holineſs to the moſt Chriſtian King: which is, that in the utmoſt fury of the battle, and in ſuch confuſion as you may imagine, the poor Gentleman, as he was running away dreſt in a manner ſuitable to his dignity of a Biſhop, fell into the hands of three Spaniards, who laying hold of him, without knowing him, conſtrained him by bullying and threatning, to promiſe a ranſom of three thouſand ducats, and they led him along in that dreſs through the camp, often turning back, and preſſing him with the moſt harſh expreſſions to follow them. The affrighted Biſhop ran after them like a lackey, without daring to ſay that he was the Apoſtolic Nuncio. But being got into Pavia he was known by the Vice-roy of Naples, and by the Marqueſs de Peſcara, who, with great trouble and difficulty, delivered him from that confinement and ſlavery: nevertheleſs to be releaſed from his oath, he was obliged to give the ſoldiers 200 ducats a man to make them eaſy. I hear he is going to Venice, he will give you himſelf an account of his diſgraces and misfortunes (4)."

(4) Lettres des Princes, tranſlated by Belleforet, fol. 96.

[D] Some people ſay that he died through the blunder of his Phyſician (5).] That does not at all agree with his Epitaph, which ſhews, that his death was occaſioned by a languiſhing diſeaſe, contracted by the fatigues of his embaſſies. Mox, diverſis legationibus pro ſummis Pontificibus ad omnes ferè Chriſtianos Principes fideliter & diligenter perfuncto, & IDEO IN TABEM DELAPSO. That is, "At length, having diſcharged with diligence and fidelity ſeveral Legateſhips for the ſovereign Pontiffs, to almoſt all the Chriſtian Princes, BY THAT MEANS HE FELL INTO A CONSUMPTION." A paſſage of Paulus Jovius, wrong underſtood at firſt, and afterwards metamorphoſed backwards and forwards into various ſenſes, has perhaps given room for the ſtory of the blunder of Aleander's Phyſician. However that be, we learn from Paulus Jovius, that Aleander ruined his health by the overcare he took of it, and that he was a very bad Phyſician to himſelf, by making uſe of too many unneceſſary medicines. Lætatus eſt eâ purpurâ per annos quinque (6), pervaſurus haud dubie ad exactam ætatem, niſi nimiâ tuendæ valetudinis ſolicitudine intempeſtivis medicamentis, ſibi hercle inſanus & infelix medicus, viſcera corrupiſſet (7). i. e. "He enjoyed the Purple five years, and would undoubtedly have arrived at a good old age, if he had not, through too great ſolicitude to preſerve his health, proved a mad and unſucceſsful Phyſician to himſelf, and corrupted his entrails by improper medicines."

(5) See les Jugem. des Savans ſur les Poët. tom. 3. num. 1273. p. 194.

(6) We muſt conclude from hence that he obtained the Cardinalſhip in 1537.

(7) Paulus Jovius, Elog. c. 98. pag. 231.

[E] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] Mr. de la Rochepozai (8) gives me again a little reaſon to complain of his want of exactneſs. He ſays that Aleander, although very capable of treating the ſublimeſt ſubjects, has not diſdained to write upon polite Learning, and to publiſh ſeveral ſmall works, the ſubject whereof was very trifling: De re literariâ licet inferiori bene mereri non dedignatus eſt, exilis argumenti operulis editis, quæ tamen autoris nomen & famam nec elevant neque imminutum eunt (9). That is, "He deſerved well of Literature, though he condeſcended to write only upon trivial ſubjects, having publiſhed ſome inconſiderable works, which however neither raiſe nor depreſs their author's reputation." There is no body who does not on the reading of this, prepare himſelf to ſee nothing but ſmall Pamphlets in the Catalogue of Aleander's works, which is the ſequel of theſe words of the Nomenclator. Obſerve however the beginning of that ſequel. Scripſit vaſtum opus adverſus ſingulos diſciplinarum Profeſſores, in quos cenſuram acerbius & felicem exercuit calamum. Tabulas in Grammaticam Græcam, ſeu potius Grammaticam ad literas Græcas. Dialogos duos feſtiviſſimos, quorum alter Cicero relegatus inſcribitur, alter verò Cicero revocatus (10). Carmina quædam illuſtrium Poetarum Italorum carminibus indita Epiſtolas multas, quarum quatuor habes inter Epiſtolas Federici Nauſeæ, & alias in quibus de rebus eccleſiaſticis agit. Annotationes item quaſdam in Bibliotheca Cardinalis Sirleti aſſervatas. i. e. "He wrote a vaſt work againſt all the Profeſſors of Literature, upon whom he exerciſed his pen happily and beſtowed ſevere cenſures. Tables for a Greek Grammar, or rather a Grammar for the Greek language. Two very witty Dialogues, one of which is called Cicero relegatus, and the other Cicero revocatus. Some verſes which are put amongſt thoſe of the moſt celebrated Italian Poets. Several Epiſtles, four of which you have amongſt the Letters of Federicus Nauſea, and others in which he treats of Eccleſiaſtical affairs. Alſo ſome Annotations which are kept in the Library of Cardinal Sirleti." If any perſon be diſpleaſed at ſeeing a great huge work where he was to have found only a ſmall diſſertation, he will not recover his good humour at finding in the Catalogue of a man's writings no mark to diſtinguiſh betwixt what has and what has not been printed. That is a fault that reigns in the Nomenclator, in Oldoïni's Athæneum, and in ſeveral other Bibliographers.

(8) Biſhop of Poitiers, author of the Nomenclator Cardinalium.

(9) Nomenclator Cardinalium, p. 131. edit. 1614.

(10) I demonſtrate that to be falſe in the article of LANDO (HORTENSIO).

very well; and he is said to have had a surprizing memory [F]. I don't believe that there was any reason for saying that the Hebrew was his mother tongue, or, to speak more clearly, that he was born a Jew [G]. There was more reason to accuse him of being passionate (f). He made his own epitaph, which testifies that he did not repine at (f) See the note [G] towards the end.

phers. Aleander's great work, wherein he censures all sorts of Professors, was never printed. He was putting, it is said, the last hand to it when he died. Mentre andava compiendo una vastissima opera contra i Professori di tutte le scienze, fu assalito in Roma dalla morte (11). That is what Moreri means by these words: He died February the first 1542, at a time when he was going to publish a considerable work. Paulus Jovius has been a guide upon this head to a great many people. Quum vastum opus, says he (12), vastâ illâ memoriâ adversus singulos disciplinarum Professores agitaret, Romæ interiit. The Continuators of Gesner knew none of all Aleander's works, but the tables of the Greek Grammar. Draudius knew nothing even of that. The Oxford Catalogue mentions nothing but a small Poem of this Author's.

(11) Lorenzo Crasso, Istor. de' Pitti Greci, pag. 277.

(12) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. 98. p. 231.

[F] He is said to have had a surprizing memory.] I don't know how to take what Paulus Jovius says of him for any thing but a poetic flight, though he gravely tells it us in prose. It is that Aleander could retain every thing that he read, and that he could recite it a long time afterwards, without making the least mistake, either with regard to the subject, or even in the words. Detur hoc incomparabili inusitatæ memoriæ felicitati quæ in Hieronymo Aleandro supra cujusque vel antiqui seculi captum admiranter excelluit, ut ejus ex vero depicta facies vel in pudenda ingenii sterilitate inter fœcundissimas imagines conspiciatur, quando nihil eum cuncta volumina cupide perlegentem vel rerum vel verborum omnino subterfugerit, quin singula memoriter vel à multis annis longo sepulta silentio recitaret (13). i. e. "Let thus "much be granted to that incomparable and unusual "happiness of memory, which in Hieronymus Aleander surprizingly excelled the capacity of any, "even the earliest, ages, that its picture taken from "the life, may be beheld amongst the most fertile images even in this present most shameful barrenness of "genius, since nothing of the subject or even of the "words, whilst he attentively read all sorts of books, "escaped him, but he would recite them all by "heart, after they had lain dormant in his mind for "several years." It is not an easy matter to believe this, if one did not see it; but as a memory may be a very good one, although it does not come up to the pitch that Paulus Jovius has just described, I do not question Aleander's being perfectly acquainted with the several languages that his Epitaph attributes to him: Hebraicæ, Græcæ, Latinæ, aliquotque aliarum linguarum exoticarum ita exacte docto, ut eas recte & apte loqueretur & scriberet. i. e. "He was "so throughly acquainted with the Hebrew, Greek, "Latin, and several other foreign languages, that he "could speak and write them readily and exactly.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 230.

[G] I do not believe there was any reason for saying he was born a Jew.] Luther, and his followers, gave it out as a thing certain, during Aleander's first nunciature in Germany; and this is what we read in Luther's works (14). Venit his diebus Hieronymus Aleander vir sua opinione longè maximus, non solum propter linguas quas eximiè callet, siquidem Ebræa illi vernacula est, Græca à puero illi coaluit, Latinam autem didicit diutina professione, sed etiam mirabilis suis videtur ob antiquitatem generis. Nam Judæus natus est, quæ gens immodicè gloriatur de Abraham vetustissimo se originem ducere. An verò baptizatus est nescitur. Certum est eum non esse Pharisæum, quia non credit resurrectionem mortuorum, quoniam vivit perinde atque cum corpore sit totus periturus, adeo nullum à se pravum affectum abstinens. Usque ad insaniam iracundus est, quavis occasione furens. Impotentis arrogantiæ, avaritiæ inexplebilis, nefandæ libidinis & immodicæ, summum gloriæ mancipium, quanquam mollior quam qui possit elaborato stylo (15) gloriam parare, & pejor quam qui vel colorem in argumento honesto. At ne nesciamus, cessit felicissimè simulata defectio ad Christianos. i. e. "There is now come hither Hieronymus Aleander, "a very great Man in his own opinion, not only "on account of the languages which he is perfectly "acquainted with; for Hebrew is his mother-"tongue, Greek he has made familiar to him from "a child, and he has learnt Latin by long professing "it, but he seems an extraordinary person to his "own friends on account of the antiquity of his "family. For he was born a Jew, which nation is "immoderately proud of deriving their original so "far back as from Abraham. It is not known whether "he be baptized or not. It is certain he is not a "Pharisee, because he does not believe the resurrec-"tion of the dead, but lives as tho' all of him was "to die with his body; wherefore he does not stifle "in himself any evil inclination. He is prone to "anger even to madness, and flies into a fury upon "every occasion. A man full of impotent arrogance "and insatiable avarice, scandalously and immode-"rately libidinous, a meer slave to glory, and yet "too indolent to gain a reputation by an elaborate "style, and too wicked to endeavour for it on an "honourable subject. But that we may omit no "part of his character, his pretended coming over "to the Christians has been of excellent service to "him." Here is a picture, which represents Aleander to us, not only as a Jew, who pretended to be a Christian, and even whose Baptism was a thing doubtful; but also as a man that did not believe the immortality of the soul, and who wallowed in the most infamous voluptuousness, passionate even to madness, covetous and proud in the highest degree. He answered to the accusation of being born a Jew, and declared before the Diet of Worms, that his ancestors had enjoyed the dignity of Marquiss in Istria, and that he had produced good proofs of his noble and illustrious extraction, when he was made a Canon of Liege. He called to witness several persons of probity who knew him, and were acquainted with his family. It is Mr. de Seckendorf that acquaints us with this particular. He found it in the Archives of the Dukes of Weimar, where are kept amongst several manuscripts of that time the Records of the Diet of Worms. Aleander's long Oration is abridged in those Acts, and it is thence that that illustrious Lutheran extracted what follows as he has translated it into Latin (16): Tandem questus est à Luthero spargi quasi Aleander gente Judæus esset: "Deum immortalem!" dixit, "multi hic sunt boni viri, quibus notus sum ego & familia mea, & asserere ego verè possum, majores meos Marchiones in Istria fuisse (17): "quod verò parentes mei ad inopiam redacti sunt, fato tribui debet. Natales meos ita legitimavi, ut in Canonicum Leodiensem receptus sum, quod factum non foret, nisi ortus essem ex familia illustri vel spectabili." i. e. "Aleander at length complained that he was defamed by Luther as though he "was a Jew by nation: "Good God!" said he, "here "are many good men present, to whom both I and "my family are well known, and I can with truth "affirm that my ancestors were Marquisses in Istria; "but that my parents were reduced to poverty "must be attributed to fate. I have so well demon-"strated my pedigree, that I have been received a "Canon of Liege, which could not have been done, "if I had not come of an illustrious or eminent "family." What makes me believe that the imputation of his Jewish extraction was unjust, is no trifling reason. Ulric Hutten published an invective against Aleander, wherein he worked himself up into such a passion, that he threatned to kill him. Omnem advertam diligentiam, omne adhibebo studium, omnia tentabo conaborque, ut qui furore, amentiâ, & iniquitate gravis accessisti, vita inanis hinc efferaris. Neque enim expectandum adhuc tibi est ut stilos doctorum hic virorum sentias, sed futurum crede ut fortium gladiis confodiare (18). i. e. "I will apply my "utmost diligence, will leave no stone unturned, "will attempt and endeavour all methods, that you "who came hither full fraught with fury, madness, "and wickedness, shall be carried hence deprived "of life. Nor are you to expect to be attacked by "the pens of learned Men, but depend upon it "you

(14) Tom. I. fol. 496. apud Seckendorf de Lutheran. l. 1. p. 125. num. 4.

(15) Paulus Jovius testifies that Aleander only exercised himself in speaking; and that when he had a desire to write, he found out his weakness too late.

(16) Seckendorf de Lutheran. p. 149. lit. k.

(17) We are assured in his epitaph that he descended e Comitibus Landri in Carnia Petræpilosæ in Histria.

(18) Hulricus Huttenus in Aleandrum.

at his deſtiny [H], as he has been accuſed to have done. Eraſmus makes frequent mention of him in his letters, and generally to his diſadvantage [I]. He complains, amongſt

"you ſhall be ſtabbed by the ſwords of men of valour." He was not ignorant that the Nuncio had confuted, before the Diet, the reproach of Judaiſm, and had boaſted his being deſcended from a very illuſtrious family; but he was ſo far from engaging to maintain that reproach, that he denied its being objected to him. It is but little to my purpoſe to obſerve that he did wrong to deny it; the proof which I draw from his ſilence is not the worſe for that; for if he had ſeen any foundation for accuſing him, he would at leaſt have maintained that Aleander denied falſly his Jewiſh extraction. Does not Hutten maintain that the Counts, whom he had claimed as his relations, did not acknowledge him? Nihil intellexiſti proximâ auditione cum multis quidem excuſares Judaïcam originem, nemo objiceret. Nam eſſe malum quâcunque etiam gente editum ſciebant omnes. Itaque nemo magnopere putabat generis pravitatem tibi objiciendam: adverſum mores fremebant infensè multi. Et poterat ſentiri jam manifeſtè quæ eſſet animorum commotio: tu tamen, quaſi illic potiſſimum expurgatione opus eſſet, multis tractabas locum eum ad faſtidium uſque audientium: ſed tantâ cum fiduciâ ut planè certus tibi eſſe videreris neminem intelligere, quam impudenter ibi mentireris omnia. Illo enim poſt multa erupiſti, ut ad nobiliſſ. comitum, qui te penitus ignorant, & quos tu haud ſatis nôſti, genus, originem tuam referres (19). i. e. "You acted without under-
(19) Idem. ibid. "ſtanding at the next hearing when you uſed a great "many words to vindicate your ſelf from being a "Jew, whereas no body objected it. For all knew you "to be an ill man, let your origin be what it would. "So that no one thought it any mighty matter to "object your deſcent to you: it was againſt your "manners that many were incenſed. And it might "plainly be perceived how much their minds were "moved: but at the ſame time, as if your vindica-"tion was chiefly wanting there, you inſiſted upon "that ſubject, till the audience was quite tired: "and with ſo much confidence that you ſeemed to "be quite ſure in your own mind that no body "knew how impudently you lied. For at laſt you "roſe to that pitch as to claim a deſcent from a "moſt noble family, who are entirely unacquainted "with you, and whom you hardly know." But as there is nothing ſo trifling as not to grow conſiderable by paſſing from one to another, I would not deny, but that the ſlander which ran againſt the Nuncio had no other foundation than what Paulus Jovius has ſaid, that the Jews admired Aleander's skill in Hebrew, and could eaſily believe him one of their own nation: Latinæ Græcæque literæ quum ſæpè alacriter jactabundo pro vernaculis haberentur, Hebraicas admirantibus Judæis & ſuæ ſtirpis eum
(20) Jovius, Elogiorum, cap. 98. p. 231. facilè credentibus, ſolertiſſime didicit (20). I would obſerve to ſuch as have a mind to criticiſe upon me, that I do not pretend that Paulus Jovius's book has given occaſion to the ſlander; my meaning is, that others might have ſaid it long before Paulus Jovius.

"What Luther ſays, that Aleander was choleric is "very true: we may believe Joſſe Gentin Secretary "to this Cardinal, in a letter to Nauſea Biſhop of
* Lib. 8. Ep. ad Nauſeam a variis Scriptarum, p. 353. "Vienna *. He tells him, in the ſerioueſt manner "in the world, after having given him an account of "the death of Aleander, that he does not know "where to diſpoſe of himſelf after the death of his "Maſter, for fear of finding one ſtill more paſſionate. "Hactenus, ſays he, alium Mecenatem Romæ non "quæſivi, eo quod immodeſtia & furor hujus mei "defuncti inculcat mihi timorem, ne faciam Glauci "cum Diomede permutationem." See the margin (21).
(21) This ſupplement comes from Mr. de la Monnoie. [H] He made his own Epitaph, which ſhews he was not diſpleaſed with his deſtiny.] It conſiſts of two Greek verſes, which ſignify that he died willingly, becauſe he ceaſed to be witneſs of ſeveral things, the ſight of which was more inſupportable than death.

Κάτθανον οὐκ ἄἰκων, ὅτι παύσομαι ἢν ἐπιμάρτυς
Πολλῶν, ὧπιφ ἰδιῖν ἄλγιον ἦν θανατῦ.

Such would be the diſpoſition of all men, if reflexion, if reaſon, if good ſenſe, were capable of ſurmounting the mechanical impreſſions that make us in love with life. But, laying aſide this profound moralizing, I muſt ſay it is very ſtrange that Paulus Jovius ſhould produce againſt himſelf ſo plain an evidence as this epitaph. He had ſaid that Aleander, being enraged with his deſtiny, that carried him off a year before the climacterick, gave up his breath, complaining of it: Interiit fato ſuo vehementer indignatus, quum ſe præreptum anno uno ante climactericum inter anxia ſupremaque ſuſpiria quereretur (22); and, immediately after he adds, that Aleander directed by his will that a Greek epitaph of his own compoſing ſhould be put over him, containing this thought:
(22) Jovius Elog. cap. 98. p. 231.

Exceſſi e vitæ ærumnis faciliſque lubenſque,
Ne pejora ipſâ morte debinc videam.

Lorenzo Craſſo ſays pretty near the ſame thing concerning this indignation of Aleander againſt his deſtiny. Fu aſſalito in Roma dalla morte, contro la quale moſtroſſi anche negli ultimi ſoſpiri ſdegnato (23). Paulus Jovius fell into another miſtake with regard to Aleander. He accuſes him of having preſaged new misfortunes ready to fall on our heads, novas clades imminere nobis ominatur; but nothing is more falſe than that: Aleander regarded futurity only by accident; all his views reſpected the time paſt; he imagined that the future was of no value in this world. Here then is a ſecond error of Paulus Jovius. As for the firſt, we cannot juſtify him in it, without charging him with a horrible ſlander, of having repreſented him as a dying impoſtor, who ordered by his will a lie to be tranſmitted to poſterity, that he did not die with regret. Lorenzo Craſſo relates, that Scraderus has inſerted in his monuments of Italy the monumental inſcription of Aleander, with the Latin tranſlation of the two Greek verſes (24). This tranſlation is the ſame that Paulus Jovius has related: it is not much worſe than this, Non invitus obii; quia quieſco, teſtis multorum quæ videre pejus eſt morte (25). See what one gains by making uſe of a language that is but little known: All the force and all the grace of the Greek diſtich have eſcaped the tranſlators.
(23) Lor. Craſſo, Hiſt. de' Poëti Greci, p. 297.
(24) Lor. Craſſo, Hiſt. de' Poëti Greci, p. 278.
(25) Chytræus, lib. 17. fol. 458, relates it. See Seckendorf, book 1. p. 128, let. b.

Let us add an obſervation here, that has been communicated to me by a learned man: Joſſe Gentin, in his letter to Nauſea, ſays that Aleander, three days before his death, having put all his affairs in order, ſervitoribus & aliis præſentibus, pronunciavit ſuum quod fieri cupiebat epitaphium, quod hoc diſticho clauſit, κάτθανον &c. This ſhews that the epitaph did not conſiſt only of theſe two verſes, but that they were only the cloſe of it. I am not of this opinion: I believe Gentin intended to ſay his maſter comprehended in this diſtich the whole inſcription that he ordered to be put upon his tomb.

[I] Eraſmus made frequent mention of him in his letters, and generally to his diſadvantage.] Aleander being naturally hot-headed, and intereſted alſo in the ruin of Lutheraniſm, being by his quality of Nuncio ſent into Germany to ſtrangle this infant in the cradle, could not bear the moderation of Eraſmus. This was not all: Eraſmus's enemies were continually defaming him as a favourer of Lutheraniſm; ſo that the reciprocal eſteem and friendſhip between him and the Nuncio was greatly diminiſhed by Aleander's firſt journey into Germany. Hieronymum Aleandrum, Nuncium Apoſtolicum, hominem apprime doctum, mihique vetere ac jucundiſſima neceſſitudine conjunctum, miris mendaciis in me conati ſunt irritare... Quid multis? Perſuaſerant homini, ut acri ſimplicique ingenio prædito, ita credulo, me parum amicè de ipſo & ſentire & loqui. Nec defuerunt, qui coaleſcentem amicitiam novis ſubinde delationibus diſcinderent (26). i. e. "They have endeavoured by ſtrange lies to irri-
(26) Eraſmi Ep. 24. l. 17. p. 767. "tate againſt me Jerom Aleander, the Apoſtolick "Nuncio, a man of great learning, with whom I "have long had an intimate friendſhip.... Why "ſhould I uſe many words? As he was not only of "a warm and ſimple, but alſo of a credulous diſpoſi-"tion, they had perſuaded him that I both thought and amongſt other things, of ſome ill offices that had been done him with the Biſhop of Liege, in whoſe houſe Aleander had a brother, who was a much greater maſter in the art of diſſimulation than himſelf [K].

ALEANDER

" ſpoke of him in an unfriendly manner. Nor were " there wanting ſome to break off our friendſhip, that " was going to be renewed, with freſh ſlanders." This is ſpeaking very faintly of the ill diſpoſitions of Aleander, if it is true, as we cannot doubt, that it was he who was intended in another place (27) by the title of Bull-carrier, Διπλωματοφόρος; for this Bull-carrier did all he could to deſtroy Eraſmus; and it was well for the latter, that the Emperor would not do all that the ſomer deſired of him: Me quo minus oppreſſerit per illum non ſtetit: perierat Eraſmus, ſi pronas aures Principum reperiſſet. A letter that Eraſmus had writ to Luther, whoſe friends had publiſhed it, ſo irritated Aleander, that he endeavoured to ruin his old friend, as well with the Pope, as the Biſhop of Liege. Hæc (Epiſtola) dedit anſam Aleandro jampridem inique in me animo ut me perditum iret, conatus Leonis animum irritare in me, ſimul Leodienſis Epiſcopi, qui prius pene deperibat, ut ita loquar, in Eraſmum. Nam ipſe Leodienſis oſtendit mihi literas, quas ad eum è Roma ſcripſerat Aleander ſatis odioſe me attingentes (28). That is, " This letter gave a handle to Aleander, who was already offended with me, to endeavour to deſtroy me, endeavouring to incenſe Leo " againſt me, and alſo the Biſhop of Liege, who before was almoſt in love with me. For the Biſhop " ſhewed me a letter written to him by Aleander " from Rome, wherein he treated me after a ſpiteful manner," He affected to ſay, that the heretics had found in Eraſmus's works the foundation of all their falſe doctrines. Jam audio multis perſuaſum ex meis ſcriptis extitiſſe totam hanc Eccleſiæ procellam. Cujus vaniſſimi rumoris præcipuus autor fuit Hieronymus Aleander; homo, ut nihil aliud dicam, non ſuperſtitioſe verax (29). i. e. " I hear now that many " have been perſuaded that all this ſtorm has riſen " upon the church out of my writings. Which " moſt idle ſtory was broached by Jerom Aleander; " a man, to ſay no worſe of him, not ſuperſtitiouſly " addicted to truth." He did not content himſelf with nibbling at Eraſmus's religion; he ſlandered alſo the learning and the works of that great man. This appears by a letter that Eraſmus wrote in 1524 (30), wherein he opens his mind to him. He looked upon him as ſo violent an enemy, that he took him for one of the principal promoters of the cenſures that the Sorbonne had publiſhed againſt his books, and for the true Author of the invective that went under the name of Julius Cæſar Scaliger. Non tamen erant prodituræ cenſuræ, niſi quidam oleum camino addidiſſent. Lutetiæ fuit Eccius, & ut ſuſpicor Aleander, quem ſuſpicor hac de cauſâ præcipuè veniſſe, ut Eraſmo moliatur exitium. Julii Scaligeri libellum tam ſcio illius eſſe, quam ſcio me vivere. Id tamen diſſimulandum eſt, ne magis inſaniat prodito fuco (31). That is, " But theſe cenſures would not have appeared, if ſomebody had not added oil to the flame. " Eccius was at Paris, and, as I ſuſpect, Aleander, " whom I imagine to have gone thither almoſt on " purpoſe to contrive Eraſmus's deſtruction. I am " as ſure that the book under Julius Scaliger's name " is his, as that I am alive. But this muſt be diſſembled, for fear he ſhould rage more when he " finds it is diſcovered." I have ſhewed elſewhere (32), that Eraſmus was miſtaken in this laſt fact; Scaliger's oration was the work of him whoſe name it bore; and to ſay, that in 1531, Aleander's chief occaſion of going to Paris was to contrive the ruin of Eraſmus, is thinking one's ſelf of too much conſequence, and not knowing the nature of the employments that the Pope gave this Nuncio. We ſhall ſee elſewhere (33) whether Eraſmus had any reaſon to aſcribe a book, that went under the name of Doletus, to Aleander. He ſeems to mean this Nuncio in the xxivth letter of the xxvth book. Aleander's paſſion then muſt have been very great; for he of whom Eraſmus complains diſperſed a writing (34) at the Court of Rome, wherein he told the Pope, he was aſtoniſhed that when ſo many perſons had periſhed in Germany in the peaſant's war, Eraſmus, the author and leader of this furious tumult, was ſtill alive. One cannot be ignorant who was the Author intended by Eraſmus, ſeeing theſe words are found in another letter: In me impudentiſſimis argumentis cauſam agit (Albertus Pius) & agit hoſtiliter, docere laborans, me fuiſſe occaſionem, cauſam, autorem, & principem, totius hujus negotii. Quod idem agit Aleander in ſuo Racha, demirans me adhuc ſpirare, quum in Germania tot hominum millia ſint trucidata (35). i. e. " Albertus Pius pleads againſt me " with moſt impudent arguments, and in a hoſtile " manner, endeavouring to prove me the occaſion, " cauſe, author, and principal of this whole affair. " The ſame has been done by Aleander in his Racha, " who wonders that I am ſtill alive, when ſo many " thouſand men have been killed in Germany." In another place, he deſcribes him under the name of VERPUS (36); which ſhews he was not quite unde-ceived concerning the ſlanderous report of his being born a Jew. If Aleander wrote this book, he had been very intimate with Eraſmus, had the ſame table, the ſame chamber, and the ſame bed, and had received good offices at his hands; for thus Eraſmus informs us: Cum altero fui mihi olim non tectum modo ac menſa, verum etium cubiculum & lectus communis (37), adeoque a me nulla læſus eſt injuriâ, ut quum illi res eſſent anguſtiores commendatricibus literis meis nonnihil etiam adjutus ſit, nec uſquam illius in ſcriptis meis niſi honorifica mentio (38). i. e. " We formerly " lived not only under the ſame roof, and at the " ſame table, but had alſo the ſame chamber, and the " ſame bed, and he was ſo far from being injured " by me, that when his circumſtances were ſtrait, " I gave him ſome aſſiſtance by my commendatory " letters, and I never made any but honourable men-" tion of him in my works." One cannot help owning that Aleander is meant here, when one recollects another letter (39) where are theſe words: Ut video, tibi propemodum perſuaſit (Aleander): at ego, qui è domeſtico convictu ac lectuli quoque contubernio totum intus & in cute novi, tam ſcio eſſe ovum illius (40), quam ſcio me vivere. That is, " I ſee that Aleander " has almoſt perſuaded you: but I that know him " throughly from a fellowſhip in bed and board, am " as ſure it is his production, as that I am alive." Let us conclude theſe diſadvantageous relations with a paſſage that concerns the morals of Aleander: He lived like an Epicurean at Venice in 1533, if we may credit Eraſmus: Nunc Venetiæ plane vivit Epicureum, non ſine dignitate tamen (41). i. e. " He lives now " at Venice like an Epicurean, but not without an honourable character." By this character no doubt he underſtands the double mitre, which he had mentioned in the lxth Letter. Aleander gemina mitra inſignitus, nam Brunduſinus & Oretinus eſt, apud Cæſarem agit Legatum Anglicum (42). This laſt word is equivocal, and perhaps Eraſmus had not writ Anglicum, but Angelicum, to ſignify the employment of Apoſtolic Nuncio, which Aleander had at that time in Germany. Be it as it will, there would have been no harm in noting in the margin, that he was not the King of England's Embaſſador at the court of the Emperor Charles V, for ſo the reader will immediately conclude. Mr. de la Monnoie has very happily conjectured that Anglicum was put, becauſe Eraſmus had writ ſhort ãplicum for apoſtolicum.

We muſt however in this place take a view of a paſſage of Eraſmus to Aleander's advantage: Etiamſi nominaſſes iſtum, qui Aleandrum Eraſmo præfert in omnibus, nihil erat periculi. Nam & ipſe plurimum tribuere ſoleo Aleandro, præſertim in literis, nihiloque magis me lædi puto ſi doctior eſt, quam quod ditior eſt aut formoſior (43). That is, " If you had " named him, who prefers Aleander before Eraſmus " in every thing, there would have been no danger. " For I my ſelf am wont alſo to allow a great deal " to Aleander, eſpecially in learning, and think my " ſelf not in the leaſt worſe for his being more learned, any more than for his being richer or handſomer." The letter, wherein Eraſmus ſpeaks thus, is dated Auguſt 31, 1524.

[K] He had a brother who was a greater maſter in the art of diſſimulation than himſelf.] Eraſmus, from whom we learn this particular, adds that this brother was

(27) In the 24th Letter of the 25th book, p. 1379.

(28) Eraſmi Ep. 113. lib. 19. pag. 949.

(29) Idem, Ep. 84. lib. 20, pag. 1040.

(30) The 53d of the 18th book.

(31) Eraſmus, Ep. 56. lib. 30. p. 1941.

(32) In the note [M] of the article ERASMUS.

(33) In the ſame Note.

(34) In quo docebat quid ſignificet Hebræis Racha. i. e. " In which " he ſhew'd what " was meant in " Hebrew by the " word Racha.

(35) Eraſmi, Ep. 99. lib. 20. pag. 1052: It is dated from Baſil, Dec. 23, 1528.

(36) In the 44th Letter of the 30th book, p. 1931. See alſo the 74th Letter of the ſame book.

(37) It was probably at Venice, when Eraſmus was employed by Aldus Manutius.

(38) Ep. 24. lib. 25. p. 1379.

(39) The 58th Letter of the 30th book of Eraſmus, p. 1945.

(40) He ſpeaks of Scaliger's Oration.

(41) Ep. 62. lib. 30. p. 1949.

(42) Eraſm. Ep. 60. lib. 30.

(43) Ep 4 l. 21. p. 1053. Vide etiam p. 814.

ALEANDER (JEROM) of the ſame family with the former (a), and grandſon by the mother's ſide of Jerom Amaltheus, was one of the learned men of the ſeventeenth Century. As ſoon as he quitted Friuli, his native country, to go to Rome, he met with the employment of Secretary under Cardinal Octavius Pandini, which he filled with honour for near twenty years. He had begun betimes to venture upon printing; for he had hardly received his degrees in Law, when he publiſhed a Commentary upon the Inſtitutions of Caius. He did not ſuffer his pen to reſt at Rome, for, being one of the firſt that were received into the riſing Academy of the Humoriſts, he had always ſome compoſition to ſhew them; and even made a very learned treatiſe in the Italian tongue upon the device of this aſſembly. The fruitfulneſs of his genius and ſtudies appeared by ſeveral writings upon different ſubjects. He explained ſome antiques [A]: He wrote on the queſtion of the * Suburbian Churches, and publiſhed a work againſt that which an anonymous Author (b) had compoſed on that ſubject in favour of the Proteſtants. A volume of his Verſes came from the preſs, and was followed with a Vindication of the Adonis of the Cavalier Marino, againſt the vigorous attacks of the Cavalier Stiliani. Urban VIII ſhewed his eſteem for him in a very advantageous manner: For he took pains himſelf to draw him from the ſervice of Cardinal Bandini to attach him to that of the Barberini, ſo that Aleander became Secretary of Cardinal Francis Barberini, this Pope's nephew. He accompanied this Cardinal when he went into France with the character of Legat à latere. He did not ſink under the fatigues of this long journey, but bare them couragiouſly, and got very well through it, notwithſtanding his weak conſtitution, and the ill ſtate of his health. He did not eſcape ſo well from the entertainments. He had made an agreement with ſome of his intimate friends to treat one another by turns every three days: He could not refrain, where there were ſo many delicate diſhes before him, from eating more than agreed with ſuch a weak ſtomach as his was; this occaſioned the diſeaſe of which he died (c). The Cardinal his maſter made a magnificent funeral for him at the Academy of the Humoriſts; and the Academiſts, his fellow members, carried his body to the grave (d). Gaſpar de Simeonibus made the Funeral Oration there the 31ſt of December 1631; it was printed at Paris in 1616. Aleander had ſo neat and ſo eaſy a way of writing, that the compliment which one of his friends made him upon it deſerves a reflexion [B].

(a) They are diſtinguiſhed, by calling the other Aleander Senior, and this Aleander Junior.

(b) This was Salmaſius.

(c) Monſ. Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, num. 1420, and Witte, in his Diarum Biograph. Part II. p. 40, place his death in 1631. Witte calls him Alexander.

(d) Extracted from Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth 1. See alſo Allatius in Apibus Urbanis, p. 123, 124, 125.

* The Suburbian Churches are the Provinces of Italy which compoſed the dioceſe of Rome. The word is alſo extended to ſignify all the Weſtern Churches.

was in this reſpect a great deal more dangerous than Aleander, who did not know ſo well how to conceal his deſigns. Let us relate it in his own words: Habet fratrem apud Leodienſ. hoc perniciоſiorem, quod omnia poteſt diſſimulare, id quod non poteſt Aleander (44). "He has a brother at Liege more pernicious "than himſelf, for he can diſſemble every thing, "which Aleander cannot do.

(44) Eraſmi, Ep. 51. lib. 20. p. 1011.

[A] He explained ſome antiques.] They were two marbles, a table and a ſtatue. The table contained the figure and ſymbols of the Sun; the ſtatue was girt with a zone full of ſculptures. The title of Aleander's work is as follows: Explicatio antiquæ tabulæ marmoreæ ſolis effigie ſymboliſque exſculptæ: Explicatio ſigillorum zonæ veterem ſtatuam marmoream cingentis. It is one volume in 4to, printed at Rome in 1616, and at Paris in 1617. I make no doubt but that by this work he came acquainted with Father Morin. It appears by the book intitled Eccleſiæ Orientalis Antiquitates (1), that they ſometimes correſponded together.

(1) Printed at Lond. 1682, and at Francfort in 1683, in 12°.

[B] His way of writing procured him a compliment which deſerves a reflexion.] Nicius Erythræus often uſed to ſay to him; When I read your works I think myſelf a learned man, but when I read thoſe of other authors, who would be thought eloquent, I think myſelf very ignorant, for I do not underſtand one word they write. How few modern Latin authors are there, who can have this compliment paid them. I do not ſpeak of thoſe who write in a law or ſcholaſtic ſtyle, but ſuch as would write like Orators, and who labour their phraſes. They only ſerve for the moſt part to mortify the preſumption of their readers, who continually find themſelves ſo perplexed by ſome dark alluſion, or confuſed metaphor, that they cannot ſee where they are. The misfortune is, that they fail of mortifying their readers by this means, provided ſelf-love induces them to impute the reaſon of this obſcurity, not to their own ignorance, but to the nonſenſe of the author. I fancy however it will not be amiſs to give the reader the ingenious remark of Nicius Erythræus, as it ſtands in the original. Scribendi ejuſdem ratio tum in ſolutâ oratione tum in verſibus adeo erat pura, adeo elegans, adeo perſpicua, ut ſæpe ex me audiret, tum demum me mihimet doctum eruditumque videri, cum ſua legerem; cum autem in aliorum ſcripta, qui ſe eloquentes dici vellent, incurrerem, tum plane me indoctum omniumque rerum rudem agnoſcere, eò quod verbum prorſus in illis nullum intelligerem (2). This, one would think, ſhould have proved a ſtrong motive to him againſt leaving any obſcurity in his Elogies, and yet we meet with ſome therein. Some think it is not expreſſed plain enough, whether it was at Rome or at Paris that high living was fatal to Aleander: they think it was at Paris (3). For my part I make no doubt of the contrary: for ſet times of feaſting by turns, and that two or three times a week, ſuit much better with people that live quietly at home than travellers. Beſides the journey that the Legate Francis Barberini made to France in the year 1625, was but for a few months, whereas Aleander did not die till 1631.

(2) Nicii Erythræi Pinacoth. 1. p. 46.

(3) See Jugemens des Sçavans ſur les Poëtes, tom. 4. num. 1420, p. 54.

ALEGAMBE (PHILIP) a Flemiſh Jeſuit, was born at Bruſſels the 22d of January 1592. He ſtudied polite Literature in his own country; after which he went to Spain, and was taken into the Duke of Oſſuna's family. He followed him into Sicily, when that Duke went thither as Viceroy. Finding in himſelf an inclination for a religious life, he took upon him the habit of a Jeſuit at Palermo, the 7th day of September 1613. He went through his probation, and read his courſe of Philoſophy in the ſame city, and followed his ſtudy of Divinity at Rome, from whence he was ſent into Auſtria, to teach Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Gratz. Having diſcharged the duties of this function to the ſatisfaction of his ſuperiors, he was advanced to be be Profeſſor of School Divinity, and ſolemnly promoted to the Doctorſhip in 1629. During theſe tranſactions, the Prince of Eggemberg, favourite of the Emperor Ferdinand II, reſolved that his ſon ſhould travel, and would have him attended by a learned and prudent Jeſuit for his Confeſſor. F. Alegambe was thought a fit perſon for this employment: They took him from the ſchools in order that he might travel with this young Lord. He was with him five years, and ſaw Germany, France, Spain, Portugal and Italy. Being returned to Gratz he taught moral Divinity, and acted under the character of ſpiritual father to the youth. In the year 1658 the young Prince, whom he had accompanied in his travels, was named by the Emperor Ferdinand III to the embaſſy of obedience to Pope Urban VIII. He had a mind to take F. Alegambe with him: ſo this Jeſuit travelled to Rome in quality of Confeſſor to the Ambaſſador. When this function was finiſhed, the General of the Jeſuits retained him for his Secretary of Latin diſpatches for Germany. Alegambe having ſpent four years ſucceſſively in the duties of this difficult office, was obliged to leave it, becauſe the continual application to writing weakened his ſight too much: Then they gave him the preſidentſhip of ſpiritual affairs in the Profeſſed Houſe, and the office of hearing people's confeſſions in the church, of which he is ſaid to have acquitted himſelf admirably well. He died of the dropſy at Rome the ſixth day of September 1652 (a). He has not compoſed many books [A]; but that does not hinder him from deſerving the praiſe of being a very good Author; for the Bibliotheque of the Writers of his Order is in its kind a very uſeful book, and much better than all the works of that nature which had appeared before that time. He muſt have taken a great deal of pains to gather materials for it, which requires two talents that hardly ever meet, much patience and much activity. Afterwards he muſt have put the collected Memoirs in order, which is the hardeſt thing in this ſort of works, becauſe one is no longer animated by that eagerneſs and ardour with which one ſeeks for materials that are wanted. It was at Rome that Alegambe laboured to form the catalogue for which he had gathered ſo many memoirs (b). It was printed at Antwerp in 1645. He augmented ſo much what the Jeſuit Ribadeneira had begun [B] upon that ſubject, that whereas the work of the latter is but a very ſmall Octavo, his is a Folio of a reaſonable ſize. We ſhall relate in the notes the different characters that have been given of it [C]. He had intended to make a new edition of his work; and during the nine years

(a) Taken from Sotuel, Bibliothec. Script. Societatis Jeſu, Romæ, 1675, in folio, pag. 706, 707.

(b) Sotuel, ibid.

[A] He did not write many books.] All that the Jeſuit Sotuel allows to be writ by him are theſe: Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jeſu, Antverpiæ, 1643, in folio; Vita P. Joannis Cardin, Luſitani, ex Societate Jeſu, Romæ, 1649, in 12; Heroës & Victimæ charitatis Societatis Jeſu, Romæ 1658, in 4*to*; Mortes illuſtres & Geſta eorum de Societate Jeſu, qui in odium fidei ab hæreticis vel aliis occiſi ſunt, Romæ, 1657, in folio.

[B] He augmented the Catalogue of the writers of his Order, begun by the Jeſuit Ribadeneira.] That the reader, who is deſirous of knowing the hiſtory of the Catalogue we are ſpeaking of, may not have the trouble of going from one volume to another, I will take notice here, that Father Ribadeneira, in the year 1602, began the Catalogue of the Writers among the Jeſuits. This at firſt contained but a few ſheets: afterwards he augmented it, made it a volume, and publiſhed it at Antwerp in the year 1608. It was reprinted the following year at Lyons with ſome additions and corrections touching ſome things concerning the French Jeſuits, which the authors had not been well acquainted with. Father Julius Nigroni found that this work wanted ſtill ſome further emendations in ſeveral places, eſpecially with regard to the Italian Jeſuits; therefore a new edition of it was printed at Antwerp in the year 1613. Father Andrew Schott undertook the care of it, and made ſome conſiderable additions to it (1); however the work was ſtill defective, and therefore Alegambe undertook to correct it, and to make it the more fit to give an advantageous idea of the learning of the ſociety. He publiſhed it in the year 1643. It has been ſtill very much augmented by the Jeſuit Sotuel, whoſe edition appeared at Rome in 1675; and they will be obliged doubtleſs to augment it afreſh, as well by reaſon that the ſociety of the Jeſuits is continually furniſhing out new authors, as becauſe many things eſcaped the laſt Continuator, which will be of uſe to make the Catalogue of the Order more perfect. The ſecond tome of the Roman Catalogue (2) gives us to underſtand that the Jeſuit Bonanni is now employed on the catalogue of ſuch writers of his ſociety as have publiſhed any thing ſince the year 1675.

(1) Præfatione Alegambe.

(2) Printed at Rome 1692, the Author Proſper Mandoſio.

Alegambe is without diſpute wonderfully exact, but nevertheleſs his book is not without faults both of omiſſion and commiſſion. He has not always given us the firſt edition of books, which is a very material neglect, and which all the compilers hitherto have been guilty of: nor has any perſon as yet undertaken to give us an exact collection of all the editions, and to mark out carefully the firſt: Geſner and his continuators have been extremely negligent in this reſpect. Father Sotuel endeavouring to avoid the fault of being over particular, which Alegambe ſometimes is a little too much addicted to, has fallen into the contrary extreme of being too dry; it is certain he had not a genius for ſuch a work equal to that of Alegambe. The curious, I ſpeak of thoſe who excuſe him on account of the orders he might have receiv'd from his Superiors with regard to anonymous and pſeudonymous writers, are of opinion that his work, in this reſpect, falls ſhort of the former's, in which we find an account of ſo many authors who lay concealed.

[C] We ſhall relate the different characters that have been given of his Bibliotheca, &c.] Mr. Baillet will furniſh us with a remark on this head. To begin with the favourable ſide.

He ſays (3), that the Bibliotheca of the Writers among the Jeſuits .... is a large collection, which far ſurpaſſes any thing that was ever writ in the ſame way, and that we are to look upon it as the moſt finiſh'd piece of its kind: that according to Nicholas Antonio (4), the Jeſuits have given us in this work a ſpecimen of their great curioſity and induſtry in things which relate to themſelves, and that having built on the foundation of Ribadeneira, they have raiſed this grand edifice, whoſe beauty more particularly conſiſts in the juſtneſs and proportion of its parts, all the glory of which is due to Alegambe, an author ſo unerring and ſo juſt, that there is not the leaſt room to fear being miſled by him, not only becauſe he is clear and never confounds one Author with another: but alſo becauſe he never aſcribes to the Jeſuits any books which they did not really write, and is very exact and faithful in his repreſentations of thoſe, which were actually publiſhed by any of the Society. Mr. Baillet adds, that it is no mean praiſe ... to have the reputation of having carefully avoided a fault, which the greateſt part of the Regulars have been guilty of, who have given any account of the illuſtrious Men of their reſpective Orders, who thinking that it was doing an honour to their Societies to ſwell the number of their learned

(3) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. num. 112, pag. 130.

(4) Præfat. Bib. Script. Hiſpanic.

years that he lived after the publication of the first, he collected many things which might serve, either for corrections or additions. Father Sotuel made use of them, when he published at Rome in 1675 a new edition of this catalogue (c).

(a) Sotuel, ibid.

It cannot be denied but that there are in this book many indifferent Authors, and many of the first rank. But some pretend, that if one should continue it, there will be found a very sensible disproportion, that is, that the great men will be incomparably more scarce in the continuation of it, than in that which has hitherto appeared. This gives me an opportunity of communicating to the publick what passed in a conversation of some persons of learning in 1697 [D].

ALES

Men, and of their Saints, tho' without choice or distinction, have given a place in their fraternity to a great number of authors who never belonged to it; whereas we scarce see a single one in the Bibliotheque of the Jesuits, who had not been a Jesuit: nay further that he does not so much as mention even those writers who had belonged to the society, but afterwards quitted it; as for instance Papyrius Masso, Gaspar Scioppius, Mark Anthony de Dominis, Christian Franken, &c. or that if we do find any such taken notice of, it is only upon account of the books which they wrote before they quitted the Order; and that for no other reason we find mention made of Francis de Macedo, a Portugueze, who from Jesuit turned Cordelier, and Claudius Dausquey, a Fleming, who left the Society to be made Canon at Tournay. In short Mr. Baillet remarks that according to the author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (5), Alegambe has critically hit the taste of our age, that is to say, of all persons of good sense; that this taste consists in seeing every thing, as far as it bears any relation to History, in an exact, chronological view; that it is this which has stamped a reputation on the Elogies of Alegambe, who throughout the whole gives the time when, and place where, his authors were born, the age in which they commenced Jesuits, their employments, and most remarkable actions, in the order of time they succeeded; and that this order hath something in it very entertaining. Mr. Baillet adds (6), that as the Society of Jesuits has been hitherto the most learned of all the Societies of Regulars, or at least the most productive of writers of all kinds, (excepting in Physic) we are from thence to judge of the advantage which may be drawn from this copious Catalogue, which is very well writ, without affecting any particular style, and without laboured beauties, digested into a very beautiful method, and embellished with a great number of very exact tables. So much for the favourable side; let us now pass on to the other. Mr. Baillet says (7), that as the best shaped bodies are not without some defects and blemishes, seeing their beauty consists in nothing but symmetry and proportion of parts, so neither ought we to be surprized to find that this beautiful Catalogue has met with its censures, as well as others; that some have thought the Author guilty of so much partiality to the Society as to make him almost always shew its writers in the most favourable light; that throughout the whole of this large volume, we find little else than encomiums, and that in so vast a number of authors and books neither ALEGAMBE nor Sotuel allow a single one to be bad, unless such as were either put into the inquisition or index; that others have further observed, that there is scarce one writer in all this Catalogue, who is not represented as a Saint. It is true, all reasonable persons ought to rest satisfied with seeing both at the beginning and end of the book a solemn declaration, that he does not take upon him to answer for every thing that is advanced concerning the sanctity and virtues ascribed to his brethren, any more than for the other elogiums which are given them. It is a harder matter, according to Mr. Baillet (8), to acquit him of two other articles he stands charged with. The first is, that Alegambe being imposed upon by false memoirs sent to him by ill designing people, has branded as heretics Mr. Marion, and Mr. Servin, and some other illustrious Magistrates and good Catholics. The second is, that he has been too indiscreet in revealing certain matters which the Society was nearly concerned in having concealed and kept secret; as for example, when he assures us that the Amphitheater of Honour (α); which was wrote against the Royal authority by one Bonarscius, was the work of a celebrated Jesuit, tho' Father Coton had satisfied Henry the Great of the contrary; and that some other Books, which were written against Episcopacy and the Hierarchy in general, and against the Clergy of France and the Sorbonne in particular, were composed by some Fathers of the Society, though the Heads of the Jesuits of France, who were the Principals of the religious houses in Paris, being cited upon this occasion, had protested, and given it under their hands and seals, that the Jesuits were not the authors of those libels. Mr. Baillet adds, that Sotuel has been more discreet than Alegambe in this point; for in his edition we have none of the writings of the pretended Smith, and the spurious Of Jesu, which have given so much offence; nor likewise the books of Guimenius, of Vernant, nor of the Apologist of the Casuists: and he has also taken care to inform us previously, that his passing over such kind of books in silence is to be looked upon as disallowing them to be genuine, and as a tacit sentence of condemnation passed on them by the Society. But then on the other hand we can't deny but that he has, in several other places, left the faults of Alegambe untouched; or that his edition is less exact and beautiful than Alegambe's. See the foregoing remark, towards the end. I will just take notice hereafter, at the end of the remark [C] of the article ANNAT, of a small defect in this Catalogue.

(5) For the month of July 1684, Art. V, where he condemns indirectly those who content themselves with describing in a florid style the qualities of a man, without taking notice either of his country, family, or different employments, in which place he says very expressly, That one can't without indignation, and complaining of the negligence of the Historian, read the life of many of the Roman Emperors, seeing it neither acquaints us with the place of their birth, their family, their age, nor the manner how they advanced themselves.

(6) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. num. 112. pag. 135.

(7) Idem, pag. 133.

(8) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. pag. 139.

§ (α) This book is ascribed to the Jesuit Carolus Scribonius of Antwerp, in the Catalogue of Ribadeneira, printed at Lyons, in 8vo, for Pillehotte, and at Antwerp, ex officina Plantiniana, 1613, in 8vo. CRIT. REM.]

[D] I shall remark what passed in a conversation of some persons of learning, on the subject of this Catalogue, in the year 1697.] Some Gentlemen, who came to Delft with the Plenipotentiaries of France, were in company one day with some French Refugees, and with some of the natives of the country; and as is usual where Men of Letters meet together, the conversation ran chiefly on books and learned Men. They almost all agreed that learning was now in a declining state, and they observed more than once, with an air of triumph, that the Society of Jesuits could no longer produce ingenious Men. The Bellarmins, the Sirmonds, the Petavius's, added they, have not left behind them their equals: their places, as well as those of many other less illustrious persons are still vacant. Mr.  was almost the only one who did not approve this reflexion, and who desired the company to consider, that those who delight in advancing every where such assertions as these, were guilty of a double fault; "for in the first place, "says he, they make but slight mention of what e- "qually concerns other orders and communities, and "insist altogether upon this one: this partiality to "persons is without dispute very unfair. Can the "Universities of France at present shew any Pro- "fessors in Physic as famous as the Fernelius's and the "Silvius's, or any Professors of Law to be compared "to the Donellus's, the Duarenus's, the Hofmans, and "the Cujas's? Shew us if you can amongst the Pro- "testants a Casaubon, a Scaliger, or a Salmasius. "Name us in Holland a Grotius, a Heinsius or a "Vossius. Are not all these great Men dead with- "out leaving any rivals in fame; are their places "yet supplied with equal successors? We must al- "low then that the defect which you would fix "upon the Jesuits, is common to all bodies and so- "cieties of men in Europe; it is a defect of the age "and not of their particular order. Do not "think, continues he, and this was his second re- flexion, "that I am of opinion that the part of the "seventeenth

Whether the Jesuits are as able Men now as formerly.

ALES (ALEXANDER) in Latin Aleſius, a celebrated Divine of the Confeſſion of Augſbourg, and author of many books (a), was born at Edinburgh in Scotland, the 23d of April 1500. He made an admirable progreſs in the ſchool Divinity, and entered the liſts very early againſt Luther. It was then the controverſy in faſhion, and the grand field of battle, wherein all Authors, young and old, endeavoured to give proofs of their merit. He bore a part a little afterwards in the diſpute that Patrick Hamilton maintained againſt the Eccleſiaſticks [A], in favour of the new faith which they had given him a taſte of at Marpurgh. He endeavoured to bring him back to the Catholic religion, but he could not prevail upon him, and only began to doubt himſelf about his own religion, by the diſcourſe of this Gentleman, and more ſtill by the conſtancy he ſhewed at the ſtake, where David Beton, Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, cauſed him to be burnt. The doubts of our Ales would perhaps have had no conſequence, if they would have let him enjoy peaceably the Canonſhip he poſſeſſed in the Metropolitan Church of St. Andrews, but they perſecuted him with ſo much violence, that he was obliged to retire into Germany [B], where he was at laſt perfectly inſtructed. He wavered a little in the beginning between the two religions, as may be ſeen by his Anſwers to Cochleus; but after all his doubts he embraced Lutheraniſm and perſevered in it till his death. It is true, that in the different parties which were formed, he ranked himſelf ſometimes on the ſide of thoſe who appeared the leaſt Orthodox. Thus, in 1560, he maintained the doctrine of George Major, concerning the neceſſity of good works [C]. I forgot to ſay, that the change which was made in England, with

(a) See the note [C].

" ſeventeenth Century, in which we live, enjoys a " leſs ſhare of learning than the laſt; for on the " contrary I am perſuaded, all things conſidered, it " has the advantage over it, and that you miſtake " the difference of taſte for what you call a decay " of learning. The ſtudy of Criticiſm is declined, " mankind have turned their genius to exact reaſon- " ing (9), and have ſtudied to improve their mind " more than their memory, to be maſters of fineneſs " of thought, and elegance of expreſſion. An ap- " plication of this nature does not produce large vo- " lumes, nor impoſe upon the Public in folio, to " raiſe a great name, but in reality makes greater " men, and furniſhes a ſagacity, which is more to be " valued than the deep learning of the Grammari- " ans and Philologiſts. The Jeſuits have come into " this new taſte, and this is the reaſon that their " learned Men are not of the ſame ſtamp with thoſe " of former days. Have you conſidered, as I have " done, adds he, the conſiderable number of fa- " mous Men there are at this time in their college at " Paris? Father Bernier is ſo compleat a Maſter of " the languages, that all the foreigners both of Eu- " rope and Aſia reſort to him, and converſe with " him as if he was of their own nation. Can one find a " greater treaſure of polite Literature than Father Har- " douin? Is not Father Commire one of the great- " eſt Latin Poets of the age? Where is the man that " for the French tongue, and a true taſte for com- " poſition, ſurpaſſes Father Bouhours; or, in claſſical " learning, Father Juvency; or, in fine Latin, Father " de la Beaume, who has juſt publiſhed the works " of Father Sirmond? Are there any better writers " in all France than Father le Tellier, Father Daniel, " Father Doucin, &c.? I only mention ſome few, " though without any deſign of doing injuſtice to a " great many others which I forbear naming." Theſe were the words of Mr. , if the perſon I had the converſation from did not deceive me. I leave every one to his own thoughts upon them.

(9) See the remark [D] on the article ACONTIUS.

[A] He bore a part in the diſpute of Patrick Hamilton with the Eccleſiaſtics.] Beza hath given in a few words the Elogy of this Proteſtant Martyr, who was of the blood of the Kings of Scotland. He places his martyrdom in the year 1530 (1). Buchanan places him in 1528 (2), and makes him the ſon of the Earl of Arran, by the ſiſter of the Duke of Albani. He takes notice that a little after his ſuffering, the death of a Dominican, who had been his accuſer, very much ſhocked the minds of people. This Dominican was by name Alexander Campbel. He was a young man, of great natural parts, and a great deal of learning. He had often diſcourſed with Hamilton upon the interpretation of Scripture, and he had confeſſed to him, that he aſſented to the truth of the greateſt part of thoſe doctrines, which were then look'd upon as paradoxes. Hamilton remembring this confeſſion, when he ſaw him to be his accuſer, called him a wicked man, and cited him to appear before the Throne of God. Theſe words troubled him in ſuch a manner, that he loſt his ſenſes, and died mad ſoon after (3). Ales gives a long account (4) of the execution of Patrick Hamilton, which Rabus has inſerted in his German Hiſtory of Martyrs.

